Seale remained jailed pending a bail hearing set for tomorrow. His court-appointed lawyers said he is suffering from cancer. His trial is scheduled for April 2, though that is expected to be delayed.

Seale's arrest Wednesday marked the latest attempt by prosecutors in the South to close the books on crimes from the civil rights era that went unpunished. In recent years, authorities in Mississippi and Alabama won convictions in the 1963 assassination of NAACP activist Medgar Evers; the 1963 Birmingham, Ala., church bombing that killed four black girls; and the 1964 Philadelphia, Miss., slayings of the three civil rights workers — the case that led to the discovery of Moore's and Dee's bodies.

In the dismissal motion, Nester said prosecutors needed to have charged Seale under the law in effect at the time of the alleged offense. The statute of limitations on the federal crime of kidnapping is five years, meaning the deadline to charge Seale was 1969, she argued.

While the other cases dealt with murder charges, Seale's is the first case in Mississippi to involve federal kidnapping charges.

Earnest Avants, convicted in 2003 on federal charges of aiding and abetting in the killing of a black handyman in the Homochitto National Forest in Mississippi in 1966, was among the defendants in recent civil rights- era crimes who argued the statute of limitations had run out.

A federal judge, later upheld by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, ruled that there was not an unreasonable delay in indicting Avants, because the federal government did not become aware it had jurisdiction until 1999, when it was discovered that the slaying occurred in a national forest.

Men Shot By Md. Official Are Freed From Custody (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda And Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Two critically wounded men who were shot by the No. 2 homeland security official in Prince George's County were released from police custody yesterday as the department backed off earlier statements that the men would probably face assault charges.

Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey determined yesterday that Robert White, 36, and Brandon D. Clark, 22, should no longer be in custody. "The state's attorney's office did not want to rush to judgment. We believe that further inspection of the evidence and further interviews with all concerned parties is necessary before any charges are brought forward," said Ramon Korionoff, Ivey's spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0123872

Michael J. Winkelman, an attorney for the men's families, said the decision means that their relatives will have free access to them in the hospital.

On Thursday, county police said assault charges were pending against the men, both furniture movers, for allegedly assaulting Cpl. Keith Washington, who is also a county police officer, in his Accokeek home Wednesday. They said then that Washington apparently acted in self-defense, based on statements from Washington and a family member whom they did not identify. The movers were unarmed, police said.

Yesterday, Sharon Taylor, the police department's top spokeswoman, said the statement that assault charges were pending "was obviously based on preliminary information."

"No charges have been made yet. Nothing can be decided until a fair and thorough investigation has been done, which this department is going to do," Taylor said. "There are two sides to the story, and so far we don't have both sides."

Washington could not be reached. Steven E. Sunday, a police union lawyer who met with Washington, did not respond yesterday to a phone message seeking comment.

White, of the District, and Clark, of Oxon Hill, remained at Prince George's Hospital Center yesterday. Both were breathing with the assistance of tubes and were unable to talk, Winkelman said. Police investigators have been unable to interview White and Clark because of their condition, Taylor said.

According to Winkelman and Leelee Best, Clark's girlfriend, Clark and White were working as subcontractors, moving pieces for Marlo Furniture, when they arrived at Washington's house to exchange a bedroom set.

Winkelman said the delivery contractor for whom Clark and White worked said the two men called him from Washington's house before the shooting to report that Washington was "very upset."

Speaking outside the hospital, Clark's mother, Marilynn Clark, said she was allowed to see her son and his co-worker yesterday for the first time since the shooting.

"I got a lot of eye contact with them," Clark said, adding that she told each man that relatives who loved them were nearby. "Both of them had tears coming out of their eyes. They understood what I was saying."

She said of her son, "I reminded him that he's strong and that he'll be okay."

White's mother and two siblings also arrived in Prince George's yesterday, having driven through the night from South Carolina. Late yesterday afternoon, they were waiting to see White.

"I just want to see my son," Carrie White Williams said. "If he just looks in my face, I know he'll be doing better."

White recently moved to the District from South Carolina. According to court records, White was convicted in the early 1990s in South Carolina on charges of assault, receiving stolen property and burglary.

Winkelman said that "any alleged prior criminal history has no bearing on this incident."

Washington was appointed the county's deputy director of homeland security in 2004 by County Executive Jack B. Johnson. He is a longtime Johnson supporter who worked at one time as his driver.

Yesterday, Johnson, a former state's attorney, said of the probe into the shooting: "My position is the same position I had as a prosecutor. Every investigation must be aboveboard, beyond reproach. No stones must be left unturned."

Staff writer Rosalind S. Helderman and staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

No Rush To Judgment (WP)

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

In Prince George's, a police officer, a shooting and two men down

APRINCE GEORGE'S County police officer with an unsettling record of anger management problems gets into a verbal dispute with two men making a routine furniture delivery to his home. The dispute escalates. The officer, who has friends in high places despite his checkered history, ends up shooting both men with his 9mm Beretta. The deliverymen are critically injured, hospitalized and unable to give their accounts to investigators. Yet the very next day, a police spokesman says that the police officer acted in self-defense and the deliverymen will probably be charged with assault.

Talk about a rush to judgment.

Yesterday Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High acted to restore his department's credibility. "Right now the investigation is far from concluded," the chief said, rightly. "I want to see what the full facts disclose. We're not charging anyone right now."

We don't presume to know what happened Wednesday night when Cpl. Keith Washington shot the two men making a delivery for Marlo Furniture at his home in Accokeek. We don't assume that the two men he shot, Brandon D. Clark and Robert White, were angels; Mr. White evidently has an arrest record, and Mr. Clark also has had a brush or two with the law.

But we do know that Cpl. Washington has been the subject of repeated complaints about his on- and off-duty behavior. The common thread is that he turns routine encounters into highly charged, violent incidents. In separate meetings of a homeowners association on whose board he served three years ago, Cpl. Washington assaulted a property manager, shoved the association's treasurer and berated the association's president, it was alleged. Earlier, Cpl. Washington was sued for wrongfully arresting and abusing a man who protested Cpl. Washington's allegedly rough treatment of a motorist involved in a fender bender; an initial $260,000 judgment against him was overturned on appeal.

Cpl. Washington is a friend and political ally of County Executive Jack B. Johnson. In 2004, Mr. Johnson named Cpl. Washington to the newly created job of deputy director of homeland security for the county. At the time, we were among those questioning Mr. Johnson's judgment in appointing someone of Cpl. Washington's evidently deficient interpersonal skills.

Cpl. Washington, Mr. Clark and Mr. White all deserve a thorough, evenhanded investigation. What's on the line here is not only the reputation of a county police officer and the lives of two working men but the impartiality and judgment of police and prosecutors in Prince George's County.

Philadelphia Jails To Return To Court Oversight (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 26 (AP) — A federal judge ordered city jails to go back under court monitoring, describing conditions there as overcrowded and squalid and saying that inmates lacked access to clean cells and adequate medical attention.

The judge, R. Barclay Surrick of Federal District Court, issued a scathing ruling on Thursday, saying that holding facilities were overflowing and that lockups at police stations were firetraps that violated detainees' constitutional rights.

The ruling came in a lawsuit filed last year on behalf of 11 inmates with the help of David Rudovsky, a University of Pennsylvania law professor who filed a similar suit 35 years ago. That case led to court oversight of the jails from 1971 to 2001.

Judge Surrick had toured the system, which holds roughly 8,800 inmates.

While waiting to be assigned to regular cells, detainees at one jail "were forced to sleep overlapping one another and on every inch of concrete floor," Judge Surrick wrote. "Prisoners slept with their heads next to the toilet."

Inmates would spend days "without bedding provisions, sleeping, if they could, on metal benches or directly on the concrete floor," he wrote.

The city solicitor, Romulo L. Diaz Jr., said Friday that officials were evaluating the decision. Mr. Diaz said the city remained committed to improving conditions and to developing a fire safety plan that would satisfy the court.

Mr. Diaz has said the city needs more money to hire staff members and buy equipment, and to seek other solutions like home-monitoring devices for low-level offenders.

The city spends $262 million a year on its jail system, up from $93 million in 1987 and $195 million in 2001.

Professor Says Seminary Dismissed Her Over Gender (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

FORT WORTH, Jan. 26 (AP) — A former theology professor at a prominent Southern Baptist seminary here said officials had told her to leave because women are biblically forbidden to teach men.

The professor, Sheri Klouda, said she was hired in 2002 to a tenure-track position as an assistant professor at Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, where she taught Hebrew and had earned her doctorate. But in 2004, Dr. Klouda said, an administrator, whom she would not name, told her that the seminary's president, Paige Patterson, would not be recommending her for tenure because she was a woman, and that she should plan to move on.

Dr. Klouda said she continued teaching for two more years, receiving good evaluations and usually filling her classrooms. In January 2006, the same administrator told her she would no longer be able to teach but would be paid through the 2006-7 academic year. A couple of weeks later, she said, she was told she would be terminated at the end of 2006 instead. She appealed to Dr. Patterson in April, she said, to no avail.

Dr. Patterson did not respond to requests for comment, and Van McClain, president of the board of trustees, said he could not discuss the matter but e-mailed several previously written statements.

Mr. McClain said Dr. Klouda had not been dismissed, but he did say that she had not been granted tenure. He also said it had been rare for women to teach theology at Southern Baptist seminaries.

"With regard to the tightening of the policy of women teaching in the School of Theology, there has been no change in policy, but rather a return to the way it has always been," Mr. McClain said.

DOJ_NMG_0123874

“There was a momentary lax of the parameters,” he said, adding that the seminary had “now returned to its traditional, confessional and biblical position.”

Southern Baptist leaders agree that the role of pastor is reserved for men, based on a verse in I Timothy in which the Apostle Paul says, “I permit no woman to teach or to have authority over a man.” The 2000 Baptist Faith and Message prohibits women from serving as pastors.

But critics say the interpretation should not be applied to the seminary because it is not a church.

Wade Burleson, a Baptist pastor and blogger in Enid, Okla., has denounced the seminary’s treatment of Dr. Klouda. Mr. Burleson said leaders of the Southern Baptist Convention were trying to expand the church’s statement of faith.

“The extraordinary belief that women should be forbidden from teaching men the Bible, or ‘doctrine,’ is held by only a handful of Southern Baptist leaders, including at least one agency head and a few strategically placed trustees in various agencies,” Mr. Burleson wrote on his blog. “Unfortunately, the majority of Southern Baptists let them dictate policy for the entire convention.”

In June, Dr. Klouda took a position with Taylor University, a nondenominational evangelical college in Indiana. “I gave up four years toward tenure,” she said. “I had to begin all over again.”

She said she did not know if she would take any action against Southwestern.

New Voting Machine Delays Continue (AP)

By Marc Humbert, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — It is highly unlikely new voting machines will be in place for this year's fall elections in New York and fully implementing them may have to wait until 2009, state election officials said Friday.

That could leave New Yorkers using the state's aging lever-action voting machines for yet another presidential election.

The prediction, from state Board of Election officials, came after state and county officials participated in two days of meetings about the situation this week with officials of the U.S. Justice Department.

"Clearly, 2007 is going to be very difficult for us and they understand that," said Peter Kosinski, the board's co-executive director. "We are in discussions about what is doable."

Federal officials sued New York last year over its slowest-in-the-nation moves to comply with provisions of the federal Help America Vote Act, which was adopted after the disputed 2000 presidential election. HAVA was designed to get states to replace their aging voting systems with modern machinery. The plan was to have everything in place for the 2006 elections at the latest.

Under a court-approved settlement of the lawsuit, New York agreed to have new machinery in place that could be used by handicapped voters for the 2006 elections. Other voters continued to use lever-action machinery.

While the state Legislature and former Gov. George Pataki had adopted legislation last year that required new voting machines for all voters to be in place for the 2007 elections, testing of possible new machines for certification by the state has been repeatedly delayed. The deadline for certification was originally set for late last year, then moved to this March and further pushed back to May by the state board earlier this month.

"It looks like it won't happen in 2007," state board spokesman Lee Daghlian said Friday. "I suppose it could happen in 2008, but there are some who feel they don't want to have new machines out there in a presidential year, so the next obvious move would be '09."

Daghlian noted that any such delay would require a change in state law and approval by the federal courts.

"That's all up in the air at the moment," he said.

"It's pretty clear, they are definitely interested in trying to get them in place for 2008," said Kosinski when asked about how federal officials were reacting.

Nonetheless, Kosinski said, "We don't want to have to set out some artificial deadline."

Counties across the state can't purchase new machines until the state board certifies which ones meet the state's standards. It was recently revealed that the private company in charge of testing for the state, Ciber Inc., was having problems with its federal certification as an approved testing company. New York officials have suspended testing while they investigate that situation.

Given the questions that have surfaced nationally over the security of some new voting systems and problems other states have faced with new machines, even one-time critics of New York's slowness to comply with HAVA now support a further delay.

"Obviously, 2008 is not the appropriate time to introduce a new technology," said Barbara Bartoletti, a spokeswoman for New York's League of Women Voters which is advocating a delay until 2009.

Bartoletti said the additional time was needed to make sure new voting systems were adequately tested and that poll workers and voters were properly trained and educated.

DOJ_NMG_0123875

"We feel New York should go slowly and do it right," said Bartoletti.

Kosinski said that given the problems many other states have encountered, "our delay has worked to our benefit."

Nonetheless, Kosinski acknowledged the delay in complying with HAVA has led to the possibility New York might have to return at least $50 million in federal aid meant to help pay for new voting machines. The state has also received more than $200 million in additional HAVA-related aid. Kosinski said state officials are working with New York's congressional delegation to protect the funding.

"We have not given back any money as of today," he said.

The lever-action voting machine was first demonstrated in Lockport, N.Y., in 1892 and soon became the dominant system all across New York and much of the nation. It is still the primary voting system used in New York.

Official Proposes "Drafting" Poll Workers To Ease Problems (NYT)

By Bob Driehaus

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

CINCINNATI, Jan. 26 — The chronic shortage of election workers in Ohio could be solved by requiring residents to work at the polls the way they fulfill jury duty, the newly elected secretary of state says.

The official, Jennifer L. Brunner, a Democrat who won the office vacated by J. Kenneth Blackwell, a Republican, is asking lawmakers to require conscripted workers to have two days of training and then work eight-hours on Election Day.

If the Legislature approves the plan, Ohio would be the first state to force people to be election workers.

The system has been troubled by too few workers struggling with electronic machines and changes like the new requirement for voter IDs.

“Under Ohio law, we’re supposed to have equal numbers of poll workers from both parties at each polling place, but we don’t always,” Ms. Brunner said.

The workers’ average age is 72, and states and advocates around the country are grappling with a shortage of workers, according to research by VoteTrustUSA, a nonpartisan group.

“We are now facing a small crisis,” said Curtis Gans, director of the Center for the Study of the American Electorate at American University in Washington. “Most of the poll workers are older people, and they’re dying off.”

The problems here have been compounded since 2000 by accusations of mismanagement. This week, two Cuyahoga County election workers were convicted of misconduct for rigging a recount of the 2004 presidential election.

The communications director at VoteTrustUSA, Susan Greenhalgh, welcomed the effort to compel workers but stopped short of endorsing it.

“We need to see where the opt-out provisions are,” Ms. Greenhalgh said. “The last thing you want is somebody who really, really doesn’t want to be there working the polls.”

Ms. Brunner, a former judge in Franklin County, said poll workers would fall under the same rules as jurors and would be drawn from registered voters. Conscripted workers, who would receive a stipend, would supplement the 48,000 poll workers in the state. They are paid $95 a day.

Officials could replace defiant workers who refuse to work.

Ms. Brunner said she hoped to have the system in place for the 2008 election but would not rush it. She said that she had not estimated the cost, but that it was likely to be more than the current system.

Candice Hoke, a professor of election law and the director of the Cleveland State Center for Election Integrity, praised the plan for allowing people who want to work at the polls to serve without fear of losing their jobs as a result of missing work.

“The downside is it takes a good deal of training, particularly with the complexity of the systems we have today,” Ms. Hoke said.

Advocates of an election overhaul prefer maintaining a pool of workers who voluntarily return, to limit training.

“It’s almost become a specialized job,” said Dan Seligson, editor of Electionline.org, which monitors reform efforts. “In a perfect world, you would have the same group of young people come in, do it for five years and then bring in their friends to do it for five years.”

R. Doug Lewis, executive director of the Election Center in Houston, would prefer the Ohio initiative on a smaller scale along the lines of tests in small, medium and large counties.

“I think we need to keep an open mind but realize that some of these ideas may not be as convenient as they appear at first blush,” Mr. Lewis said.

Douglas County, Neb., is one of the few counties with such a conscript system. Its election commissioner, Dave Phipps, said the system had worked brilliantly for 20 years.

DOJ_NMG_0123876

Half the county's 2,000 poll workers are "draftees," required to work in four elections, resulting in fully staffed polls for the 300,000 registered voters.

A drawback is higher absenteeism, Mr. Phipps said, a hurdle overcome by recruiting slightly more workers than needed. Technology-savvy younger people have lowered the average age of poll workers to 52.

The leaders of the Democratic minority in the Ohio legislature, Senator Teresa Fedor and Representative Joyce Beatty, will consider the proposal and other changes, including mail-in ballots for elections that involve just issues.

"We need to put more attention into our elections system than we have in the past," Ms. Fedor said. "It's time to update it."

The Senate president, Bill Harris, a Republican, declined to comment before receiving a detailed proposal.

Representative Jim Hughes, a Republican who is seeking reappointment as chairman of the Election and Ethics Committee, said: "Elections are a symbol of freedom in this country. Off the cuff, it kind of seems a little bit oppressive making service mandatory."

New York Won't Replace Voting Machines By The Fall (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

New York officials have given up on replacing the state's aging voting machines by the fall elections, and some would like to put off buying new electronic voting systems until after the 2008 presidential election, state officials said yesterday.

New York is the last state to update its machines, and the latest delay comes amid growing questions about the work of a laboratory that was hired to help test the machines being offered by five bidders.

Based in part on the problems with the testing lab, the New York State Board of Elections has pushed back its deadline for certifying which machines would be acceptable until at least May.

Given the months it would take for counties to acquire the machines and train poll workers, "that would make it impossible to replace anything more than a few isolated machines for the 2007 elections," said Douglas A. Kellner, a board co-chairman.

Mr. Kellner said it might be possible to have the new system ready for the presidential primary in March 2008. An association of county election officials passed a resolution last week urging the state to wait until 2009, and Mr. Kellner said most board members agreed that it would be better if the state did not have to make such sweeping changes amid the high turnout of a presidential election.

But because the electronic systems are easier for the disabled to use than the old lever machines, the state was required by Congress and a federal court order to make the changes more quickly. Mr. Kellner said those orders would need to be amended to allow for further delays and to let New York hold on to at least $50 million in federal funds to help pay for the machines.

Mr. Kellner said the elections board was also considering whether to terminate its contract with the testing lab, Ciber Inc., which has also run into trouble with federal officials.

The board suspended Ciber's work earlier this month after The New York Times reported that federal officials had found deficiencies in its practices and had held up its application for temporary accreditation under a new oversight program.

State election officials then asked Ciber, based in Greenwood Village, Colo., and the federal Election Assistance Commission for the reports about the deficiencies. The company turned them over on Thursday, after state officials threatened to subpoena the documents. The federal commission posted them on its Web site yesterday, along with a letter warning Ciber that it had only four to five more weeks to fix the problems.

According to the documents, a federal auditor found last July that Ciber, the nation's largest tester of voting machine software, did not follow its own quality-control procedures or conduct all the proper tests.

The documents indicate that in many cases, the lab simply used tests suggested by the voting machine manufacturers, rather than running standardized checks of its own. The auditor also criticized the lab for "acceding too quickly" to requests by the voting machine companies to modify the tests.

Voting machine experts have long been concerned about possible conflicts of interest in the testing, and some say the problems with Ciber have raised questions about the security and reliability of some of the machines now in use.

In a written response to the audit, company officials also acknowledged "relatively loose handling" of meetings during the testing. "Since we are a small group, we often just call each other down the hall for a meeting, especially if something is critical," the response said.

Ciber's spokeswoman, Diane C. Stoner, said in a statement yesterday that the company had fixed most of the problems and expected to receive the federal certification.

DOJ_NMG_0123877

ANTITRUST:

Ringleader Sentenced In Concrete Scheme (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran

The Indianapolis Star, January 27, 2007

Fishers businessman gets 14-month prison term for his role in organizing cartel that fixed prices

The second of two ringleaders in a conspiracy to fix ready-mix concrete prices in the Indianapolis area was sentenced Friday to 14 months in federal prison.

Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney gave Gus "Butch" Nuckols III, 46, Fishers, a sentence seven months shorter than the one the government had recommended.

Nuckols' sentence matched that of price-fixing conspirator Scott D. Hughey, 52, president of Hughey Inc., a company doing business as Carmel Concrete Products. Hughey was sentenced Dec. 14.

Nuckols held two secret meetings to fix prices from July 2000 through May 2004 at a horse barn on his property.

Antitrust officials estimate $37.5 million to $100 million in concrete sales by Nuckols' firm, Builder's Materials & Supply Co., were affected by the conspiracy to increase prices and limit discounts to major purchasers. In June, McKinney fined Nuckols' company $4 million. The company also had pleaded guilty to an antitrust violation.

During sentencing, McKinney said he was concerned about an interview Nuckols gave WISH (Channel 8) in December. In the interview, the president and owner of the Fishers-based company said market "prices were eroding, and we probably did what any businessman would do." Nuckols also referred to fallout from the FBI and Justice Department investigation as "a hassle."

"Tell me why I shouldn't be concerned about that," McKinney said to Nuckols in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis. "I want to be sure you really understand what you did was against the law."

Nuckols was contrite during his sentencing, saying he had brought shame upon himself, his family and his company and employees through his leadership of the conspiracy, which potentially affected hundreds of millions of dollars in spending on public and private projects.

"I don't have a word in my vocabulary to tell you how sorry I am for my conduct," Nuckols said. "What I did was wrong, selfish. I'll spend the rest of my life trying to make up for what I did."

Jonathan A. Epstein, an attorney for the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, asserted Nuckols was "saying all the right things" at his sentencing but had minimized his role in the conspiracy during trial testimony in December and in the TV interview.

"This isn't 'a hassle'; it's a crime," Epstein said. "We don't think those are the words of a man who fully appreciates he broke the law."

Nuckols' attorney, C. Joseph Russell, accompanied Nuckols to the TV interview at his horse barn and said he had told Nuckols not to admit responsibility during the interview, even though he had pleaded guilty to the conspiracy.

Ultimately, McKinney accepted that Nuckols regrets his conduct. In addition to his prison sentence, Nuckols must pay a $50,000 fine and spend a year on supervised release after serving his prison term.

Call Star reporter Kevin Corcoran at (317) 444-2750.

Delta Creditors May Seek Extension From US Airways (BLOOM)

By Mary Schlangenstein And Jeff St. Onge, Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, January 27, 2007

Delta Air Lines Inc.'s creditors may ask US Airways Group Inc. to extend the Feb. 1 deadline on its hostile takeover bid as they study competing plans for the bankrupt carrier's future, people familiar with the matter said.

The nine-member committee of unsecured creditors is split between those favoring a quicker payback of their claims through a US Airways merger and those who would benefit under a Delta plan to emerge from court protection as an independent company, said the people, who didn't want to be identified because the discussions are private.

US Airways wants the panel to urge Atlanta-based Delta, which operates a hub at Salt Lake City International Airport, to open its financial records and trigger a U.S. antitrust review. If the committee doesn't act by Feb. 1, the $9.67 billion offer expires, Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker has said.

US Airways probably would extend its deadline if the creditors "said one single positive thing about the deal," said Jim Corridore, a New York-based analyst for Standard & Poor's. "All they need to do is allow the process to continue. This is not a selection of one plan over the other."

DOJ_NMG_0123878

An extension would give the creditors' panel more time to debate US Airways' merger plan and Delta's bid to leave bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline by mid-2007, the people said.

The committee has "not asked us for an extension of the deadline," said Kelly Sullivan, a spokeswoman for US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz.

"We continue to work constructively and collaboratively with the creditors committee and others involved in our Chapter 11 proceedings," said Betsy Talton, a Delta spokeswoman. She declined to comment on the possible extension request.

Parker has offered $5 billion in cash and 89.5 million US Airways shares for Delta, whose creditors would own 49 percent of what would become the world's largest airline. Delta's plan to remain independent values the airline at as much as $12 billion. Delta is the third-biggest U.S. carrier by traffic; US Airways is seventh.

US Airways and Delta are both courting the creditors committee, which will help set terms for any bankruptcy exit. The panel is led by Boeing Co. and includes Coca-Cola Co.; United Technologies Corp.'s Pratt & Whitney, which makes aircraft engines; and Delta's pilots union.

The committee and its members face a Jan. 31 deadline to file objections to Delta's disclosure statement, which explains the airline's reorganization plan. A hearing on the document is set for Feb. 7.

"There are several large creditors that have conflicts of interest in terms of their willingness or desire to work with Delta in the future," S&P's Corridore said in an interview. "Their best interests may not line up with the best interests of the creditors not on the committee."

A reorganization plan generally doesn't go to all of the airline's creditors for approval until it has the backing of the creditors committee. A judge can confirm a plan over creditor objections as long as it is fair and reasonable.

A separate committee representing 20 institutions that own $2.25 billion of Delta's debt urged the panel on Jan. 24 to begin talks with US Airways.

The bondholders "are interested in maximizing the immediate return on their investment," said Eric Schaffer, a Pittsburgh-based bankruptcy attorney with Reed Smith LLP. Members of the creditors panel "are looking at it from what is arguably a longer-term perspective."

Delta estimates that unsecured claims against it would total $14.2 billion. The airline's September 2005 bankruptcy filing listed debt of $28.3 billion and assets of $21.8 billion.

Hynix Loses Bid For New Trial (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, January 27, 2007

Hynix Semiconductor Inc. lost a bid to revisit a $133.4 million damage award to Rambus Inc. in a patent lawsuit over computer memory-chip technology, as a federal judge said he may decide next month whether to allow the case to move into its final phase.

Rambus shares surged as much as 11 percent. U.S. District Judge Ronald Whyte in San Jose, Calif., said a new trial on damages can't happen until the final phase of the lawsuit, which will address antitrust, unfair competition and fraud claims.

advertisement

The judge Friday set a hearing for Feb. 16 to decide whether he should delay that phase until the U.S. Federal Trade Commission issues its penalty in an antitrust suit against Rambus, a designer of computer memory chip interfaces.

A federal jury in April awarded Rambus $307 million in its dispute with Ichon, South Korea-based Hynix, the world's second- largest memory chipmaker.

Jurors agreed with Rambus' claim that Hynix infringed patents covering fundamental aspects of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, the main type of memory used in computers. Whyte later reduced the award to $133.4 million.

Rivals Voice Complaints About Microsoft's New System (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

BRUSSELS, Jan. 26 (AP) — Rivals of Microsoft renewed their call Friday for European regulators to act against what they say are "illegal practices," charging that the new Vista operating system is the company's effort to extend its monopoly to the Internet.

They asked the European Commission to make a decision "as fast as possible" on a complaint they filed last February. It had accused Microsoft of working to keep its existing monopolies and trying to extend its market dominance into other areas, including Web-based computing.

DOJ_NMG_0123879

Microsoft had no immediate comment beyond saying that the rivals — represented by the European Committee for Interoperable Systems — were not saying anything new. The company has described the group as a front for I.B.M. and other competitors that have tried to use regulatory complaints to their business advantage.

The group said Microsoft's XAML markup language — which it said was positioned to replace the current Web page language HTML — was designed "from the ground up to be dependent on Windows."

"The very same practices the European Commission found to be illegal almost three years ago have now been implemented in Vista," the group of rivals said.

A spokesman for the group, Thomas Vinje, said Microsoft was seeking to impose its own Windows-dependent standards and displace existing ones.

"The end result will be the continued absence of any real consumer choice, years of waiting for Microsoft to improve — or even debug — its monopoly products, and, of course, high prices," Mr. Vinje said.

The rival group represents I.B.M., Nokia, Sun Microsystems, RealNetworks and Oracle along with smaller software companies like the Web browser maker Opera Software and two Linux operating system businesses: Red Hat and Linspire.

The complaint that the group filed in February 2006 accused Microsoff of monopoly abuse in sectors not covered by Europe's 2004 antitrust ruling. That decision found Microsoft had abused its position by bundling media software into its Windows software and squeezing out rival media players.

As a remedy, the European Union ordered Microsoft to share communications code with rivals to make their software work smoothly with Windows. It fined the company last July for dragging its feet over supplying the "complete and accurate" data required.

Microsoft challenged the regulators' conclusions and is awaiting a ruling from the Court of First Instance.

Jury: Broadcom Didn't Violate Patents (AP)

By Elliot Spagat, AP Business Writer

AP, January 27, 2007

A federal jury ruled Friday that Broadcom Corp. did not infringe on two of rival semiconductor maker Qualcomm Inc.'s patents for video compression technology, Broadcom said.

The nine-day trial, the latest turn in a long-running legal battle between the two companies included testimony from both chairmen, Broadcom's Henry Samueli and Qualcomm's Irwin Jacobs.

Lou Lipin, Qualcomm's general counsel, told the San Diego Union-Tribune the company was disappointed with the verdict and had not decided whether to appeal. Qualcomm representatives did not immediately return phone messages from The Associated Press.

The verdict comes amid a fierce attack against Qualcomm's business model by Broadcom, Nokia Corp. and other wireless equipment makers who say Qualcomm charges excessive royalties for rights to its patented inventions.

Qualcomm accused Broadcom of violating two patents for the compressing of video signals - technology that is used in DVD players, digital televisions and iPod music players.

"We are obviously very pleased and very grateful for this jury's diligence in working to arrive at the truth, even when presented with some very complex and intricate engineering testimony," said David Dull, Broadcom's general counsel.

Qualcomm has filed numerous lawsuits that accuse Broadcom of infringing on a combined 10 patents and misappropriating trade secrets. Broadcom has filed lawsuits that accuse Qualcomm of violating a total of 18 patents, and is one of six companies that has asked the European Commission to investigate Qualcomm's business practices.

A federal judge in New Jersey recently dismissed Broadcom's antitrust lawsuit against Qualcomm, a ruling Broadcom is appealing.

Qualcomm, based in San Diego, is best known as a pioneer of a wireless standard known as code-division multiple access, or CDMA, which runs about 20 percent of the world's cell phones. Broadcom, based in Irvine, is a relative newcomer to the cell phone business.

BofA And Countrywide In Alliance Talks (FT)

By Ben White And James Politi In New York

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

Bank of America and Countrywide Financial have held discussions about an alliance that would create the biggest mortgage lending group in the US, people close to the matter said.

DOJ_NMG_0123880

The talks are said to be at an early stage and may not lead to a deal. But if they proceed, the negotiations could lead to a joint venture between the two companies, under which BofA would use its big branch network to help sell home mortgages originated by Countrywide. Countrywide would have the support of BofA's far bigger balance sheet to fund its lending.

The talks could also lead to an acquisition of Countrywide by BofA, which is eager to expand its mortgage lending business to match its breadth in credit cards. Such an acquisition would probably cost BofA, the second-biggest US bank, about $30bn, analysts said.

The talks indicate that BofA continues to focus on expansion in the US in spite of recent reports that it might be interested in buying UK bank Barclays. Ken Lewis, chief executive, has said a major foreign acquisition would be difficult for BofA to execute.

BofA said it did not comment on market rumour. Countrywide did not respond to a request for comment.

Countrywide shares soared 11 per cent after FT.com disclosed a possible alliance. They closed up 4.2 per cent at $42.00. BofA shares fell slightly to $52.04.

Banking analysts said a deal could make sense for both sides. BofA would dramatically expand its ability to serve consumers, while Countrywide would get the financial muscle to withstand the current slowdown in the mortgage business.

"This would cement Bank of America's lead as the dominant retail bank in the US," said Gerard Cassidy, banking analyst at RBC Capital Markets. He added that even if BofA were to buy Countrywide outright it could avoid violating the US law forbidding banks from having more than 10 per cent of consumer deposits following an acquisition.

Countrywide has a consumer bank and about $56bn in deposits, according to Mr Cassidy. BofA has about 9 per cent of US consumer deposits and could acquire $35bn-$40bn more without violating the cap.

BofA could divest some or all of Countrywide's consumer deposits to comply with the cap while keeping the mortgage origination business.

Countrywide is expected to report fourth-quarter results next week. In the first nine months of 2006 revenues rose 17 per cent to $8.7bn, while net earnings were 9 per cent higher at $2.1bn.

According to Mortgage Daily, Countrywide was the top provider of US home loans in the fourth quarter of 2006, ahead of Wells Fargo, JPMorgan Chase and Washington Mutual.

Nasdaq Holds Firm On A Bid For London Stock Exchange (NYT)

By Heather Timmons

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 26 — Nasdaq said on Friday that it did not plan to raise its offer for the London Stock Exchange, just before a deadline to do so, damping investors' expectations. Investors have until Feb. 10 to tender their shares for a deal, but any changes in the bid would have to happen this weekend unless a rival bidder emerges.

That is generally seen as unlikely, though any such deal would not happen quickly, because the N.Y.S.E. is just starting to absorb pan-European exchange Euronext.

The exchange's shares have fallen over the last week as investors who were hoping for a higher price than Nasdaq's initial $5.3 billion bid head for the door.

If the deal does not go through, Nasdaq has to walk away for a year, possibly leaving the door open to other bidders. Shares of the London Stock Exchange rose 12 pence on Friday, to £12.95, above Nasdaq's 1,243 pence-a-share offer.

What could happen until Feb. 10 is still unclear. About 25 percent of the exchange's investors are short-term holders like hedge funds.

Many bought into the stock at a price higher than Nasdaq's bid, and some invested in the stock through time-sensitive options, which expire early this year.

Nasdaq already owns 28.8 percent of the London exchange and needs an additional 21 percent to take control. Nasdaq has hinted that it could reduce its position, but many other investors think that is a bluff designed to persuade them to tender their shares of stock for the hostile offer.

If enough investors sell and force the price below Nasdaq's offer price, then the remaining investors could race to Nasdaq to tender their shares, giving it the majority that it needs.

London exchange executives contend that the bid is not even equal to the standalone value of their company and have repeatedly refused to meet with their Nasdaq counterparts. The situation between the two exchanges degenerated in recent days to an exchange of hostile, taunting news releases.

The chief executive of Nasdaq, Robert Greifeld, and the chief of the London Stock Exchange, Clara Furse, have never talked about the deal face to face, and securing an agreed deal at any point in the future is probably unlikely, analysts say, because of the bad blood this bid has raised between them.

DOJ_NMG_0123881

Nasdaq Declines To Raise Its Bid For LSE (WSJ)

By Alistair Macdonald And Henry Teitelbaum

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

Deal Dims as U.K. Market's Stock Climbs

The Nasdaq Stock Market said it won't raise its offer of £12.43 ($24.42) a share for London Stock Exchange PLC, but the LSE's share price rose, making Nasdaq's chances of buying the exchange it has pursued for almost a year look less likely.

Nasdaq could have raised its offer until a deadline at midnight Saturday if the LSE's board had agreed to a new bid. Under United Kingdom takeover rules, Nasdaq will no longer be able to increase its offer for the LSE unless a rival bidder appears, which most analysts see as being unlikely.

If Nasdaq aimed to spook the LSE's investors into selling -- something the London exchange has accused it of trying to do in the past -- the ploy has failed for the moment. The LSE's shares closed 4.2% higher than Nasdaq's offer at £12.95 Friday, on heavy volume.

Nasdaq also announced Friday that it was extending the closing date for LSE investors to tender their shares to Feb. 10. Nasdaq said that 0.62% of LSE investors have tendered their shares since Nasdaq extended its last deadline, leaving Nasdaq with 29.37% of the LSE's stock.

Defenders of the LSE say the shareholder register is going through a shift in which short-term hedge funds that might have taken Nasdaq's offer are trading places with investors who have a longer-term interest in the LSE. U.S. businessman Samuel Heyman continues to build his stake and is the LSE's second-largest investor, with a 10.44% stake through derivatives. A person familiar with Mr. Heyman's thinking said he "has a lot of faith in the credibility and judgment of LSE's management" to act in the interests of shareholders.

Even if this bid lapses under U.K. takeover rules, Nasdaq can come back in a year and have another shot at buying the LSE. Its near-29% stake in Europe's largest stock exchange could put off a rival bid, something the London exchange's management says is a possibility.

In a statement, Nasdaq said that, in its view, "there is now insufficient time to effect any revision of the final offers via constructive dialogue with LSE and an LSE Board recommendation by the deadline." The LSE declined to comment.

--Margot Patrick contributed to this article.

Write to Alistair MacDonald at alistair.macdonald@wsj.com1 and Henry Teitelbaum at henry.teitelbaum@dowjones.com2

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush's Climate Remarks Weighed For Policy Shift (WP)

By Peter Baker, Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

It was just a couple of dozen words out of more than 5,000, uttered so fast that many in the audience missed them at first. But President Bush's commitment to fight global warming in his State of the Union address this week has echoed around the world and provoked debate about whether he is shifting his view of climate change.

The words themselves were not radically different from what he has said in the past in other settings. As he addressed Congress and a national television audience, Bush forecast energy breakthroughs that will reduce U.S. dependence on oil. "These technologies," he said, "will help us become better stewards of the environment, and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

But it was the first time in Bush's six years in office that he mentioned the issue in a State of the Union. And he did it while presenting a high-profile plan to cut gasoline consumption -- and with it, greenhouse gases. "Every word is crafted in that speech and every word has meaning behind it," said Christine Todd Whitman, Bush's former Environmental Protection Agency administrator. "So the fact that he mentioned climate change in that context, that was a step forward, that was a change."

Leaders in Europe and Asia took notice as well, hailing what they saw as a turning point while renewing pressure on Bush to accompany words with more meaningful action. Environmentalists were skeptical but said Bush may be starting to respond to the growing political momentum for grappling with climate change.

"They may see some handwriting on the wall," said David Doniger, climate center policy director for the Natural Resources Defense Council. "They don't want to look like deniers right now. They've got enough problems." But he said Bush's proposal could be "a Trojan horse" that looks more important than it really is and, in its details, actually could undermine its own environmental benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0123882

Bush's plan calls for reducing projected gasoline consumption in the United States by 20 percent over the next 10 years by mandating a dramatic expansion in the use of alternative fuels such as ethanol and raising fuel efficiency standards for automobiles. According to the White House, that would cut annual emissions from cars and light trucks by 10 percent, or 175 million metric tons, equal to taking 26 million cars off the road.

Environmentalists noted that the 20-percent reduction target applies to how much gas is forecast to be used in 2017, not how much is used today. Because of an expected increase in consumption over the next decade, such a cut then actually might only slow the growth of gas use. Moreover, alternative fuels would include liquid made from coal, which emits its own toxic gases. And Bush's plan does not address the source of two-thirds of greenhouse gases, such as power plants and manufacturers.

The Bush plan fell far short of the mandatory reductions in greenhouse gas emissions envisioned by the 1997 Kyoto accord, which Bush renounced in 2001. Days before the State of the Union, there was speculation he might embrace emission caps after James L. Connaughton, head of the White House's Council on Environmental Quality, agreed with such an idea "in concept." But White House spokesman Tony Snow slapped down the idea, and the speech made no mention of it.

"To be perfectly frank, I thought it was an appalling disappointment for everyone, whether you're on the right or the left," said Samuel Thernstrom, a former Bush environmental aide now at the American Enterprise Institute. "We had all been led to expect . . . that we would hear a very substantial initiative from the president." Instead, he said, Bush's plan is "essentially trivial, it's marginal."

Global warming has long been a political sore spot for Bush. During the 2000 campaign, he seemed to doubt that it was a major problem or that human activity contributed to it. "There's differing opinions," he said. "And before we react, I think it's best to have . . . full understanding of what's taking place."

After taking office, he withdrew the United States from Kyoto and, amid energy shortages in California, broke a campaign promise to impose mandatory reductions in power plant carbon dioxide emissions. The Kyoto move did not represent a major policy shift because the Senate had already made clear it would not ratify the pact because of possible economic consequences. But the administration had not prepared allies, and the move became an enduring symbol of Bush defying the world.

In 2002, Bush unveiled a plan to reduce the intensity of greenhouse gases 18 percent by 2012, but environmentalists dismissed his ideas as inadequate. In 2005, however, Europeans sensed a shift when Bush was asked about the issue in Denmark. "Listen," he said, "I recognize that the surface of the Earth is warmer and that an increase in greenhouse gases caused by humans is contributing to the problem."

Climate change began inching up the Bush priority list because of energy security. With oil prices spiking, disruptions to domestic production by Hurricane Katrina in August 2005 convinced Bush that more needed to be done to diversify U.S. supplies, aides said. He declared in last year's State of the Union that "America is addicted to oil." And he chose as Treasury secretary Goldman Sachs Chairman Henry M. Paulson Jr., an advocate for aggressive action on global warming.

Meanwhile, states led by California launched their own efforts to rein in greenhouse gases. Corporate executives began agitating for a consistent national policy.

As the White House began developing a new energy policy in the fall, Paulson pushed for bold action. Instead of a laundry list of small-bore initiatives, officials recalled Paulson saying, they should set an ambitious goal, then determine how to get there, leading to the idea of a major cut in gasoline consumption. By November, prodded by Paulson and Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman, officials decided to make curbing greenhouse gases another goal of the policy.

"Since Secretary Bodman was committed to doing something about the climate change issue, he saw [fuel efficiency] as a win-win. It reduces our dependence on foreign oil, the vulnerability of the economy to oil price shocks and helps cut our greenhouse gas emissions," said David W. Conover, former head of the department's climate change technology program.

Outside the administration, another person who may have helped shape the president's thinking was FedEx Chairman Frederick W. Smith, a Bush fundraiser and friend whose business is sensitive to energy costs. During a campaign swing through Memphis last year, Bush attended a private dinner that included Smith. The conversation dwelled on national security but also touched on energy, Smith said later. Smith chaired the Energy Security Leadership Council with former Marine commandant P.X. Kelley and through the fall made the case that a disruption in global supplies could be devastating.

"The dependence of the United States on foreign imported petroleum, after nuclear proliferation, is the country's largest economic and national security issue," Smith said in an interview. "And if the country doesn't do something to reduce the amount of imported petroleum, we're going to have a very unpleasant economic correction or national security challenge."

Smith, Kelley and Goldman Sachs vice chairman Robert Hormats met Dec. 13 with White House economists Al Hubbard and Ed Lazear to present ideas, many resembling those built into the State of the Union. "They were very receptive," Hormats said. "You can tell the difference between a meeting where they're going through the motions and where they're genuinely searching for new ideas. They weren't in defensive mode. They recognized that more needed to be done."

DOJ_NMG_0123883

The issue gained momentum on Capitol Hill, too, with Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) toughening a climate change bill and Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) developing a plan closer to the president's. Amid an unusually warm winter in Washington, newly elected House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) created a committee to examine the topic. And the same day Bush outlined his plan, former vice president Al Gore won two Oscar nominations for his global warming documentary.

Bush still opposes Kyoto and argues that greater technology will solve the problem. The White House said he has devoted $29 billion to climate science, aid and incentives, and this week he ordered government agencies to buy more hybrid-fuel cars and otherwise curb the intensity of greenhouse gas emissions by 30 percent by 2015. "We can get beyond . . . the pre-Kyoto era with a post-Kyoto strategy, the center of which is new technologies," he said on a visit to a DuPont facility in Delaware the day after the State of the Union.

Former EPA chief Whitman said that for the first time Bush may be willing to sign carbon emission caps into law. "He's kind of setting up for a carbon-constrained economy," she said. "I don't know whether there will ever be an administration bill, but it may be that he's setting himself up not to veto [someone else's] bill."

Inside Bush's Energy Proposals (WSJ)

By Nick Timiraos

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

Alternative energy: Fuel suppliers would have to include 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels such as ethanol in the nation's vehicle fuel supply by 2017, up from five billion gallons produced last year. Production of corn-based ethanol could reach about 15 billion gallons. The rest could come from cellulosic ethanol, which uses fibers from switch grass and other natural products, or liquefied coal.

Some economists caution that ethanol demand could pressure the corn supply, driving up corn prices because of food-fuel competition. Ethanol demand has already increased chicken prices by six cents a pound, according to the National Chicken Council. The price of corn, 75% of the cost of ethanol production, has doubled to nearly $4 a bushel over the past six months. Almost half of the country's corn harvest could go toward the fuel with the addition of 79 planned ethanol plants in 2008, according to the Earth Policy Institute.

Ethanol costs between $1.45 and $1.65 a gallon to produce and is less efficient than gasoline. A car running on E85 fuel -- reformulated gasoline that is about 85% ethanol -- gets a third less gas mileage than one running on gasoline. The federal government supports ethanol with tax subsidies worth about 51 cents a gallon. Only about 2.5% of cars are considered "flex-fuel," or capable of running on gasoline or ethanol, and even fewer do because less than 1% of the nation's gas stations offer E85.

Environmentalists are cool to corn-based ethanol because it requires so much water, energy and land and produces only slightly more energy than it consumes. A study by the Argonne National Laboratory last year found that a car that runs on E85 produces 20% less greenhouse-gas emissions, which are thought to cause global warming, than one using gasoline. Cellulosic ethanol, on the other hand, offers 80% net energy and could reduce emissions 80%. But the technology to produce cellulosic ethanol economically hasn't been developed. Liquefied coal would increase greenhouse-gas emissions.

Fuel efficiency: The president's plan proposes reducing consumption by 8.5 billion gallons over the next 10 years with stricter gas-mileage standards. Reaching that would require a 4% annual increase in fuel efficiency beginning in 2010 for cars, which would be equivalent to a fuel economy standard of 34 miles a gallon, according to the Union of Concerned Scientists. Currently, auto makers' fleets must meet an average standard of 27.5 mpg for cars and 21.6 mpg for light trucks. The light-truck standard is already set to increase to 24 mpg by 2011. The president's plan would do away with fleet-wide averages and instead assign fuel-economy targets to car models based on their size.

The two proposals present an apparent contradiction. Because ethanol gets less gas mileage than gasoline, mandates for greater use of alternative fuels could undermine efforts to achieve increased fuel economy.

Strategic reserves: The U.S. would more than double its strategic oil reserves to 1.5 billion barrels over the next 20 years to protect against oil-supply disruptions caused by such things as a terrorist attack or natural disaster. At full capacity, the reserves would represent 97 days of net oil imports, up from 690 million barrels today, or 55 days. The Energy Department estimates the expansion would cost $65 billion, with $55 billion for purchasing oil and $10 billion to build new storage facilities, which would join the hollowed-out salt domes along the Gulf Coast.

Very, Very Big Corn (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123884

President Bush made a big push for alternative fuels in his State of the Union speech Tuesday night, calling on Americans to reduce gasoline consumption by 20% over 10 years. And as soon as the sun rose on Wednesday, he set out to tour a DuPont facility in Delaware to tout the virtues of "cellulosic ethanol" and propose $2 billion in loans to promote the stuff. For a man who famously hasn't taken a drink for 20 years, that's a considerable intake of alcohol.

A bit of sobriety would go a long way in discussing this moonshine of the energy world, however. Cellulosic ethanol -- which is derived from plants like switchgrass -- will require a big technological breakthrough to have any impact on the fuel supply. That leaves corn- and sugar-based ethanol, which have been around long enough to understand their significant limitations. What we have here is a classic political stampede rooted more in hope and self-interest than science or logic. * * *

Ostensibly, the great virtue of ethanol is that it represents a "sustainable," environmentally friendly source of energy -- a source that is literally homegrown rather than imported from such unstable places as Nigeria or Iran.

That's one reason why, as Jerry Taylor and Peter Van Doren note in the Milken Institute Review, federal and state subsidies for ethanol ran to about $6 billion last year, equivalent to roughly half its wholesale market price. Ethanol gets a 51-cent a gallon domestic subsidy, and there's another 54-cent a gallon tariff applied at the border against imported ethanol. Without those subsidies, hardly anyone would make the stuff, much less buy it -- despite recent high oil prices.

That's also why the percentage of the U.S. corn crop devoted to ethanol has risen to 20% from 3% in just five years, or about 8.6 million acres of farmland. Reaching the President's target of 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017 would, at present corn yields, require the entire U.S. corn harvest.

No wonder, then, that the price of corn rose nearly 80% in 2006 alone. (See the chart nearby.) Corn growers and their Congressmen love this, and naturally they are planting as much as they can. Look for a cornfield in your neighborhood soon. Yet for those of us who like our corn flakes in the morning, the higher price isn't such good news. It's even worse for cattle, poultry and hog farmers trying to adjust to suddenly exorbitant prices for feed corn -- to pick just one industry example. The price of corn is making America's meat-packing industries, which are major exporters, less competitive.

In Mexico, the price of corn tortillas -- the dietary staple of the country's poorest -- has risen by about 30% in recent months, leading to widespread protests and price controls. In China, the government has put a halt to ethanol-plant construction for the threat it poses to the country's food security. Thus is a Beltway fad translated into Third World woes.

As for the environmental impact, well, where do we begin? As an oxygenate, ethanol increases the level of nitrous oxides in the atmosphere and thus causes smog. The scientific literature is also divided about whether the energy inputs required to produce ethanol actually exceed its energy output. It takes fertilizer to grow the corn, and fuel to ship and process it, and so forth. Even the most optimistic estimate says ethanol's net energy output is a marginal improvement of only 1.3 to one. For purposes of comparison, energy outputs from gasoline exceed inputs by an estimated 10 to one.

And because corn-based ethanol is less efficient than ordinary gasoline, using it to fuel cars means you need more gas to drive the same number of miles. This is not exactly a route to "independence" from Mideast, Venezuelan or any other tainted source of oil. Ethanol also cannot be shipped using existing pipelines (being alcohol, it eats the seals), so it must be trucked or sent by barge or train to its thousand-and-one destinations, at least until separate pipelines are built.

Even some environmentalists cry foul. Steve Sanderson, president of the Wildlife Conservation Society, tells us that intensive, subsidized sugar farming in Brazil -- where the use of ethanol is most widespread -- has displaced small tenant farmers, many of whom have taken to cutting down and farming land in the Amazon rain forest.

In the U.S., there is now talk of taking the roughly 40 million acres currently tied up in the Agriculture Department's conservation reserve and security programs and putting them into production for ethanol-related plants. "The land at risk under this ethanol program is land that's shown by the USDA to have had great results for the restoration of wildlife," Mr. Sanderson says, pointing especially to the grasslands of eastern Montana and the Dakotas. Hello ethanol, goodbye bison.

But what about global warming, where ethanol, as a non-fossil fuel, is supposed to make a positive contribution? Actually, it barely makes a dent. Australian researcher Robert Niven finds that the use of ethanol in gasoline -- the standard way in which ethanol is currently used -- reduces greenhouse gas emissions by no more than 5%. As Messrs. Taylor and Van Doren observe, "employing ethanol to reduce greenhouse gases is fantastically inefficient," costing as much as 16 times the optimal abatement cost for removing a ton of carbon from the atmosphere. * * *

It's true that scientific advances will probably improve and perhaps even transform the utility of ethanol. Genetic modification will likely improve corn yields. And the President insists we are on the verge of breakthroughs in cellulosic technology, though experts tell us the technical hurdles are still huge. We'd be as happy as anyone if DuPont researchers finally discover the enzyme that can efficiently break down plants into starch, but betting billions of tax dollars and millions of acres of farmland on this hope strikes us as bad policy. If cellulose is going to be an energy miracle -- an agricultural cold fusion -- far better to let the market figure that out.

DOJ_NMG_0123885

Not that any of these facts are likely to make much difference in the current Washington debate. The corn and sugar lobbies have their roots deep in both parties, and now they have the mantra of "energy independence" to invoke, however illusory it is. If anything, Congress may add to Mr. Bush's ethanol mandate requests.

So here comes Big Corn. Make that Very, Very Big Corn. Sooner or later, our experience with this huge public gamble may make us yearn for the efficiency, capacity, lower cost and -- yes -- superior environmental record of "Big Oil."

Mr. Bush's Oil Security Blanket (NYT)

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

One of the stranger and so far unexplained items in President Bush's energy program is his proposal to double the capacity of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, to 1.5 billion barrels, over the next 20 years. The proposal carries a $65 billion price tag — one of several reasons Congress should question Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman closely when he comes looking for the money.

The reserve's purpose is to provide an emergency supply of oil in the event of, say, a terrorist attack somewhere along the global oil supply chain or a natural disaster that sharply limits imports for a short time. The United States is highly vulnerable to such interruptions. It has only 3 percent of global oil reserves but accounts for 25 percent of consumption — more than 20 million barrels a day, about 60 percent of it imported. The reserve now holds 55 days worth of net oil imports. After the increase, there would be an estimated 97 days of protection.

A larger reserve would seem to make sense in the post-9/11 world, and last year's energy bill did in fact authorize an expansion to one billion barrels. But is there nothing better to do with the money? Might it not be more usefully deployed developing alternative fuels or more efficient vehicles, thus reducing the nation's dependence on oil and its vulnerability to future shocks?

The $2.7 billion the administration proposes to spend on this project each year for the next 20 years is three times the amount that Congress authorized last year for the Energy Department's entire research and development program for alternative energy sources. It may be necessary to increase backup supplies. But the administration would be a lot more persuasive if it displayed a deeper commitment to programs that would provide lasting security by reducing Americans' consumption of oil, rather than just squirreling it away.

Bush Proposes Budget Increase For Ocean Programs (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush on Friday proposed an 8% increase in the $1.75 billion federal budget for coastal and marine conservation programs.

The president hopes "to clean up our oceans and coastlines," said Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, whose agency includes the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which would get most of the additional $143 million budget request.

NOAA would receive $123 million, allowing it to do more research and improve ocean protections, said Arden Bement, director of the National Science Foundation.

Another $20 million would go to the National Science Foundation and the U.S. Geological Survey, helping increase research, sea floor mapping, forecast models, and water quality monitoring in the Gulf of Mexico, Chesapeake Bay and other coastal areas.

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said the budget request reflects the awareness that oceans no longer can be considered inexhaustible or indestructible.

"Only in recent decades have we come to realize we must take care of them as we would take care of any precious natural resource," he said.

This month, Bush signed into law a measure that overhauls management of marine fisheries and strengthens protections against further depletion of dwindling stocks. It reauthorizes through 2013 the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act, a 30-year-old law that guides fishery management in waters between three miles and 200 miles offshore. It also aims to end overfishing in America by 2011.

Last year, Bush created a vast new marine sanctuary, extending stronger federal protections to the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands and surrounding waters in the Pacific Ocean that are home to endangered monk seals, nesting green sea turtles and other rare species.

He also sought to have the United Nations impose a full-fledged ban against unregulated and destructive bottom trawling on the high seas, but he was opposed by fishing nations that sponsor the boats that drag the giant nets along the sea floor.

DOJ_NMG_0123886

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Artists Rescue Coca Heritage (AP)

By Joshua Goodman, Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia - You're unlikely to see Milena Bonilla's artwork on display in a New York gallery. Just mounting one of her installations inside the United States could land the 30-year-old artist in jail.

That's because, instead of oil on canvas, Bonilla's preferred medium is coca leaf, the base ingredient for cocaine. Classified as a dangerous substance, importing the plant is a felony without U.S. Justice Department permission.

The stalky shrub, which Bonilla planted in 12 two-liter plastic Coca-Cola bottles sheared off at the spout, is getting a makeover by a cadre of artists who want to wrest coca's millennial heritage and aesthetic appeal from the teeth of the war on drugs.

But the main target of so-called coca art may be Colombia President Alvaro Uribe, who has become the plant's chief eradicator as caretaker of the United States' $4 billion war on drugs.

Amid an upsurge in anti-American sentiment, several leftist leaders in the Andes have embraced the virtues of the much-maligned leaf even as the conservative Uribe - Washington's staunchest regional ally - has committed himself to its annihilation.

When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice first met with President Evo Morales of Bolivia in Chile, the former coca grower presented her with a charango - a Bolivian ukulele - decorated with lacquered coca leaves. To avoid a run-in with U.S. customs authorities, the diplomat left the present behind. President Alan Garcia of Peru, who is a relative moderate in the region, suggested to foreign journalists that the calcium-rich leaf tastes great in a salad.

Bonilla's installation, "Legal Consumption," was one of a handful invited last year to partake in the 40th National Salon of Artists, a showcase of Colombia's most innovative artists. She calls it a meditation on the hypocrisies of a marketplace that commercially exploits a plant most countries ban in its natural form.

"The worst part is that in its artificial form, used in a sugary soft-drink, coca carries a lot of health risks and none of the medicinal benefits traditionally associated with the plant," complained Bonilla.

Coca's scientific name, erythoxylon novograntense, refers to the Spanish viceroyalty of Nueva Granada, which spanned Colombia, Ecuador and Venezuela. Across the Andes, the plant has been chewed as a hunger suppressant and stimulant for millennia, and the legal cultivation of small quantities is still permitted in Colombia for medicinal and ceremonial purposes.

But under Uribe, the plant's namesake habitat has been under constant assault by U.S.-supplied crop duster planes that chemically eradicated a record 445,000 acres of the plant last year - 31 percent more than in 2005, also a record year.

In a parody of this aggressive pursuit, Wilson Diaz exhibited "Uribe: The Eradicator," his drawing of the hunched-over president uprooting a coca plant with his hands, as part of a photo exhibit documenting the many places where the coca shrub can still be found in Diaz's native city of Cali, from ornamental hedges in upscale gardens to wild growths just outside an army barrack.

The aim, Diaz says, is to "deconstruct our understanding of the thin line between what's legal and illegal."

Diaz, 43, personally opposes the legalization of drugs - a result of his upbringing in the southern city of 2 million, which suffered more than most the cartel-driven violence of the late 1980s and early 1990s. But for its shock value, he says coca is unrivaled for its deviant symbolism.

Since 1996, Diaz has tried everything from handing out free coca seeds to unsuspecting horticulturists in Liverpool, England, to a videotaped performance in which he replicated the journey of a drug "mule" by swallowing 30 coca seeds, boarding a plane and voiding the seeds on foreign soil.

In 2004, New York-based e-flux, an online art forum, published Diaz' answer to "The Anarchist's Cookbook," the once underground bomb-making manual that was required reading for the anti-war movement in the 1970s. Called "How to obtain one kilogram of high quality cocaine in twenty steps," it is a precise and ultimately impractical instruction manual for making the narcotic at home from 1,500 pounds of coca leaves.

"To date, I don't know anyone who's tried it," said Diaz.

Unlike Diaz and Bonilla, Miguel Angel Rojas' coca artwork is based less on art theory and more on personal experience - or survival. The 61-year old artist, whose mixed medium work is well-known abroad, narrowly escaped from a drug addiction that claimed the lives of many of his friends in the reckless, sex-crazed Colombian art world of the 1980s.

In 1999, he used hole-punched pieces of coca to re-create the title of Richard Hamilton's iconic 1956 pop-art work "What makes today's homes so different, so attractive?"

DOJ_NMG_0123887

The shared responsibility between producer and consumer for Colombia's drug-fueled violence is the subject of his latest work, a diptych featuring the words New York and Medellin - the former comprised entirely of confetti dots of dollar bills and the latter of coca leaves.

"It's like throwing salt on an open wound. I want to force the coke consumer to fess up to their share of the blame," said Rojas.

The odyssey Rojas underwent trying to exhibit his work in May at Houston's Sicardi Gallery, where it sold for $4,000, is a parable of the drug-stained stigma any Colombian must face when traveling abroad. Held for days by U.S. customs officials, four of his canvases were returned, hours before his show's opening, full of tiny holes from probing.

Ironically, although officials routinely search artwork for false bottoms and coca-impregnated canvases, they failed to notice the illegal substance when it was in plain view.

"This is the reason why I work with coca - there's nothing romantic about it," said Rojas. "I want to show the world the violence we Colombians must face daily as a result of their drug habit."

Targeting Cross-border Gangs (LAT)

By Duke Helfand And Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

The FBI will join L.A. police officials to train Latin American authorities in how to track 'transnational' street criminals.

Seeking to combat the spread of street gangs across international borders, the FBI will join forces with Los Angeles police and prosecutors next month to teach authorities from Mexico, El Salvador and other Latin American countries how to better track and investigate gang crime.

The three-day training in Los Angeles comes amid an alarming increase in "transnational" gangs that move between countries despite repeated efforts to dismantle their organizations and finances, authorities said.

The U.S. law enforcement officials will focus much of their attention on how they have dealt with local gangs that have gained footholds in Mexico and Central America.

Special attention will be given, for example, to the MS13 and 18th Street gangs, both of which began in Los Angeles but have branched out to Central America, federal officials said. About 12 of 17 members of the 18th Street gang arrested in Los Angeles in September were foreign nationals, the officials said.

The training will include discussions about which laws countries use — or do not use — to attack gang problems. El Salvador, for example, does not allow wiretapping, a strategy employed by U.S. authorities to monitor gang activity.

"Many of these countries are seeing an influence of street gangs that evolved in Los Angeles but are moving [there] because of deportation," said Lt. Paul Vernon, a spokesman for the Los Angeles Police Department. "Many of these are hardened criminals."

The interagency training Feb. 7-9 will occur as Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Police Chief William J. Bratton unveil their strategies for dealing with the city's own 39,000 gang members. They are expected to call for a multi-agency effort using court orders, injunctions and stepped-up enforcement to target Los Angeles' most dangerous gangs. Among those expected to attend the FBI summit are Bratton, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca and representatives of the city attorney and district attorney.

They will be joined by agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, the Department of Homeland Security, the State Department and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, as well as the Justice Department's new assistant attorney general for gangs and violence.

Police officials from other cities in California, Virginia and Maryland are also scheduled to attend.

The foreign police presence also will be formidable. It will include the directors of the national police forces of El Salvador, Honduras, Belize and Guatemala, as well as police chiefs from major cities in Mexico, according to Robert Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal division for the FBI's Los Angeles office.

"Essentially it is to get everybody together to build partnerships and provide for better communications and information sharing," said Loosle, who added that the exchange would continue at an April conference in El Salvador.

Villaraigosa did not mention the gang training during a news conference Friday at which he discussed his trip this week to Washington, D.C. But the mayor insisted that the responsibility for enforcing immigration laws rested with the federal government.

"Los Angeles is not in the position to crack down on illegal immigration," he said.

Still, Matt Szabo, a spokesman for the mayor, said the city was an enthusiastic partner in the FBI training. "It's absolutely necessary," Szabo said. "It's a big deal."

DOJ_NMG_0123888

In El Salvador, law enforcement officials noted a 300% increase in extortions last year over the year before, including kidnappings in which families were told to wire money to people in Los Angeles, Loosle said. With a population of nearly 7 million, El Salvador has been experiencing about 10 homicides a day, with 60% to 70% of them gang-related, he said.

duke.helfand@latimes.com

patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

Suspected Cartel Boss Hires McAllen Lawyer For Defense Team (MCAMON)

By Andres R. Martinez, Monitor Staff Writer

McAllen (TX) Monitor, January 27, 2007

McALLEN — Suspected Gulf Cartel leader Osiel Cardenas-Guillen has hired prominent McAllen lawyer Roberto Yzaguirre as part of his defense team in a federal drug case that prompted Cardenas' extradition from Mexico a week ago.

Cardenas-Guillen, who faces a 17-count indictment out of Brownsville, was flown to the United States on Jan. 19 with 14 other fugitives.

He appeared in court once this week, but the judge closed the proceedings to the public. His arraignment is set for Feb. 1 in Houston. It's unclear whether the trial will be in Brownsville or Houston.

Yzaguirre defended the Matamoros-based Gulf Cartel's former head, Juan Garcia Abrego, in another federal drug case in 1996. Unlike Cardenas, who was first tried in Mexico before being extradited, Mexican authorities whisked Garcia out of the country without a trial the day after he was arrested.

U.S. Justice Department officials told reporters Monday that Cardenas-Guillen was responsible for smuggling 4 to 6 tons of cocaine a month into the United States from 1999 to 2003. They also claimed he is responsible for a majority of the violence associated with drug cartels during the last few years, including the attempted murder of FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Matamoros.

Cardenas-Guillen had been running the cartel from his prison cell in Mexico since 2003, according to Mexican authorities.

Yzaguirre was also the lawyer for Guillermo Gonzalez Calderoni, Mexico's former drug czar. Calderoni led Mexico's effort against drug cartels in the early 1990s, but later fled the country after rumors spread that he protected some cartels.

Calderoni lived in McAllen for about a decade. Yzaguirre successfully represented him when Mexico twice tried to have him brought back to Mexico to face charges. The former Mexican official was gunned down leaving Yzaguirre's office Feb. 5, 2003.

Yzaguirre referred all questions about Cardenas-Guillen to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Houston.

Andres R. Martinez covers courts and general assignments for The Monitor. He can be reached at (956) 683-4434.

Video Recovered In US Marshals Shooting (WUSA)

By Dave Statter

WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC, January 27, 2007

The shooting of a 16 year old by US Marshals is caught on camera. An attorney for the teen wounded on January 3 on 4th Street Southeast, says he recovered video from 4 different cameras.

David Shurtz says the images paint a different picture than the story given by a US Marshals Service spokesman.

On the day of the shooting the spokesman said deputy marshals working an eviction fired on a teenager who tried to run them over with a car. Shurtz says the video doesn't show any deputy marshal in danger of being hit by the vehicle. Shurtz and the teen's mother believe their is a cover-up by the Marshals Service.

Spokesman Dave Turner denies there is a cover up. Here is Turner's complete statement sent by email Thursday to 9NEWS NOW:

"The U.S. Marshals Service takes this shooting incident very seriously. We are processing the case according to our standard procedures, which call for the initial investigation to be conducted by the Metropolitan Police Department. That's underway right now, and we're cooperating with them to the fullest extent. There isn't 'a cover up' because we're responding appropriately to the investigation. After the completion of MPD's independent investigation, this agency will receive the matter for internal review to see if there were any violations of our own policies, or Justice Department's."

Ex-ATF Agent Cross-examined In City Suit (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, January 27, 2007

CHICAGO -- Lawyers for the city of Chicago and former Police Officer Joseph Miedzianowski on Friday cross-examined a one-time ATF agent who contends she lost her job after confronting the officer about corruption.

Diane Klipfel and her husband are suing the city, alleging that Miedzianowski was protected and turned internal investigations against them after they tried to bring his activities to light in 1992.

DOJ_NMG_0123889

Miedzianowski was arrested six years later and was convicted of running a Chicago-to-Miami drug ring.

The attorneys attempted to show that Klipfel had significant issues with her ATF employers that had nothing to do with a detail she worked with Miedzianowski. They went through Klipfel's history of filing complaints against her bosses and asked about some of the reasons she may have been dismissed from ATF.

A lawyer for the city, Sara Ellis, asked whether Klipfel took any of her complaints about Miedzianowski directly to Chicago police internal affairs. She said that she did not.

Ellis also asked whether any harm had come to her or her children; Klipfel testified this week that she was threatened.

"You're still alive, right?" Ellis asked.

"So far," Klipfel said.

Trial Of Accused Bomb Maker Ends In Hung Jury (MOBPR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile (AL) Press-Register, January 26, 2007

Jurors weighing criminal charges against accused bomb maker Gregory Wendell Nichols reported Thursday that they were hopelessly deadlocked, prompting the judge to declare a mistrial.

The charges remain pending, unless federal prosecutors in Mobile move to dismiss them. They said they will confer among themselves before deciding whether to try the case again.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Anderson asked Senior U.S. Circuit Judge Emmett "Rip" Cox to set the case for March, which would give prosecutors an extra month to decide if they want to proceed. He stated in a written motion that a February setting would not give enough time to either side to coordinate with their expert witnesses from out of town. He also indicated that both sides would like to explore the possibility of a plea bargain.

Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden said he does not know whether the U.S. attorney's office ultimately plans to take another shot at the 46-year-old car salesman from Flomaton.

"That's up to them. If they do, we expect Mr. Nichols will be acquitted," he said.

Acting on a tip, agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5. Getting permission to search his pickup truck, they found five explosive devices and charged him with violations of federal firearms laws.

Nichols admitted that he made the devices from spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He said he packed the cylindrical canisters, a couple of inches long, with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape, and attached a firecracker fuse.

Nichols told jurors that he made the devices -- which he referred to as firecrackers -- to drop into a river to watch the explosions. He said he and his fiancée did this with a batch of devices he had made in June and planned to do it again before ATF agents arrested him.

Aglice Messer, Nichols' mother, said she hopes prosecutors decide to drop the case. "I just feel like they're picking on the wrong person," she said. "He's ready to get it over with."

The trial featured dueling testimony from experts. James Jason Harrell, an explosive enforcement officer with the ATF in Atlanta, compared the modified carbon dioxide cartridges to hand grenades. He testified that in tests he conducted, the cartridges blasted apart, sending metal fragments in different directions.

The testimony was designed to help prosecutors meet their burden of proving that the device was a weapon with no other "legitimate social or commercial purpose."

Madden attacked Harrell's credibility, noting that he falsely claimed on a résumé to have a college degree. Harrell explained that he was set to graduate in December but had to push back the date until this coming March because his wife suffered a health problem.

John Nixon, a firearms, ballistics and explosives consultant who testified for the defense, told jurors the devices were "puny" compared with weapons used by the military. He acknowledged under cross-examination, however, that the device could cause injury and that fragments sprung from the explosion could travel at speeds comparable to a bullet from a .45-caliber gun.

Under cross-examination, Nichols denied assertions by the prosecution that he had threatened his fiancée and her family with the bombs. Assistant U.S. Attorney George May suggested that the woman had not been seen from since the day ATF agents arrested Nichols.

But prosecutors never offered any evidence to back up those suggestions, and Madden said in an interview Thursday that they were baseless. He said prosecutors did not subpoena the woman.

"As far as I know, she's still living in Flomaton," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0123890

IMMIGRATION:

Unions Split On Immigrant Workers (WP)

By Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Union leaders are fundamentally divided over how to best tackle immigration reform as they wrestle with how to convert illegal immigrants from job threats to dues-paying members. The split reflects long-standing questions over the place of undocumented immigrants in the labor movement.

One side supports a guest-worker program, which could permit hundreds of thousands of immigrants to enter the country annually depending on the needs of U.S. businesses. The other side says such programs encourage employers to pay less, exploit immigrant workers and drive down working conditions for everyone.

The Service Employees International Union, with many immigrants among its 1.8 million members, backs the guest-worker idea, leading it to an unusual labor-business alliance with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The AFL-CIO, a federation of 54 unions, calls guest-worker programs exploitative and wants immigrants who enter the country to do so as permanent residents, not temporary workers.

Eliseo Medina, executive vice president of SEIU, which broke from the AFL-CIO in 2005 over strategic differences, said his union recognizes "the reality of the marketplace and the economy." A guest-worker program could give immigrant workers the right to unionize and eventually petition for citizenship, he said.

Immigration reform, which congressional leaders and President Bush have called a priority, has wide implications throughout the U.S. labor movement. Last year, the Senate proposed a guest-worker program that would have made immigrants temporary residents and employers responsible for requesting their green cards.

Unions universally opposed that proposal and are trying to shape a plan to their liking, but their divided voices could dilute their message.

Immigrants are the fastest-growing sector of the U.S. workforce and organizing them has been a priority for unions as they shift from a message of "protect American jobs."

"It's a sea change from the early 1990s when immigrant labor was viewed by many as the enemy of organized labor," said Harley Shaiken, director of the Center for Latin American Studies at the University of California at Berkeley. "Now labor recognizes the reality of 12 million undocumented people in this country and the complexity of how to regularize that."

When thousands of immigrants marched on the National Mall last year, many of the organizers were union leaders. The spokesman for the Washington region's immigrant coalition was also the leader of a SEIU local. AFL-CIO leaders also stood with immigrant activists at marches, and last year they formed an alliance with a national group of day-laborer centers.

For some, guest-worker programs awaken memories of the government-sanctioned -- and flawed -- Bracero Program that operated from 1942 to 1964. It locked immigrants, mostly Mexican men, into English-language contracts that they could not understand and made them beholden to farm bosses. At the end of their contracts, under which they picked sugar beets, cotton and other crops for long hours and low pay, the immigrants were deported.

Ana AvendaÃ±o, the AFL-CIO's associate general counsel, called today's guest-worker programs, which tie immigrant workers' visas to their U.S. employers, "modern-day Bracero Programs."

"The bells and whistles they are currently adding to the temporary workers programs are bound to fail, they have been proven to fail," she said.

Medina said the SEIU advocates a guest-worker program with visas that would let workers change jobs, join unions and petition for permanent residency.

"Workers that come here would have full protections of our labor rights, including the right to organize, and they would have an independent method of enforcing those rights," Medina said.

SEIU's support of a revamped guest-worker program reflects a desire to create politically tenable immigration reform. Bush has said that his support of immigration reform hangs on the inclusion of a temporary-worker provision.

"Immigrants really want something. There's such desperation for some resolution of this mess," said Ruth Milkman, a professor of industrial sociology at the University of California at Los Angeles.

But SEIU's temporary-worker proposal is nothing like the president's plan to connect "willing employers with willing workers" or the guest-worker provisions floated in Congress, which would not give workers the right to independently petition for permanent residency.

DOJ_NMG_0123891

Finding middle ground could be tough. Broad support is needed to change immigration laws, said proponents of increased immigration, who have been pushing to rewrite the laws for years.

"As the process goes along, I think there's a framework for the labor movement to come together," Medina said. "It won't be an easy process, but it can happen."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Focuses On Iraq At GOP Retreat (RC)

By Susan Davis

RollCall.com, January 26, 2007

President Bush spent nearly two hours at the House Republican retreat today in further efforts to build support for his Iraq War strategy and to allay concerns that Congressional Republicans could be sidelined in the legislative process under Democratic control.

"I appreciate your understanding that we're still a nation at war," Bush told the nearly 160 Members in attendance. "You know, when I talked to the country the other night, I wish I could have reported differently, but it's not the truth and it's not the reality. There's an enemy out there that would still like to strike us. And as I said, and I know most of you believe, the best way to defend this country is to stay on the offense and bring the enemy to justice before they hurt us again."

While Bush's opening remarks received lukewarm applause — they largely mirrored his State of the Union address on Tuesday — House Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) said Bush received "several" standing ovations in the closed-door question-and-answer session afterward.

"It did a lot of good to have the president here, and to have Members hear him, and be able to confront him if they had a question about policy, and to hear him and his conviction to continue to win and do all we can to succeed in Iraq," Cantor said.

The House and Senate are on track to vote on a resolution soon that is expected to be a referendum on Bush's war plan. Democratic leaders have said they expect significant bipartisan support opposing the president's strategy.

However, Cantor said recent Whip meetings have shown encouraging signs that the GOP may be more unified than Democrats anticipate.

"I've gotten a lot of positive reception," Cantor said. "I think, again, this was an opportunity for Members to get together and to understand that we are a party of principle and to stand up and do all we can to back the commander in chief and succeed and win in Iraq."

Approximately 15 Members questioned the president on Iraq and a range of policy matters, including health care and immigration.

"This was a full discussion," said House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.), who said the president helped assure Republicans they will not be cut out of the process in the 110th Congress.

"He's no triangulator," Putnam said.

Putnam added that while Bush strongly advocated his policy in Iraq, he did not expressly ask House Members for anything in return. "He didn't say 'Please support me.' He said, 'Here's what happens if this doesn't work,'" Putnam said.

Sources in the room said one of the standing ovations was prompted by Rep. Mike Ferguson (R-N.J.), who told Bush that House Members were equally committed to success in Iraq.

As for the Iraq resolution, House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) reiterated Thursday that the leadership would not put pressure on its Members as to how to vote on the floor. "This is a war," Boehner said. "As a leadership team you can't make this a party unity vote."

At Lawmakers' Retreat, Pep Talks Address Concerns Of The New G.O.P. Minority (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

CAMBRIDGE, Md., Jan. 26 — President Bush tried to rally House Republicans on Friday as the lawmakers hunkered down on the Eastern Shore and struggled to come to grips with their new minority status and the challenge of the continuing war in Iraq.

Gathered to plot how to make their stay in the minority as brief as possible, 160 House Republicans were exhorted by Mr. Bush to work with him on education, health care, immigration and retirement issues and to give his troop buildup in Iraq a chance to work.

DOJ_NMG_0123892

"I fully understand there are differences of opinion, but one of the things I have discovered is in Washington, D.C., most people understand the consequences of failure," Mr. Bush said. "And if failure is not an option, then it's up to the president to come up with a plan that is more likely to succeed."

After his public comments, Mr. Bush took more than a dozen questions from lawmakers in a closed session. Republican leaders said Mr. Bush offered a detailed explanation of his Iraq strategy and made it clear that he understood the political pressure the war was putting on lawmakers back home. They said the president's determination bolstered the Republican rank and file, which will face a fight over a Democratic resolution opposing the president's new strategy.

Representative Adam Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference, said Mr. Bush told lawmakers that "because I sleep in the White House, don't think I don't know what is going on out there." Mr. Putnam said that that "reminds people that he really does get it and understands what ordinary members are going through."

"And he said: 'Know this,' " Mr. Putnam said. " 'There is a commander in chief and I ran for this office and that is the expectation of this office and the responsibility of this office.' " The comments came on a day the administration stepped up its campaign against Congressional opposition to the troop increase.

Though House Republicans have been among the president's most reliable supporters, there is deep skepticism among even these loyalists about whether his new Iraq plan will work. The skepticism is coupled with political unease about what may happen if the plan does not — particularly after election losses influenced by public frustration with the war.

Mr. Bush sought to allay those concerns and made a veiled reference to calls by some Democrats to block spending on the added troops, noting that he had met earlier in the day with Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus after the Senate confirmed the general as the new commander in Iraq.

"It reminded me as the president I must make sure he has everything he needs, that he thinks he needs to succeed in the mission that we have sent him on," Mr. Bush said. "And I look forward to working with you to make sure that our generals and our troops that we put into harm's way have the support of the United States Congress."

In his public comments, Mr. Bush made no mention of the recent election's outcome for his party, though he seemed pleased to see no sign of the Democrats.

"I'm glad to be among friends," said Mr. Bush, who is scheduled to visit a Democratic retreat next week.

The majority of House Republicans attending the two-day retreat at a resort in this historic waterfront community have never served in the minority, having joined the House after the Republican takeover in 1994.

Trying to inspire the House members, the party leadership brought in Newt Gingrich, the former speaker and the architect of the 1994 victory, who urged them to think big. They examined where they lost direction in the months leading up to the midterm elections and what they could do to recover. Lou Holtz, the former football coach who led Notre Dame to a national championship in 1988, delivered what was described as a rousing motivational speech.

Many House Republican lawmakers and senior aides acknowledged that the sudden loss of the majority had been a shock and that they were having difficulty adjusting. People who once ruled the House find themselves with much less to do and much less power with which to do it. The Republicans also believe they have been badly mistreated by the new Democratic majority in the opening days of the 110th Congress, as Democrats who promised a more inclusive House rammed through their priority legislation with little consideration for Republican views.

But the new minority has won little sympathy, given that the Democrats complained bitterly that Republicans ran roughshod over them in the 12-year Republican reign, subjecting Democrats to some of the same treatment.

Republican officials said the question-and-answer session with the president covered a variety of issues and touched on one lawmaker's flood control project. The president was applauded for his new health care push, and lawmakers said he gave no ground on immigration — a subject on which he and House Republicans have diverged. Republicans compared the session to a frank family discussion.

"I felt it did a lot of good to have the president here," said Representative Eric Cantor of Virginia, the chief deputy whip.

Bush Rallies GOP On Iraq Plan (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- President Bush yesterday rallied House Republicans gathered for their annual retreat, saying the party can unite around his domestic agenda but acknowledging his ideas are overshadowed by fractured positions on the Iraq war.

Republican leaders said Mr. Bush explained the importance of success in Iraq without explicitly asking them to support his plan to send 21,500 more troops there.

DOJ_NMG_0123893

"It did a lot of good to have the president here [and] have our members ... be able to confront him if they had a question about the policy and to hear him and his conviction to continue to win and do all we can to succeed in Iraq," said Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia, the deputy Republican whip.

"The president said these are tough times, war is never easy," Mr. Cantor said. "Unlike what the other side is going to present on the floor, we're going to do what's right. We're going to stand by our troops."

Democrats who control Congress are planning a vote next week on a nonbinding resolution opposing the president's plan.

Mr. Bush's public remarks on Iraq yesterday were largely repeated from his State of the Union address on Tuesday, but he stayed for a private session with the 160 members attending the retreat. Leaders later described the one-hour talk as a "frank," "unabashed," "good family discussion."

Republican Conference Chairman Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida said Mr. Bush's talk was filled with his trademark decisiveness: "He's no triangulator."

Mr. Bush took questions from more than a dozen members about domestic issues and his Iraq plan, which several Republican senators have openly criticized.

"He didn't say, 'Please support me.' He said here's what happens if this doesn't work,' " Mr. Putnam said.

Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio on Thursday identified Iraq as "first and foremost" why Republicans lost their congressional majority in November's midterm elections.

Mr. Bush told members he understands the war poses a political difficulty for them.

"That reminds people he really does get it," Mr. Putnam said.

According to a source in the room during the private discussions, Rep. Mike Ferguson of New Jersey told Mr. Bush: "We want you to succeed in Iraq," prompting members to applaud wildly.

During his public remarks, Mr. Bush said he thinks the war in Iraq is key to the war on terrorism.

"I fully understand there are differences of opinion, but one of the things I have discovered is in Washington, D.C., most people understand the consequences of failure," Mr. Bush said. "The plan I outlined to the American people is one that I believe can succeed."

Mr. Boehner said most members support a Republican resolution calling for the creation of a bipartisan panel to oversee the implementation of the troop surge and setting benchmarks for the plan's progress.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, has dismissed the idea. Republican leaders said they will not try to force a party-line vote on the Democratic war resolution because "this is war [and] you can't try to make this some party loyalty vote."

But Mr. Cantor said yesterday he asked members at the retreat: "Does anybody feel the need to or are compelled to have to vote for Mrs. Pelosi's resolution or can you stand up and support our troops?"

Washington Bush Going Into The Lion's Den In Test Of Brittle Bipartisanship (WSJ)

By Gerald F. Seib

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

President Bush travels to Williamsburg, Va., next Saturday to meet with the entire House Democratic delegation. It will be a real "Kumbaya" moment for the nation's leaders, a sign of a new spirit of bipartisanship in Washington.

Well, maybe. To some extent. While it lasts.

Those caveats reflect the uncertain nature of bipartisan cooperation in Washington right now, almost four weeks into power-sharing between a Republican president and a Democratic Congress. The rhetoric of bipartisanship, at least, remains alive, and in that spirit Mr. Bush accepted an offer to meet behind closed doors with the House's Democrats, who will be on their own previously scheduled retreat.

The president's appearance was the brainchild of Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the chairman of the Democratic Caucus. He describes it as "a chance for him to speak to Democrats directly, confidentially, in a personal way." Similarly, a senior White House aide characterizes the appearance as a way to open some lines of communication, which in turn might help build some trust.

As a former senior adviser in the Clinton White House, Rep. Emanuel knew that the idea made sense for both sides -- and that the president could hardly say no. For Democrats, the invitation is an important way to make good, at least in a symbolic way, on pledges they made to voters to try to work across the aisle. For Mr. Bush, refusing to walk into the Democratic lion's den would make him appear to be the one standing in the way of cooperation.

Moreover, a meaningful private conversation might be a way to help both sides figure out how much common ground there really is. Right now it's hard to tell. Democrats in the 435-seat House, for example, have been getting some Republican votes for their legislative initiatives, but not overwhelming numbers: 82 to raise the minimum wage and 37 to expand embryonic stem cell research, but only eight to set up a panel to oversee intelligence spending.

Other, quieter steps are happening. Rep. Emanuel, for instance recently hosted a dinner with 10 moderate Republicans, and may have other such small sessions.

But it's increasingly obvious there simply won't be any bipartisan understanding on the biggest issue of the year, Iraq. And, whatever its extent, the bipartisan impulse has a life span that runs, at best, until this summer's August recess. After that, nearly everything will be tinged by the 2008 presidential campaign. That leaves limited time, and a limited set of issues, energy and immigration the most interesting among them, for which something bipartisan can actually happen.

It's worth remembering that Mr. Bush has been here before. When he became governor of Texas, Democrats controlled both houses of the state legislature. Mr. Bush developed a reputation for working the Democratic side pretty well, and he got meaningful results to show for it. That's why talking directly to Democrats, while at least a few people are still humming "Kumbaya," makes sense for both sides.

Health Plan's Impact Debated (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

President Bush likes to say that his health-care proposal would "level the playing field" between people who get health coverage through their job and those who buy it on their own.

But experts said yesterday that it would tilt that field toward a kind of health insurance that Bush has long favored -- a high-deductible plan paired with a special tax-exempt health savings account, or HSA.

"I think it would be a big push for HSAs," said Mark B. McClellan, a health economist and former top health-policy adviser to Bush.

While McClellan thinks that would be a good thing, other experts said it would benefit the wealthy and undercut Bush's goal of bringing fairness to the private health insurance system.

In contrast with traditional health plans that typically charge $20 co-payments for visits to the doctor, high-deductible plans require consumers to pay hundreds or thousands of dollars out of pocket for medications, physicians' services and hospital care before most insurance coverage kicks in. The deductibles are steep, at least $2,200 for family coverage, compared with about $220 in a traditional plan. But the special savings accounts enable people to accumulate a tax-free pool of their own money to pay the deductibles and other uncovered health bills, rolling over any unused funds to the following year. And premiums for high-deductible plans tend to be lower.

The theory is that the plans, by making consumers feel the costs of their health care, give them an incentive to shop for the best prices for health services and to forgo procedures that they do not need. That is also one of the goals behind the proposal the president rolled out this week.

Bush's proposal seeks to eliminate the long-standing tax break for job-based medical insurance, requiring that a worker's taxable income include any money his employer contributes to help pay the premiums. A new tax deduction -- $15,000 a year for families and $7,500 for individuals -- would help people pay the premiums, either through their job or on their own. The plan faces opposition from Democrats in Congress.

The president contends that the current tax code favors employer-sponsored insurance and encourages covered workers to get more expensive plans, while his proposal would put all insurance buyers on an even tax footing and encourage them to shop for plans that cost less than $15,000.

Average annual premiums for employer-sponsored health insurance were $11,480 for family coverage and $4,242 for individual coverage in 2006, according to the nonprofit Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation.

Congress cleared a legal path for high-deductible plans to be paired with HSAs in 2003, and so far the new plans account for about 3 percent of the insurance market, according to a study by economists at the Rand Corp. But because they tend to have lower premiums and to allow consumers to accumulate money tax-free, more people would sign up for them as a cost-containment strategy if Bush's proposal were enacted, experts said. The plans would also benefit from shifts from employer-sponsored insurance to the private market, where high-deductible plans are more common.

"It would reinforce HSAs," said McClellan, formerly chief of Medicare. "That's what a lot of people who don't get insurance through their jobs are buying now."

The White House says the proposal would motivate people to seek only the amount of insurance that they really need, helping to control spiraling health-care costs.

"HSAs are a great step in this direction, and this is an even bigger step towards leveling the playing field and removing some of the weird disincentives to getting basic insurance and paying for routine care out of pocket," said Katherine Baicker, a member of the president's Council of Economic Advisers.

DOJ_NMG_0123895

Len Burman, director of the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center, said that, in leveling the field, the White House should also seek to scrap the HSA tax break, whose purpose is to counter the tax code's current bias toward comprehensive and expensive employer-provided coverage. Under Bush's plan, it would be the only extra tax break for health insurance -- one that would most benefit wealthy people, who can best afford the financial risk of a high-deductible plan and to sock away a lot of money in an HSA.

"It's a really generous tax break," said Burman, whose center is a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution. "If the goal is to try to get people to spend less on health care, why subsidize high-deductible health plans over aggressively managed care? People who believe that the market is the solution ought not to be prescribing one particular approach. Just create the right incentives for people to economize . . . and let them pick the option that works best."

Burman said eliminating the HSA tax break would bring in billions of dollars that Bush could put toward the other initiative he proposed this week -- giving states special grants to fund innovative ways of covering the nation's 47 million uninsured.

"This is not just free money just sitting there," he said. "There really is a big opportunity cost."

High Schools Eyed In No Child Left Behind Renewal (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

Educators, lawmakers and the White House are indicating that high school reform should be included in this year's renewal of the No Child Left Behind law, and the discussion about what it will include is already under way.

"If we're going to do significant high school reform, this is the vehicle, this is the year," Bob Wise, president of the Alliance for Excellent Education (AEE), told educators gathered on Capitol Hill yesterday.

The administration -- to the chagrin of some conservatives worried about ballooning the law -- included several new high school requirements in its NCLB proposal, such as mandatory dropout-data collection, additional testing standards and more funding for low-income schools.

"I think something can and will happen this year on high school reform," Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said recently.

Yesterday's conference, hosted by AEE, brought together research analysts to discuss how the government can best help improve the nation's high schools and better prepare students for college and the work force.

James Kemple, director of K-12 education policy at MDRC, a nonpartisan social policy research group, said there are common themes in successful high school reform models, including small classes or schools, double doses of basic literacy and math classes, well-designed curriculums and teacher coaching, and a focus on career mentorships and "real-world" interaction.

"Most high schools have limited connection to the adult world," he said, arguing that work-based learning and employers in the classroom improve student learning.

The administration's proposal would require states to develop college-prep English and math standards for high schools and administer tests based on those standards by 2012-2013. Its goal is to coordinate between high school and college courses to build common expectations for students and better prepare them for college and the workplace.

Democrats who control the education committees already have indicated an openness to tackling high school reform. Whether they will remains to be seen, and details will emerge as lawmakers from both sides of the aisle -- including Senate education panel Chairman Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts -- outline their suggestions for renewing the NCLB law at the National School Boards Association's annual conference Monday.

The five-year-old law requires states to test third- to eighth-graders annually and once in grades 10 to 12, with the goal of ensuring that all students can read and do math at grade level by 2014. States had to set paths to meet that goal and track the progress of their schools. Consistently failing schools must offer students public school choice and tutoring services.

Education experts say more data is needed to quantify the needs of high school students, especially dropout numbers. Mrs. Spellings said authorities have "virtually no information" about America's high schools.

According to numbers compiled by AEE, about 1.2 million students each year don't graduate from high school with their peers, and those from low-income families are six times as likely to fall into that category. If the 2006 dropouts had graduated, America would benefit from an additional $309 billion in income and purchasing power over their lifetimes, according to AEE.

"We realize that if we can't change the trend of dropouts in this country, we'll have a serious, serious problem," Sen. Richard M. Burr, North Carolina Republican, told yesterday's gathering.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, New Mexico Democrat, agreed that there is a growing appetite for acting on high school reform this year -- a topic that "hasn't received the attention" it deserves.

Mr. Kemple said the following innovative high school models studied by the MDRC provide a starting point for reform discussions:

DOJ_NMG_0123896

·First Things First greatly improved the academic outcomes of middle and high school students in Kansas City, Kan., by setting up small learning communities, pairing students with a staff member and forcing rigorous course work.

·A study of Career Academies -- small high schools set up around a common career theme -- found that over a four-year followup, young male Academy graduates, especially those who were at risk, earned over $10,000 more than counterparts who didn't attend the academies.

·The Talent Development High School model -- often used in low-performing city schools as a way to focus on college entrance and employment -- produced substantial gains in attendance, academic course credits earned and promotion to the next grade, according to a MDRC study of 20 groups of ninth-graders.

The administration's proposal for renewing NCLB also calls for extending to the high school level the federal funding stream known as Title 1, which now primarily goes to low-income elementary schools.

Coast Guard Cited In Report On Flawed Ship (WP)

By Renae Merle, Spencer Hsu

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

The Coast Guard's newest cutter, the flagship of a $24 billion plan to modernize the nation's coastal fleet, suffers from significant design flaws, and the service has failed to properly supervise the contractors doing the work, government inspectors have found.

The 418-foot National Security Cutter is the largest ship the Coast Guard has ever commissioned, but as designed would be limited in its ability to venture far from U.S. shores in search of drug smugglers and terrorists, according to a report scheduled to be released Monday.

Technical experts said the design of the vessel was likely to result in "fatigue cracks" that would sharply increase maintenance costs and shorten the ship's useful life. The report also said the Coast Guard appeared ill-equipped to supervise the project's contracting team, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, which had been given wide latitude in running the program.

The agency lacks the "appropriate workforce, business processes, and management controls for executing a major acquisition program" like this one, the report by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general says. "The Coast Guard is still trying to come from behind and create the organization needed to manage the program."

The Coast Guard and its contractors hindered the audit of the program, known as Deepwater, after ignoring years of warnings from technical experts about the ships' designs, the report says.

A representative for the Coast Guard did not return a call for comment yesterday. But in a response included in the report, the service challenged the inspector general's conclusions, saying the findings do not represent the "most current, comprehensive, or technically accurate data."

"The Coast Guard opinion is that decisions regarding structures and production have been well-considered and were prudent and correct," the response says.

The inspector general's report is the latest indictment of Deepwater, which aims to modernize the Coast Guard's aging fleet of ships, planes and helicopters over the next 25 years. In December, the Coast Guard sidelined eight Miami-based 123-foot cutters produced under the program after finding that they were not seaworthy.

The report has been circulated in the Department of Homeland Security and in Congress. A source provided it on the condition of anonymity because the document is not yet authorized for release.

New House Appropriations Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.) has discussed exerting more control over Deepwater projects, and a Transportation and Infrastructure subcommittee chaired by Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D-Md.) will hold an oversight hearing into Deepwater on Tuesday.

Cummings called the report "one of the most troubling reports I've read in my 11 years in Congress," adding that indications that the Coast Guard impeded auditors demanded a "thorough assessment."

House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) called the report "a stunning indictment" of Coast Guard management.

"This Congress is not a ship of fools," Thompson said, promising unspecified oversight. "We will not tolerate the spending of $775 million of the taxpayer's money on a boat that will not perform its intended function, will have a shortened service life and will cost another fortune to maintain."

The inspector general's report is the latest in a series of audits that have faulted the Department of Homeland Security for its failure to manage contracts for its most complex and demanding missions. Deepwater was the largest project on a list of 32 Homeland Security contracts worth $34 billion cited in July by the House Government Reform Committee as marred by "significant overcharges, wasteful spending, or mismanagement." Other projects singled out included the hiring of airport screeners and deploying baggage inspection equipment, as well as programs involving nuclear detection equipment, border sensors and emergency housing after Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0123897

The Coast Guard cutter report laid much of the blame on the Coast Guard's relationship with its contracting team.

The ship's "design and performance deficiencies are fundamentally the result of the Coast Guard's failure to exercise technical oversight over the design and construction of its Deepwater assets," the report said. The Coast Guard plans to build eight new cutters. The first was christened in November and will be delivered to the service in August. The second is slated for delivery in October 2008.

The combined cost of the first two ships has already increased from $517 million to about $775 million. That does not include the cost of addressing the design flaws or another $302 million for "re-pricing of all work associated with the production and deployment" of the first two ships, the report said.

Put another way, the cost of the first two ships will roughly double while their expected service life will likely be cut by 20 percent.

That's because shortly after the contract was awarded in 2002, Coast Guard technical experts began to warn about design flaws. The "fatigue service lives" of several critical elements are expected to be less than three years. In 2004, an assistant commandant wrote a memo expressing concern about the structural design, noting that "several of these problems compromise the safety and viability of the hull."

The Coast Guard eventually decided to make upgrades to the two current ships so they could operate at least 170 to 180 days a year at sea, the report says. The original contract calls for the ships to be able to operate 230 days a year.

The Coast Guard "has chosen to reinterpret the Deepwater contract rather than hold the contractor accountable" for the higher standard, the report says. The change allows the service to "downplay" the seriousness of the deficiencies and "minimize" the scope of improvements required.

In its response, the Coast Guard said it had "not lowered performance standards." The ship's structure "does not pose an immediate concern; rather, it presents a risk that it may need some structural repairs during its service life," the response said.

The inspector general also faulted the Coast Guard and contractors for imposing restrictions on interviews with employees and "hindering" the audit. The contractors, for example, wanted lawyers present during interviews with their employees. The meetings never took place.

The Coast Guard initially required that contact with the auditors be reported, that interviewees submit documents to the service before turning them over to auditors, and that an agency official be present during any interviews. The inspector general suspended fieldwork for five weeks in 2005 because of the agency's demands.

The Coast Guard's lawyers found some of the restrictions violated employees' rights. Auditors eventually interviewed some agency officials, but continued to have problems obtaining documents, according to the inspector general. In December 2005, auditors requested a copy of a briefing detailing the results of a structural analysis. The Coast Guard submitted the document, but omitted several pages of technical information, including notations "in large red lettering" stating that the ships would not meet their 30-year service life requirement, the report said.

In a response to the report, the Coast Guard said it did not prevent employees from meeting with the audit team and that Homeland Security officials are developing department-wide guidance for working with the inspector general in the future. A spokeswoman for the Lockheed-Northrop contracting team said the team companies concurred with the Coast Guard's response.

"There are no flaws with the design," spokeswoman Margaret Mitchell-Jones said.

She said the Coast Guard is the "technical authority for the National Security Cutter" and if the report claims otherwise, "then the report is flawed."

Navy Searches For 3 From Copter Crash (AP)

By Allison Hoffman,

AP, January 27, 2007

Navy vessels about 50 miles off the California coast searched Saturday for three crew members of a Navy helicopter that crashed during a training operation.

The Friday crash killed one crew member and left the remaining three missing as darkness fell over the Pacific.

The sailor died after being pulled alive from the water, said Navy spokesman Cmdr. Jack Hanzlik.

"It's a sad time whenever we lose shipmates like this, so our hearts and prayers go out to the families," Hanzlik said.

The helicopter, based at Naval Air Station North Island in Coronado, was on a training mission when it crashed at about 5:30 p.m. EST. The MH-60S, commonly known as a Seahawk, was on a mission off the USS Bonhomme Richard, near San Clemente Island, directly west of the Camp Pendleton Marine base.

DOJ_NMG_0123898

Hanzlik said the helicopter crew put out a mayday call before the crash. Navy sailors and Marines who were training with them aboard ship arrived at the crash site in inflatable boats within minutes.

The sailor pulled alive from the water died aboard the Bonhomme Richard while receiving medical attention, the Navy said.

His name was being withheld pending family notification. The names and rank of the others aboard also had not been released.

It was not clear whether mechanical malfunction or pilot error might have contributed to the crash, the Navy said. An investigation was under way.

Hanzlik said he did not know what type of maneuver the helicopter was performing when it crashed.

The USS Bonhomme Richard is an amphibious assault craft that took Marines to Indonesia after the 2004 tsunami.

The ship was training with two other Navy ships, the destroyer USS Chung-Hoon and the cruiser USS Chosin. Both of those ships were also participating in the rescue mission, Hanzlik said.

Two additional vessels, the destroyer USS Milius and the amphibious craft USS Rushmore, were deployed to assist with the search.

The MH-60 Sierra is a twin-turbine craft based on the UH-60L Black Hawk and the Navy's SH-60B Seahawk, according to the manufacturer, United Technologies Corp.'s Sikorsky Aircraft. It is designed to operate off aircraft carriers, cruisers, destroyers and frigates, ranging up to 100 nautical miles from the ship.

Watch What They Do (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

The next time Senate Democrats preach spending restraint, readers may want to recall this week's vote on the line-item veto. The new majority had a perfect opportunity to add a new check on spending earmarks but quickly passed it by.

New Hampshire Republican Judd Gregg needed 60 votes to end debate on his amendment to give the President Bush "rescission" authority. That tool would have allowed Mr. Bush and his successors to single out and send back to Congress earmarks and other wasteful projects in spending bills. Congress would have then been required to vote quickly, up or down, on the spending cuts. Mr. Gregg's bill was nearly identical to 1995 legislation that was supported by 20 Democrats who are still in the Senate.

Yet Mr. Gregg won only 49 votes, and among Democrats only Indiana's Evan Bayh and Connecticut's Joseph Lieberman voted in favor of the spending restraint they've preached. Among Republicans, only Alabama's Richard Shelby voted for his beloved pork-barrel power. At Tuesday night's State of the Union address, the Members applauded for the cameras when Mr. Bush spoke of controlling earmarks. A day later the Senators showed what they really care about.

Countdown To The Census (NYT)

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

The accuracy of the census is determined in the planning stages, and planning for the 2010 count is already imperiled. The dangers fall into two categories: money (too little) and politics (too much). The new Congress will have to manage both vigilantly.

An underfinanced census would be an inaccurate census. Easy-to-count suburbanites — who tilt Republican — would almost certainly be overrepresented, while urban dwellers — who lean Democratic — would get short shrift because of the difficulty in counting mobile and diverse populations. To prevent that, lawmakers must begin by reinstating the roughly $50 million that was cut from the current census budget by the previous Congress.

The new Congress must also ensure that the next budget includes adequate funds for projects that made the 2000 census a success. Among them are strong partnerships with state and local governments, as well as with churches and businesses, to promote the census, and a multimillion-dollar down payment on the census advertising budget. Because they will not bear fruit until the census is under way, those projects may seem easy to sacrifice in favor of more immediate demands. But any budget shortfalls cannot be made up later because the necessary lead time will have been squandered.

Lawmakers should also hold hearings to air the reasons behind the abrupt resignation last November of the director of the Census Bureau and the equally sudden departure of his deputy director. Both men were highly qualified statisticians and, by all accounts, committed to an unbiased and thorough census. They have acknowledged tensions with the Bush administration, but offered no details.

Whatever it finds, the inquiry should send a clear message that the White House must choose new census directors whose professional qualifications and impartiality are above reproach.

Slave Wages (WSJ)

By Malia Zimmerman

DOJ_NMG_0123899

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

HONOLULU -- Nancy Pelosi led the effort in the U.S. House during her first week as speaker to increase the minimum wage to $7.25 per hour from $5.15. In the process she ensured that American Samoa, a U.S. territory, is exempt from the wage hike, but did not exempt the Marianas Islands. The distinction is not unimportant.

StarKist and Del Monte, two big fish- and tuna-canning companies with packing plants in American Samoa, are headquartered in California, the former in Ms. Pelosi's San Francisco district. These companies pay a federal minimum wage of $3.26 per hour, or what will be $4 per hour less than what Ms. Pelosi is requiring American businesses on American soil to pay workers. But American Samoa Delegate Eni Faleomavaega argued that raising the minimum wage "would devastate the local tuna industry." Could that not also be the case elsewhere in the country?

In any event, despite strident criticism of Ms. Pelosi for the exemption and her avowal "to make sure that all of the territories have to comply with U.S. law on the minimum wage," it still carried over into the final legislation.

But the exemption for American Samoa is more curious still. Even the U.S. Department of Labor has noted the government's corruption, citing several cases of waste and fraud. Hawaii U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo says there is a push for federal law enforcement to take a more active role on that Pacific island. And Hawaii's FBI plans to open an office there to keep a closer watch.

What is even more ironic about Ms. Pelosi's behavior is that the region she is attempting to exempt has historically treated its workers poorly, with many instances of human rights abuses, and paid them pittances, besides.

Look no further than the story of Kil Soo Lee. In 1998, the Korean national incorporated the Daewoosa garment factory with the help of Togiola Tulafono, then lieutenant governor. (Mr. Tulafono is now governor.) Mr. Lee kept roughly 300 women from Vietnam as slaves; he was convicted in 2003 on 14 counts, including extortion, money laundering, conspiring to violate the civil rights of others and holding workers to a condition of involuntary servitude. Federal prosecutors called the Daewoosa case the biggest "modern-day slavery" case in U.S. history. Mr. Lee had devastated hundreds of young girls' lives -- and he had done so with the help of prominent Samoan government officials.

I met Mr. Lee in January 2001, flying from Hawaii to American Samoa with a Vietnamese translator to help expose him, his "garment factory" and the government who embraced him. Dozens of young women in the factory told me they paid $5,000 upfront to their government to secure a three-year contract to sew designer clothes for $408 per month. They were promised spacious living quarters with a swimming pool, nutritious meals three times daily and substantial wages. When they arrived, the accommodations crammed 36 people to a poorly ventilated, humid hallway, lined by tiny bunk beds with half-inch mattresses. Bath facilities offered no privacy and broken toilets; the swimming pool was filled with garbage and putrid green slime.

But poor living conditions wasn't all. They were fed a rice and cabbage gruel. They were slapped and pinched by guards for minor offenses such as missing a curfew or working too slowly. Female workers were subject to the whims of Mr. Lee, some of them sexual. He forced them to clip and manicure his toenails, to watch them shower, and to "lay" beside them on their bunks. The workers often weren't paid sometimes for months, despite the National Labor Committee reporting Daewoosa's sales at $8 million in 1999. They could not leave the island, as Mr. Lee had seized their passports.

Mr. Lee received special treatment from the government, including tax exemptions and a waived bond requirement -- possibly because of his connection to then-Lt. Gov. Tulafono, who was hired to incorporate Daewoosa while Mr. Tulafono's wife served for two years on the company board. The Vietnamese workers told me that when police were called to investigate a beating, they walked away with clothes, not a report or an arrest.

Ngyen Thi Nga and Dung Thi Kim Vu sought help from attorneys Virginia Sudbury and Christa Tzu-hsiu Lin, who took their case in 2001 pro bono. Weeks later, both whistleblowers allegedly drowned in rough seas off Pago Pago, although their bodies were never found. As new witnesses stepped forward, Mr. Lee became more volatile. He deported, with the cooperation of the Vietnamese and Samoan governments, nine primary witnesses and demanded the arrest of four others. Tensions were high when Samoan guards attacked the Vietnamese workers on Nov. 28, 2000. Quyen Truong, 21, was severely beaten with a club, stabbed in the eye and blinded.

Associate Justice of the High Court of American Samoa Lyle Richmond presided over the five-week civil trial in 2001, which I attended. Mr. Richmond ordered Mr. Lee to refund back wages, but he did not.

After national media exposure, Mr. Lee was arrested by federal agents, deported from American Samoa to Hawaii on March 23, 2001, and held behind bars without bond. The indictment claimed Mr. Lee willfully held people in involuntary servitude from Feb. 9, 1999, to December 2000, and forced them to work without pay under threats of serious harm and physical restraint. In February 2003, after a four-month trial, Mr. Lee was found guilty.

Mr. Lee appealed. He argued that the United States did not have jurisdiction in American Samoa. The court disagreed and on Dec. 27, 2006, Mr. Lee lost his appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0123900

Ms. Pelosi campaigned heavily for office and her leadership position on a promise of honest government. Her party supposedly advocates for the blue-collar workers. But is it honest to exempt American Samoa from the minimum wage requirement, especially with the documented human-rights abuses? Is it "advocating for the workers" to ensure that their pay is kept considerably lower than their counterparts in the U.S.?

In addition to House speaker, Ms. Pelosi can add "ethically challenged" to her resume.

Ms. Zimmerman is president of Hawaii Reporter, a Honolulu-based newspaper.

OTHER NEWS:

Durable Goods, Housing Deliver Signs Of Strength (WSJ)

By Michael Corkery, Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

The manufacturing and housing sectors exhibited some unexpected strength in December, although economists were cautious about both reports.

The Commerce Department reported that new orders for durable goods -- things like refrigerators and airplanes that are meant to last three years or more -- rose 3.1% in December from a month earlier. A surge in aircraft orders accounted for a large part of the gain, but orders for "core" capital goods excluding defense and aircraft were also up at a good clip. That category, which counts everything from telephones to machine tools and is viewed as a measure of business investment, rose 2.4% in December.

Nevertheless, some economists warned against reading too much into one month's data. Overall, manufacturing remains in a tough patch: In the fourth quarter, orders for core capital goods fell at an annualized rate of 6.1%, the largest drop in nearly three years. Also, other survey data on new orders have suggested the current quarter could be weak, said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at consultancy MFR Inc.

"It was a very solid report, but it's kind of inconclusive about where we're headed," he said.

In a separate report, the Commerce Department said that new-home sales recovered in December, rising 4.8% from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.12 million units. But many economists cautioned that the monthly number may have been exaggerated. For one, unusually warm weather in December may have confounded seasonal adjustments meant to compensate for lower activity in winter.

The figures also do not take into account the high number of buyers canceling contracts on homes. In addition, say economists, the 1.5% drop in the median home price in December to $235,000 from a year ago may understate the actual size of the price decline because it does not factor in the generous incentives that builders are offering buyers to sell homes. Incentives can be indicative of further weakness in the market.

"We have yet to see any meaningful evidence of a sustainable recovery in the housing market," said Ian McCarthy, chief executive of Atlanta-based Beazer Homes USA, which reported a loss in its fiscal first quarter that ended Dec. 31.

For the full year, new-home sales fell 17.3% in 2006, the largest decline since 1990. Home builders sold roughly 1.1 million new homes last year. On Thursday, the National Association of Realtors said that sales of existing, or preowned, homes fell 8.4% to 6.48 million. Taken together, sales of new and existing homes totaled 7.54 million units last year, down 9.78% from about 8.36 million units in 2005.

The uncertain outlook for housing contrasts sharply with an overall economy that has recently exceeded forecasters' expectations. Positive data on consumer spending and job growth, reinforced by the upbeat report on capital-goods orders, have increased economists' confidence that the expansion will maintain momentum this year as drags from housing and manufacturing ease.

The interplay between housing and the economy also remains a key issue for Federal Reserve policy makers. They expect the housing slump to offset strength in other areas of the economy just enough to keep inflation on the cooling trend it has exhibited in recent months. That, in turn, would allow the Fed to hold short-term interest rates at their current level of 5.25%. As of Friday, futures markets put more than nine in ten odds on the Fed holding rates steady through at least July.

US Housing Shows Unexpected Strength (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

The US economy showed signs of renewed strength on Friday as data revealed unexpected growth in the housing sector and orders for big-ticket manufactured goods rose.

DOJ_NMG_0123901

Sales of newly built family homes rose 4.8 per cent last month to 1.1m for the year amid signs that housebuilders were beginning to clear excess inventory that has weighed down the construction sector.

The figures make it less likely that the Federal Reserve will consider cutting interest rates in the coming months. US stocks weakened in early trading while bonds fell and the dollar strengthened against the euro and yen.

The backlog of new homes standing empty fell to its lowest level since the start of last year – with enough supply to meet about 6 months worth of demand, the Commerce Department said.

The drop in excess inventory was seen by some economists as a sign the market had bottomed, while figures for the full year revealed the extent of the slowdown in 2006 as sales of new homes were 17 per cent lower than the previous year.

This sharp slowdown last year acted as a drag on the economy, prompting jobs cuts and reducing demand for construction machinery.

Caterpillar, the heavy-equipment maker, said on Friday it expected demand for domestic construction equipment to remain weak in the year ahead as it turned its attention to the oil and mining market.

Meanwhile, manufacturers welcomed a government report showing orders for durable goods rose in December by the largest amount in three months, with a gain of 3.1 per cent.

Daniel Meckstroth, an economist at the Manufacturers Alliance, said the increase was "a positive sign that the manufacturing slump is a pause, not a recession, and is starting to turn around".

The increase was driven by orders for commercial aircraft, but there was also an unexpectedly strong rise in demand for other durable goods as non-transportation orders rose 2.3 per cent.

Peter Kretzmer, an economist at Bank of America, said: "The rise in capital goods orders appears to signal improved prospects heading into 2007, following a pronounced flattening last quarter."

New-Home Sales Up At End Of Down Year (WP)

By Daniela Deane

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

The number of new homes sold in December rose more than expected, suggesting that the depressed market could be turning a corner, but sales for all of 2006 still took their biggest annual slide in 16 years, according to government figures released yesterday.

December sales rose 4.8 percent, the biggest monthly gain since April, to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 1.12 million new homes sold, the Commerce Department said. For the full year, new-home sales fell 17.3 percent, the biggest decline since 1990, as the housing market suffered a sharp contraction after five years of blazing growth.

The new-home sales numbers came one day after other figures showed that sales of previously owned homes fell 0.8 percent in December after two months of modest gains, capping the steepest annual drop in that part of the real estate market since 1989. For the year, sales of existing homes fell 8.4 percent.

"We knew the year was going to be bad," said David Seiders, chief economist of the National Association of Home Builders. "There was no big surprise there. The real story is that toward the end of the year, sales did stabilize and even move up a bit."

The November and December sales figures were boosted by unusually warm weather, after inclement weather kept October numbers down, Seiders said.

New-home sales in December rose in three of four regions of the country, compared with November. Sales were up 27.3 percent in the Northeast, 26.6 percent in the Midwest and 0.3 percent in the Southeast, which includes the Washington region. Sales fell 4.4 percent in the West.

Nationally, the median price of a new home fell 1.5 percent in December, to $235,000 from $238,600 a year earlier. For the year, the median new-home price rose 1.8 percent, to $245,300 from $240,900.

The down year has translated to lower profits for home builders. To lure back buyers, builders cut prices somewhat, but also offered sweeteners that included free upgrades and finishes, help with closing costs and lower mortgage rates through their affiliates.

Sagging sales and a slew of contract cancellations also caused builders to cut back on construction. Builders delayed starting projects; walked away from land deals, leaving deposits on the table; renegotiated lesser deals with land sellers; and converted new home projects into rentals. These steps all helped to reduce inventory.

Thomas S. Bozzuto, chief executive of the Bozzuto Group, which builds condominiums, townhouses and single-family houses in the Washington-Baltimore region, said he believed the new-home market may have touched bottom and will gradually begin to recover, though not to previous sky-high levels.

"We're not going to see an instant turnaround or a quick recovery," Bozzuto said. "But I think it has bottomed out."

DOJ_NMG_0123902

Bozzuto said traffic at local developments built by his firm has picked up since the beginning of the year after what he described as a "very bad" autumn and early winter.

He said that although buyer traffic had increased, it was nowhere near the boom levels of 2004 and 2005.

Bozzuto said his company responded to the market contraction by delaying some projects, turning two condominium developments to rentals and restructuring some land deals with sellers.

Sales Of New Homes Rise For 2nd Month (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 (AP) — New-home sales increased in December for a second consecutive month, raising hopes that the worst of the housing downturn is coming to an end.

The Commerce Department reported Friday that sales last month rose 4.8 percent after a 7.4 percent rise in November.

Those two increases, however, were not enough to salvage the full year, which had sales of 1.06 million units, down 17.3 percent from 2005. That was the biggest decline since 1990, when sales fell 17.8 percent.

The housing bust has come after a boom in which sales of both new and existing homes set records for five consecutive years. Helped by the lowest mortgage rates in four decades, the sales surge was bolstered by investors buying in hopes of reselling the properties for quick profits. Analysts attribute the declines in 2006 to a cooling of that speculation.

The median price of a new home sold in 2006 rose 1.8 percent, to $245,300, compared with a 9 percent gain in 2005.

David Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders, said he looked for home prices to remain depressed in 2007 as builders try to reduce high levels of unsold homes.

He said his organization's January survey of builder sentiment showed continued use of incentives to clear the backlog, with 60 percent of builders surveyed offering optional items like kitchen upgrades or decks at no charge, compared with 41 percent at the beginning of 2006.

Other incentives include paying closing costs, which 52 percent of builders said they did, compared with 31 percent a year earlier, and paying buyers' financing points on loans, something 30 percent said they did.

The report on new homes came after a report on Thursday that sales of existing homes fell 8.4 percent last year, to 6.48 million units, the biggest decline since 1989.

New-home sales in December rose in all parts of the country except the West, which posted a 4.4 percent decline. Sales rose 27.3 percent in the Northeast, 26.6 percent in the Midwest and 0.3 percent in the South.

Regarding another sector of the economy, the Commerce Department said orders to factories for big-ticket manufactured goods rose in December by 3.1 percent, the largest gain in three months, giving hope that manufacturing will not be seriously affected by the slowdown in housing.

The increase was led by demand for commercial aircraft and the biggest increase in orders for cars and trucks in more than two years.

Excluding transportation, these orders increased 2.3 percent, the best showing in that category since March and better than analysts had expected.

For all of 2006, new orders rose 7 percent, compared with an 8.6 percent increase in 2005.

Blue Chips Slip; Volatility Marks Start Of '07 (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

The pundits weren't kidding when they said the stock market could be more volatile this year.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to its 26th record finish in four months on Wednesday, and then promptly plunged 119 points on Thursday, its largest point or percentage decline in two months.

It fell an additional 15.54 points, or 0.12%, on Friday, to 12487.02 and now is little changed since the year began, up just 0.2%. For the week, the blue-chip average was down 0.6%.

What's behind the volatility? Uncertainty about what investors consider the two most important stock-market drivers: profits and interest rates.

The issue in a nutshell: The pace of profit growth has slowed markedly from the 19% gain registered in the third quarter. Market interest rates, meanwhile, such as bond yields and mortgage rates, which pleased investors by falling late last year, have started rising again.

DOJ_NMG_0123903

Neither is a disaster, which helps explain why the Dow industrials, which were down sharply for much of the day Friday, recouped most of their losses by day's end. Profit gains still are above the historical average, and interest rates still are low by historical standards. But neither is quite as good as it was, which makes investors nervous.

As for corporate profits, "I've heard the term 'mixed.' I've used the term 'dicey,'" said Benjamin Pace, chief investment officer at Deutsche Bank Private Banking in New York.

About 40% of the companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index have reported fourth-quarter 2006 profits so far, and the results aren't bad at all. They just aren't eye-popping.

Profits are coming in about 10% above the year-earlier quarter, according to Thomson Financial. That is above the long-term average of 7%. It looks as if this will be the 14th quarter in a row of double-digit profit gains. About 68% of companies are surpassing analyst estimates.

But profit gains for last year's third quarter were nearly twice as good -- up about 19%. And 71% of companies beat estimates.

While profits are above average, they are being evaluated by investors who, subconsciously at least, had gotten in the habit of buying stocks based on truly excellent results.

"Earnings have been a bit weaker, I think, than many market participants had been hoping for," said Leo Grohowski, chief investment officer at U.S. Trust in New York.

And as 2007 results roll in, profit gains are likely to be below 10%. Neither Mr. Pace nor Mr. Grohowski expects stocks to decline overall this year, but they both say the market could experience some volatility as it adjusts to slower profit increases.

It also will have to adjust to a less-positive interest-rate environment. Late last year, investors widely expected the Federal Reserve to begin cutting interest rates by the middle of this year. The yield of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell below 4.5% last month.

But since then, with the economy looking hotter than expected, the Fed seems much less likely to cut rates any time soon. The 10-year Treasury yield rose Friday to 4.879%.

That still is pretty low. But like profits, it isn't eye-popping any longer.

None of this is causing panic. But rising market rates make life more expensive for businesses and consumers. They also make bonds look like a more attractive investment compared with stocks.

The broad S&P 500 fell 0.6% in the week just ended, including a decline Friday of 0.12%, or 1.72 points, to 1422.18. It is up 0.27% in 2007.

The Nasdaq Composite Index also was down 0.6% for the week, and up 0.05%, or 1.25 points, on Friday to 2435.49. It is up 0.84% on the year.

Also working against stocks on Friday, crude-oil futures rose $1.19 a barrel, or 2.2%, to $55.42.

Worries On Rates Lead To Mixed Day (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

Wall Street closed out a volatile week with a mixed performance yesterday after a pair of economic reports dashed hopes for an interest rate cut anytime soon. The major indexes were down for the week.

Stocks found some late-day strength as investors sought bargains after a two-day pullback that erased most of the gains made so far this year.

Strong results from Microsoft helped lift technology stocks, while the heavy machinery maker Caterpillar lent some support to the Dow Jones industrials. However, those gains were offset by economic reports that raised concerns about interest rates.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 15.54 points, or 0.12 percent, to 12,487.02.

Broader stock indicators were mixed. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was down 1.72 points, or 0.12 percent, at 1,422.18, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 1.25 points, or 0.05 percent, to 2,435.49.

The Commerce Department said new-home sales rose 4.8 percent in December, well above economists' projections and a sign that the slumping housing market might have bottomed out. The department also said orders to factories for big-ticket manufactured goods rose in December by the largest amount in three months, led by demand for commercial aircraft.

Investors had been holding on to hopes that central bankers might cut rates in the first half of the year. A steady stream of positive economic data like yesterday's is, however, making that unlikely and is instead raising the possibility the Federal Reserve might resume its campaign of rate increases that ended in August. The Fed's Open Market Committee meets next week.

"The biggest driver is concern the Fed might see more reasons to raise rates than to lower," said Arthur Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies & Company.

DOJ_NMG_0123904

For the week, the Dow was down 0.62 percent, while the S.& P. 500 lost 0.58 percent and the Nasdaq fell 0.65 percent.

Long-term bonds were steady, with the price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note at 982/32 and the yield at 4.87 percent, both unchanged. Shorter-term bond yields rose during the session.

The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell.

Oil prices rebounded after a steep decline in the previous session because of doubts that OPEC members are making the production cuts promised last year. The price of a barrel of light crude oil rose $1.19, to $55.42, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Steven Goldman, chief market strategist for Weeden & Company, said the retreat in stocks should offer buying opportunities. He said that the market was not "terribly overbought, but had been listlessly moving up" and that "pulling back allows the market to clean out its excess."

The major indexes had been up more than 1 percent on Wednesday, to the highest levels this year, before the two-day retreat. For the year, the Dow is up 0.19 percent; the S.& P. is up 0.27 percent; and the Nasdaq is up 0.84 percent.

Shares of Caterpillar, whose earnings are heavily tracked as an indication about the pace of construction, rose $1.46, or 2.5 percent, to $61.09 after it reported a 4.3 percent rise in fourth-quarter profit. The company also stood by its full-year forecast, which it thinks will show continued strength in industries like mining, oil and gas.

Honeywell International, a diversified high-tech manufacturer, reported fourth-quarter profit rose 14 percent. Lackluster 2007 projections, however, sent shares down 7 cents, to $44.13.

Countrywide Financial, a mortgage lender, rose $1.71, or 4 percent, to $42, after The Financial Times reported that the company was in talks with Bank of America that might lead to its acquisition or a joint venture.

The newspaper, quoting sources that it did not identify, said Bank of America might acquire Countrywide for as much as $30 billion or form a joint venture to sell mortgages.

Technology stocks rose after Microsoft reported second-quarter results beat Wall Street expectations and projected double-digit growth in all of its core businesses through the rest of its fiscal year, which ends June 30. Strong sales of its Xbox video game console helped offset the delayed release of its latest operating system, Vista.

Microsoft, which hit a 52-week high in the previous session, rose 15 cents, to $30.60.

Amgen, the biotechnology company, declined after it said fourth-quarter profit missed projections. Its shares fell $3.35, or 4.5 percent, to $71.50.

Dollar Seesaws As Markets Await More U.S. Data, Fed (WSJ)

By Isabelle Lindenmayer

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

The dollar seesawed indecisively Friday, making few intra-session gains as the market awaits additional U.S. data and a Federal Reserve meeting in the coming week to provide further confirmation of a recovering economy.

Despite the release of solid housing and manufacturing data early Friday, the dollar slipped across the board, then retraced its losses in afternoon trading.

Late Friday in New York, the euro stood at $1.2913 from $1.2935 late Thursday. The dollar stood at 121.595 yen from 121.14 yen late Thursday, while the euro stood at 157.00 yen from 156.72 yen late Thursday. The dollar was at 1.2536 Swiss francs from 1.2481 Swiss francs, while the pound was at $1.9593 from $1.9643 late Thursday.

"The market is unwilling to sell [the euro against the dollar] even more until there is further confirmation" that the economy is firming up, said Matthew Strauss, currency strategist at RBC Capital Market.

"That confirmation will have to come from next week's gross domestic product data, the Fed becoming more hawkish or the employment data," Mr. Strauss said, referring to January payroll data.

"That will tell the market whether [the euro] should break lower than $1.29 and continue, or if it should reverse," he said.

Crude Goes Above $55 A Barrel On Cold Weather, OPEC Cuts (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

Crude-oil futures jumped above $55 a barrel Friday to their highest level in more than two weeks as freezing temperatures around the East Coast raised the prospect of increased consumption of heating fuel.

Forecasters predicted that below-normal temperatures gripping the region would continue into at least the first week of February after a respite over the weekend. Private forecaster Frontier Weather said temperatures from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic will likely average 12 to 16 degrees below normal through the first week of February, boosting heating-oil demand.

DOJ_NMG_0123905

"The weather forecasts started the ball rolling," said Phil Flynn, an analyst at Alaron Trading Corp. "Even though winter is getting off to an awfully late start, these types of weather patterns are known to sometimes last into March, and all the extra supply we built up may be lost further down the road."

The March crude-oil contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange rose $1.19, or 2.2%, Friday to $55.42 a barrel, the highest settlement since Jan. 9.

A report from tanker tracker Lloyds MIU that crude-oil exports from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries fell to below 23 million barrels a day in December from under 24 million barrels a day in November also underpinned the gains.

In Race For Iowa, Clinton Has To Make Up Ground (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut, Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

DES MOINES, Jan. 26 -- When New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton arrives here for her first presidential campaign events this weekend, she will encounter unfamiliar terrain -- a landscape where she is not the perceived front-runner for the Democratic nomination.

Although Clinton appears formidable at the national level, she has not built up a lead in Iowa, home of the first caucuses of the 2008 campaign next January. Most recent polls of Iowa Democrats have shown former senator John Edwards of North Carolina in the lead, with Clinton in a pack that includes Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack.

"This is anyone's race to win, including obviously Governor Vilsack, who is very familiar with the landscape here," said newly elected Iowa Gov. Chet Culver (D), who met with Clinton shortly after she arrived Friday afternoon but who is remaining neutral. "That's the wonderful thing about the caucus process. The winner will have to earn it."

That puts Clinton in the unusual position of having to prove herself against other Democrats, and having to build up a political infrastructure in Iowa at a time when many rivals already have a head start. Her appearances here -- her first in more than three years -- are certain to start a media frenzy, potentially intruding on the direct access to candidates that caucus-goers have come to expect.

There are many reasons why Clinton may meet resistance in Iowa. An obvious one is her vote for the 2002 congressional resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war in Iraq. Although she has increasingly become a harsh critic of the administration, her long support for the conflict -- and her refusal to renounce her vote -- has left a sour taste among some liberal Democrats.

She also has opposed subsidies for ethanol, a politically incorrect position for any presidential candidate seeking support in an agricultural state such as Iowa.

But, more fundamentally, her challenge may be finding ways to show Iowa Democrats that she is a more personable and accessible figure.

"Her history is eight years at the White House and six years as a U.S. senator -- all of it with Secret Service -- and there's many obstacles that go along with it, many of which Vice President Gore faced in 2000," said Steve Hildebrand, a senior Obama adviser who ran the Clinton-Gore reelection effort in the 1996 race and managed Gore's victory over Bill Bradley in Iowa in 2000.

"She's going to have to figure out how to get outside of that circle, in order to have the same kinds of dialogues with Iowa voters that all the other candidates are going to have," Hildebrand said. "It's expected in these early states, and she's going to have to figure out how to get that done."

J. Ann Selzer, who conducts the Iowa Poll for the Des Moines Register, said the key for Clinton is "to figure out how to make it personal."

Clinton advisers accept the polls as generally accurate and reject suggestions that she will have trouble converting skeptics into supporters. She has, they argue, only begun the process of introducing herself to Iowans, in a dinner in Washington last month and with a handful of phone calls to key activists.

"She needs to get out there and start campaigning," one Clinton adviser said. "I think there is a fundamental stubbornness about [Iowans] that they're not going to be favorable until they see them. They want to see Senator Clinton personally."

The previous time Clinton appeared in Iowa was November 2003, when she served as emcee at a state Democratic fundraising dinner featuring the party's 2004 presidential candidates.

She did not campaign in the state last year during her reelection campaign in New York, choosing to avoid any indications that she already had her eye on the presidency.

Former president Bill Clinton was the keynote speaker at a Democratic Party dinner in October, a few weeks before the midterm elections, but though he is very popular among rank-and-file activists, neither he nor Sen. Clinton has spent much time campaigning in Iowa living rooms over the years.

DOJ_NMG_0123906

Bill Clinton essentially wrote off Iowa in 1992 because Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) was a presidential candidate that year, and in 1996 because Clinton faced no primary opposition in his reelection campaign.

Sen. Clinton is just beginning to put an organization in place and to attract endorsements. She named JoDee Winterhof, a former top adviser to Harkin, as her Iowa state director on Friday. Former Iowa attorney general Bonnie Campbell is heavily involved as a non-paid adviser and supporter. Another veteran of Harkin's staff, Lorraine Voles, serves as Clinton's Senate communications director.

But other Iowa veterans are already signed up elsewhere, including David Plouffe, a former Harkin acolyte who is running the Obama campaign.

Vilsack's presence in the race complicates the efforts of all candidates to line up endorsements from top elected officials in the state, but there is a scramble underway for the backing of state legislators and county officials. "With Hillary in the race, with Obama in the race, Iowa politicians are pretty smart about this process," said a party official who spoke about the competition on the condition of anonymity. "I think they're going to keep their powder dry and see how it's playing out."

Obama's appearance at an annual steak fry hosted by Harkin last fall helped touch off interest in Obama's presidential bid. The Clinton campaign regards him as a candidate who has enormous potential appeal but who is untested in the rigors of national campaigns.

Edwards, who finished second in the 2004 caucuses, has been to Iowa 17 times since the beginning of 2005, maintaining his network of supporters. None of the other Democrats underestimates his strength in the state, although several strategists in Iowa say he may have trouble holding his position over the course of the year.

"John Edwards has been out there a lot, and he ran before, and since that time he's been cultivating people, meeting them in living rooms, signing up people, and that means a lot," said Harkin, who is supporting Vilsack.

"And then Barack Obama, when he came to my steak fry -- I haven't seen anything like that since Robert Kennedy ran for president."

Hillary Heads To Iowa To Kick It Off (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's first trip as a 2008 presidential candidate starts Saturday with a two-day political tour of Iowa, to be followed by rapid-fire excursions to New Hampshire, South Carolina and California.

In recent Iowa polls, Clinton trails Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, former vice presidential candidate John Edwards and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. But Clinton's staff says she'll turn those numbers around once she hits the frigid Iowa ground and warms up skeptical Hawkeye State voters.

The Clintons don't have as much of a track record in Iowa as they do in other states: In 1992, Bill Clinton skipped the state, conceding it to Sen. Tom Harkin, a native son. He did win the state in 1992 and 1996.

Hillary Clinton last swung through in 2003.

Earlier this week, Clinton scooped up former Harkin aide JoDee Winterhof to run Clinton's state operation. Another Harkin alumna, Lorraine Voles, has been working for Clinton for about a year.

The senator, who declared her candidacy via Web video a week ago, makes her first visit to New Hampshire next weekend, with a trip to South Carolina, a state where Obama and Edwards are expected to do well, planned later in the month, according to a Democratic source. Clinton also has planned fundraisers and meetings in Los Angeles late next month and late March.

The West Coast appearances have kicked off a prediction that Obama and Clinton will battle it out to win over the party's Hollywood fat cats. DreamWorks founders David Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg already have scheduled a Feb. 20 fundraiser for Obama. Clinton earned the backing of Elizabeth Taylor on Thursday.

Clinton was to arrive in Des Moines Friday night and kick off her trip with an appearance before the state Democratic Party at 11:30 a.m. local time Saturday, followed by an appearance at a community center. Then she treks to Cedar Rapids for a small house party with supporters.

On Sunday morning, she heads to Davenport, where she will schmooze diners at a local restaurant.

Simon Says: Hillary Stumps In Iowa (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, January 27, 2007

DES MOINES – It is not as if Iowa had nothing going for it before Hillary Clinton got here.

DOJ_NMG_0123907

John Wayne was born and Cary Grant died here. The state has produced one president (Herbert Hoover from West Branch) and one First Lady (Mamie Eisenhower from Boone). And it is the only state whose first two letters are vowels.

But what really gives this state its claim to fame is that this is where the presidential nominating process begins in the Iowa caucuses, scheduled to be held next January.

Numerous 2008 presidential candidates have been here numerous times in the last months and years with the exception of Hillary (as her campaign officially refers to her.)

Until today, she had not set foot in Iowa since Nov. 15, 2003, when she headlined a Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner for the state party. It was considered her first real signal that she might run for president some day.

Now that day has arrived and Hillary is back and many Iowans are almost as excited as if John Wayne and Cary Grant had come back with her.

On Thursday, one local TV station had a story about school children hand-painting signs of greeting for Hillary and another had videotape of Bonnie Campbell, a Democratic activist here, getting a phone call…from Hillary HERSELF!

Iowa Gov. Chet Culver, a Democrat, said in an interview Friday, "This is anyone's race to win, but they have to earn it and that includes going to a high school gym on a Saturday morning like Hillary is and taking tough, pertinent questions."

Iowans love to ask questions of candidates and not just once. By the end of this year, this is the joke you are going to hear out of Iowa: "I haven't decided whether I am going to vote for Hillary, yet. I have only met her five times."

"Candidates need to spend a lot of time here," Culver said. And spend lots of money. Iowa loves the money that the campaigns and media spend, but they love the attention much more.

Where else can you look up from your biscuits and gravy at the breakfast buffet in the downtown Marriot here to see Brian Williams or Tim Russert or Bob Schieffer or George Stephanopoulos waiting to get a table? Where else are you going to be able to go to your local diner and see Hillary and Barack and John and Joe and Chris and all the rest?

Culver said that John Edwards drew 900 people when he was last in Iowa. And 900 is a big crowd in this state. Of the 953 communities in Iowa, 800 contain fewer than 1,000 people. Keep that in mind when you see crowd estimates from here.

Culver said the race was wide open in part because Hillary hasn't been here in such a long time. "This is her first trip," he said. "People admire and respect her, but this is her first test."

I asked Culver whether he was going to endorse anybody and he said, "In all likelihood I will not."

But doesn't Culver feel any obligation to his predecessor, Tom Vilsack, who is running for president?

"While Gov. Vilsack has been supportive and is certainly my friend, others have been supportive and are my friends," Culver said. And then Culver mentioned how Barack Obama had come out and campaigned for him last year.

Everyone would like Culver's endorsement, but in 2004, Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin and Al Gore and even Jimmy Carter all endorsed Howard Dean. Who then came in third here.

"We have learned endorsements, frankly, don't amount to a whole lot," Culver said.

So what does?

"Coming here and spending quality time," Culver said. "They all need to spend a lot of time here."

Ex-Shaheen Aide Joins Clinton Campaign (POL)

By John Distaso

The Politico, January 27, 2007

UnionLeader.com has picked up the first clear signal that Hillary Clinton's New Hampshire campaign is taking shape.

Highly-regarded Democratic strategist Liz Purdy of Concord has signed on in a senior staff role in the state, Clinton national field director Karen Hicks confirmed today.

"She's a super organizer and we are so psyched to have her," Hicks said.

"She is going to be helping us through the year organizing and staffing up as a senior person in the state."

Hicks said Purdy has no official title at the moment, but said, "She will be playing a big role for us."

Purdy, a 1996 UNH graduate, was the fund-raising director for former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen's successful 2000 campaign for a third term as governor. She also was deputy campaign manager for Shaheen's unsuccessful bid for the U.S. Senate in 2002.

She headed the college Democrats while at UNH and was speaker of the student senate. She also worked for the state Senate as a legislative aide before serving as finance offer for the state Democratic Party.

John Distaso is Senior Political Reporter for the New Hampshire Union Leader.

Huckabee To Set Up '08 Exploratory Panel (AP)

By Andrew Demillo

DOJ_NMG_0123908

AP, January 26, 2007

Republican Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor and a favorite of conservatives, will take the first step in a 2008 presidential bid, an official told The Associated Press on Friday.

Huckabee, 51, plans to file papers on Monday establishing an exploratory committee that will allow him to raise money and hire campaign staff, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid pre-empting a formal announcement.

Huckabee faces difficult odds as he enters a crowded Republican field topped by better-known, better-funded candidates such as Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

All three have spent the last few months building their national campaign organizations, courting fundraisers and lining up grass-roots supporters in primary and caucus states. However, they also have records or positions on social or fiscal issues that don't sit well with conservative voters — and that could give Huckabee an opening.

"My brand of conservatism is not an angry hostile brand. It's one that says 'conservative' means we want to conserve the best of our culture, society, principles and values and pass them on," the former Southern Baptist minister said last month.

Huckabee, a fierce foe of abortion rights and gay marriage, isn't the only conservative in the field and he faces a tough fight for the support of the GOP's right flank, a crucial voting bloc in the nominating contests.

Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, a favorite son of the religious right, is already in the race and other conservatives, such as California Rep. Duncan Hunter and Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo, will be battling for their share of the vote.

Still, Huckabee is hoping history can repeat itself. He was born in Hope, Ark., and was chief executive for a small state for many years. It was a story line that worked for Democrat Bill Clinton in 1992.

Huckabee left office Jan. 9 after serving 10 1/2 years as governor of a Democratic-leaning state; he was ineligible to seek re-election because of term limits. During his tenure, he repeatedly had to defend against slips of the tongue and ethics controversies.

Arkansas' Ethics Commission has admonished Huckabee for violations five times in 14 years, once for taking money from an organization whose donors have never been listed. He jokingly attributed his weight loss to a "concentration camp" diet and once called his state a "banana republic."

In November, he lashed out at reporters who questioned wedding-gift registries set up to furnish Huckabee's new $525,000 home in North Little Rock. Friends had set up the accounts for Huckabee and his wife Janet, who have been married since 1974.

Nationally, Huckabee is perhaps best known for his dramatic weight loss and his emphasis on healthy lifestyles. He shed 110 pounds after being diagnosed with diabetes. He also saw his political profile rise when he headed the National Governors Association for one term.

Since he left office, Huckabee has been on a nationwide tour to tout his book, "From Hope to Higher Ground: 12 Stops to Restoring America's Greatness." With chapters on taxes and foreign policy, Huckabee's book lays out his potential talking points for a presidential campaign.

Sen. Joe Biden To Kick Off Presidential Campaign Wednesday (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) — Democratic Sen. Joe Biden, who has made no secret of his plans to run for president in 2008, says he will make it official next Wednesday.

The 64-year-old Delaware lawmaker said he will file paperwork with the Federal Election Commission and launch a campaign website, www.joebiden.com.

He joins a crowded Democratic field dominated thus far by New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. Other candidates include former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee; Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich.

Biden traveled extensively last year to the early voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina and plans another swing through those states soon after launching his presidential committee, his spokesman, Larry Rasky, said.

Recently, as the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Biden convened several weeks of high-profile hearings on the Iraq war.

Generally regarded as a longshot in the presidential contest, Biden is one of his party's leading spokesmen on foreign affairs and plans to stress that expertise on the campaign trail. Biden voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq, but has since become a vociferous critic of the conflict.

Biden has also criticized President George W. Bush's plan to deploy an additional 21,500 troops to try and stabilize Iraq's capital city, Baghdad. On Wednesday, the Foreign Relations Committee approved a resolution he co-authored with Sens. Carl Levin, a Democrat, and Republican Chuck Hagel, stating that sending more troops into Iraq is "not in the national interest."

Biden has also been promoting a detailed plan for peace in Iraq that would divide the country along ethnic lines.

DOJ_NMG_0123909

This is not the first time Biden has sought the presidency. He was a candidate for the 1988 Democratic presidential nomination, but withdrew from the race in 1987 amid accusations that he had plagiarized passages in his speeches.

Biden has about $3 million (euro2.31 million) in his Senate campaign account that will transfer to his presidential committee, Rasky said.

The campaign will be run by Luis Navarro, a longtime Democratic activist with close ties to organized labor. Recently, Navarro headed the Florida Democratic Party and served a stint as political director for Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's 2004 presidential bid.

Hunter Is First Candidate To Buy TV Ad In New Hampshire (BOS)

By James Pindell

The Boston Globe, January 26, 2007

California Congressman Duncan Hunter is the first candidate to pay for television advertising time on New Hampshire airwaves for the 2008 presidential election.

The ad, which began airing on WMUR-TV in Manchester today, shows Hunter in front of a fence on the border with Mexico.

CNN is reporting the ad also airing in Iowa.

Hunter announced in South Carolina Wednesday he is running for president. He will visit New Hampshire on Monday.

Last month, DraftObama.com paid for ads on cheaper cable networks encouraging Illinois Senator Barack Obama to run for president.

Preparations Set, Giuliani Now Faces A Big Choice (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani, who developed a national reputation for decisive and reassuring leadership after 9/11, now faces the odd challenge of having to reassure some supporters that he can be decisive about a very different issue: running for president.

Even as his fellow Republican John McCain and fellow New Yorker Hillary Rodham Clinton have all but formally declared their candidacies, Mr. Giuliani has proceeded more cautiously.

Since last month, he has formed an exploratory committee, more aggressively recruited a campaign staff and moved to divest himself of one of his companies. And he is now visiting New Hampshire, home to the first primary, for the second time in three months. But he has studiously avoided making a public commitment to run.

Asked recently in Delaware about his political plans, he offered an ambiguous reply: “I think the biggest question you have to ask is, ‘Can you really lead the country?’ If I believe that I can do it, then I will, and if I don’t, then I’ll support somebody else.”

He ducked the question again yesterday, telling reporters in Bretton Woods, N.H., that he would not be rushed by contenders who are already entering the race. “You should do it when you feel it’s the right time,” he said.

Despite the delay, his aides argue that the accelerated pace of early primaries next year actually benefits a well-established figure like Mr. Giuliani — much, they say, as his national stature will enable him to close whatever gaps now exist in fund-raising and organization.

Frank Luntz, a Republican consultant who is not now working for any of the presidential campaigns, described Mr. Giuliani as “the only candidate who can set his own timetable, because he is so established in the minds of the voters.”

Nonetheless, doubts have been raised about the proverbial fire in his belly. Some New Yorkers in particular recall his decision to quit the Senate race against Mrs. Clinton in 2000 after running for months and raising millions of dollars but never formally declaring his candidacy.

Mr. Giuliani, already hobbled then by a messy separation from his wife, withdrew after finding that he had prostate cancer. But he was also ambivalent about the prospect of being a legislator.

Wrestling then with which course of medical treatment to pursue, he said on the day he withdrew: “And about the decision to run: I was almost in the same position, not being able to make it, which has never really happened to me. I’ve always been able to make decisions.”

David Garth, a media consultant who helped steer the Giuliani mayoral campaigns, said that while he had no reason to doubt a candidacy this time, “it’s a question of where his head is, as it was in the Senate race.”

Michael R. Long, chairman of the New York State Conservative Party, voiced uncertainty.

“He called me before Thanksgiving just to touch base and said he’d like to talk, and I haven’t heard from him since,” Mr. Long said. “We went through this in the United States Senate race. Whether he pulls the trigger or not, I don’t know.”

DOJ_NMG_0123910

Fred Siegel, a Cooper Union historian and Giuliani biographer, dismissed the analogy to 2000. "The question is there in Washington," Mr. Siegel said, but "I think it's mistaken."

Mr. Giuliani's aides maintain that he is being held to a standard different from that of other prospective candidates who have not formally declared. And anyway, they say, his ambivalence, whether real or merely perceived, may well vanish soon. Mr. Giuliani, who will address the Republican State Convention in New Hampshire today, is to travel to California and South Carolina next month, and supporters in New Jersey are preparing to announce endorsements next week.

California and New Jersey are two of a number of populous states that are expected to shift their 2008 primaries to February, very early in the campaign season, and South Carolina's comes even earlier, a week after New Hampshire's.

"Folks who believe he is not running do so at their own peril," said Michael DuHaime, former political director of the Republican National Committee, who is heading Mr. Giuliani's exploratory effort.

"There is a spin out there that the campaign is further behind than it is, that Rudy may not be serious, and that is being done deliberately to keep us from certain fund-raisers," said Mr. DuHaime, a native New Jerseyan who begins working for Mr. Giuliani full time next week.

Kieran Mahoney, a Republican consultant in New York who is working for another presidential prospect, former Gov. James S. Gilmore III of Virginia, said he had been unconvinced of a Giuliani run until recently, when the former mayor stepped up the pace of hiring a campaign staff and reports emerged that he had taken steps to sell the biggest division of his consulting business.

"Stop listening to what they say and look at their behavior," Mr. Mahoney said of potential candidates in general. "Giuliani is, in fact, an active participant in the marketplace in terms of scooping up talent and making business decisions that are economically injurious and politically positive. I have been a skeptic. I am now a believer."

Even Mr. Giuliani himself, though continuing to demur, did drop a hint or two in New Hampshire yesterday, saying at a Chamber of Commerce dinner that he might return later this year to play golf, or for other reasons.

Some consultants to Mr. Giuliani's rivals, and even some of his supporters, say that given the campaign's relatively late start, his inner circle may be overconfident about his ability to build a respectable war chest by March 31, the first of the deadlines for reporting campaign contributions. A poor sum then would make it all the harder to attract further donations, and, with more candidates now choosing not to participate in the federal campaign financing system, the importance of fund-raising has increased, as has competition for the millions at stake.

Already, Mr. Giuliani is being measured against a 140-page game plan drafted by a member of his campaign staff last fall. That document, which Giuliani advisers say was stolen from them, set a fund-raising goal of at least $25 million by the end of March, but some potential fund-raisers and donors whom it identified have already enlisted in support of other candidates.

Asked about the $25 million figure, Mr. DuHaime, who did not join the campaign until after the document was drafted, replied: "What is important to us is we have a strong number in that first period, and I'm not going to put the number out there publicly. We're certain we're going to have enough money to be competitive."

In New Jersey, where two fund-raisers have been scheduled and a spectrum of local politicians are expected to endorse Mr. Giuliani next week, one supporter, Steven E. Some, said that he had worked in five presidential campaigns and that "selling Rudy is the easiest sell I've ever had in my life."

"I have no doubt whatever that he's in this for the long term," said Mr. Some, a veteran political consultant. "I've never had anyone come up to me to raise any doubt about whether he's going to go the course."

Still, an underlying perception exists, and is being stoked, that Mr. Giuliani has not committed himself to a campaign, in part because he is reluctant to relinquish the lucrative consulting business that he founded after he left the mayor's office five years ago. Referring to Mr. Giuliani's exploratory activity, Harold M. Ickes, a longtime adviser to Mrs. Clinton, said, "I thought he was just advertising so he can increase his fees."

Mr. Mahoney, the Republican consultant, acknowledged that one challenge facing Mr. Giuliani would be determining how to expand his political base rightward.

"In order to become the mayor of New York City," Mr. Mahoney said, "you have to do things that are not wholly consistent with being the Republican nominee for president."

Amid Question Of Flip-flopping, McCain To Back Reform Bill (POL)

The Politico, January 27, 2007

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., will sponsor a bill to strengthen campaign finance laws in this session of Congress despite vehement opposition to campaign finance reform from conservative Republican activists whose support he needs to win the party's nomination for president in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0123911

McCain recently had appeared to be backing away from his support of campaign finance reform, which has been a signature issue for him. But Friday, a top aide in his Senate office said that McCain will reintroduce a bill to further clamp down on independent "527" groups.

"Yes, it is McCain's bill and McCain will introduce it this Congress," Mark Salter, McCain's chief of staff, wrote in an e-mail. "Moreover, he wanted to introduce it earlier this month, but Senator (Russ) Feingold's staff suggested to our staff to wait a week or two."

Salter's response came after inquiries from the Politico about McCain's apparent retreat on campaign finance reform.

McCain and Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat, together wrote the 2002 law that fundamentally over-hauled federal campaign finance regulations.

The measure earned the scorn of conservative Republicans and other political activists who argued that it stifled free speech rights by limiting political spending.

Last session, the two worked on a measure that would place tighter controls on the "527" groups that emerged to circumvent the limitations imposed by the McCain-Feingold measure.

This session, however, McCain has declined to support two other campaign finance measures that reformers consider priorities: one would expand the public financing system for presidential elections, and another would require grassroots organizations to disclose their funding and expenditures.

His lack of support for both worried campaign finance reformers who have considered him a champion of their cause.

McCain "has been supporting reform efforts for so long and has taken on the whole world when it comes to reform drives in Congress, so I'm convinced he truly believes in it," said Craig Holman, a lobbyist on campaign finance for Public Citizen.

"But it's very unfortunate that when it comes around to his presidential bid he's suddenly backing off, especially at such a critical moment. This is the year in which we're actually going to get some sweeping lobbying and ethics reform legislation, and he's not working with us on that," Holman said, adding that McCain's staff over the last few months had become unresponsive to entreaties to support campaign finance reforms.

McCain's campaign officials deny that he's backed away from supporting campaign finance reform. "He is a conservative candidate. He is going to run on reform should he decide to run," said Danny Diaz, a spokesman for McCain's exploratory campaign. "He's committed to reducing the amount of special interest money involved in politics. He has been. He will remain so."

However, in a survey recently posted on the exploratory campaign Web site, McCain officials asked supporters to comment on 25 specific proposals in four categories: taxes, government spending and regulation, the war in Iraq and the war on terror, and America's military. Campaign finance was not on the list.

Additionally, campaign officials have declined to quash speculation that he will opt out of the public financing system. And McCain voted last week to remove the grassroots lobbying disclosure provision that he previously supported. Many conservative activists, whose support McCain is courting, had opposed this measure.

McCain also has declined to sponsor a bill in the 110th Congress to expand the public financing system for presidential elections. The bill -- which will be introduced by Feingold -- is similar to one McCain sponsored in the 108th Congress, though he withheld his name on last session's measure.

By the time the bill was introduced last session, McCain was already considering a presidential run. Had he sponsored the bill, Diaz said, McCain might have faced charges of conflict of interest. It could have appeared as if he were trying to boost the public money that could be provided to campaigns, including his own.

Diaz described McCain's decision not to sponsor the bill as "a noble and pretty straightforward thing to do," and compared it to a judge recusing himself from a trial in which he or she has an interest. Public financing "is something that he still supports as a matter of policy," Diaz said, but he added that McCain "believes the public financing system is not fulfilling its original goal and must be reformed."

The leading contenders for the Democratic and Republican presidential nominations are expected to opt out of the public financing system, which provides taxpayer dollars to candidates who abide by restrictions on how much they can raise.

"A decision has not been made" about whether McCain will rely on public financing, Diaz said. As for the lobbying disclosure provision, which would have required grassroots organizations to disclose their financing, Diaz said McCain withdrew his support last year after meeting with groups across the political spectrum that argued the provision would have stymied citizen activism.

The leaders of six prominent campaign finance reform groups in Washington disagreed and urged the senators to support the provision, which the groups said would prevent abuses exposed in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

But one campaign finance reformer who has supported McCain's campaign finance efforts said his recent equivocation should be understood in the context of the campaign. The people whose support McCain needs don't count campaign finance as among their top issues, the reformer said, adding "some of the people hate McCain-Feingold and he's not going to run from it. I don't think he could, but he won't try to."

DOJ_NMG_0123912

"There's going to be ongoing tension between his interest in campaign finance reform and the political reality that some of the people he's trying to reach are not interested in that issue.

Early On, Obama Showed Talent For Bridging Divisions (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — Barack Obama's entry into politics came on a winter morning at the white-columned Harvard Law Review building when, about 2 a.m., a deeply divided editorial staff chose him as the first African American to lead the prestigious publication.

It was no small accomplishment. Obama, who at nearly 30 was older and more world-wise than most of his classmates, had to navigate among sharply drawn factions of conservatives and liberals to beat 18 other candidates for the job.

Today, Obama's weighing of a bid for the White House has provoked questions about whether he has the experience to build a winning coalition of voters. But at Harvard Law Review he showed that — on a much smaller scale — he had the savvy to maneuver through turbulent political waters.

"The Harvard Law Review was a place of petty and vicious internal politics," said Brad Berenson, an editorial board member with Obama and, more recently, an associate counsel to President Bush.

"Compared to Washington and the White House and the Supreme Court, the Harvard Law Review was much more politically vicious," Berenson said. "The conservatives threw their support to Obama because he could bridge the gap between both camps and retain the trust and confidence of both."

Whether Obama can reprise his role as political bridge-builder remains to be seen. Now a Democratic U.S. senator from Illinois, he plans to announce a decision Feb. 10 about the 2008 campaign — though most observers believe that he is in the race.

The son of a racially mixed marriage, Obama did not present himself at Harvard as either a black candidate or a white candidate. He gained the respect of the law review's famously divided factions by listening to all sides.

Former staffer Michael Froman, now a corporate executive who has supported Democratic presidential candidates, agreed that when Obama led the law review in 1990 and 1991, much of the staff's right wing "felt comfortable" with Obama, even those in the conservative Federalist Society.

"It's funny," Froman said, "but it's the same thing I hear now from some conservative friends of mine — not that they agree with him on policy, but that they feel he hears them out. Unlike some of the firebrands on both the left and the right, he was just a very good listener."

Interviews with more than a dozen people associated with the law review, both liberals and conservatives, found no one who did not profess respect for Obama.

The law review was housed in a three-story Greek Revival structure that once had been a private home. The Harvard Legal Aid Bureau occupied the first floor, leaving the cluttered upper stories for the review. The top level, or attic, became the review's law library, its desks and tomes stacked under the sloping roof. The house invoked chaos.

Obama entered that disheveled world in the fall of 1988, already distinct from most of his classmates.

He did not come to Cambridge, Mass., directly from an undergraduate program; he had spent several years doing community work in Chicago. He was not among the privileged or Ivy League legacies. He had turned down a full-ride scholarship at New York University School of Law to attend Harvard. Classmate Cassandra Butts remembers first meeting Obama at the financial aid office.

Nor did Obama arrive with little life experience. He was born in Hawaii, lived in Indonesia and later attended college in Los Angeles and New York. He had also traveled to Africa in search of his father's roots in Kenya.

In his first year, he researched articles for the Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review. He occasionally spoke out against apartheid in South Africa. He addressed a banquet for the Black Law Students Assn.

Professor Randall Kennedy recalled Obama's theme: Don't forget where you came from.

Classmate Tynia Richard called the speech "one of the most rousing and passionate addresses we heard."

"Harvard was one of those places that can get petty politically," said Richard, now a New York administrative law judge. "People put forth their own agendas, stretched and pressed their ideas in a variety of different ways.

"And he talked about the need to interact with different groups, to become engaged with one another."

DOJ_NMG_0123913

After students' first year in law school, they compete for spots on the law review. They are selected by editors based on their writing and analytical skills. Each year, about 40 students in a class of 540 win spots on the review. Each winter the editors, second- and third-year students, gather to choose a president for the following year.

Obama competed in a field of 19 candidates, four of whom were black.

By tradition, the candidates spend the day cooking meals for the voters. After breakfast, the kitchen table is piled high with law articles the candidates have worked on. The articles are reviewed, and votes taken. As the day wears on, eliminated candidates join editors at the kitchen table for the next meal and round of voting.

In Obama's case, the staff of about 80 conducted a marathon series of votes stretching about 17 hours. It was well past midnight when Obama finally bested David Goldberg.

"He was not a conventional politician," said Goldberg, now a civil rights lawyer in New York. "He was thoughtful, and he listens. People came to appreciate that."

Goldberg added, "I was happy to lose to him. I really wanted to be the articles editor."

Kenneth W. Mack, now a law professor at Harvard, said Obama stood out from the beginning. "He seemed more mature," Mack said. "Everyone understood he was a liberal. He didn't hide that.

"We had opinions, and we argued. But he was always able to make common ground," Mack said.

Under Obama's presidency, the review tackled several delicate racial issues, including allegations that black males, or "invisible men," were inadequately protected by civil rights laws, and the plight of black women giving birth to crack-addicted babies.

The review also panned a biography by a white writer about former slave and abolitionist Frederick Douglass, saying not enough blacks were quoted.

Obama too was criticized at the time. Christine Lee Spurell, a black classmate who is now a public defender in Abingdon, Va., was upset he did not name other blacks to the law review's masthead.

But today she believes he was trying to build the best staff. "He had to make hard decisions," she said. "And he made them correctly."

In The Tennessee Senate, A Historic Shift Of Power (NYT)

By Theo Emery

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

NASHVILLE, Jan. 26 — Over the last year, members of the Tennessee legislature have witnessed a number of updates. Plasma televisions that broadcast legislative sessions now line corridors in Legislative Plaza, where many lawmakers have their offices. Smoking has been banned from the building although the two activities it used to cloud, lobbying and political arm-twisting, remain.

But a sign of perhaps the most significant change can be found outside Room 1, the office of the Senate speaker, where the nameplate on the wall has been replaced for the first time in 36 years.

Earlier this month, senators voted out John S. Wilder, an 85-year-old Democrat who had been speaker since 1971, choosing instead Ronald L. Ramsey, the first Republican to lead the body since Reconstruction. In Tennessee, the powerful Senate speaker is also lieutenant governor, and next in line for the governorship.

Back-room politicking and shifting loyalties played a role in the ouster of Mr. Wilder, who comes from a wealthy West Tennessee cotton family and who flew his own plane to the capital. Until he was voted out, he was the nation's longest serving state legislative leader, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

The change reflects a reality in the South: rising Republican strength in state politics, said Prof. Merle Black of Emory University, a co-author of "The Rise of Southern Republicans."

Since Barry Goldwater's campaign for the presidency in 1964, the South has reliably voted Republican in presidential races, except for 1976 and to a lesser degree in 1992, but Democrats maintained power in state and local elections.

"It's really only been in the 1980s and accelerating in the 1990s, that white voters in the South have identified themselves more as Republicans than as Democrats," Professor Black said, adding, "Mr. Wilder represents the persistence of Democratic strength in states like Tennessee."

As recently as the early 1990s, Democrats controlled every Southern legislature. That changed in 1994, when voters in North Carolina and South Carolina elected Republican majorities in their Houses, and Florida elected a Republican majority in its Senate, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. Today, Republicans control both houses in Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia, while Democrats control those in Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana and North Carolina. In Mississippi and Tennessee, Democrats control the House and Republicans the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0123914

Beginning in 2005, Republicans held a one-vote majority in the Tennessee Senate, which temporarily grew to two votes when a Democrat switched parties last year and then lost his seat last fall. But the Republicans were denied the leadership two years ago when two Republicans, Micheal R. Williams and Tim Burchett, voted for Mr. Wilder. Mr. Wilder then named Mr. Williams to the No. 2 leadership post in the Senate. This time around, both senators voted for Mr. Ramsey, and it was a Democrat, Senator Rosalind Kurita, who played the pivotal role in Mr. Wilder's leadership defeat when she startled colleagues by voting for Senator Ramsey. Ms. Kurita said her decision was a "vote of conscience" because Republicans had been undemocratically denied the leadership in 2005. Although she said it was not a reward for her vote, this time it was Ms. Kurita who received the No. 2 position, speaker pro tem.

Mr. Wilder's exit from the speaker's chair is the end of an era of sorts, said Mark Byrnes, a political science professor at Middle Tennessee State University.

"I think it does mark a close of a chapter of Tennessee history," Professor Byrnes said, "that more of the old-style, less partisan — if not bipartisan — politics is on its way out."

Professor Black predicted that as older Democrats left the Southern political landscape, "Republicans will probably pick up more seats as we proceed through this decade."

Mr. Wilder won his first Senate race in 1959, served one term, then returned in 1967 to a political career that has continued uninterrupted. When first elected speaker, he pledged to shun "petty" partisanship, according to a newspaper account at the time. He fended off later challenges by enlisting the loyalty of Republicans, who received plum committee assignments.

In recent years he seemed not to care about his image or the fact that politics is increasingly media-driven. He referred to himself in the third person and was known for his befuddling speeches. He ruminated regularly about "the cosmos," and in 2002, famously rambled about "bed devils" during a speech.

But there has never been any doubt that he was a crafty politico who reveled in his position.

"You've got to figure that he's wily as all get out if he's survived in this position for 36 years," said John G. Geer, a Vanderbilt University political science professor. "He probably knows every nook and cranny of the State Legislature."

Mr. Ramsey praised his predecessor, but said the Republicans' time had come in Tennessee.

"John Wilder had done a good job for 36 years," he said, "but leadership needed to change, and I think both sides would agree with that."

Last week, movers carted furniture from Mr. Wilder's former offices and stacks of boxes filled his new, more modest quarters, which he shares at least temporarily with another senator.

As Mr. Wilder walked slowly down the hall after a meeting, he waved off questions about his ouster and its meaning.

"I'm a state senator," he said, one finger raised, "and I'm going to be the best state senator that I can be."

Regulate AstroTurf Lobbying (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

A MEMBER OF Congress will sit up and pay attention when told that 1,000 — or even 100 — constituents have written or e-mailed about a particular piece of legislation. Paying attention to grass-roots opinion is part of a politician's DNA.

But what if the voice of the people is really only an echo of a sophisticated pitch by professional lobbyists? In that not-uncommon situation, "grass-roots" lobbying of Congress has been dubbed the political equivalent of AstroTurf, the artificial grass first installed in the Houston Astrodome in 1966.

The real AstroTurf has its defenders. But no one argues that baseball or football players shouldn't know if they are playing on grass or on a synthetic substitute. (The information would be impossible to keep from them anyway.) Likewise, shouldn't lawmakers know whether a "grass-roots" campaign is actually "AstroTurf"?

The sponsors of the recently enacted ethics bill in the Senate thought so, and included in an early version of that legislation a proposal to require any organization that spends at least $25,000 to stimulate grass-roots lobbying to file detailed reports with Congress. The provision was stripped out, however, after complaints that the restrictions would interfere with free speech by ensnarling activists in bureaucratic red tape.

Chastened, campaign reformers have narrowed their proposals for "AstroTurf" accountability in a way that should allay any legitimate concerns about free speech. Instead of applying to all organizations that might urge their members to contact Congress, the more modest proposals being discussed would be limited to organizations that already are registered as lobbyists.

Even this regulation would be protested by some activists, who contend that a constituent who writes to a member of Congress deserves to be heard regardless of whether the idea was suggested by an interest group with access to direct mail or the Internet. After all, don't others influence us all in the formation of our political opinions?

DOJ_NMG_0123915

True enough, but members of Congress have a right to know whether a campaign is the result not of a spontaneous sea change in public opinion but a professional operation. Such truth-in-packaging doesn't mean that lawmakers will disregard the outpouring of opinion on a given subject, only that they will put it in proper perspective.

Registered lobbyists are already subjected to disclosure requirements that don't apply to ordinary citizens. It's a minimal burden on free speech in the cause of making the legislative process transparent and accountable.

"AstroTurf" lobbying shouldn't be illegal, but neither should it be disguised as coming from the grass roots.

U.N. Atomic Chief Cites Iran Enrichment Plan (NYT)

By Mark Landler, David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 26 — The head of the United Nations nuclear inspection agency said Friday that Iranian officials had told him that they planned to begin installing equipment next month in an industrial-scale plant to enrich uranium.

Such a move would intensify Iran's confrontation with the Security Council, which has demanded a full suspension of the production of nuclear material, and has authorized mild sanctions.

The announcement by the official, Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, was coupled with a plea to both Tehran and Western nations for all sides to take a "timeout" to head off a larger confrontation.

"Enough flexing muscles, enough calling names," Dr. ElBaradei said in a conversation with reporters here at the World Economic Forum conference. "It's time to engage."

He proposed a suspension of the sanctions against Iran, while the Iranians simultaneously suspend enrichment of uranium. That process can produce fuel for nuclear weapons, though the Iranians deny that is their goal.

Nuclear experts and American officials say Iran's announcement may be a bluff. Tehran has run into significant difficulties in assembling centrifuges to enrich uranium. A year ago it promised to have 3,000 centrifuges running by now; instead, it is just beginning to install that equipment, at Natanz.

But Dr. ElBaradei seemed clearly concerned that once enrichment began, it would be difficult to halt, and that Iranian officials would be loath to dismantle any plant once construction had begun.

He is also concerned that such a plant could become a military target for the United States or Israel. Such a strike would be "absolutely bonkers," he said, noting that it would not deprive Iran of the technological expertise to pursue any nuclear ambitions.

"It would only strengthen the hand of hard-liners," he said. "They would simply go underground."

Dr. ElBaradei said he worried that further sanctions against Iran, which the United Nations has threatened to impose next month, "is only going to lead to an escalation."

Given what inspectors know about Iran's current capabilities, Dr. ElBaradei said, the Iranians are three to eight years away from being able to manufacture a nuclear device. That is roughly in line with estimates made by American intelligence officials.

The United States said it would stick to its insistence that Iran stop enrichment before negotiations begin. The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the reports that Iran planned to install 3,000 centrifuges showed its continued defiance.

"We'll see what Dr. ElBaradei has to say," Mr. McCormack said Friday at a briefing in Washington. "More importantly, we'll see what the Iranians do; they continue in provocative behavior."

He said the preliminary sanctions, which ban the import and export of material used in uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missiles, appeared to be having some effect in Iran.

There is evidence of an internal split in Tehran. Two hard-line newspapers that reflect the views of Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, recently demanded that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad stay away from nuclear issues because his comments were deepening Iran's isolation.

Iran's relations with the international nuclear monitoring agency have deteriorated since the sanctions were approved. Iran has demanded the agency remove the official who oversees inspections of Iranian facilities, and it has barred more than 30 inspectors, all from countries that supported sanctions.

It is not clear how much influence Dr. ElBaradei can exercise, now that the confrontation has moved to the Security Council. But he appears to believe there is support for his proposal.

A diplomat at the agency, speaking on condition of anonymity, said he had found such support in Germany and France. Those nations, along with Britain, have led the talks with Iran over its nuclear program.

Dr. ElBaradei has also consulted with Russia, which favors a more conciliatory approach. But he did not discuss the idea with American officials before making it public here, the diplomat said.

The United States has said that if Iran suspended uranium enrichment, Washington would join the Europeans in direct talks with Tehran, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has indicated that she would take part.

DOJ_NMG_0123916

Dr. ElBaradei also suggested the United States show more flexibility in its standoff with North Korea, which detonated a crude nuclear device in October. The North Koreans have demanded that the United States drop financial sanctions as a condition for reviving talks over their nuclear program.

American and North Korean officials met this month in Berlin, a meeting meant to lay the groundwork for a revival of multiparty talks in Beijing. State Department officials say they are hopeful of some kind of deal, perhaps involving a temporary freeze on plutonium production in the North.

U.N. Says Iran Plans Nuclear Development (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2007

Iran plans to begin work next month on an underground uranium enrichment facility, as part of a plan to create a network of tens of thousands of machines turning out material that could be used to make nuclear arms, U.N. officials said Friday.

The officials' comments were the first concrete confirmation that work on the facility would begin in February. A senior U.S. State Department official warned the move would be a "major miscalculation" by Iran.

"If Iran takes this step, it is going to confront universal international opposition," said Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns. "If they think they can get away with 3,000 centrifuges without another Security Council resolution and additional international pressure, then they are very badly mistaken."

Former Iranian President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, meanwhile, accused the U.S. of acting like a bully, with the ultimate aim of forcing Iran to "abandon nuclear energy." In a sermon in Tehran, he said a U.S. military buildup in the Gulf and the announcement that U.S. forces would seek to capture or kill Iranian agents in Iraq were aimed Iranian nuclear programs.

"Today our enemies have come with several issues against us while having supporters in the world communities," Rafsanjani told worshippers Friday. "This is bullying."

Also Friday, the Iranian government said it would bar all U.N. inspectors from countries that voted in favor of a U.N. Security Council resolution last month that imposed sanctions on Iran for its nuclear program. Iran said it had rejected 38 names from a list of inspectors from the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency.

Iranian officials have said repeatedly that work would start soon on the uranium enrichment facility at its Natanz underground plant. There had been speculation the leadership might launch the project next month to celebrate the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution that brought the clerical leadership to power.

But the timing of the work may in part be a gesture of defiance. The Security Council's 60-day deadline for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment runs out next month, paving the way for further sanctions.

"I understand that they are going to announce that they are going to build up their 3,000 centrifuge facility ... sometime next month," IAEA head Mohamed ElBaradei told reporters at the World Economic Forum.

U.N. officials, who demanded anonymity because the information was confidential, emphasized that Iran had not officially announced plans to embark on the assembly of what will initially be 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz. But they said senior officials have informally told the IAEA that the work would begin next month.

Iran ultimately plans to expand its program to 54,000 centrifuges, which spin uranium gas into enriched material.

Iran says it aims to produce nuclear fuel to generate electricity. But if Iran chose, it could use the massive array of centrifuges to make enough weapons-grade material for dozens of nuclear warheads a year.

Diplomats briefed on the IAEA's findings said this month that the Iranians recently finished pre-assembly work at the Natanz facility, which is underground as protection against attack.

In enrichment plants, centrifuges are linked in what are called cascades. For now, the only known assembled centrifuge cascades in Iran are above ground at Natanz, consisting of two linked chains of 164 machines each and two smaller setups.

The two larger cascades have been running only sporadically to produce small quantities of non-weapons grade enriched uranium, while the smaller assemblies have been underground "dry testing" since November, IAEA inspectors have reported.

A U.N. official cautioned against assuming that the new work at Natanz would result in thousands of centrifuges spinning anytime soon, suggesting Tehran might do nothing more than put together another 164-machine cascade underground.

A diplomat with access to much of what is known about Iran's enrichment program said Tehran may not be technologically advanced enough to put together thousands of centrifuges in series _ work that would take months even for more developed countries. Additionally, he said, Iran might be "drawing a new line in the sand" by embarking on _ and then pausing _ its underground assembly work.

Even a symbolic start of underground installations at Natanz would sharply escalate the conflict between Tehran and world powers over its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0123917

In another example of Tehran's hardball tactics, diplomats in Vienna, where the IAEA is headquartered, said Iran had demanded the removal of a senior official linked to agency inspections of the Iranian nuclear program. Iran barred the official, Chris Charlier, from visiting last year.

ElBaradei suggested Thursday that one way to defuse tensions would be a "simultaneous time-out" _ with Iran suspending enrichment activities and the Security Council suspending sanctions so the matter could "go to the negotiating table."

In an indirect slap at the U.S. and Israel, ElBaradei also said anyone advocating military action against Tehran was "bonkers," because such a move would force Iran "to go underground."

Israel and the United States have both suggested a strike on Tehran's nuclear facilities was not off the table.

Curfew Is Lifted In Beirut, But Tension Lingers (NYT)

By Nada Bakri

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 26 — Lebanese Army soldiers reinforced checkpoints and maintained a heavy presence in tense neighborhoods in Beirut on Friday, lifting a rare nighttime curfew that had been imposed to stop the worsening violence between pro- and antigovernment crowds.

If there was any optimism in this beleaguered city, it was framed around the hopeful notion that all sides had become so frightened by the violence that perhaps they would be willing to find a compromise to end the nation's internal political standoff.

"The opposition will think about escalating maybe 10 times before doing it again," said Osama Safa, director of the Lebanese Center for Policy Studies, a research group. "I think, if anything, it proved that this can be very, very costly."

The curfew, lifted early Friday morning, was imposed after a fight at a university cafeteria grew into rioting and gunfire that left four people dead and 200 injured.

Slowly, this weary city came back to life as cleaners removed piles of debris, broken glass and bullet castings from the streets around Beirut Arab University, in Tariq Jadide, a Sunni neighborhood on the southern edge of the city.

Dozens of smashed and burned cars were towed away.

There was a veneer of calm yet deep uncertainty as the Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah and its allies held funerals for two of their activists who had been shot near the university campus.

Leaders on all sides, as they have from the beginning, called for unity to prevent Lebanon from sliding toward civil war.

"We urge all religious figures, Christian and Muslim, and all sensible people in Lebanon to shoulder their responsibility before it's too late," Sheik Mohammed Yazbik, a senior Hezbollah official, told mourners at one of the funerals.

Several thousand mourners turned out for the funerals. Gunmen fired shots in the air while others carried portraits of the deceased. The calm was fragile. "Death to Siniora, death to Jumblatt," shouted mourners in one procession, referring to Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and the pro-government Druse leader Walid Jumblatt.

At the same time, the Christian pro-government leader, Samir Geagea, said that he held the Hezbollah-led opposition responsible for the violence and warned that any moves to topple the government by force would lead to civil war.

"Some parties are trying to overthrow the government and the regime by force," said Mr. Geagea, the leader of the Lebanese Forces party. The government, he said, "will not fall under pressure, and if you continue, there will be civil war."

On Tuesday, a nationwide strike called by the Hezbollah-led opposition shut down the city and much of the nation, with roadblocks and crowds of supporters who took to the streets, burning tires and cars.

Hezbollah has demanded that Mr. Siniora step down or form a government of "national unity" that would give the opposition veto power and hold early parliamentary elections.

Mr. Siniora has refused to resign, insisting that the opposition end the protests and negotiate.

Lebanon Stands At Shiite-Sunni Brink (WSJ)

By Mariam Fam

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

The violence that Lebanon has witnessed in recent days -- culminating in clashes between Shiite opposition activists and Sunni pro-government supporters -- has again raised the specter of a civil war with a sectarian slant that echoes the growing regional Sunni-Shiite tensions. It also has underscored how combustible the stalemate has become between the Lebanese government and the opposition.

Lebanon, once viewed as a success story for democracy in the region, has previously witnessed mass protests that were largely disciplined and peaceful. But it has more recently seen a frightening escalation of unrest that troubles many Lebanese still recovering from the 15-year-old civil war that ended in 1990.

DOJ_NMG_0123918

Then, the fighting was largely between Christians and Muslims. Now, the political differences, on the rise since the end of the summer war with Israel, have sectarian undertones, among other things. Lebanese Sunnis largely back the government, while the Shiite Hezbollah and other Shiite groups stand in the opposition. Christians are divided between the two camps.

Increasing polarization in the Middle East further aggravates this issue. The rising clout of Shiite Iran and its influence in Iraq -- and beyond -- has alarmed Sunni regimes in the region. Hezbollah is backed by Iran and Syria, while the Lebanese government has the support of Washington and some key European and Sunni Arab governments. And many Lebanese feel their country, which boasts a delicate religious and sectarian mix, has become a proxy battlefield for regional and international power struggles.

"Lebanon's political terrain is rapidly shifting away from a phase marked by mild tremors and toward another era of civil-war-style earthquakes in which no government will be able to find firm footing," read an editorial on the Web site of the Lebanese The Daily Star newspaper. "Anyone who has studied the history of this fractious country knows how easily and quickly minor skirmishes can spiral out of anyone's control."

The editorial lamented Thursday's incidents involving a scuffle in a Beirut university between Sunni Muslim backers of the government and Shiite supporters of Hezbollah that disintegrated into clashes with cars set afire and fighting with stones and homemade clubs. Television footage showed gunmen taking aim from rooftops and windows. At least three people were killed, according to wire reports, and each camp blamed the other for the violence.

"What really scares the Lebanese people is that now Lebanon is once again teetering on the verge of a civil war, and that it may be starting to resemble the frightening Iraqi scenario, where sectarian sedition between the Sunnis and the Shiites flares," said Sateh Noureddine, managing editor of As-Safir newspaper, in an interview.

Thursday's violence came the same day that international donors pledged some $7.6 billion in aid, loans and other help for Lebanon and its government's economic-overhaul plans. The donors' conference in Paris was seen as a success, but the violence showed it will take more than just money for war-scarred and fractured Lebanon to heal its wounds.

"Any reform programs cannot take place without a political consensus," said Farid el-Khazen, a professor of politics at the American University of Beirut and a member of the Christian opposition allied with Hezbollah. "Not much can be done unless you have political consensus and support."

Demanding greater power, Hezbollah-led opposition supporters have staged sit-in protests for nearly two months in downtown Beirut, demanding the government step down or a new one be formed. The situation started to unravel on Tuesday when the opposition stepped up its campaign -- burning tires in the streets in a strike that paralyzed Beirut and other areas across Lebanon. Clashes between supporters of the two camps ensued.

While many Lebanese agree Tuesday was a watershed, they are divided over whom to blame. "Tuesday's strike has crossed the red line. The opposition controlled the country in a way that is not peaceful, and that did not respect the freedom of opinion," Mr. Noureddine said. Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, an expert on Hezbollah, said that, feeling threatened by the opposition's show of force on Tuesday, government supporters fueled Thursday's violence to flex their own muscles. "A lot of the violence is emanating from pro-government supporters," she said.

Aware of the lurking danger, political leaders on all sides appealed for restraint. Druse leader and senior pro-government politician Walid Jumblatt called on the Hezbollah-allied speaker of parliament to reconvene lawmakers in a bid to resume dialogue, the Associated Press reported.

The appeals for calm have raised the hopes of some that the violence may serve as a wake-up call that brings the leaders of the opposing groups closer.

But many analysts feel the recent flare-up has served only to cement the sectarian divide. Most troubling, they say, is that Thursday's street clashes signaled that if the situation further deteriorates, it may become more difficult for political leaders to control their supporters and stop some from tit-for-tat attacks. Already, many are accusing saboteurs of infiltrating crowds to instigate violence. On Friday, as calm was restored to Beirut, television stations affiliated with the opposing camps rehashed Thursday's events, trading barbed accusations.

"Unfortunately, I don't feel that the Lebanese leaders have enough awareness, wisdom and ability to assess the danger and call for coming together to find a common ground," Mr. Noureddine said.

Along Beirut's Line Of Confrontation (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

BEIRUT, Jan. 26 -- During Lebanon's 15-year civil war, the Green Line divided Beirut into predominantly Christian and Muslim halves along a road that became a symbol as telling as it was intimidating. In time, in a war in which more than 100,000 people were killed, it was less a front line and more a no man's land, named, some say, for its unkempt weeds and bushes.

DOJ_NMG_0123919

Little remains of the Green Line today, save the Barakat Building near the downtown, its stately columns and arches still honeycombed by the damage of war. Like much of Lebanon itself, the other scarred buildings along the road are sheathed in a thin facade of concrete, stone and glass.

These days, the front has shifted to the Old Airport Road, a mile-long stretch of which divides its residents by Muslim sect -- Sunni or Shiite. The emerging border evokes the old and the new of Lebanon's two-month-old crisis: civil war memories and the sectarian schism transforming Lebanon and the region around it.

"This is the line of confrontation," said Ahmed Itani, sitting with friends around a corner from the airport road, in the Sunni neighborhood of Dana. "They're there, we're here, and if something's going to happen, it's going to happen in between."

For hours Thursday, Beirut witnessed scenes reminiscent of Iraq, as hundreds of Sunni residents, aligned with the government, battled Shiites loyal to Hezbollah and the allied Amal movement, opposition groups that launched a campaign in December to topple the government. At least four people were killed and about 200 wounded. Calm returned Friday after the army imposed an overnight curfew and politicians urged their followers to retreat from the streets. Workers removed dumpsters that had served as barricades, dragged incinerated cars to curbsides and scrubbed streets stained by charred tires.

But the telltale specter of civil war lingered. Residents traded stories of both now and then: Sunni snipers perched on roofs, firing on unarmed Shiites below; Shiite vigilantes stopping cars, demanding identity cards to learn the drivers' sects.

In the claustrophobia inspired by Lebanon's shoe-horned diversity, many Sunnis were upset that Shiites had dared to encroach upon what Sunnis consider their turf, and they set up their own checkpoints in the Bekaa Valley and on the coast south of Beirut. Along the Old Airport Road, residents wrestled with the knowledge that civil wars often start through accumulated accidents, not by design.

"The leaders in this country are shepherds, and the followers are sheep. Is that not right?" Itani said. "Fight, you fight. Stop, you stop. Sleep, you sleep." His friends at a garage started laughing, until the owner, Mahmoud Akawi, stepped in.

"Who wants a war?" he asked angrily. "A long time ago, the fathers of the sons living here today died. Are the sons going to have to die now? Are we going to have to go through all these deaths again? Sunnis killing Shiites?"

Itani and his friends sat in silence.

Lebanon's crisis is more than a struggle between a government and its opposition. At issue are the fundamental questions of the country's identity: the influence of the United States, Syria and Iran; the relationship with Israel; the power of the Sunni and Shiite constituencies. Given the stakes, the government and its allies -- grouping Sunni Muslims, Druze and some Christians -- and the opposition -- the Shiite movements of Hezbollah and Amal, together with an influential Christian ally -- have escalated pressure, confident they can both mobilize and restrain their supporters. But with each clash, many say, the two sides move inexorably toward a point of no return.

On the Old Airport Road, a sign outside a Sunni mosque reads, "We want one Lebanon, not two Lebanons." Across the street, another banner says: "Sunnis and Shiites are the nation of the Prophet Muhammad. They can't be divided."

Other signs are more sectarian. A banner commemorates former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, a Sunni, who was executed by a Shiite-led government. "We will not forget you," it reads in red and black. Other posters celebrate the ongoing Shiite holiday of Ashura, "the victory of the aggrieved."

Every few hundred yards Friday, the army deployed armored personnel carriers and soldiers, some of whom were checking cars as they entered neighborhoods.

"We're against this war," said Mustafa Tahish, a 33-year-old tailor standing with his brother, Hisham, in Dana. "But armed men came to our territory. It's like a stranger coming to your house. How can we put up with this?"

"It was a provocation," his brother interrupted.

"We've been living together for years," Tahish went on. "They married us, and we married them. But you can't use force to settle a problem." He quieted. "This isn't Iraq," he said finally. "Is someone going to burn his house with his own hand?"

Traffic was light along the Old Airport Road on Friday because schools and universities were closed to let tensions subside. At one kiosk, a headline read, "Lebanon: Last chance for a solution before a disaster for everyone."

A little farther along was the Shiite neighborhood of Ghobeiri, where Wissam Berro, a grocer born to a Sunni mother and a Shiite father, worried about his wife of two months and the children they planned to have.

"How can I, if I don't know if there's going to be a war in Lebanon?" he asked.

From Hezbollah's leaders to Shiites in the street, many speculate that the United States is encouraging the Sunni-Shiite tension as a way to blunt the growing profile of largely Shiite Iran. But there is worry, too, that whatever the design, Lebanon is too divided, too weak, too reflexive in its loyalty to its clannish leaders to withstand the repercussions of sectarian strife.

"Curse whoever awakened it!" read Friday's headline in as-Safir, one of Beirut's main daily newspapers.

DOJ_NMG_0123920

Mohammed Zein al-Din shook his head as he remembered Thursday. An electrician, he was returning home from a Christian neighborhood when he was stopped in a mixed area by Amal loyalists in plain clothes, pistols tucked in their jackets. The men asked for his identity card. "They found I was a Shiite," he said, "and they told me I could go."

Din pointed at the Old Airport Road. It was the khat al-tamas, he said, the line of confrontation. "Anything can happen because everyone's armed," he added, then grimaced. "Pretty soon we're going to need three or four identity cards to get around."

Storming Of Home Caps Deadly Day In Gaza Strip (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

GAZA CITY, Jan. 26 -- Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a fighter from the rival Fatah movement Friday, witnesses said, sparking a deadly gun battle. The clash capped a day of factional violence across the Gaza Strip that killed at least 13 people, including a 2-year-old boy.

The fighting, among the deadliest in nearly two months, marred the anniversary of Hamas's upset victory in Palestinian parliamentary elections. After nightfall, gunfire continued to echo through Gaza City. The heaviest shooting was concentrated around the residence of Mansour Shaleil, a Fatah leader in the Jabalya refugee camp just north of Gaza City.

Hamas gunmen surrounded the house early Friday to detain Shaleil, accusing him of involvement in a shooting in which two Hamas supporters were killed. After an hours-long standoff, dozens of gunmen stormed the house and exchanged fire with Shaleil and a supporter, according to witnesses and ambulance drivers.

The gunmen later withdrew, Palestinian news media reported, leaving Shaleil unharmed. Two men identified as Hamas fighters were killed.

"It looks like they forgot who the enemy is," said Maher Megdad, a Fatah spokesman. "They forgot the Israeli occupation."

Fatah gunmen, meanwhile, kidnapped 19 Hamas fighters and threatened to kill them if Shaleil was harmed, officials on both sides said. After the siege at Shaleil's house ended, Hamas and Fatah officials said they were working with mediators to arrange the hostages' release.

Fighting also spread to the headquarters of the pro-Fatah Preventive Security Service in Gaza City. Four Hamas gunmen were killed in a battle outside a nearby mosque.

In other incidents, fighting erupted outside the residences of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas.

Deadly Battles Shatter Gaza Calm (BBC)

BBC.com, January 27, 2007

At least 13 people have died in some of the deadliest fighting between rival Palestinian factions Hamas and Fatah in Gaza for months.

Two civilians - one a two-year-old boy - were among those killed, Palestinian medics said.

The clashes erupted after weeks of relative calm and renewed efforts to form a national unity government.

Both Hamas and Fatah said they were suspending talks after the violence, which continued into the night.

Both factions also kidnapped members of the opposing side during the day.

More than 40 people have died as a result of a power struggle between supporters of the Hamas-led government and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction since mid-December.

Echo of gunfire

The BBC's Alan Johnston in Gaza says there has been intensive mediation by Egyptian diplomats in an effort to stop the bloodshed there.

He says late in the evening word came that Fatah and Hamas had agreed to order their supporters off the streets.

But our correspondent says both then accused the other of reneging on the deal and clashes continued.

Some of the heaviest fighting took place in the Jabaliya refugee camp, where Hamas gunmen laid siege to the home of a local Fatah leader.

The gunmen eventually stormed the building and two people were killed.

Militants linked to Fatah said they had captured at least 19 Hamas supporters in response to the siege. Some were later freed.

As night fell the streets of Gaza continued to echo to the sound of gunfire and explosions.

Elsewhere, fighting erupted outside the residences of Mr Abbas and Hamas Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar.

Mr Zahar's home was damaged after being hit by a rocket-propelled grenade, security sources said.

DOJ_NMG_0123921

Palestinian Factional Strife Leaves 14 Dead (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Rushdi Abu Alouf

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

JABALIYA, GAZA STRIP — Fourteen Palestinians died Friday in a resurgence of factional violence that marred the one-year anniversary of Hamas' victory in parliamentary elections.

The daily death toll was one of the highest in the sporadic street fighting that has sunk the Palestinians deeper into chaos and poverty over the last year and complicated efforts to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Friday's bloodshed disrupted talks between Hamas and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' rival Fatah movement on a proposed power-sharing arrangement.

Hamas' upset win Jan. 25 of last year gave the militant Islamic group control of the government, ending Fatah's dominance.

Because Hamas is sworn to Israel's destruction, its takeover prompted the United States, other Western countries and Israel to cut off funding to the Palestinian Authority.

Abbas, who had been elected president in 2005, has been trying for months to cut a deal with Hamas that would install a coalition Cabinet supportive of his efforts to negotiate peace with Israel and end the crippling sanctions. These talks have broken down several times amid the sporadic factional fighting, which has left more than 70 people dead since May.

Friday's violence, in which at least 34 people were wounded, broke two weeks of relative calm.

Four Hamas gunmen were killed in Gaza City after they and other worshipers leaving a mosque exchanged mortar and grenade fire with Fatah-led Preventive Security Service police at their nearby headquarters.

Most of the violence occurred in this northern Gaza town and its refugee camp.

After a 10-hour siege, dozens of police from the Hamas-led Interior Ministry stormed the home of a senior officer in the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, Fatah's militia, trying to arrest him for an earlier killing. The officer, Mansour Shaleil, escaped harm, but six people died — one of his relatives, a Fatah defender, two Hamas policemen and two unarmed bystanders.

During the siege, Fatah militants elsewhere said they had seized 19 Hamas members as hostages and threatened to kill them if Shaleil was hurt. Eleven of the hostages, held in the West Bank city of Nablus, were later freed; the fate of the others was unknown.

Hamas police officials said Shaleil was implicated in a roadside bomb explosion that hit a Hamas police jeep late Thursday, killing two policemen. Five other police officers and five civilians were wounded.

Before dawn Friday, Hamas policemen surrounded the home of another Fatah militiaman suspected of involvement in the bombing and killed him. A police spokesman said the militiaman had fired at the police as they went to arrest him.

Fatah officials called his death an execution.

Also killed Friday was a Hamas activist shot by a rooftop sniper as he rode through Jabaliya in a loudspeaker van summoning people to a rally marking the election anniversary.

Hamas had scheduled the rally for Gaza City but moved it to Jabaliya as a protest against Fatah's alleged role in the latest violence.

The crowd of 6,000 people, many of them bused from elsewhere, was small for a Hamas gathering in the coastal strip, the movement's stronghold, and many times fewer than Fatah mobilized for a Gaza City rally. Hamas policemen set up roadblocks and stood sentry on rooftops to protect the gathering as militants waved the movement's green flags.

The main speaker, lawmaker Mushir Masri, said Hamas would stand firm against its foes: Israel, the United States and "leaders of the coup," a reference to Abbas and other Fatah leaders who are trying to force Hamas to give up full control of the government.

"Don't waste your time and effort, because we are staying in our positions, in the government and in the parliament, just as the mountains of Palestine are staying in their place," shouted Masri.

Despite the Western economic pressures, which have made it impossible for the government to pay full salaries to its 165,000 employees, Hamas remains relatively popular — about even with Fatah in several opinion polls.

Abbas, reluctant to force a showdown, has delayed the plan he announced last month to call parliamentary and presidential elections ahead of schedule, a move Hamas has said it would resist.

He set a deadline Thursday, promising to fix an election date unless talks with Hamas produced agreement within three weeks on a power-sharing government that would recognize Israel's right to exist.

But Friday's violence forced a postponement of the latest scheduled power-sharing talks until at least Sunday, Hamas officials said. Fatah officials said the talks were suspended until further notice.

"How can dialogue go on when there is a bomb underneath the table?" said Fatah spokesman Tawfiq abu Khoussa.

DOJ_NMG_0123922

Deadly Suicide Bomber Attack At Hotel In Pakistan's Capital (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Jan. 26 — A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a Marriott hotel here on Friday afternoon, killing himself and a security guard, the police and security officials said. At least five other people were wounded.

No one immediately claimed responsibility.

The attack took place in an upscale neighborhood of the Pakistani capital considered to be a high-security zone.

Many foreign visitors stay at the Marriott, and important government and private functions are often held there. The prime minister and many of his cabinet ministers, members of Parliament and diplomats live nearby.

The United States Embassy issued an advisory to American citizens in the country.

"The embassy strongly advises all Americans to avoid the area, exercise caution, and limit unnecessary travel," the statement read.

Officials and witnesses said the suicide bomber had tried to enter the hotel through an entrance near the parking area.

"There is an emergency gate which is used by the employees of the hotel," Brig. Javed Iqbal Cheema, a retired officer who runs the National Crisis Management agency, said in an interview at the blast site.

He said the bomber appeared to have planned to force his way through the emergency gate.

"The guard, as a matter of fact, resisted entry into the gate and did not allow him to get inside," he said, adding that when the bomber saw that he could not enter, he detonated his bomb there. The bomber and the guard were killed.

"We don't know where he parked his car, but primarily he was on foot and trying to make forced entry into the hotel," Brigadier Cheema said.

Officials here said the bomber's remains would be examined by forensic investigators. He is believed to have been in his mid-20s, according to initial reports.

The blast shattered the glass of several vehicles parked in the nearby parking lot.

The police cordoned off the area, and security forces were put on high alert in the city. Three hotel staff members were wounded and hospitalized. No hotel guests were injured, according to a statement issued by the office of the District Magistrate in Islamabad.

Pakistani officials said it was too early to try to determine who might be behind the attack. Pakistan has experienced sporadic violence carried out by local militants and groups linked to Al Qaeda since President Pervez Musharraf allied himself with the United States in 2001 in the effort to curb terrorism.

International hotel chains like Marriott and Sheraton and branches of foreign companies like KFC and McDonald's have been targets.

"One should not speculate whether it's a reprisal or a continuation of what is going on in this country and region," Brigadier Cheema said.

The same view was echoed by Tariq Azim Khan, the minister of state for information and broadcasting. "It would be premature to judge the motives of the suicide bomber," he said.

Chinese Colonel Sees Arms In Space (WT/AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland -- A senior Chinese military officer predicts that weapons will be deployed in outer space despite her government's long-standing desire to prevent an arms race there.

Yao Yunzhu, a senior colonel in the People's Liberation Army, brought up China's recent successful test of an anti-satellite weapon during a World Economic Forum dinner Thursday.

"My wish is we really want to keep space as a peaceful place for human beings," she said, adding that China would like all countries to come to a consensus that space should be used only for peaceful purposes.

"But personally, I'm pessimistic about it," said Col. Yao, 52, who directs the Asia-Pacific Office at the Academy of Military Science in Beijing. "My prediction: Outer space is going to be weaponized in our lifetime."

Col. Yao's remarks were the first time a member of the Chinese military has commented on the test. The only other official comment, from the Foreign Ministry, offered the barest confirmation and repeated stock positions about China's wish to keep space free of weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0123923

"This isn't the act of a country who remains fiercely committed to peace and harmony in the world," said Adm. Timothy Keating, commander of U.S. Northern Command. "This is a cause for concern. ... In executing this test, they have created potential significant problems for international space flight."

Adm. Keating told the Associated Press in an interview this week there are ongoing worries that such tests have other consequences, "intended or otherwise," that China must realize, including potential damage to other satellites or the space station by debris.

He added that the United States does not now plan a direct response to the test, but "there are a number of things that are on the list of potential military options" if it happens again.

The Jan. 11 test sparked criticism from the United States and Japan, and created concerns over the rising militarization of space. Analysts said it also represented an indirect threat to U.S. efforts to remain predominant in space and on the ground, because it raised the possibility that the network of U.S. spy satellites could be shot down.

The U.S. military has had the capability to shoot down satellites since the 1980s. Russia has a similar capacity, and now China is the third potential military power in space.

China confirmed the test on Tuesday but did not provide details -- and neither did Col. Yao. The magazine Aviation Week, which first reported the test, said the satellite was hit by a kinetic kill vehicle launched from a ballistic missile.

China's long-standing policy has been to ban weapons in space, Col. Yao said, noting that Russia and China presented a draft outline for a treaty to prevent the deployment of weapons in space to the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva in June 2002.

The United States objected at the time, saying the 1967 Outer Space Treaty provided sufficient guarantees against the weaponization of space. The Russians countered that while the 1967 treaty banned weapons of mass destruction in space, it did not contain any legal barriers to putting other weapons in orbit around the Earth.

Without naming any country, but in an apparent reference to the United States, Col. Yao said if there's going to be "a space superpower, it's not going to be alone, and China is not going to be the only one."

"It will have company," she said.

Her rank of senior colonel is equivalent to that of a brigadier or one-star general in the U.S. military. She belongs to a small group of fluent English speakers the usually secretive People's Liberation Army uses to deal with foreigners.

Moscow Lashes Out At Georgia Over Uranium Sale (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 26 (AP) — Russia's foreign minister denounced on Friday the detention of a Russian man accused of trying to sell highly enriched uranium to Georgian agents, calling it a "provocation."

A government scientist, meanwhile, confirmed that a sample of the uranium sent to Russia was weapons-grade, but said the sample was too small to determine its origin, news agencies reported.

Igor Shkabura, deputy director of the Bochvar Inorganic Materials Institute, said the uranium sent by Georgia "could be used for military productions, including nuclear weapons," according to ITAR-Tass.

It was the first public comment by a named Russian official to claims by Georgia that it arrested and jailed a Russian man last year for trying to sell weapons-grade uranium to an agent posing as a rich foreign buyer.

The reports that emerged Wednesday, confirmed by United States officials, renewed concern about security at Russia's array of nuclear facilities. They also aggravated already high tensions between Russia and Georgia, which have been at odds for years over the status of South Ossetia and Abkhazia, two renegade regions of Georgia seeking either independence or absorption into Russia.

Georgian officials say their agent made contact with the man selling contraband uranium in South Ossetia, which is widely seen as a regional epicenter for smuggling.

Georgia's Foreign Ministry issued a statement late Thursday saying the uranium sting highlighted the need for international observer missions in both regions, a proposal that Georgia has been pushing in recent months. Russia has peacekeepers in both regions, which have been under the control of unrecognized separatist governments since fighting ended in the mid-1990s.

The ministry statement said, "Georgia is far from politicizing these questions."

Russia's foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, said that he could see no reason for the detention of the man accused of smuggling the uranium.

"On the basis of the facts that I have at my disposal, I can say that this was a provocation," he said, according to Interfax and RIA-Novosti.

DOJ_NMG_0123924

Russia Calls Uranium Incident A Ploy (LAT)

By David Holley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

Georgia's news of an arrest is propaganda meant to tarnish Moscow's image, authorities say.

MOSCOW — Russian authorities on Friday rejected as an overblown propaganda ploy the announcement this week that one of their citizens was arrested last year in Georgia while allegedly trying to sell a small amount of weapons-grade uranium.

Russian national Oleg Khintsagov was arrested Feb. 1 after he smuggled about 3.5 ounces of the uranium into Georgia from his homeland, expecting to receive $1 million for it, Shota Utiashvili, chief of the analytical department of the Georgian Interior Ministry, said Friday in a telephone interview from Tbilisi, the Georgian capital.

Khintsagov, who thought he was dealing with "an extremely wealthy customer" wanting to buy nuclear bomb-making material, claimed that he would be able to provide up to 6.6 pounds at the price of $1 million for each 3.5 ounces, Utiashvili said.

Khintsagov was convicted for the attempted sale and is serving a sentence of at least eight years in a Georgian prison.

Some experts say that as little as 4 pounds of weapons-grade uranium could be sufficient to construct a bomb, but more common estimates are that even a highly sophisticated weapon would need several times that amount. Estimates of how much enriched uranium a terrorist organization would need to make a relatively crude bomb typically range from 35 to 50 pounds.

Utiashvili charged that Russia had not cooperated in the investigation of the incident, which was first made public this week by Georgian and U.S. officials. These officials said the CIA, the FBI and the Energy Department had assisted in the case.

"We think it is extremely dangerous that such material can get into the hands of terrorists," Utiashvili said. "We think it is in everybody's interests, and especially in the interests of Russia, to get to the bottom of it and assist us in this investigation."

Georgian-Russian relations have been strained since last year, and Russian authorities have blamed any lack of cooperation in the case on the Georgian side.

An official of the Russian Federal Atomic Energy Agency, who asked for anonymity because the agency was not yet issuing a formal statement on the case, said that shortly after the man's arrest, Georgia had provided a tiny sample of the seized material for testing in Russia.

The sample was sufficient for Russian scientists to determine that it was weapons-grade uranium but was not large enough to determine the origin of the material or the method of production, he said.

The agency requested a larger sample but did not get one, he added. The official said the affair "seems to us to be very strange, to say the least."

Russian officials and analysts said Friday that Georgia was using the incident to score propaganda points.

"It appears obvious that Georgian 'hawks' were consciously trying to deal a painful blow to the prestige of Russia in the international arena," the state-run Rossiyskaya Gazeta newspaper declared in an unsigned commentary.

Georgia's actions in the case were "a planned information provocation," said Andrei Cherkasenko, board chairman of Atompromresursy, a manufacturer of nuclear power industry equipment, according to RIA Novosti, the state-run Russian news agency.

Ivan Safranchuk, director of the Moscow office of the Washington-based Center for Defense Information, expressed doubt that Khintsagov really had access to the quantity of nuclear material he claimed.

"It reminds one very much of similar FSB sting operations in the early 1990s, when FSB agents, in order to produce some successful operations, provoked various low-rank employees and guards at companies that possessed nuclear materials," he said, referring to the main successor agency to the KGB.

"They would offer sums of money for stealing it and selling it to FSB agents posing as eager customers," he explained. "I think genuine serious terrorists would rather go to Pakistan if they wanted to lay their hands on nuclear materials. They must know better than to try to fish for that stuff in the waters of the former Soviet Union, where they most likely will end up stiffed, cheated and robbed rather than get back with the real thing.

"I don't think the international community should give much credit to this story and express serious concern about the situation," Safranchuk said.

Utiashvili said Khintsagov had previously been known to Georgian authorities as "a small-time smuggler specializing mostly in foodstuffs."

"When we received information that this man claimed to be in possession of some weapons-grade nuclear materials, we didn't really believe it was true, given the trade habits of this person," Utiashvili said. "But we decided to follow that trace anyway because we can't leave any information like this without proper investigation. So we set up an operation in which one of our men posed as an extremely wealthy customer who was interested in obtaining that material."

DOJ_NMG_0123925

During the sting operation, Khintsagov was tracked from Russia through the Russian-backed Georgian separatist region of South Ossetia to the main part of Georgia controlled by the central government, Utiashvili said.

"We are completely convinced he brought the nuclear material from Russia," he said. "When the man and his three Georgian accomplices were arrested and the material was analyzed by our experts, we were shocked to hear that the material in question was indeed weapons-grade uranium-235."

Utiashvili said Georgia had requested help from the FSB, or Russian Federal Security Service, immediately after the arrests were made, but that the agency never responded.

"Unfortunately," he said, "Khintsagov never either during the investigation or during the trial testified where he got the dangerous material and who helped him get that in Russia."

david.holley@latimes.com

Times staff writer Sergei L. Loiko contributed to this report.

Garry Kasparov: The Other Russia (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

NEW YORK -- As the longtime world chess champion, Garry Kasparov was a famously aggressive player. His latest game is politics, and his style is equally aggressive. "Our goal is to dismantle the regime," he says, speaking of the political coalition he leads to bring down Vladimir Putin.

Mr. Kasparov's Putin antipathy is well known to readers of this newspaper, of which he is a contributing editor. "I Was Wrong About Putin," was the headline on his Jan. 9, 2001, op-ed article for this page. One year into Mr. Putin's presidency, Mr. Kasparov sounded an early warning about a man whose "KGB roots have informed a style of governance that is neither reformist nor particularly democratic." Since then, Mr. Kasparov has scarcely let up, retiring from chess in March 2005 in part to devote himself to politics.

Mr. Kasparov's new occupation is not without its perils -- a thought that occurred to me as we arranged to meet earlier this month at his newly refurbished apartment in an art deco building on a smart street in Midtown Manhattan. It's a neighborhood replete with sushi bars -- of the sort that bring to mind, ghoulishly, the late Alexander Litvinenko, who was poisoned with polonium 210.

The doorman announces me, and Mr. Kasparov greets me at the door. We are old interlocutors -- I was present at his first meeting with the editorial board in March 1990 and was his editor at the Journal for years. So we kiss -- twice, once on each cheek, not three times, as is the custom in Moscow. After his wife serves tea -- in bone-china English cups, not à la Russe, in glasses -- I ask Mr. Kasparov about the risks: "Look," he says, "there are certain moments in your life when you should forget calculations and do what you believe is your moral duty. I knew that the choice would be dangerous. That's why our baby was born here. I'm prepared to take all the risk, but if I can avoid some, I do." The Kasparovs have a three-month-old daughter.

"The Other Russia" is the name of the unlikely left-right coalition conceived by Mr. Kasparov in 2005 and founded last year. It is composed of groups that would normally be at political odds -- democrats like Mr. Kasparov, nationalists, socialists, even Bolsheviks. Mr. Kasparov predicts that the Communist Party will join up before the end of the year. "There's still a lot of distrust," he says, with more than a modicum of understatement. "It's a problem, but I don't think it's insurmountable. The big advantage of the Other Russia, and I think it's our biggest accomplishment, is that we've established the principle of compromise, which was not yet seen in Russian politics. It was always confrontation. It was a mentality of a civil war. We eliminated it."

A declaration at the time of the Other Russia's organizing conference last summer reads, "We are gathering together because we are united in our disagreement with the current political course of the Kremlin and united in our alarm for the present and future of our country." The group's sole objective is to find a candidate to run -- and win -- in the March 2008 presidential elections. Or as Mr. Kasparov puts it with characteristic bluntness: "When a liberal democracy is re-established, everybody goes his or her way."

The Russian Constitution forbids Mr. Putin from running for a third term -- though that doesn't quell widespread speculation that the president will ignore the rule of law and do so anyway. He "has the administrative resources" to do so, Mr. Kasparov agrees, but it would be at the price of his legitimacy -- both in the West and at home. "I don't think Putin wants to take such a chance."

Mr. Kasparov believes Mr. Putin's "mentality is just to run away -- with all the Russian billionaires. This is the richest ruling elite in the world. They are way ahead of the Saudi princes. They are mega-rich. When you're so rich, you have to make sure that your funds are safe." But "if Putin goes, then who will be in charge? That's a big problem. Then it's instability. An authoritarian regime cannot have a successor while the big name [Mr. Putin] is still alive, much less well, young and strong."

DOJ_NMG_0123926

As the new year unfolds, Mr. Kasparov predicts "a political crisis" in Mr. Putin's government, along with "less stability, more uncertainty." That's the opening for the Other Russia. "We should keep our group together, close to the wall, to get into the hall when it's broken. But not too close to be buried under the debris." And then? "If the Other Russia wins, who cares? The victory of the Other Russia candidate destroys the legacy of any institution built under Putin. You have to start from scratch. You have to call new [parliamentary] elections. You have to introduce new laws. You have to undergo judicial reform. You have to destroy censorship." In short, you have to start over, back to where Russia was before Mr. Putin took over, building democracy, block by block.

The next step for the Other Russia, Mr. Kasparov says, is to come up with a platform and work out the rules for selecting a presidential candidate, tasks that are on the agenda for a conference planned for April. The candidate will likely be chosen in another conference in September or October, Mr. Kasparov explains. At the moment Mikhail Kasyanov, a former prime minister, "looks most prominent."

And what about Garry Kasparov? Is he a candidate? It's the only time in 15 years of conversations with Mr. Kasparov that I've known him to be less than confident in a reply. "So far . . .," he says -- note the "so far" -- "so far, I don't think my personal participation helps the coalition because so far" -- another one! -- "I keep the position of moderator. . . . I keep balance of different forces. If I step into the game, that might jeopardize the whole coalition."

In the course of our discussion, Mr. Kasparov refers often to the lack of a free press in Russia. So how, then, will the Other Russia get its message across? "The role of Internet is growing," he says. "Mobile telephones are not unique anymore, not even in rural villages." But -- and the master chess player may have too much confidence in the analytic abilities of ordinary Russians here -- "more important is growing malcontent. People are getting really unhappy. And if they're unhappy, they'll listen."

Mr. Kasparov is far more worried about money, which is short; but "I think in 2007 we will see a major influx of our financial support from within Russia because people can see that the ground is shaky." The Other Russia won't touch "politically exposed money," he says -- and emphatically denies that exiled oligarch Boris Berezovsky is a donor. But in the end, he says, "You know, you can't buy political support. Either you are the right man at the right place at the right time or no money helps you." More political naïveté?

Our hour nearly at an end, conversation drifts back to the early '90s and the discussions we used to have about Russia and its future. Is there something the U.S. might have done differently back then, I ask, that would have helped keep Russia on the path to democracy?

Mr. Kasparov gives a wry smile. "I think the best thing [the U.S.] could have done was to get Saddam [Hussein] 15 years earlier," he says. "By going after Saddam in 1991, I think we could have saved Yugoslavia from a civil war and could have sent a message, a very powerful message, to many dictators. . . . In 1991, the United States was much stronger and everybody else was much weaker."

The decision to let Saddam stay in power happened under the watch of President George H.W. Bush, whom Mr. Kasparov isn't shy about criticizing. But he's far more scathing about President Bill Clinton. "During the Clinton years, the United States did virtually nothing in the international arena. . . . There were a lot of activities, but when you look at the core events, I think the influence was irrelevant. . . . Leadership. There was no leadership. . . . There was a big window of opportunity to show leadership, in 1992-93. In those years the whole world was in an ambiguous state after the Cold War. It was a new world, and it required leadership. The way Winston Churchill and [Harry] Truman showed it in World War II. . . . Missing this chance and playing sporadically -- you know, boom, boom, you play one move here, one move there. The United States was asleep."

What advice does he have for George W. Bush about helping Russian democracy today? "Stay neutral," comes the swift reply. The "worst thing" that happened to the democracy movement, he says, was the inclusion of Russia in the Group of 7 democracies, now the G-8, a designation he can't bring himself to utter. Now, Washington should take that position that "there must be an election under the Russian constitution. Putin must go, and elections should be held. Period. That's enough. There's no double standard. Obey the Constitution. That's it."

In addition to his work with the Other Russia, Mr. Kasparov continues to write books about chess -- he's up to Volume Six in a series about his great predecessors -- and he has a mass-market book coming out this year called "How Life Imitates Chess," about the decision-making process in chess, business, politics and history. But at least for now, politics has taken the place of chess as the big game in his life: "I just don't see any other choice for me," he says. "As I used to say for 25 years, I am defending the colors of my country. I'm still doing the same, just not at the chessboard. At a much larger board."

Ms. Kirkpatrick is a deputy editorial page editor at The Wall Street Journal.

Kosovo To Declare Statehood In Months (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Neil Macdonald

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123927

Kosovo is to declare independence in the next few months, with the tacit support of the EU and Nato, in an effort to resolve the eight-year impasse on the status of the province at the heart of the 1999 war between Nato and Belgrade.

Senior western diplomats say the province will make its move and be recognised as independent by European Union and Nato countries once a United Nations resolution about its future – expected to stop short of granting independence – is agreed.

"It's for a state to determine whether it's a state and for others to recognise it or not, and that's what's going to happen," said a western diplomat. He added that although the EU would recognise Kosovo as independent, Serbia would not.

Western diplomats believe bilateral recognition of Kosovo's independence is the only way out of the dispute about the future of the province, but acknowledge they will have to work hard to prevent Serbia's objections destabilising the region as a whole.

The EU and US see Kosovo as the biggest remaining source of instability in the Balkans. They intend to avoid either more rioting among Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority like that in March 2004 or an attempt by Belgrade to partition the province, over which it claims sovereignty.

Russian opposition means the UN resolution will not declare Kosovo independent. But the EU and Nato believe the resolution is necessary to prevent the province spinning out of control.

Muhamet Hamiti, senior political adviser to Kosovo's ethnic Albanian leadership, confirmed the province was considering a unilateral declaration of independence but added it would prefer to work within the UN process: "We have been independent since 1999 but we need our sovereignty recognised by the international community. We don't expect our independence and sovereignty as a gift from anybody."

On Friday Martti Ahtisaari, UN chief mediator on Kosovo, presented proposals to the contact group of leading powers on Kosovo made up of the UK, France, Germany, Italy, the US and Russia. He plans to take his blueprint to the leaders of Serbia and Kosovo on February 2, to start negotiation before a UN Security Council resolution in March.

Moscow wants Mr Ahtisaari to take more time, arguing there is no permanent government in place in Belgrade.

U.N. Plan Expected To Pave Way For Kosovo Independence (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 26 — The United Nations mediator Martti Ahtisaari presented his proposals for the final status of Kosovo on Friday, most likely setting the tiny war-torn territory on its way toward independence.

Although that goal is still months away and subject to a vote at the United Nations, the presentation of a plan is an important and long-delayed step in resolving the still potentially explosive tensions that led to war in Europe eight years ago.

The recommendations would leave the former Yugoslav province free to declare independence from Serbia, according to Western diplomats who have seen the plan. But they say it would also impose international supervision, much like what exists in Bosnia, to provide protection for Kosovo's ethnic Serbs.

As a result, the proposals fall short of the full independence so hoped for by the territory's majority population of ethnic Albanians, according to Western diplomats.

Even with the promise of international involvement, the diplomats say, Russia, a Serbian ally whose support is a crucial element, remains cool to the plan.

The proposals foresee a strong international presence for the indefinite future, and include "a lot of measures to guarantee and promote the rights of the minority communities," Remi Dourlot, Mr. Ahtisaari's spokesman, said in Vienna, where the plan was presented.

NATO troops, which have kept peace in the country since fighting ended in 1999, will stay put for the time being. And while the United Nations mission governing the territory will pack up and leave, it will be replaced by another international organization that will have executive powers to annul any legislation that breaches Kosovo's obligations under United Nations agreements, diplomats said.

If the United Nations Security Council approves the plan, Kosovo is expected to quickly declare its independence and could expect swift recognition from its American and European supporters, even if Serbia rejected such a move.

But that step, diplomats caution, is probably months away.

"I foresee this process taking some time, and we might be in a wholly different situation," said one senior Western diplomat in Vienna who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to comment on the proposal until it is made public. "No one can predict the Security Council dynamic."

Mr. Ahtisaari handed his recommendations to representatives of the so-called Contact Group — the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Russia — during a meeting at a secret location in Vienna. It will be presented next Friday to the Serbian government in Belgrade and the Kosovo government in Pristina.

DOJ_NMG_0123928

Serbia and Kosovo will have the opportunity to ask questions and suggest changes to the proposals. When Mr. Ahtisaari feels he has exhausted those negotiations, he is expected to present a plan to the Security Council for approval. Kosovo and Serbia remain far apart in their positions, and experts say it is unlikely that Mr. Ahtisaari can close the gap.

Already, Russia, which supports Serbia's efforts to keep Kosovo as a province, is pushing for the Security Council vote to be delayed until Belgrade has formed a government after recent elections, diplomats in Vienna say.

Serbia's nationalist Radical Party came in first with 28 percent of the vote this month, but the democratic parties that came in second and third have the best chance to form a coalition.

But four Western diplomats interviewed said they doubted that Serbia could prevail upon Russia to veto a resolution once the Security Council is presented with one.

Mr. Ahtisaari, a former Finnish president, has not said when he expected to send the proposals to the Security Council, but diplomats involved in the negotiations say they are pressing for it to happen this spring.

According to one diplomat familiar with the plan, it would give Kosovo the right to enter into some international agreements and join world organizations as a sovereign state.

NATO would train a civil defense force that could eventually become a Kosovo Army, though it is not clear what would become of the Kosovo Protection Corps, which includes former Kosovo Liberation Army fighters and has been accused of aiding ethnic Albanian rebels in Macedonia and other misconduct.

In other ways, Kosovo would remain subject to international community oversight. The European Union is already setting up a police force of more than 1,000 officers to monitor the territory's police, judges, prosecutors and even prison guards.

The most politically delicate part of the plan concerns treatment of the estimated 114,000 Serbs in Kosovo, most of whom adamantly oppose independence from Serbia.

To reassure the minority that their rights will not be overrun, some Serbian areas would reportedly be given autonomy, and be free to receive some Serbian government help in building hospitals and schools. Mr. Ahtisaari's plan also reportedly provides for the creation of several new municipalities where the concentration of Serbs is high.

Serbian legislators in the Kosovo Parliament, meanwhile, would be able to stop at least some legislation if they believe it discriminates against the Serbian minority, diplomats said. Serbian religious institutions would also be guaranteed special protection.

Kosovo, nearly the size of Connecticut, has about two million people, 90 percent of whom are ethnic Albanian Muslims, a legacy of Ottoman rule.

It was an autonomous region within the Yugoslav federation until 1989, when Slobodan Milosevic asserted Belgrade's authority over the territory. That led to a rebellion by ethnic Albanians that was brutally suppressed until NATO intervened with a bombing campaign against Mr. Milosevic's troops in March 1999.

The war ended that June 1 when Serbian forces withdrew from Kosovo and NATO peacekeepers moved in. Kosovo became a United Nations protectorate with the promise that its final status would be decided over time. NATO has recently warned that Kosovo Albanian patience in waiting for that solution is running thin.

Rift Widens Among Nations Over Kosovo (AP)

By William J. Kole, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2007

Russia is pressing for more time to examine a U.N. proposal for the future of Kosovo, Western and Russian officials said Friday, underscoring a widening rift between Moscow _ a key ally of Serbia _ and the United States and its European allies.

"Russia wants a longer period" to consider the plan, which U.N. special envoy Martti Ahtisaari presented in Vienna to diplomats from the so-called Contact Group _ U.S., Russia, Britain, France, Germany and Italy _ a Western official told The Associated Press.

Other members of the Contact Group insisted that "we've got to set a time limit" on the roadmap for the independence-minded province, said the official, who was not authorized to discuss details of the proposal and spoke on condition of anonymity.

Russia is a traditional ally of Serbia, which considers Kosovo the heart of its ancient homeland and insists that it remain part of Serbian territory. Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority has been pushing for outright independence.

The U.N. Security Council will have the final say on Ahtisaari's plan, which the former Finnish president will formally present to both sides on Feb. 2.

Moscow's apparent misgivings _ and its veto power at the U.N. _ have raised the possibility of a diplomatic showdown with the United States, which backs the province's drive for statehood.

DOJ_NMG_0123929

The other members of the Contact Group "agreed that the plan should go to the parties" without delay, the Western official said. But a Russian diplomat told the AP that the Kremlin "would prefer to wait" at least until Serbia, which held parliamentary elections earlier this month, forms a new government.

"We would not favor hasty moves," the Russian official said. The Russian official also was not permitted to discuss the proposal publicly and spoke on condition of anonymity.

Ahtisaari's deputy, Albert Rohan, called Friday's meeting "very good and positive," but declined to provide details. The diplomats planned to take the document to their capitals for further review, spokesman Remi Dourlot said.

In Pristina, Kosovo Prime Minister Agim Ceku reacted with impatience to the Russian request, insisting: "There are no more reasons to delay the status process."

Ceku said he realized the proposal "may contain elements that are not that favorable _ not all will be what we want."

"But it will be an acceptable package, we believe, for the people of Kosovo," he said. "I am confident that Kosovo will be independent and that when Ahtisaari goes to the Security Council he will propose independence for Kosovo."

His deputy, Lufti Haziri, said the U.N. blueprint was crafted around "two main issues, two main principles: Kosovo's right to its future and Kosovo's obligations toward minorities."

But diplomats and officials have said the proposal likely will not mention the word independence, although it is expected to give Kosovo some attributes of a sovereign state, such as access to international institutions and provisions for a security force.

Kosovo has been under U.N. control since mid-1999 _ when NATO airstrikes ended former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic's crackdown on ethnic Albanian separatists _ and is currently patrolled by a 16,000-strong NATO-led peacekeeping force.

Ahtisaari has said his plan focuses on the protection of Kosovo's small Serbian minority and envisages a strong international presence backed up by the NATO peacekeepers.

International mediators have held yearlong talks between ethnic Albanian and Serbian leaders on issues such as giving self-rule to Serbs in areas where they form a majority, protecting their religious and cultural monuments and offering them constitutional guarantees so they are not overruled.

Oliver Ivanovic, a moderate Kosovo Serb leader from the ethnically divided city of Kosovska Mitrovica, said he was briefed earlier on key elements of the plan. He said Serbs "will have special rights in security, health services, education and cultural matters."

Diplomats said the plan also outlines post-status international supervision, with the European Union's top envoy in Kosovo likely to have veto power over laws and government decisions.

That would resemble the Dayton accords that ended Bosnia's 1992-95 war and established an international administrator to oversee that country's day-to-day affairs.

___

Associated Press writers Aleksandar Vasovic in Vienna and Garentina Kraja in Kosovo contributed to this report.

Tokyo Cuts Aid, And Hinterland Withers In Japan (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

YUBARI, Japan — Buried in chest-deep snow, History Village sprawled across a valley here, undisturbed by the tourists it was supposed to attract.

The place has gone bankrupt, as has its owner, this city on the northern island of Hokkaido.

No visitor could be seen the other day walking up the road, past the robot museum, the building with stuffed animals, the one dedicated to fossils, the one on life in the 1950s — “We were poor but happy in those days” — or the coal mine museum.

During Japan’s economic boom, Tokyo showered enormous subsidies on Yubari to build these huge though poorly thought-out tourist attractions, which drew few visitors, ran large deficits and saddled this city of 12,828 inhabitants with more than $500 million in debt.

At first it was a convenient arrangement: the hinterlands prospered, politically connected contractors had plenty of work and the government cemented the loyalty of rural voters. But the good times ended in the 1990s, and the government slowly closed the financial spigots, leaving Yubari and other rural cities increasingly desperate.

Yubari’s plight has drawn nationwide attention, in part because it has become a precedent-setting test of wills between the city and the national government. How closely will Tokyo — which has always bailed out communities and companies — hew to its new policy of weaning rural Japan from the central government?

DOJ_NMG_0123930

The evidence of growing hardship is hard to miss. Museums with little to exhibit, roads that lead nowhere and other white elephants litter the rural landscape, even as their upkeep drains local communities' shrinking resources. In fact, municipal finance experts say, other localities are in even worse financial shape than Yubari, but the day of reckoning has come here first.

As part of its plan to file for bankruptcy, place itself in the hands of Tokyo and repay its debts over 20 years, Yubari has put History Village and about 20 other tourist attractions up for sale. About half of the 300 city workers are leaving, and those who stay face salary cuts ranging from 30 percent to 70 percent.

The city's 11 schools will be consolidated into three or four; its hospital will become a clinic; its library, city hall branches and public baths will be shuttered. City bus discounts for the elderly will be reduced. Local taxes will rise. Already, snowfalls now have to total six inches, rather than four, before they are cleared.

No cost-cutting measure has been deemed too small. The toilet at the Yubari train station has been closed, forcing travelers to sneak into the adjoining hotel.

The imminent drop in the quality of life has led to recriminations and finger-pointing: at local politicians for lack of foresight, at Tokyo for feeding the rural addiction to public works. So far the government has not budged at reports that Yubari's little old ladies will not be able to afford to ride the bus any longer. It has said it shares no "responsibility" for Yubari's troubles, and the internal affairs minister, Yoshihide Suga, has pressed for even deeper cuts.

Yubari's mayor, Kenji Goto, said, "There are many local governments besides Yubari that are in dire financial straits, so I guess Tokyo has to take a hard stance against us."

Tokyo's attitude has led to anger here that the central government is singling out Yubari as a warning to the countless other Yubaris across Japan. If the Yubaris can no longer count on the government to rescue them, the reasoning goes, they will start cutting costs on their own.

"It's Tokyo that handed us all this money, without saying a word, and now they're saying it was wrong," said Kazuko Kudo, 77, a longtime resident. "No one expected that all of a sudden they'd make an example out of us."

Once a prosperous coal mining town with a population that peaked at 120,000 in the 1960s, Yubari extends for 20 miles up a single road, flanked by mountains. To advertise a local film festival, the city has put billboards of classic movies, like "Gone With the Wind," on buildings throughout the city, adding color to the city's general grayness.

Yubari began trying to transform itself into a tourism destination in the 1980s as the mines closed. It received generous subsidies from Tokyo for years; its former six-term mayor, Tetsuji Nakata, was famous for winning projects from the central government.

Some tourists came during Japan's economic heyday in the 1980s, and the city also became famous for its expensive melons. Yubari continued building tourist sites even after the collapse of Japan's economic bubble, as the nation tried to spend its way to recovery during the 1990s.

But the tourist attractions drew few repeat visitors, and the city was falling into the red — even though city officials fudged accounting figures to mask budget deficits.

"Whenever I'd pass by the tourist sites, I never felt there were that many visitors," said Mie Kosugi, 60. "So I wasn't surprised when they announced the truth, but I was shocked at the amount."

The reality was indeed dire: Yubari had $296 million in debts and $224 million in outstanding local government bonds. Its biggest employer was the municipal government, and 40 percent of the population was 65 or older. History Village, especially the robot museum, was now the object of widespread ridicule.

Mitsuo Okazaki, the city council leader now in his fourth term in office, said Yubari would have already become a ghost town had it not tried its hand at tourism.

"When we switched from coal mines to tourism, Tokyo kept coming at us with money to invest," Mr. Okazaki said. "So what we did was to accept their offer, and we kept building public works projects. But we were left with debts."

Mr. Okazaki said the biggest reason Yubari could no longer make its debt payments was simply that subsidies from Tokyo had fallen. As part of its plans to decentralize and cut waste, the Japanese government in recent years has given greater tax collecting authority to local governments and reduced subsidies.

For Japan, the most indebted government in the developed world, decentralization means lessening a financial burden it can no longer bear. But critics say it will merely widen the gap between thriving urban centers, like Tokyo and Nagoya, and a rural Japan with an increasing number of elderly residents and an outflow of young taxpayers.

Misao Yamamoto, 32, who was shopping at a Yubari convenience store with her 2-year-old, said her neighbors had packed up and left, even though they had built a house recently. Her family is thinking of doing the same, since her husband has lost his job at History Village.

"My third-grade son watches TV and says he's fed up with how this place is about deficit this, deficit that," Mrs. Yamamoto said, adding that the older boy wanted to move to a neighboring city. "He says he's just fed up with Yubari."

DOJ_NMG_0123931

Venezuela: U.S. Envoy Says Bags Are Packed (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

Diplomatic relations with the United States appeared to become more fragile as William Brownfield, the American ambassador, responded to a threat of expulsion from President Hugo Chávez by saying, “My bags are always packed and ready.” Mr. Brownfield, in a visit to Maracaibo, also emphasized that he hoped to avoid further confrontation and to focus instead on issues of political and economic importance to both Caracas and Washington. Mr. Chávez, who has threatened to expel Mr. Brownfield before, said on Thursday night that he could declare the ambassador “persona non grata” if he continued to comment on such issues as Venezuela’s plan to nationalize companies controlled by foreign investors.

Venezuela's Satellites (WP)

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

AREMARKABLE year of democracy in Latin America has left the region generally stronger. Presidential elections were held in 11 countries in the past 13 months, and political moderates won seven of them, including those in the four largest countries: Brazil, Mexico, Colombia and Peru. Throughout most of the hemisphere, the elections reinforced a consensus that continued growth must depend on free markets and free trade but that governments should concentrate on narrowing the large gap between rich and poor.

The new year nevertheless has begun with attention focused on a handful of countries where democracy is dead, dying or in danger. Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez began his term this month with a flurry of authoritarianism, promising to cancel the license of the largest independent television station and seeking authority to rule by decree. He then rushed to attend the inaugurations of Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega and Ecuador's Rafael Correa, whom he hopes to convert into satellite leaders in a Venezuelan-led "socialist" bloc. Bolivia's Evo Morales and an ailing Fidel Castro are already in Mr. ChÃ¡vez's orbit; thanks to Venezuela's petrodollars, Cuba's totalitarian system may survive Mr. Castro's demise.

Mr. ChÃ¡vez's best chance may lie with Mr. Correa, who distanced himself from the Venezuelan and his policies to win the election, then swung back to his side on inauguration day. Mr. Correa denounced globalization and called the United States an "empire." More ominously, he adopted Mr. ChÃ¡vez's political strategy, calling for a constituent assembly to bypass Congress and rewrite the constitution -- a step Mr. ChÃ¡vez used to begin dismantling Venezuela's democracy seven years ago.

Mr. Morales's attempt to use the same tactics in Bolivia is foundering, but it is also pushing the country closer to another crisis. The Bolivian constituent assembly is deadlocked over voting rules; meanwhile, opposition governors in the relatively prosperous eastern lowlands are mobilizing masses against the president and his Venezuelan tutors. If he presses forward, Mr. Correa may encounter similar resistance.

Interestingly, Mr. Ortega is moving with considerably more caution, though he, too, has been showered with promises of Venezuelan aid and graced with an inaugural visit by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Elected with just 38 percent of the vote, the former Marxist dictator has avoided anti-American rhetoric and promised not to tamper with the Central American Free Trade Agreement. His new finance minister told the Financial Times that socialism is not the government's program.

At 61, Mr. Ortega may understand something that Mr. ChÃ¡vez, 52, and his would-be followers have yet to learn: Socialist economics are a recipe for impoverishment, while political power grabs tend to boomerang. The mini-bloc of Latin outliers poses little threat to the United States or the region's overall stability. But even as their neighbors consolidate democratic institutions and unprecedented prosperity, the people of Venezuela, Bolivia, Ecuador and Cuba may be headed for a miserable year.

Ground Zero In Bolivia's Dispute (LAT)

By Patrick J. McDonnell

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

COCHABAMBA, BOLIVIA — Embattled President Evo Morales launched his second year in office this week, mocking his political opponents and vowing that "this Indian is going to be around for a while."

But recent turmoil in this city long regarded as a bastion of support for Morales, Bolivia's first indigenous president, has raised new questions about his leftist government's ability to serve out its five-year mandate.

Days of protests culminated Jan. 11 in violent clashes between pro- and anti-Morales factions that transformed this normally bustling agricultural center 140 miles southeast of La Paz, the nation's administrative capital, into an anarchic battleground. The fighting left two dead, scores injured and the capitol building and other structures burned.

The tear gas has dissipated and a sense of normalcy has returned to Cochabamba, though riot police still stand watch near the quaint central plaza. But the paroxysm of rage has reverberated in national politics at a time when Morales' "democratic revolution" was already facing fierce resistance.

DOJ_NMG_0123932

"If you'd asked me six months ago if Evo's government would survive, I'd have replied, 'Yes, absolutely,' " said Jim Shultz, a Californian who works with a nonprofit pro-democracy organization here. "I still say 'yes' today, but the possibilities of 'no' are rising."

Bolivia has a long history of forced ousting of governments, including many military coups. Morales won the presidency after protests chased out two previous presidents.

Today, even some of his longtime supporters have assailed the president for failing to quell the festering crisis in Cochabamba and instead opting to heap the blame elsewhere — mostly on his chief political rival here, Gov. Manfred Reyes Villa, a once-defeated presidential candidate now seemingly positioned for a future run.

Pro-Morales demonstrators, many of them Indian coca-leaf growers brought in from the countryside, unsuccessfully attempted to force Reyes out of office and install a "revolutionary committee" headed by an ex-guerrilla leader once known as Comandante Loro — Commander Parrot.

The hardscrabble protesters fought pitched street battles with Reyes supporters, largely middle-class, mixed-race residents fed up with what many view as the president's snubbing of their needs as he exalts Bolivia's long-ignored indigenous masses. It is a bitterness voiced well beyond Cochabamba.

"Evo has basically turned his back on the Bolivian middle class," said Gonzalo Lema, a well-known author here.

By all accounts, crossover support from the middle class helped propel Morales into the presidency in the December 2005 election with almost 54% of the national vote. Yet the president seldom acknowledges the existence of a non-indigenous Bolivia, except as a nefarious force opposing his efforts to rewrite the constitution.

"Evo has lost a chunk of his mandate because of rhetoric, and that's needless," said Shultz. "What would it cost him to get on TV on a regular basis and talk about the problems of people who aren't indigenous?"

Keen to capitalize on the dissatisfaction is Reyes, a former army captain and longtime mayor who has been catapulted into a leadership position in the nation's opposition.

"They're trying to impose a totalitarian regime," the governor said of Morales' government during an interview at a relative's penthouse suite in this city of 500,000. "Democracy has taken a blow in Cochabamba."

The president's response to the crisis here was typically pugnacious: He called for a new "people's" law to allow recall votes against elected officials such as Reyes. "If the people knew that they could remove an official with their vote, we would avoid this type of confrontation," Morales explained.

Detractors see a Morales power play to wrest control of Cochabamba and other opposition-dominated provinces — including La Paz, which also has a rival governor — at a time when the president's Movement Toward Socialism party only holds three of nine statehouses.

"Things got out of hand in Cochabamba because it is part of the larger national controversy," said Fernando Mayorga, an analyst here.

The lightning rod is the demand for autonomy emanating from the resource-rich, lowland "half moon" regions to the east, south and north of La Paz. The lowland zone is geographically, ideologically and culturally removed from Morales' base in the Andean high plains and nearby coca-growing tropics, where he got his start as a labor leader. The raging autonomy debate has become a proxy for the broader question of the country's future.

For his part, Morales equates autonomy with Bolivia's breakup and has vowed to fight it.

"No caballero will be able to split apart Bolivia," Morales said near Lake Titicaca this week, using a term identified with white colonizers, as cheering "red poncho" indigenous volunteers pledged to resist alongside their Aymara kinsman, the former llama herder who became president.

The volatile ethnic and class issues are somewhat of a diversion, some analysts say. In Bolivia, autonomía has relatively little to do with language, culture, religion or the other core issues that have animated autonomy controversies in other lands. Here, it is mostly about money and resources — specifically, who controls Bolivia's valuable natural gas reserves, second largest in South America after Venezuela's.

From Morales' standpoint, it is an unfortunate quirk of fate that much of Bolivia's gas and petroleum wealth is concentrated far from his base of support. The president has repeatedly charged that rich landowners and businesspeople from the eastern city of Santa Cruz, an anti-Morales stronghold, were fomenting and funding the autonomy movement in a bid to grab national resources.

Now Cochabamba, a geographic and cultural bridge between the pro-autonomy lowlands and Morales' Andean base, has been thrust front and center into the autonomy fight. Seven years ago, a "water revolt" in Cochabamba against foreign distributors helped change the national political landscape.

DOJ_NMG_0123933

What Reyes tried to do is ally Cochabamba with the four existing pro-autonomy provinces of the "half moon" region. That is an apparent red line for Morales, who would then be facing pro-autonomy forces in a majority of Bolivia's nine states, or departments.

Voters in Cochabamba firmly rejected autonomy last year in a nationwide referendum. But Reyes pushed for a new vote, arguing the government misled residents. "People thought autonomy meant you would need a passport to travel from one province to another," Reyes said.

The governor's pro-autonomy push ultimately was the spark that ignited this month's riots. The conflict featured Morales' alleged shock troops, coca-growers from the nearby Chapare valleys, who descended on the city to demand Reyes' ouster. Whether Morales, who still heads the coca-growers federation, personally ordered the protests remains unknown.

It is clear, however, that the president did not use his considerable influence to head off swiftly the predictable trouble that followed.

Waves of police and supporters of the governor confronted the pro-Morales masses who occupied Cochabamba's paralyzed city center. Both sides brandished sticks and rocks.

"Suddenly we were surrounded by police," recalled Ernesto Marin, 18, a pro-Morales union man from the Chapare, who is being treated by doctors to retain his eyesight, at risk after he was hit by a rubber bullet. "The union told us to come here, and we came."

The two dead included a fatality from each camp. The violence has left hard feelings on all sides, and a widespread sense that this is not the end of it.

"I could care less whether the governor stays or leaves," said Edgar Lopez, a merchant here. "But it appears the government wants to divide Bolivians. And in that it is succeeding."

Ghana Looks To Annan To Lead (WT)

By Karen Palmer

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

ACCRA, Ghana -- If Kofi Annan's compatriots have their way, his retirement from the United Nations will have less to do with golf and grandchildren and more to do with presidential politics.

Ghana's most celebrated statesman sounded every bit like a candidate this week as he gave his first public address since stepping down as U.N. secretary-general last month.

Mr. Annan spoke of the promise of Africa, the spirit of change and prosperity enveloping the continent and the continued challenges that hamper its development.

"It is an exciting but challenging time to be African," he said. "I am joining hands with my fellow citizens to help lift Ghana to the bright future that can and must be ours."

The only thing he didn't say would be the words many Ghanaians long to hear -- that he will run in next year's presidential elections.

Mr. Annan, who led the United Nations for a decade, has explicitly and repeatedly denied having any interest in turning to politics. He has said previously that he will split his time between his West African homeland and Sweden, the birthplace of his wife, Nane Maria.

With a hero's welcome and a reception far warmer than any visiting head of state, Mr. Annan has been getting not-so-subtle pressure from all quarters of his birth country.

"Retirement is overrated," joked Daniel Adzei-Bekoe, the chairman of the council of state, as he invited Mr. Annan to deliver a speech as part of Ghana's Golden Jubilee, a yearlong celebration marking the 50th anniversary of Ghana's independence from Britain.

An anonymous group has even started a Web site urging Mr. Annan to take up the leadership challenge. The online petition at www.draftkofiannan2008.com is meant to encourage Mr. Annan to put his U.N. experience endorsing peace, development and good governance to use as Ghana's next head of state.

The field already is crowded with candidates, as President John A. Kufuor prepares to step down next year. Many political analysts predict winning would be a shoo-in for Mr. Annan, especially with the opposition party split in two.

Mr. Annan is the kind of candidate who would send even seasoned campaign managers into a swoon. As a Nobel Peace Prize winner and two-term U.N. secretary-general, he has unprecedented name recognition. And as Ghana's most beloved son, he has enormous approval ratings.

Born as a twin in Kumasi in 1938 to a Fanti chief who became a regional politician and a mother who sold bread, Mr. Annan left Ghana in pursuit of his undergraduate degree, leaving the tropical climate of equatorial Africa for the challenging cold of a Minnesota winter.

DOJ_NMG_0123934

More than 10 years ago, as Mr. Annan was working his way up the U.N. hierarchy, tribal elders approached him to take over as paramount chief, but he declined.

In a 2003 interview with the Smithsonian magazine, Mr. Annan was quoted as saying he might have stayed in Ghana if the country's economy had been stronger when he was leaving college and might have considered entering politics in his later years.

In his speech Thursday night, Mr. Annan said he is cautiously optimistic about Africa's future, noting that the number of conflicts has dropped and more countries are proving successful at paying off debt and managing inflation.

"But with the magnitude of Africa's needs, there is little room for complacency," he said.

Sounding like a political challenger, he said African leaders must "think faster and act quicker," while encouraging them to adopt three pillars -- peace, development and security.

U.N. Approves Resolution Condemning Holocaust Denying (WP)

By Bill Brubaker, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

The United Nations General Assembly today approved a resolution, drafted by the United States and co-sponsored by 103 countries, that condemns denials of the Holocaust.

The resolution came six weeks after a conference in Tehran, organized by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, questioned whether six million Jews were exterminated during World War II.

Ahmadinejad and the conference were not mentioned in the resolution, which "condemns without any reservation any denial of the Holocaust" and "urges all member states unreservedly to reject any denial of the Holocaust as a historical event, either in full or in part, or any activities to this end."

The conference, which drew 67 Holocaust skeptics and deniers from 30 nations, including former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke, was widely denounced.

"The Iranian regime perversely seeks to call the historical fact of those atrocities into question and provide a platform for hatred," the White House said in a statement last month.

Iran disassociated itself from today's resolution, calling it a political exercise to deflect attention from Israel's "atrocious" crimes. He said the resolution should have included other cases of genocide such as Hiroshima and Nagasaki, where the U.S. dropped atomic bombs, according to a U.N. news release.

The acting U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Alejandro D. Wolff, told reporters he was disappointed that more of the 192 U.N. delegates did not attend today's General Assembly session.

"Those who would deny the Holocaust -- and, sadly, there are some who do -- reveal not only their ignorance but their moral failure as well," Wolff said in a statement.

A statement from U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon's office said the resolution "reflects the prevailing view of the international community. The Secretary-General reiterates his conviction that the denial of historical facts such as the Holocaust is unacceptable."

Ahmadinejad has repeatedly cast doubt on the Holocaust, calling it a "myth."

"Those having supported the Zionist regime during their lifetime should be aware that its lifetime will be over, and their interests as well as reputation will be endangered," Ahmadinejad said last month, according to the Islamic Republic News Agency. "Just as the ground was prepared to assign such a regime, the Zionist regime will be overthrown by its supporters."

Iran's United Nations ambassador, Mansour Sadeghi, told the assembly today "there is no justification for genocide of any kind, nor can there be any justification for the attempt made by some -- particularly by the Israeli regime -- to exploit the past crimes as a pretext to commit new genocide and crimes," according to [a] news service.

In response, Israel's U.N. Ambassador Dan Gillerman referred indirectly to Iran's program to enrich uranium, a key ingredient in a nuclear bomb.

"While the nations of the world gather here to affirm the historicity of the Holocaust with the intent of never again allowing genocide, a member of this assembly is acquiring the capabilities to carry out its own," Gillerman said, according to [a news company]. "The president of Iran is in fact saying, 'There really was no Holocaust, but just in case, we shall finish the job."

Correspondent Colum Lynch at the United Nations contributed to this report.

Partnership Announces $500M Health Initiative For Developing Nations (LAT)

By Charles Piller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123935

DAVOS, Switzerland — A multinational health group announced here today that it would commit $500 million over three years to strengthen healthcare systems and train health workers in developing nations, addressing a key problem for implementing its vaccination programs.

The GAVI Alliance, formerly called the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunization, is moving to counter a massive outflow of health workers in developing nations where its training and immunization programs have proved most effective. Doctors and nurses, particularly from Africa, often seek higher wages in developed nations that also face shortages of health professionals.

GAVI is a partnership that includes national governments, the United Nations, World Bank, the vaccine industry and the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. It was launched at the World Economic Forum in 2000 with a $750-million grant from the Gates Foundation, which gave the organization the same amount in 2005.

GAVI announced the move at this year's session of the World Economic Forum, an annual gathering of businesspeople, political leaders and others to discuss international problems and their solutions.

Since its inception, GAVI has prevented 2.3 million deaths from diseases for which vaccines are available, including 600,000 lives saved last year, according to World Health Organization data released today. The organization said GAVI had boosted vaccination rates among African children to 73% for one or more diseases.

"We know the impact of saving those lives has a lot of other benefits," improving standards of living and quality of life and reducing population growth, Bill Gates, chairman of Microsoft Corp. and a co-founder of the foundation, said at a news conference. "Vaccines are a miracle."

As new vaccines are developed for tuberculosis and HIV/AIDS, training and support provided by GAVI would help developing nations deliver them, Gates said.

But as the vaccination programs proceed, healthcare systems in Africa are crumbling, partly because of the loss of medical professionals trained by global aid programs. Malawi has lost 64% of its nurses and 85% of its doctors in recent years, many going to work for aid groups or the U.S. or British governments, which pay much higher salaries than local governments, according to a recent analysis in the journal Foreign Affairs.

Dr. Tadataka Yamada, who directs the Gates Foundation global health efforts, said in an interview that the role aid agencies and developed nations play in the outflow of medical talent from poor countries may be overstated. The larger reasons may be problems in the local economies.

"If you don't have places for physicians to work, if you don't have salaries to pay them, then there is no place for them to go," Yamada said.

The Gates Foundation is now seeking ways to improve conditions for local health workforces, he said.

"How do we create opportunities for this Diaspora to come home?" Yamada asked.

Julian Lob-Levyt, executive secretary of GAVI, called the problem in sub-Saharan Africa, where millions of children still die each year from diseases preventable with vaccines, a "capacity crisis."

He said the effort announced today was a tactical response.

"Instead of just training sophisticated doctors and nurses, we will train paramedics" to administer vaccines, Lob-Levyt said in an interview. The technicians would be more cost-effective to train and support, he said, and would more likely remain in their home nations because their skills would not be in demand in wealthier nations.

One such model may come from Ghana, said Anne M. Veneman, executive director of UNICEF, in an interview.

"They put together a vocational program for community-based health workers" who can give immunizations and basic care, she said, adding that the program offers an incentive for advancement once the workers become ensconced in local jobs. "Later on they can get additional training and become full nurses," she said.

GAVI has raised $3.8 billion, nearly all from the Gates Foundation and national governments, and hopes to raise $1.3 billion more by 2015. The $500-million effort, which also will be spent on systems to distribute vaccines and drugs, needs new cash infusions from governments, Lob-Levyt said.

charles.piller@latimes.com

What North Korea Really Wants (WP)

By Robert Carlin, John W. Lewis

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Those who think that dealing with North Korea is impossible are wrong. Unfortunately, those who think that it is, in fact, possible to deal with North Korea often are not much closer to the truth. The basic problem is that people of both views simply haven't figured out what it is that the North really wants.

DOJ_NMG_0123936

We tend to confuse North Korea's short-term tactical goals with its broader strategic focus. We draw up list after list of things we think might appeal to Pyongyang on the assumption that these will constitute a "leveraged buyout," finally achieving what we want: the total, irreversible denuclearization of North Korea.

But this list of "carrots" (energy, food, the lifting of sanctions) does not include what the North thinks it must have. It can, of course, help keep the process on track and moving ahead, and it could help cement a final deal and hold it together through the inevitable political storms. But these things are not the ends that North Korea seeks.

North Korea feeds our misperceptions by bargaining so hard over details and raising its initial demands so high. For our part, we tend to be taken in by Western journalists' repetition of stock phrases about it being "one of the poorest nations," "one of the most isolated," "living on handouts." Accurate or not, these factors are irrelevant to Pyongyang's strategic calculations.

Those who realize that North Korea does not have visions of grand rewards sometimes move the focus to political steps that many see as "key" to a solution. These include replacing the armistice with a peace treaty, giving the North security guarantees, discussing plans for an exchange of diplomats. But these, like the economic carrots, are only shimmering, imperfect reflections of what Pyongyang is after.

What is it, then, that North Korea wants? Above all, it wants, and has pursued steadily since 1991, a long-term, strategic relationship with the United States. This has nothing to do with ideology or political philosophy. It is a cold, hard calculation based on history and the realities of geopolitics as perceived in Pyongyang. The North Koreans believe in their gut that they must buffer the heavy influence their neighbors already have, or could soon gain, over their small, weak country.

This is hard for Americans to understand, having read or heard nothing from North Korea except its propaganda, which for years seems to have called for weakening, not maintaining, the U.S. presence on the Korean Peninsula. But in fact an American departure is the last thing the North wants. Because of their pride and fear of appearing weak, however, explicitly requesting that the United States stay is one of the most difficult things for the North Koreans to do.

If the United States has leverage, it is not in its ability to supply fuel oil or grain or paper promises of nonhostility. The leverage rests in Washington's ability to convince Pyongyang of its commitment to coexist with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, accept its system and leadership, and make room for the DPRK in an American vision of the future of Northeast Asia. Quite simply, the North Koreans believe they could be useful to the United States in a longer, larger balance-of-power game against China and Japan. The Chinese know this and say so in private.

The fundamental problem for North Korea is that the six-party talks in which it has been engaged -- and which may reconvene soon -- are a microcosm of the strategic world it most fears. Three strategic foes -- China, Japan and Russia -- sit in judgment, apply pressure and (to Pyongyang's mind) insist on the North's permanent weakness.

Denuclearization, if still achievable, can come only when North Korea sees its strategic problem solved, and that, in its view, can happen only when relations with the United States improve. For Pyongyang, that is the essence of the joint statement out of the six-party talks on Sept. 19, 2005, which included this sentence: "The DPRK and the United States undertook to respect each other's sovereignty, exist peacefully together, and take steps to normalize their relations subject to their respective bilateral policies."

And that is why the North so doggedly seeks bilateral talks with Washington. It desires not "drive-by" encounters, not a meeting here and there, but serious, sustained talks in which ideas can be explored and solutions, at last, patiently developed.

Robert Carlin, a former State Department analyst, participated in most of the U.S.-North Korea negotiations between 1993 and 2000. John Lewis, professor emeritus at Stanford University, directs projects on Asia at the university's Center for International Security and Cooperation. Both have visited North Korea many times, most recently in November.

DOJ_NMG_0123937

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, January 30, 2007 8:39 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, January 30, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070130.pdf; agnb070130.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JANUARY 30, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Attorneys Condemn Chinese Uighurs' Detention Conditions....3
Man Faces Terror Charges Stemming From Attack Against US Troops In Iraq....4
Al Qaeda Leader In Turkey, 47 Seven Other Terror Suspects Arrested....5
Gonzales' Remarks On Habeas Mark New Test On Executive Powers....5
NYTimes Celebrates Canada's Apology To Arar....5

Homeland Response:

Lack Of Screening For Airport Workers Said To Leave "Gaping Hole" In Security....6
NRC Rejects Petition To Harden Nuclear Plants Against Air Attack....6
Affidavit Details Aggressive Investigation Of Rhode Island Trucking Student....6
DHS IG Criticizes Coast Guard Modernization Program....7
Super Bowl Security Is Massive Coordinated Effort....7
Maine PUC Sets Domestic Surveillance Contempt Hearing For Verizon....7
Senators Criticize Administration At Katrina Hearing In New Orleans....8

War News:

Bush Warns Iran Against Interfering In Iraq....9
Iraqi Forces Said To Have Performed Poorly In Weekend Battle....11
Bush Says He Expects Iraqis To Take The Lead In Ending Violence....11
Additional 21,500 Troops Going To Iraq Said To Lack Equipment....13
Senate Vote On Iraq Resolutions Could Be Put Off Until Next Week....13
20,000 US Soldiers Have Been Wounded, 500 Have Lost Limbs In Iraq....15
Former CPA Official Sentenced To Prison For Fraud....15
US Urged To Reach Out to Iraqi Refugees....15
Corrupt Afghan Officials Stealing Reconstruction Aid....15
Iraqi Prison Officials Tour South Carolina Jails For Ideas....15

Corporate Scandals:

KLA-Tencor Changes Options Report Citing Unintentional Backdating....16
British Bankers Again Seek Dismissal Of Enron-Related Charges....16
Former Officials Spared Prison Time In Cendant Accounting Scandal....17
SEC Approves Market-Based Method To Value Stock Options....17
Former CA Official Sentenced To Six Months Home Detention....17
Fannie Mae CEO Received 25% Raise In 2006....17

Criminal Law:

"Unflappable" Fleischer Testifies Against Libby....18
DOJ Plans $200 Million Grant Program To Curb Violent Crime....19
Indiana Man Sentenced To Ten Years For Sexually Enticing Teen Online....20
FBI Investigating California Lawmaker's Land Deals....20
Williams Testifies She Did Not Try To Steal Coke Formula....20
Dangerous MS-13 Fugitive Arrested In Texas....20
Four Oklahoma Men Convicted Of Attending Cock Fight....21
US Alleges Pennsylvania Child Porn Suspect Also Had Sex With Child....21
FBI Internet Sex Solicitation Sting Snares Kentucky Man....21
Serial Child Molester Given Maximum Term In California....21
Judge Declines Probe Into AIPAC Case Leaks....21
Connecticut Man Gets Probation For False Chemical Attack Report....22

Florida Man Sentenced To Probation For JetBlue Hoax Bomb Threat 22
Chicago Alderman Says Powder Found In Corruption Raid Was Not Drug 22
Editorial Calls For DOJ To Charge Niagara Falls Official, Or Drop Probe 22
Hackers Search For Computer Bugs For Bounties 23
Virginia Men Face Federal Charges For Peddling Phony Purses 23
WPost Examines Four DC Weekend Murders 23
Alleged Maryland Call Girl Found Dead Of Apparent Suicide Before Trial 24
Warden Claims Florida Inmate Showed No Pain During Execution 24
Miami Herald Says FBI "Dropped The Ball" On Foley Emails 24

Civil Law:

DOJ Suit Alleges Boehringer Ingelheim Inflated Drug Prices 25
US Alleges Florida Lab Owner Bilked Medicare For $17 Million 25

Civil Rights:

NAACP Seeks DOJ Probe Of New Orleans Police Shootings 25
Witnesses In Mississippi Voting Rights Case Say They Were Not Told To Discriminate 25
Judge Denies Bond For Seale 26
DOJ Names Las Vegas As Major Human Trafficking Destination 26

Antitrust:

DOJ Decision On Mittal Steel Still Up In Air 27
FTC Approves Bridgestone Acquisition Of Bandag 27
Microsoft Launches Marketing Campaign For Vista 27
Delta Open To Future Deals Despite Resistance To US Airways Bid 28
Merrill Lynch To Purchase First Republic 29
Citigroup To Purchase British Bank 29
Lawmakers Push For Bank Ownership Limits 29
EU To Threaten Banks, Credit Card Firms With Anti-Competition Fines 29
Amaranth's Rivals Profited From Its Collapse 30
Patent And Trademark Office Seeking New Examiners 30

Environment:

Climate Change Efforts Gaining Momentum In Congress 30
BP Faces Expanding Criminal Probe Over Texas Refinery Problems 31
Court Invalidates Salmon Rider In Appropriations Bill 31
Yosemite Suit May Affect Public Access To Park 31
Proposal To Drop Gray Wolves From Protection May Spark Legal Challenge 32
NYTimes Says Bush Fuel Economy Proposal Promises Only Hypothetical Results 32

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In San Diego, 4 Drug Suspects Extradited From Mexico Plead Not Guilty 32
Seven Puerto Rican Doctors Accused Of Participating In Internet Pharmacy Scheme 33
Convicted Drug-Ring Members To Be Sentenced In Kentucky 33
Authorities Say Smuggling Tunnels Under US-Mexico Border Remain Unfilled 33
Supporters Seek To Change Montana's Medical Marijuana Law 33
Seattle-Based US Marshal Resigns 33
Florida Legislature Criticized For Easing Gun Laws 34

Immigration:

Coalition Optimistic About Immigrant Farm Worker Overhaul 34

Tax:

US Settles Tax Prosecution Claims With Texas Attorney 35
WSJournal Critical Of Reliance On "Tax Gap." 35

Congress-Administration:

In Midst Of "Export Boom," Bush To Promote New Trade Deals 35
Executive Order Said To Give White House More Control Over Federal Rules 35
Stark Says Bush Healthcare Plan "Doesn't Deserve Congress' Consideration." 36
Bush Civilian Reserve Corps Proposal Yet To Be Fleshed Out 36
Bush Says He Wasn't "Trying To Needle" By Referring To "Democrat" Party 37
Schumer Says Cheney Is "Brain Wave" Of Administration 37
Senate To Take Up Minimum Wage Bill, Business Tax Cuts 37
House Democratic Leaders Drop Plans For Pay Raise 38
Democrats Finalize $463.5 Billion Stop-Gap Funding Bill 38
Democratic Plan Bill To Authorize Generic Biological Drugs 38
Pelosi Courts Liberal Bloggers 39
GSA Offering Incentives For Managers, Execs To Work From Telework Centers 39
White House Hires New Pastry Chef 39

DOJ_NMG_0123940

Cheney Refusal To Discuss Daughter's Pregnancy Seen As Hypocritical 39
Supreme Court Urged To Permit Issue Ads Before Elections 39
WSJournal Urges Bush To Stick To Voucher Proposal 40

Other News:

Bernanke Getting Positive Reviews 40
US Law Firm Makes Inroads In China 41
Fenty Taps Nonprofit Head As Next DC Attorney General 41
Unused Embryos Pose Dilemma For Couples 41
GOP Right Restive Over Possible '08 Presidential Candidates 41
Romney Able To Skirt Some Campaign Finance Rules 42
Former New Hampshire GOP Chief, Von Dongen Back Giuliani 42
Boston Ace Pitcher Schilling Endorses McCain 42
Hutchison Says She'd Consider VP Spot In 2008 Ticket 43
Hillary Clinton's Visit To Iowa Continues To Draw Attention .. 43
Edwards Admits He May Have Lacked Experience In 2004 .. 44
Clinton, McCain Visit Center For Wounded Vets 44
Vilsack Takes Post At Drake University 44
Hunter Criticizes Kerry For Calling US "International Pariah." 44
Weak Fundraising Raises Questions About Hagel's Reelection Plans 44
Schumer Says "Middle Class Imagination" Key To 2008 44
GOP Campaigns Try To Avoid Allen's Fate 45
Franken To Leave Air America, May Run For Senate 45
Google Moves To Defuse "Google Bombs." 45
Drinan Remembered 45
Humane Society Becoming "A Tiger" Among DC Interest Groups 45
California Praised For Moving Up Primary 45
WSJournal Warns Against Efforts To Ease Unionization 46
WPost Criticizes School Using Church For Graduation Ceremony 46
Talks With Pyongyang To Resume Next Week 46
Cheney To Visit Japan, Australia 46
US Offers Air Support For Somali Peacekeepers 47
Palestinian Factions Continue Fighting Despite Ceasefire 47
State Department Tells Congress Israel May Have Misused Cluster Bombs 47
Egypt Tightens Control On Press 47
Al-Jubeir Named New Saudi Ambassador 47
Chinese General To Be Pressed On Missile Test 47
Russian Presidential Candidates Seek Putin's Backing 48
Saudi Arabia Cuts Crude Output In Effort To Bolster Prices ... 48
French Ambassador Says Ties With US Improving 48
Ghana To Chair African Union In Snub To Sudan 48
LATimes Welcomes Northern Ireland Peace Initiative 49

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 49

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 50

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Attorneys Condemn Chinese Uighurs' Detention Conditions. The Washington Post (1/30, A4, Smith, Tate) reports, "Chinese Uighurs who have been imprisoned for the past month at a new state-of-the-art detention camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, are being held around the clock in near-total isolation, a circumstance their lawyers say is rapidly degrading their mental health, according to an affidavit filed in federal court yesterday." The Post continues, "The lawyers' complaint is the latest step in their efforts to force an expedited review of the Uighurs' confinement by the U.S. Court of Appeals, a review that the Bush administration opposes and that Congress made more difficult in legislation it passed late last year. … The Uighurs' (pronounced weegurs) detention by the U.S. military, after being sold for bounty by Pakistanis in early 2002, has long attracted controversy. The men had just arrived from Afghanistan, where, they said, they had received limited military training because they opposed Chinese government control of their native region. But they said they never were allied with the Taliban or opposed to the United States, and had fled to Pakistan only to escape the U.S. bombing campaign." The Post adds, "By 2005, U.S. military review panels determined that five of the 18 captured Uighurs were 'no longer enemy combatants,' but they continued to be held at the Guantanamo Bay prison until their release last year.

DOJ_NMG_0123941

The panels did not reach that conclusion about the other 13, though all had given similar accounts of their activities during the reviews, according to declassified transcripts of the sessions. … U.S. District Judge James Robertson ruled in December 2005 that the government was unlawfully imprisoning the Uighurs who were found not to be combatants." The Post notes, "The Justice Department, in court papers, has maintained that the appellate court should delay reviewing the Uighurs' detention until cases related to other detainees are resolved. It also has said that legislation passed last year by Congress, which created new military panels to try Guantanamo Bay detainees on criminal charges, seriously limits the court's jurisdiction to question government decisions on their detention."

Man Faces Terror Charges Stemming From Attack Against US Troops In Iraq. The Washington Times (1/30, Seper, 88K) reports, "An Iraqi-born Dutch citizen pleaded not guilty yesterday in federal court in Washington to charges of conspiring with insurgents to attack U.S. military personnel in Iraq -- the first US criminal prosecution arising from terrorist activities in Iraq." Wesam al-Delaema, "extradited from the Netherlands on Saturday, had been sought by the US government since 2003, when he and other members of the 'Mujahideen from Fallujah' videotaped themselves planting explosives along an Iraqi road used by US troops." FBI Assistant Director Joseph Persichini Jr., "who heads the bureau's Washington field office, said Mr. al-Delaema's extradition 'sends a clear message of the FBI's unwavering dedication to our mission to detect, deter and bring to justice any individual who conspires to commit terrorist acts against any US citizen either in this country or on foreign soil.'"

The Washington Post (1/30, A4, Eggen, 690K) says "the unusual extradition agreement would allow Delaema to return to the Netherlands to serve his prison sentence if he is convicted, Dutch and US officials said. … Victor Koppe, who served as Delaema's attorney in the Netherlands, said the arrangement guarantees that Delaema will not be designated an enemy combatant or tried by a US military commission. Dutch courts also will be able to review and possibly modify the terms of any US sentence once Delaema is returned home, Koppe and U.S. officials said."

USA Today/AP (1/30) reports Al-Delaema's lawyers "have argued the US does not have the right to try him." Prosecutor Gregg Maisel "said the government would be seeking hair and saliva samples from al-Delaema, which the Justice Department said could link him to the crimes."

ABC News (1/30, Ryan, Thomas) reports, "Charges against Delaema include: conspiracy to kill U.S. citizens abroad; conspiracy to use a weapon of mass destruction (explosives); conspiracy to maliciously damage or destroy U.S. government property by means of an explosive; possession of a destructive device (explosives) during a crime of violence; conspiracy to possess a destructive device (explosives) during a crime of violence; and teaching or demonstrating the making or use of an explosive with the intent to further a crime of violence. … At the time of his arrest in the Netherlands, foreign media outlets reported that Dutch anti-terrorism police found video tapes of insurgent attacks and operations in Iraq at Delaema's residence. … Delaema was extradited to the United States from the Netherlands late Saturday night by the FBI and U.S. Marshals. He will be held without bond until his status conference and detention hearing on February 5."

United Press International (1/30, Waterman) reports, "Monday, the U.S. District Court in Washington gave prosecutors permission to obtain DNA swabs from Delaema, so that they could be compared with a database of DNA obtained from bomb fragments and 'other physical items' recovered from attack scenes and other terrorist sites. … The database is compiled by the Terrorist Explosive Device Analytical Center -- a multi-agency effort between the U.S. Department of Defense and federal law enforcement agencies which functions as a repository for all kinds of forensic evidence from terror attacks in Iraq and elsewhere." UPI adds, "According to court filings, the center "conducts a full range of forensic and technical analysis on such items, utilizing analytical protocols that include photography, latent fingerprint analysis, trace evidence (hair and fiber), DNA, electronic and cryptographic analysis, and tool marks."" UPI notes, "According to the indictment and other court documents, Delaema was arrested May 2005 in the Dutch city of Amersfoort. One report at the weekend said Dutch authorities had been originally been tipped to Delaema by U.S. intelligence, and the court documents say Dutch police monitored telephone conversations he had with people in Iraq. … European counter-terrorist officials have broken up several networks recruiting and making travel arrangements for European Muslim extremists who want to go to fight the U.S. military in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0123942

Al Qaeda Leader In Turkey, 47 Seven Other Terror Suspects Arrested. The New York Times (1/30, Arsu, 1.16M) reports, "In simultaneous operations carried out in five Turkish cities on Monday, the police arrested 47 people suspected of being Islamic militants, including the leader of Al Qaeda in Turkey, the semi-official Anatolian news agency reported." The Times adds, "Police acted on information warning of 'sensational attacks' by Turkish groups in coordination with Al Qaeda, the report said. No details were available on the nature of possible targets."

Gonzales' Remarks On Habeas Mark New Test On Executive Powers. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Savage) reports, "Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales provided laugh lines for comedians and fodder for outraged bloggers when he told senators recently that the Constitution does not specifically grant individuals the right to habeas corpus." The Times continues, "The Constitution appears to contradict him on that historic doctrine, which says those taken into custody have the right to plead their innocence before a judge. 'The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended,' it says, 'unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.' … Most constitutional experts agree that phrase clearly guarantees the right of habeas corpus. And Gonzales himself later clarified that he believes Americans do have that right. … But in a clumsy way, Gonzales was making a claim that underpins the Bush administration's controversial view that 'enemy combatants,' including the prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, are not entitled to fight the government in court." The Times adds, "The dispute involves not only the Constitution but also a separate law that spells out the reach of habeas corpus. The issue, which sparked the lively exchange between Gonzales and senators, is the focus of a bill before Congress as well as cases involving 'enemy combatants' that appear headed to the Supreme Court. … Many senators, including Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and its ranking Republican, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), believe the right to habeas corpus should apply broadly and include foreign terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay. … But they lost last year when the issue came before Congress. … In a 51-48 vote, the Senate joined the House in affirming the Bush administration's view that habeas corpus should not cover 'aliens' held as terrorism suspects or 'enemy combatants.'" The Times notes, "The new law, known as the Military Commissions Act, overturned a Supreme Court ruling that had extended habeas corpus rights to the detainees at Guantanamo Bay. But in that decision, in the case of Rasul vs. Bush, the justices said they were ruling only on the statutory law, not on the Constitution. … Now that Congress has overridden the high court's view, the next round of litigation in the 'war on terror' is focusing on the right to habeas corpus in the Constitution. … Although everyone — including, apparently, the attorney general — agrees the Constitution protects a right to habeas corpus, there is considerable debate over the reach of that right."

Virginian-Pilot Blasts Gonzales For Habeas Stance. The Virginian-Pilot (1/30) editorializes, "Even when White House policies seem ill-conceived, they at least have a veneer of defensible logic. If America doesn't like the idea of government agents examining its library habits, the practice does make a certain quaint, paranoid sense. … But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has ceased even trying to maintain the pretense of reason." The Virginian-Pilot continues, "Appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales abandoned cogency altogether for bald assertion of illogic as truth. … Gonzales, the highest officer of the law in the nation, asserted that because the framers don't specifically enumerate habeas corpus, it's not guaranteed, for example, to American citizens held in detention indefinitely without charge - precisely the kind of thing that habeas was designed to prevent. … The Constitution doesn't explicitly give people the freedom to have children or breathe the air, but nobody would claim Americans don't have the right to each of those things. … Gonzales' logic leads to the notion that only rights included in the Constitution actually exist, a little worrisome since it's a document silent on both babies and breathing. Still, if common sense and logic were the worst of Gonzales' violations, we'd be comforted."

NYTimes Celebrates Canada's Apology To Arar. The New York Times (1/30, 1.16M) editorializes, "Canada set an important example of decency when it offered a formal apology and compensation worth millions of dollars to a Syrian-born Canadian citizen who was a victim of President Bush's use of open-ended detention, summary deportation and even torture in the name of fighting terrorism. Last week's announcement by Prime Minister Stephen Harper came more than four years after the nightmare began for the Canadian, Maher Arar, a 36-year-old software engineer," which was "part of a legally and morally unsupportable practice known as extraordinary rendition, the deportation of terrorism suspects to countries where the regimes are known to use torture and to disdain basic human rights protections. Four months ago, a Canadian government panel concluded that Mr. Arar had never had a terrorism connection, and that Americans had misled Canada about their plans for him. The Bush administration stonewalled the inquiry."

DOJ_NMG_0123943

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Lack Of Screening For Airport Workers Said To Leave "Gaping Hole" In Security. The CBS Evening News (1/29, story 7, 3:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported that at America's airport "there's still a gaping hole in the security net, because while 700 million travelers were subjected last year to metal detectors -- that even includes pilots, flight attendants and their carry-on baggage -- there was no similar screening of tens of thousands of airport workers." The TSA said in a statement that "employees working in secure areas '…are subject to multiple security areas,' including '…random screening at any time and without notice,' and '…are required to undergo extensive background checks.' But how extensive can those checks really be when just last year 65 illegal immigrants got into the TSA system and were working in some of the most secure areas of several major US airports before finally being arrested?"

NRC Rejects Petition To Harden Nuclear Plants Against Air Attack. Under the headline, "Nuclear Agency: Air Defenses Impractical," the Washington Post (1/30, A4, Mufson, 690K) reports, "Federal regulators plunged into an energy and national security controversy yesterday by ruling that the nation's 103 nuclear power plants do not need to protect themselves from potential attacks by terrorists using airplanes. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission's 5-to-0 ruling was in response to a 2004 petition by the Committee to Bridge the Gap, a Los Angeles nonprofit group, that said nuclear plants should build shields made of steel I-beams and cabling or take other steps to prevent a release of radiation in case of an air attack. Eight state attorneys general backed the petition. … 'Nuclear power plants are pre-emplaced nuclear weapons near major cities,' said Daniel Hirsch, president of the Committee to Bridge the Gap. 'They can't blow up like a nuclear bomb, but they can release a thousand times the radiation of the Hiroshima bomb. They are the most attractive target for a terrorist to hit in our country.'" But "NRC Chairman Dale Klein said, 'Nuclear power plants are inherently robust structures that our studies show provide adequate protection in a hypothetical attack by an airplane.'" The NRC may "impose stricter requirements on new plants," but for now, "the NRC said that guarding against airborne attacks was the job of the military and other agencies."

The New York Times/AP (1/30, Press) notes that the NRC said, "[p]lant operators should instead focus on limiting radioactive releases and public exposure from any such airborne attack, the agency said in a revised defense plan for nuclear plants. 'The active protection against airborne threats is addressed by other federal organizations, including the military,' the commission said."

Under the headline, "Idea To 'Cage' Atomic Plants Is Rejected; A California group had asked that steel shields and other anti-terrorism measures be mandated," the Los Angeles Times (1/30, Weikel, 850K) reports that the NRC "adopted regulations similar to security directives it imposed in April 2003, without public hearings, on operators of commercial reactors. The directives deal with the size, training and composition of security forces; reactor security; barriers to protect against truck or car bombs; the dimensions of security perimeters; and the numbers of terrorists that plants must defend against." Still, "some fear that a terrorist attack could breach a reactor or a plant's nuclear waste storage facilities and release harmful radiation."

Affidavit Details Aggressive Investigation Of Rhode Island Trucking Student. The Providence Journal (1/30, Ziner, 167K) reports, "Shortly after Mohammed Mullawala's arrest in Rhode Island last month, investigators discovered he was a man on the move who ricocheted from state to state, city to city and apartment to apartment. But a state police affidavit draws a more complicated picture of the man whose behavior at a Smithfield trucking school in November triggered a nationwide investigation that involves the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and multiple state police fusion centers tasked with homeland security concerns. Mullawala, a 28-year-old Indian national, faces a deportation hearing today." The Journal notes, "The timeline revolves around 11 addresses in four states that Mullawala says he lived at. Only 7 have checked out so far, some of which he apparently stayed at for only a month. … The affidavit underscores how vigorously FBI agents and state police detectives attached to the FBI's Joint Anti-Terrorism Task Force have been pursuing leads tied to Mullawala, despite the lack of any criminal charges against him. … It states that federal agents are still trying to determine if Mullawala lived where he said he lived."

DOJ_NMG_0123944

DHS IG Criticizes Coast Guard Modernization Program. In its "Fleecing of America" segment, NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 8, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Federal government is spending billions of dollars to improve the fleet of the US Coast Guard, but a new watchdog report charges the program has serious problems. Ships that are way over budget and perhaps not even completely seaworthy." NBC (Meyers) adds that according to a report by federal watchdogs, a 418-foot Coast Guard cutter that had been "hailed as a crucial new weapon in the war on terror" suffers from "significant design flaws likely to shorten its useful life, increase maintenance costs and limit its ability to venture far from US shores. And the cost of building just two of these ships has roughly doubled to almost $1billion." Myers added that the report "is merely the latest debacle in a $24 billion program, known as Deepwater, to upgrade the Coast Guard fleet." Some "see a larger problem in the agency that oversees the Coast Guard." Rep. Bennie G. Thompson was shown saying, "We have assumed that the Department Of Homeland Security was shipshape. But in reality, they are just ships of fools."

The AP (1/29, Caterinicchia) reported that in a written response to the report from the Department of Homeland Security's IG, "the Coast Guard said it had 'serious concerns' with the investigators' approach to reviewing and analyzing the program. 'The report contains selective inclusion of documents that do not represent the most current, comprehensive, or technically accurate data,' the Coast Guard said."

Super Bowl Security Is Massive Coordinated Effort. The AP (1/30, Anderson) reports from Miami, "Gavin moved quickly around the spacious convention center, searching for a hidden bomb. Near a glass box containing a fire extinguisher, he sniffed the air and abruptly sat down. Inside was a pound of live high explosives, wrapped in black plastic. … For successfully finding the 'bomb,' Gavin got a treat from his handler, Special Agent L.A. Bykowsky of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. His training exercise over, the 7-year-old golden Labrador retriever is ready for duty conducting bomb-sniffing sweeps for the Super Bowl and its related events and hotels." The AP continues, "Gavin will be among 66 specialized canine bomb teams working as part of a massive local, state and federal security effort to protect one of the world's highest-profile public events from terrorists, foreign and domestic. The dog teams are one element of a 6-inch-thick security plan, which includes jet fighters and helicopters, tactical weapons teams, mobile bomb labs and robots, high-tech X-ray machines and sensors, intelligence databases and hundreds of uniformed police officers. … 'We don't have any specific threat to this event,' said Julie Torres, chief of the ATF's Miami office and the designated federal coordinator for Super Bowl security. 'It is the biggest event in the nation as far as a sporting event. It is vulnerable as far as any terrorist activity. We have to plan excessively so we can provide proper security.' … Those plans began to take shape two weeks after last year's Super Bowl in Detroit. This year's game is the sixth since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, which forever changed the security landscape for any major U.S. public event. The Super Bowl is a Level One national security event, right behind a presidential inauguration in importance." The AP notes, "The FBI plays a major role in coordinating the dissemination of intelligence and law enforcement databases - and investigating any suspected terrorism plots. … 'Information dissemination is one of our highest priorities,' said Stuart McArthur, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami field office and head of the South Florida Joint Terrorism Task Force. 'Every threat that comes in will be checked out by the South Florida JTTF.'"

Maine PUC Sets Domestic Surveillance Contempt Hearing For Verizon. The AP (1/30, Quinn) reports, "The Maine Public Utilities Commission unanimously voted Monday to schedule a hearing next month to allow Verizon Communications Inc. to argue why it should not be held in contempt for its response to a commission order stemming from allegations about domestic surveillance by the federal government." The AP continues, "The case involves a multi-customer complaint filed last May effectively seeking to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant. … The complaint followed media reports about a National Security Agency eavesdropping program." The AP adds, "Verizon, in answer to the customer complaint, issued a response on May 19, 2006, in which it referred to points made in two press releases, including one that declared the company was not asked for records by the NSA and did not provide such records. … The PUC subsequently ordered Verizon, on Aug. 9, to affirm in writing that its representations to the commission were true. … On Aug. 21, the same day that the U.S. Justice Department filed suit against the PUC and Verizon asserting that the PUC was pre-empted by federal law from investigating the alleged spying program, Verizon said it would not submit an affirmation, citing legal action by the federal government. … Since then, the PUC has sought to have the federal suit dismissed and the complaint case has not moved forward." The AP notes, "The Bush administration has agreed to let a panel of federal judges oversee the government's domestic spying program. .. .The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will have final say in approving wiretaps on communications involving people with suspected terror links, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said earlier this month in a letter to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee."

DOJ_NMG_0123945

Senators Criticize Administration At Katrina Hearing In New Orleans. The New York Times (1/30, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports, "Three United States senators sounded off on Monday about the slow pace of recovery from Hurricane Katrina at a hearing in the French Quarter, criticizing federal officials for perceived inequities in aid to Louisiana and for imposing rules that are halting government assistance." Sens. Barack Obama and Mary L. Landrieu "focused on why Louisiana, which had far more damage than Mississippi, did not receive a larger proportion of federal aid." Responding to the senators, Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator of Gulf Coast rebuilding, "said Congress had put a cap on how much aid money any one state could get. The senators complained about federal rules requiring a local match for aid after disasters; Mr. Powell said that in some cases, like the removal of the tons of debris that inundated the landscape here, the rules had been waived." The senators also "used the occasion to echo local laments that President Bush did not mention New Orleans in his State of the Union address.

NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 6, 2:00, Savidge, 9.87M) reported that it was up to Powell "to take the heat" from the Democratic senators. Powell was shown saying, "Progress is being made. The President has stood in Jackson Square and vowed that the Gulf Coast would be rebuilt stronger and better." Savidge: "The senators are frustrated by a lack of progress from the so-called 'Road Home Program.'" Sen. Joseph Lieberman: "The numbers are stunning, over 101,000 homeowners have applied for assistance under this program, but less than 300 homeowners have actually received funding." Savidge: "Powell said the problem wasn't the lack of Federal will, but a lack of local leadership, local leaders pointed finger back at government."

The Chicago Tribune (1/30, Dorning, 617K) reports Obama "blasted the Bush administration, saying, "There is not a sense of urgency in this administration to get this done." The Tribune adds, "The broken homes and vacant streets of the city's flood-damaged neighborhoods remain a potent political symbol." The Tribune also noted that Obama "echoed" criticism of the lack of a Gulf Coast mention in the State of the Union address, saying, "Those of us who are concerned all across the country wonder if we're in danger of forgetting about New Orleans, and that's shameful." Powell "said he was confident that when the history of the recovery effort is written 'it will also be a story of modern renaissance.'"

Landrieu Says Terror Attack Would Have Been Preferable, Calls Mississippi Most Corrupt State. Roll Call (1/30, Pershing) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column this morning that though they had "thought it likely everything that could be said about the tragedy already had been said," Landrieu "had some highly original things to say" at Monday's hearing. "'I often think we would have been better off if the terrorists had blown up our levees. Maybe we'd have gotten more attention,' Landrieu said, according to a report from the New Orleans station WWL-TV." Landrieu continued that there is a bias against her state in Washington, D.C., and that "Mississippi is actually the most corrupt state in the union." Landrieu communications director Adam Sharp said that in referencing terrorism, Landrieu "was just reflecting on the priorities of the [Bush] administration." And "Landrieu makes no apologies" for referring to Mississippi as the most corrupt state in the union.

Business Group Releases Disaster Response Recommendations. The Washington Post (1/30, A15, Hsu, 690K) reports following complaints from business leaders that "too many efforts to help the US disaster response were thwarted by red tape" after Hurricane Katrina, Business Executives for National Security, a nonprofit, nonpartisan advisory group representing disaster-related industries, has released "a plan for public-private disaster coordination." Among other thing, the plan, released yesterday, recommends a rewrite of "the nation's disaster laws and the National Response Plan to include the private sector; tackle issues such as liability, medical and regulatory waivers; and make businesses eligible for federal aid when carrying out disaster responsibilities, such as providing security for emergency repairs."

DOJ_NMG_0123946

WAR NEWS:

Bush Warns Iran Against Interfering In Iraq.

President Bush was interviewed Monday on NPR (1/29), where he said, "If Iran escalates its military action in Iraq to the detriment of our troops and/or innocent Iraqi people, we will respond firmly." The interview generated only limited coverage, and, although Bush discussed a variety of issues, media reports focused primarily on his remarks on Iran. The CBS Evening News (1/29, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M), for example, noted the President had warned Iran to "back off," while in a brief report, NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 4, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) said Bush "added, however, that he has no intention of invading Iran."

The AP (1/30, Hunt) reports Bush "also acknowledged skepticism concerning US intelligence about Iran, because Washington was wrong in accusing Iraq of harboring weapons of mass destruction before the US-led invasion in 2003." The President said he is "like a lot of Americans that say, 'Well, if it wasn't right in Iraq, how do you know it's right in Iran.'"

The Chicago Tribune (1/30, Silva, 617K) reports that on the issue of Iran's nuclear ambitions, Bush "insist[ed] that he is confident in the power of diplomacy to resolve it." The President also "repeatedly has asserted the right of US forces to intervene in the Iranian shipment of weaponry into Iraq," but "insists he has no plans to invade Iran, despite worries voiced in Congress."

The Washington Times (1/30, Dinan, 88K) reports Bush "also accused Iran of being part of an effort to bring down Lebanon's government as well," saying it is working with Syria and Hezbollah to "foment violence." Meanwhile, "trying to shore up support for his new plan to secure Iraq," he told NPR that senators would be sending "a contradictory message" if they vote for a resolution opposing the troop increase because those lawmakers voted just last week in favor of a new military commander who says the troops are needed.

In addition, says AFP (1/30), the President also "deplored" recent violence in Lebanon and warned that Iran, Syria and Hezbollah must be "called to account" for trying to destabilize that country. In a statement, Bush said, "While Lebanon's friends seek to help the Lebanese government build a free, sovereign, and prosperous country, Syria, Iran and Hezbollah are working to destabilize Lebanese society," noting that "those responsible for creating chaos must be called to account."

US Military Says It Has "Proof Positive" Of Iran Involvement In Iraq Violence. The CBS Evening News (1/29, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The United States has repeatedly warned Iran against meddling in Iraq." Bush "has accused Iran of supplying insurgents with weapons that have killed nearly 200 servicemen and women and wounded nearly 600 since the war began. Iran has denied it, but tonight the US military says it has proof positive…[which] can only worsen the tension between the US and Iran." CBS (Martin) added, "Outright war between the US and Iran remains only a remote possibility. But they are already fighting a proxy war inside Iraq. Some, but by no means all, of the violence there is stoked by Iran. US officials say there is clear evidence Iran wants to make the United States bleed as much as possible." CBS added, "US officials tell CBS News serial numbers on parts used to make advanced explosive devices powerful enough to breach the armor on an American tank have been traced directly back to Iran. These officials also say rocket propelled grenade launchers and assault rifles found in Iraq bear Iranian factory markings."

US Official Says North Korea, Iran Cooperating On Missile Development. The Washington Times (1/30, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports in a front page article that North Korea and Iran "are cooperating in developing long-range missiles," the deputy director of the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency said yesterday. During an address at the George C. Marshall Institute, Army Brig. Gen. Patrick O'Reilly "said…North Korea test fired a long-range Taepodong missile in July, and Iran is working on a space launcher that would help develop an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) that could hit the US." North Korea, he noted, "uses its missiles as 'geopolitical leverage' over the United States and its allies and also to raise money by selling them abroad," while Iran is building missiles for "both asymmetric threats and conventional threats" to US and allied forces. The speech "marked the first time the Pentagon publicly disclosed the missile cooperation between Pyongyang and Tehran," he noted.

Arab Nations Anxious Over Rise In Iran's Influence. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/30, A1, Shadid, 690K) reports, "Four years after the United States invaded Iraq, in part to transform the Middle East, Iran is ascendant, many in the region view the Americans in retreat, and Arab countries, their own feelings of weakness accentuated, are awash in sharpening sectarian currents that many blame the United States for exacerbating." As struggle for influence in the region deepens, "many in the Arab world find themselves on the sidelines. They are increasingly anxious over worsening tension between Sunni and Shiite Muslims across the Middle East, even as some accuse the United States of stoking that tension as a way to counter predominantly Shiite Iran. Fear of Iranian dominance is coupled, sometimes in the same conversation, with suspicion of US intentions in confronting Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0123947

Iran, Saudi Arabia Seek To Mediate Lebanon Agreement. Under the headline "US Ally And Foe Are Trying To Avert War In Lebanon," the New York Times (1/30, A6, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "In an unusual collaboration that could complicate American policy in the region, Iran and Saudi Arabia have been mediating an agreement to end Lebanon's violent political crisis." Hezbollah officials "have recently visited the Saudi king in Riyadh, according to officials who attended the meeting. And Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi chief security adviser, has met with his Iranian counterpart, Ali Larijani, in Riyadh and Tehran to try to stop Lebanon's slide into civil war." However, the Saudi-Iranian efforts "have put Washington in an awkward position, since it is trying to reduce Iran's regional influence. But since a stable Lebanon is also an American priority, American officials have watched the efforts without interfering."

Bolton Criticizes US Policy In Iran, Iraq. The Washington Times (1/30, Morrison, 88K) reports in its "Embassy Row" column that former US Ambassador to the UN, John Bolton, "dropped diplomatic niceties" in an interview with the French daily Le Monde, "calling for the replacement of the Iranian government, criticizing some US moves in Iraq and fretting about the US troop surge." He told the newspaper, in an interview published yesterday, that the "negotiations [with Iran] have failed," adding that the only way to deal with the Iranian regime is to "isolate them on the international level." He also "criticized the Bush administration's early administrative control over Iraq through the Coalition Provisional Authority," which, he said, deprived the Iraqis of "political responsibilities" and "gave the terrorists and the remainders of [Saddam Hussein's] Ba'ath Party a chance to gather." On the subject of Bush's proposed troop "surge," Bolton called it "the best of a series of bad options."

Europeans Resisting US Calls To Curb Ties With Iran. The New York Times (1/30, A1, Weisman, 1.16M) reports on its front page that European governments "are resisting Bush administration demands that they curtail support for exports to Iran and that they block transactions and freeze assets of some Iranian companies," officials on both sides say. Their resistance "threatens to open a new rift between Europe and the United States over Iran." At issue now is how the most recent UNSC resolution is to be carried out, "with Europeans resisting American appeals for quick action, citing technical and political problems related to the heavy European economic ties to Iran and its oil industry." American officials are pressing Italy, Germany, France, Spain, Austria, the Netherlands, Sweden and Britain, because they all have "extensive business dealings with Iran, particularly in energy."

Shell Iran Plan May Lead To US Sanctions. The Financial Times (1/30, Crooks) reports US authorities will "take a look at" a "controversial" agreement signed over the weekend by Royal Dutch Shell "that could ultimately lead to a multi-billion dollar investment in Iran," a US State Department official said. Shell and its partner Repsol of Spain have signed a service agreement with the Iranian government "to continue work on developing blocks 13 and 14 of the giant South Pars gas field, in spite of mounting international pressure over the country's nuclear program." Assistant Secretary McCormack said Monday that US government lawyers and policymakers "would take a look at the Shell deal, to see whether to take any action."

Legislation Targets Surplus Sales To Iran. The AP (1/30, Theimer) reports Sen. Ron Wyden (D-OR) has proposed legislation to "cut off all Pentagon sales of surplus F-14 parts, saying the military's marketing of the spares 'defies common sense' in light of their importance to Iran." The measure "would ban the Defense Department from selling surplus F-14 parts and prohibit buyers who have already acquired surplus Tomcat parts from exporting them."

Ahmadinejad Faces Mounting Domestic Criticism. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A5, Spindle, 2.04M) reports, "With another confrontational moment in Iran's nuclear standoff approaching next month, criticism of the country's president at home is increasing." President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad now "suddenly faces a concerted effort by political foes to constrain both his populist economic policies and his public defiance of the West." Many of Tehran's elite politicians and clerics "have long harbored concerns about Mr. Ahmadinejad… But the immense popularity he generated among Iran's poor and working-class voters kept many of his critics from speaking out or openly moving against his policies." However, a round of elections late last year "has undermined Mr. Ahmadinejad's political momentum and unleashed a flood of public criticism and moves to clip his wings."

DOJ_NMG_0123948

Iraqi Forces Said To Have Performed Poorly In Weekend Battle. The New York Times (1/30, Santora, 1.16M) reports, "Iraqi forces were surprised and nearly overwhelmed by the ferocity of an obscure renegade militia in a weekend battle near the holy city of Najaf and needed far more help from American forces than previously disclosed, American and Iraqi officials said Monday." They "said American ground troops -- and not just air support as reported Sunday -- were mobilized to help the Iraqi soldiers, who appeared to have dangerously underestimated the strength of the militia, which calls itself the Soldiers of Heaven and had amassed hundreds of heavily armed fighters." The Iraqis and Americans "eventually prevailed in the battle. But the Iraqi security forces' miscalculations about the group's strength and intentions raised troubling questions about their ability to recognize and deal with a threat."

ABC World News (1/29, story 2, 2:40, Karl, 8.78M) said "Iraqis may have been in the lead here, but several hundred American troops were involved and most of the killing ultimately done by US air power." ABC also noted President Bush's comments in an NPR interview, saying Bush "seemed buoyed by the performance of the Iraqi troops."

NBC Nightly News (1/29, lead story, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "if it wasn't hard enough to figure out all the factions in the fighting in Iraq, tonight there is word from a battlefield in the desert halfway around the world that there is a new force to worry about and it is being described as a cult. You may have heard of the big attack yesterday that left 200 Iraqis dead. They were fighting US soldiers and their fellow Iraqis, Shiite on Shiite. And tonight all indications are this group was bent on making a big kill before they themselves were killed in the fight." NBC (Arraf) added, "One of those killed, according to Iraqi official, the leader of the group. An Iraqi who believed he was a messenger of God. His group came out of nowhere and waged one of the biggest battles fought by Iraqi forces. The group called Soldiers of Heaven was using the cover of hundreds of thousands of Shi'as on their way to the holy cities. Their goal was to attack the pilgrims the holy sites and to kill top Shi'a clerics."

The CBS Evening News (1/29, story 2, 2:00, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "An Iraqi official said there were women and children among the detainees from the battlefield, describing them as family members who had been tricked into joining the cult. And an Iraqi soldier with military intelligence told CBS News that he saw women and children among the dead."

USA Today/AP (1/30, 5A), Los Angeles Times (1/30, Roug, Daragahi, 850K), Washington Post (1/30, A1, Partlow, Sarhan, 690K) and Washington Times/AP (1/30, Gamel) also report on the battle. The Christian Science Monitor (1/30, Murphy, 59K), in a story titled "Battle Suggests New Sectarian Divides In Iraq," says that "what precisely happened near the Shiite shrine city of Najaf Sunday is still being sorted out, but it seems likely that at its root was an unusual new wrinkle in Iraqi violence: a Shiite plan to attack Shiites. … The incident is a reminder of the swirling agendas now at play in Iraq and the turbulent political waters US troops are wading into as more soldiers arrive and President Bush has vowed to stand by Shiite Islamist Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki."

Bush Says He Expects Iraqis To Take The Lead In Ending Violence. President Bush, in an interview with NPR's All Things Considered yesterday (1/29, Williams), addressed his expectations once his new Iraq strategy is implemented. Bush, also reacting to yesterday's battle between US and Iraqi forces and an insurgent group, said, "One of the things that I expect to see is the Iraqis take the lead and show the American people that they're willing to do the hard work necessary to secure their democracy. And our job is to help them. ... We can debate terms, but what can't be debated is the fact that Iraq is violent. And the violence is caused by Sunni Arabs, like al Qaeda, who have made it clear that they want to create chaos and drive the United States out so they can have safe haven, and then they could launch attacks against America." ABC World News (1/29, story 2, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) briefly noted Bush's comments as part of its coverage of violence in Iraq, saying Bush "seemed buoyed by the performance of the Iraqi troops."

Baker Agrees To Testify Before Congress Today. The Hill (1/30, Bolton) reports, "James A. Baker III, the co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, has ended weeks of resistance and today will testify before Congress on the war, avoiding a split with his fellow co-chairman, former Rep. Lee

DOJ_NMG_0123949

Hamilton (D-Ind.). Sources familiar with the efforts to persuade Baker to testify said he did not want to appear to be lobbying against President Bush at the height of his push for 21,500 additional troops in Iraq." Baker "will answer senators' questions today during a hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which includes three Democratic presidential hopefuls and Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), the chamber's most forceful Republican critic of the war, who also is mulling a White House bid."

Lugar Says Bush Plan A "Draw Play On Third Down With 20 Yards To Go In The First Quarter." Sen. Richard Lugar, ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, writes in the Washington Post (1/30, A17, 690K), "Some commentators have compared the Bush plan to a 'Hail Mary' pass in football -- a desperate heave deep down the field by a losing team at the end of the game. Actually, a far better analogy for the Bush plan is a draw play on third down with 20 yards to go in the first quarter. The play does have a chance of working if everything goes perfectly, but it is more likely to gain a few yards and set up a punt on the next down, after which the game can be continued under more favorable circumstances." Lugar adds, "The president's plan is an early episode in a much broader Middle East realignment that began with our invasion of Iraq and that may not end for years. … The administration must avoid becoming so quixotic in its attempt to achieve the optimal outcome in Iraq that it fails to adjust to shifts in the region or political realities within Iraq. Although any administration would be reluctant to talk about a Plan B when its primary plan is still in motion, the president and Congress must reach a consensus on how to protect our broader strategic interests regardless of what happens in those Baghdad neighborhoods or on the floor of the Senate."

McCaskill Says Bush Strategy Showcases Wrong Priorities. Democratic Sen. Claire McCaskill said on Fox News' Your World (1/29, Cavuto), "My problem with what…Bush is asking of the American people is that we have not required that the Maliki government show us anything. They've been talking and I think the American public has been very patient. I don't think we've been impatient. It's been four years, and every time the Maliki government has said we will stand up and do something, they have failed to do it. ... This plan, if you really scrub it, is a law enforcement operation on steroids. The city is divided into large precincts, and they are going to be going out with the Iraqi military and the Iraqi police and helping them with the lawlessness that has enveloped Baghdad. ... If we do not have the Iraqi police and the Iraqi military and we do not have any kind of criminal justice system within the country, that should come first before we spend more of our precious lives and more of our treasures."

Nelson Says Proposed Surge Too Small To Help. The AP (1/30, Flaherty) reports Armed Services Committee member Sen. Bill Nelson, in "remarks prepared for a speech Tuesday," "said only another 200,000 or 300,000 U.S. troops would make a substantial difference in Iraq. ... Nelson also was expected to deliver a sharp rebuke of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Nelson said al-Maliki 'either lacks the will, or the nerve, to take on the Shiite militias.'" The AP adds, "Public sentiment has turned strongly against a war that has dragged on for nearly four years with more than 3,000 American dead and violence unabated by insurgents and sectarian militias."

Huckabee Expresses Support For Bush Plan. Former Arkansas Governor and 2008 presidential candidate Mike Huckabee said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/29, Blitzer) that Bush "has got to be given a chance to succeed with the plan that he has and that Gen. Petraeus is telling the Congress will work. ... I can't tell you it's going to work, because I don't know. But I do know that it's time to stand behind our troops, and see if the President's plan of increasing the patrols in Baghdad will at least work for bringing some stability." Asked what gives him "confidence that this new strategy might work," Huckabee replied, "Because it comes from a trusted general, Gen. Petraeus, who is there, and whose method of operations when he was with the 101st Airborne, I think, was a successful operation. Let's hope it's going to be this time."

Decision On Iraq War Attributed To Water Cooler-Style Deliberation. In his Washington Post column (1/30), Richard Cohen says, "A better name" for the Iraq war "would be the War of the Water Cooler. This, I'm sure, is where it all started. You can scour the vast literature about the Iraq war and how it started and not find the single moment when George W. Bush decided he had to go to war -- and why. The minutes of all the pertinent meetings, all of them surely monitored by Bob Woodward, either have produced nothing or will produce nothing because nothing was produced in these meetings. This war, I am sure, was the product of what Dick Cheney said to Bush at the White House water cooler. No one was present to take any of this down on paper."

DOJ_NMG_0123950

More Commentary. Bret Stephens writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/30, A16, 2.04M), "These are our options in Iraq: We can withdraw troops and equipment as fast as our Galaxys and Globemasters can carry them home (or to Okinawa). This is the Murtha Way. We can cap troop levels at 140,000 and withdraw them no later than Inauguration Day, 2009. This is Hillary's Way. We can redeploy our forces outside of Iraqi cities, conduct limited training and counterterrorism missions, urge reconciliation among the various political factions and seek diplomatic openings with Syria and Iran. This is the way of Sens. Chuck Hagel and Joe Biden. We can advocate and facilitate the partition of Iraq. This is the (Peter) Galbraith Way. Or we can surge troops into the toughest neighborhoods of Baghdad, Ramadi and Najaf and keep them there indefinitely. That is the President's Way." Bush's approach "is going to mean many more American casualties -- perhaps as many in the months ahead as we've seen over the past four years. It may fail for lack of troops, or insufficient cooperation from the Iraqi government. It could be defeated in the field, or it could succeed -- only to be undermined in Washington, much as Gen. Creighton Abrams's 1972 battlefield victories in Vietnam were. It lacks an endgame. It's a political loser." But "it is the only strategy on the table that aims at victory and has a chance of succeeding."

Fouad Ajami, who teaches at Johns Hopkins, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/30, A17, 2.04M), "So this government in Baghdad, fighting for its life, has not mastered even the grim science of the gallows, and has no knowledge of the 'drop charts' used for hangings around the world. The Tikritis had been much better at this sort of thing." Iraq "has been fought over, and a verdict can already be discerned -- rough balance between its erstwhile Sunni rulers and its Shia inheritors, and a special, autonomous life for the Kurds. Against all dire expectations, the all-important question of the distribution of oil wealth appears close to a resolution. … This is the country midwifed by American power. We were never meant to stay there long. Iraq will never approximate the expectations we projected onto it in more innocent times. But we should be able to grant it the gift of acceptance, and yet another dose of patience as it works its way out of its current torments. … This may not be the stuff of glory, but it has power and legitimacy all its own."

Author Milton Viorst writes in the New York Times (1/30, 1.16M) that Bush "seems not to have noticed, but what stands between hostile sectarian forces and the resumption of all-out civil war in Lebanon is the Arab League, whose diplomacy 17 years ago put an end to a conflict in which tens of thousands of Lebanese died. Is there not a lesson here, for the president and the Democratic Congress, that is applicable to Iraq? … Curiously, the Iraq Study Group, in acknowledging Iraqi distrust of the United States, suggested a greater diplomatic role for Syria and Iran, the very countries that have an interest in Iraq's instability. Though better relations with these two countries might be in Washington's long-term interest, they are surely not going to help matters in Iraq. That's where the Arab League comes in. Because it is Arab, it can count on a level of trust, even among suspicious Iraqis, not available to the United States or its Western allies." Viorst adds "critics argue that the Arab League, being heavily Sunni, can have no influence on Iraq's Shiites." But "they forget that the bulk of the Iraqi Army that defeated Iran in the 1980-88 war was Shiite. This fact alone tells us that Iraqi Shiites, much as they want to be rid of the American occupation, are not ready to become Iranian. The Arab League can work from this premise to restore Iraq's stability. The United States cannot."

Additional 21,500 Troops Going To Iraq Said To Lack Equipment. The Washington Post (1/30, A12, Tyson, 690K) reports, "Boosting US troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 would create major logistical hurdles for the Army and Marine Corps, which are short thousands of vehicles, armor kits and other equipment needed to supply the extra forces, US officials said." The increase would also "further degrade the readiness of U.S.-based ground forces, hampering their ability to respond quickly, fully trained and well equipped in the case of other military contingencies around the world and increasing the risk of U.S. casualties, according to Army and Marine Corps leaders. 'The response would be slower than we might like, we would not have all of the equipment sets that ordinarily would be the case, and there is certainly risk associated with that,' the Marine Corps commandant, Gen. James Conway, told the House Armed Services Committee last week." The Post adds, "US commanders privately expressed doubts that Iraq-bound units would receive a full complement of Humvees."

Senate Vote On Iraq Resolutions Could Be Put Off Until Next Week. Roll Call (1/30, Stanton, Pierce, Yachnin) reports, "With a vote on one or more nonbinding resolutions opposing President Bush's decision to boost troop levels in Iraq likely a week away, Senate Democratic leaders are expected to use the delay to push back against tough White House rhetoric and attempt to build a bipartisan coalition on the issue, aides said Monday. A senior Democratic leadership aide said Monday that while no talks with Republicans who oppose Bush's Iraq strategy have been scheduled, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) likely will 'extend some olive branches' later in the week as the chamber moves closer to next week's vote." Republicans "are expected to oppose any effort by Reid to bring the minimum-wage debate to a close before Thursday. Because of that, a plan to begin debate on a resolution sponsored by Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Joseph Biden (D-Del.) will be put off until sometime next week, Democratic aides said." Democrats "are deeply skeptical of GOP indications that they would like to use all of the time allowed to them procedurally before wrapping up this week's debate on minimum wage. … If Republicans use all the time available to them under Senate rules on the minimum-wage bill, debate on the Iraq resolution likely would begin at the end of this week at the earliest." Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell "has said repeatedly that he does not want to block a vote on an Iraq resolution, but that he will not allow a vote on the Democrats' Iraq resolution without an agreement to also have several other votes on GOP-sponsored resolutions less critical of the president."

DOJ_NMG_0123951

Also reporting on the Senate debate, USA Today (1/30, Kiely, 2.27M) says "one focus will be on a group of lawmakers with special expertise: the ones who know what it's like to fight a war that has lost the support of the American public. … When it comes to President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, however, Congress' Vietnam veterans are divided." In the Senate, "four Vietnam combat veterans are playing key roles in the debate: Hagel authored the resolution opposing Bush's plan; his close friend, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a former prisoner of war in Hanoi, is a leading backer of the Bush plan. … Then there are Kerry and Sen. Jim Webb. During the 2004 presidential campaign, Webb, D-Va., leveled withering criticisms of Kerry's anti-war activities in the 1970s. This time, Webb voted with Kerry for Hagel's resolution."

The Washington Post (1/30, A3, Weisman, Tyson, 690K), under the headline "Soldier's Death Strengthens Senators' Antiwar Resolve," says "just before Christmas, an Army captain named Brian Freeman cornered Sens. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) at a Baghdad helicopter landing zone. The war was going badly, he told them. Troops were stretched so thin they were doing tasks they never dreamed of, let alone trained for." Freeman, "took a short holiday leave to see his 14-month-old daughter and 2-year-old son, returned to his base in Karbala, Iraq, and less than two weeks ago died in a hail of bullets and grenades. Insurgents, dressed in U.S. military uniforms, speaking English and driving black American SUVs, got through a checkpoint and attacked, kidnapped four soldiers and later shot them. Freeman died in the assault, the fifth casualty of the brazen attack." Freeman's death "has radicalized Dodd, energized Kerry and girded the ever-more confrontational stance of Democrats in the Senate."

Bush Sees Contradiction Between Senate Resolutions, Vote For Pretraeus. During a NPR's All Things Considered interview yesterday, (1/29, Williams), President Bush was asked about his reaction to the Senate debate about his Iraq plans. He replied, "My feeling to the Senate echoes what Joe Lieberman said the other day, and that is, it is ironic that the Senate would vote 81-0 to send a general into Iraq who believes he needs more troops to do the job, and then send a contradictory message. The legislators will do what they feel like they've got to do. And we want to work with them as best we can to make it clear what the stakes of failure will be, and also make it clear to them that I think they have a responsibility to make sure our troops have what they need to do the missions."

McConnell echoed that point on Fox News' Your World (1/29, Cavuto), "Gen. Petraeus, having just been promoted without opposition, ought to be given a chance to succeed in his mission. It seems to me it hardly makes sense to confirm the general, head him out to Iraq, and then turn around and say, 'but your mission can't possibly succeed.' ... We're going to have a series of different votes on different kinds of resolutions. None of them are going to be binding. All of them, as virtually every measure in the Senate, will require 60 votes. There is a reasonable chance none of them will pass."

Feingold To Challenge Democrats' "Timidity," Call For Cutting Off Funds. The Politico (1/30) reports, "Senate Democrats oppose the war in Iraq, they just don't plan on stopping it. They have discovered that standing up to the president is not quite as easy as vilifying him." Sen. Russ Feingold "has decided, however, to challenge what he calls the 'timidity' of Democratic leaders. He is going to introduce legislation cutting off funding for the Iraq war and he may do it, he told me, as early as this week."

The AP (1/30, Flaherty) reports "the new Democratic-led Congress is on a collision course with the White House over how far lawmakers can or should go to stop the war in Iraq, a dispute that could test the bounds of the Constitution. … Some Democrats say Congress must consider tougher alternatives to force the president's hand, including cutting funding, capping the number of troops allowed in Iraq and setting an end date for the war. 'This Congress was never meant to be a rubber stamp,' Sen. Barbara Boxer told her colleagues last week. 'Read the Constitution.'"

DOJ_NMG_0123952

More Commentary. Dona Brazile writes in Roll Call (1/30), "The current US occupation (along with a dwindling number of coalition forces) of Iraq is just a drop in the bucket when you have 1,300 years to avenge; they, clearly, have a lot of patience. But for many Americans, our patience with the incompetent mismanagement of the war has grown thin. It's time we have this debate and discussion in Congress. I hope the House Democrats tell the president to stay tuned."

20,000 US Soldiers Have Been Wounded, 500 Have Lost Limbs In Iraq. CBS Evening News (1/29, story 3, :10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In addition to the more than 3,000 American servicemen and women who have been killed in Iraq, more than 20,000 have been wounded. 500 of them have lost limbs."

Former CPA Official Sentenced To Prison For Fraud. The Washington Post (1/30, D8, Witte, 690K) reports a "former official of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority was sentenced yesterday to nine years in prison and ordered to forfeit $3.6 million for his role in one of the largest fraud schemes to emerge from the reconstruction of Iraq, the Justice Department said yesterday." Robert J. Stein, 52, "of North Carolina was arrested in November 2005 and pleaded guilty in February 2006 to charges that included bribery, money laundering and conspiracy. He was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Washington." In his "role as comptroller and funding officer for the Coalition Provisional Authority in south-central Iraq, Stein worked with other Defense Department officials to rig the bids on reconstruction contracts so that all the work went to American businessman Philip H. Bloom, according to prosecutors. In exchange, Bloom gave the officials more than $1 million in cash, plus such luxury gifts as SUVs, a motorcycle, jewelry, computers, airline tickets, liquor and promises of future employment."

US Urged To Reach Out to Iraqi Refugees. Adam Goodheart, Hodson Trust-Griswold Director of the Starr Center for the Study of the American Experience at Washington College in Chestertown, MD, and John R. Bohrer, a political writer and blogger, write in USA Today (1/30, 11A, 2.27M), "Efforts for increasing the flow of Iraqi immigrants also have been stymied by post-9/11 counterterrorism laws that make it difficult for anyone from the Middle East to enter the USA. That's an especially cruel irony, since the refugees in greatest peril are those who have put their lives on the line for what President Bush has declared is a war against terrorism. In late 1975, less than eight months after the first refugee landed in the USA, the State Department declared the resettlement effort successfully completed (at a total cost of $405 million). … If the Bush administration is prepared to reaffirm those ideals [President[Ford so eloquently invoked, it should extend a similar welcome in 2007."

Corrupt Afghan Officials Stealing Reconstruction Aid. The Washington Times (1/30, Chamberlain, 88K) reports, "Corrupt Afghan police and tribal leaders are stealing vast quantities of reconstruction aid intended to improve the lives of people and turn them away from the Taliban, US and British officials said. In some cases, all the aid earmarked for an area has ended up in the wrong hands, officials said." NATO "forces in the south of the country fear corrupt police will steal aid if handed out through them. A Pentagon official said thousands of cars and trucks intended for use by the Afghan police had been sold instead. … A committee of British lawmakers plans to investigate the corruption, which has dogged operations in Afghanistan since the Taliban were driven from power in 2001."

Course To Defeat Taliban Proposed. Selig S. Harrison, who covered Afghanistan as South Asia bureau chief of the Washington Post (1/30, A17, 690K), writes this morning that "to prevent a continued Taliban upsurge, the United States should condition future economic and military aid to Islamabad on meaningful measures to shut down Taliban camps and staging areas on the Pakistani side of the border. At the same time, the Pentagon should shift to a low-profile military strategy in which air attacks are the rare exception and peace initiatives like those of the Musa Qala elders are welcomed."

Iraqi Prison Officials Tour South Carolina Jails For Ideas. The AP (1/30, Kinnard) reports, "Iraqi prison officials looking to rebuild their nation's jail system toured a state prison Monday, gathering ideas — including electronic door locks and an onsite license plate plant — to take back to their country." The AP continues, "A delegation that included U.S. Justice Department officials and their Iraqi counterparts visited the maximum security Broad River Correctional Institution, where the Iraqis watched inmates make South Carolina license plates and traffic signs. … Iraqi prisoners don't have a place to work, one visitor said through an interpreter." The AP adds, "The plant enables an inmate 'to help himself and his family. We can have productive inmates, not just consumer inmates,' said the warden of a Nasiriyah prison, whose name was withheld by the Justice Department for his own safety. … The group also was interested in the prison's security system, which includes electronically locking doors and video monitoring. … The delegation visited South Carolina because the state prison system was similar in size and organization to the existing Iraqi system, said Georgette Thornton, who works in Baghdad with the department's International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program. … The two-week visit to South Carolina will include trips to other state prisons as well as a federal prison."

DOJ_NMG_0123953

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

KLA-Tencor Changes Options Report Citing Unintentional Backdating. Dow Jones (1/30) reports, "KLA-Tencor Corp., one of the nation's largest chip-equipment makers, booked a $370 million non-cash charge related to stock options it intentionally backdated. … It also may face a lawsuit from its former chief executive officer, who in a role as an adviser to the company was fired in connection with its option- accounting investigation." Dow Jones continues, "In a Securities and Exchange Commission filing Monday, KLA-Tencor said it took a charge of $348 million for stock options it granted from July 1994 through June 2005 and a $22 million charge for the year ended June 30, 2006, due to erroneous accounting methods. … The San Jose, Calif., chip-equipment maker was forced to record the charges after a special board committee found that the company had granted stock options to executive officers and other employees at advantageous prices." Dow Jones adds, "In essence, KLA-Tencor awarded stock options at prices that were lower than those on the option-grant dates it recorded on its books. … The company began its internal investigation in May. The Justice Department and the SEC also are investigating KLA-Tencor. … KLA-Tencor said in the filing that it stopped misdating stock options after June 2002, with a few 'immaterial exceptions.[It found no wrongdoing by its current management team, now led by CEO Rick Wallace. … By filing restated financial statements, the company also said it expects to comply with Nasdaq reporting requirements, meaning its stock shouldn't face delisting."

British Bankers Again Seek Dismissal Of Enron-Related Charges. Bloomberg (1/30, Calkins) reports, "Three former British bankers accused in an Enron Corp.-related fraud scheme have again asked a federal judge in Houston to dismiss charges they cheated their onetime employer, Greenwich NatWest Ltd." Bloomberg continues, "David Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew argued that the indictment, which accuses them of skimming $7.35 million from the sale of an Enron-related partnership, improperly applied U.S. criminal law to British citizens acting in the U.K. In December, U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein revised the charges without dropping any counts. … 'The wire fraud statute does not extend to the foreign scheme alleged,' the bankers said in court papers filed Jan. 22. They claim the U.S. Congress didn't intend to criminalize the activity of 'a foreign national who allegedly defrauded his foreign employer in a foreign country.'" Bloomberg adds, "Bermingham, 44, Darby 44, and Mulgrew, 45, were extradited to the U.S. in July and are charged with seven counts each of wire fraud. If convicted, they face as much as 35 years in prison. Prosecutors said the three skimmed millions in 2000 by misleading Greenwich NatWest about the value of an Enron partnership. They are free on $1 million bond each and scheduled to go on trial in September. … The original 2002 indictment relied on the legal theory that the bankers had deprived Greenwich NatWest, which has since been acquired by Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc, of their honest services. To bolster their latest request to drop the charges, the bankers cited a December decision by Werlein to remove references to honest services from the indictment. … The honest-services argument was struck down in August by an appeals court in another criminal case stemming from a transaction at Houston-based Enron. The appeals court said an employee didn't deprive his company of honest services if he acted in the company's best interests and in line with management goals. … 'The United States will proceed at trial against defendants solely on the grounds that they deprived NatWest of money and property,' Steven Tyrrell, acting U.S. attorney in the Justice Department's Fraud

DOJ_NMG_0123954

Section, wrote in December. Removing the honest-services allegations 'does not deny the defendants their grand jury rights,' he said. … Jaclyn Lesch, a Justice Department spokeswoman, declined to comment on the bankers' request, saying the government will respond in court at the proper time."

Former Officials Spared Prison Time In Cendant Accounting Scandal. The AP (1/30, Christoffersen) reports, "Two former executives were spared prison time Monday for their roles in a massive accounting scandal at Cendant Corp. that cost the company and its investors more than $3 billion." The AP continues, "Anne Pember, 47, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy in 2000, was sentenced to two years of probation and 200 hours of community service. … Casper Sabatino, 54, a former accountant at CUC who pleaded guilty to wire fraud charges and cooperated with federal prosecutors, was also sentenced to two years of probation." The AP adds, "Pember asked to be spared prison time, citing her extensive cooperation with federal investigators. Prosecutors agreed. … 'I think your cooperation and your testimony was quite extraordinary,' said Senior U.S. District Judge Alan H. Nevas. … Pember, who faced five years in prison under sentencing guidelines, apologized for her conduct." The AP notes, "Pember was controller at CUC International of Stamford, which merged with HFS Inc. of Parsippany, New Jersey, to create Cendant in December 1997. Pember became Cendant's senior vice president for accounting. … Nevas noted that Sabatino was one of the whistleblowers and was the first person to voluntarily cooperate with prosecutors. … Prosecutors say the scheme inflated the stock of CUC International, Cendant's predecessor, by $500 million."

SEC Approves Market-Based Method To Value Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, C5, Reilly, Ng) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission for the first time has blessed a method for valuing employee stock options that relies on market forces rather than academic models. … The change potentially paves the way for companies to use techniques that lessen the hit to profit they take from this type of compensation." The Journal continues, "In a Jan. 25 letter, SEC Chief Accountant Conrad Hewitt said an auction system designed by Zions Bancorp of Salt Lake City could be used to derive 'market' values for employee stock options. The SEC had rejected earlier attempts at market-based methods, including a plan pitched by computer-networking company Cisco Systems Inc. in 2005. … Ever since accounting rule makers decreed that starting in 2006 companies would have to book an expense for issuing stock options, a number of companies and financial institutions have tried to develop new ways to value the instruments." The Journal adds, "Both the SEC and accounting rule makers have said they believe market-based approaches are best for valuing options. Mr. Hewitt said yesterday that the problem is that the models currently in use produce 'hypothetical numbers.' Market-based approaches produce what 'may be a real number,' he added. … So far, though, no one had devised a market-based method that passed regulatory muster."

Former CA Official Sentenced To Six Months Home Detention. The New York Times/AP (1/30) reports, "A former executive at Computer Associates was sentenced to six months of home detention yesterday after pleading guilty to conspiracy charges in connection with a scheme to bolster the company's quarterly revenue artificially through backdated sales contracts." The AP continues, "Judge I. Leo Glasser of Federal District Court sentenced David Kaplan, former senior vice president for finance, at a hearing in Brooklyn. Mr. Kaplan was also ordered to serve three years of supervised release." The AP adds, "Mr. Kaplan was one of several executives at the company, now known as CA Inc., to plead guilty to criminal charges in 2004 and to cooperate with the government."

Fannie Mae CEO Received 25% Raise In 2006. The Washington Post (1/30, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) reports, "Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd received salary, stock and bonuses of more than $14.4 million in 2006, an increase of about 25 percent from the year before, the government-chartered mortgage funding company disclosed. Mudd's pay included a bonus of $3.5 million, restricted shares worth nearly $10 million and a salary of $950,000. That was up from a bonus of $2.6 million, restricted shares worth $8 million and a salary of $908,121 in 2005. For 2007, Mudd's salary was increased to $990,000." The Post adds, "Mudd was promoted to interim chief executive from chief operating officer in 2004 after an accounting scandal drove out his predecessor, former federal budget director Franklin D. Raines. Mudd's appointment was later made permanent. One of his top responsibilities is restoring the company's financial systems. More than two years after the accounting problems came to light, Fannie Mae remains unable to file timely financial statements, and its shares continue trading on the New York Stock Exchange by special dispensation."

DOJ_NMG_0123955

CRIMINAL LAW:

"Unflappable" Fleischer Testifies Against Libby. ABC World News (1/29, story 4, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer testified yesterday "for the prosecution in the perjury trial of Scooter Libby," telling "the jury that Libby had leaked to him the identity of a CIA employee whose husband criticized the President's Iraq policy." ABC (Thomas) added, "Fleischer quoted Libby as saying, 'This is hush-hush; on the QT. Not many very people know about this.' … Perhaps most damaging to Libby, Fleischer testified that the meeting happened on July 7th, several days before Libby told authorities he learned of the identity from the reporters." ABC noted that "under defense cross-examination challenging his credibility, Fleischer's previous training of being grilled by reporters appeared to help him. He was largely unflappable."

NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 5, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) noted that "the former number two man to Vice President Cheney is currently on trial," and "we've already heard a lot about how concerned the White House was about press coverage, especially where it pertained to the buildup to the Iraq war." NBC (O'Donnell) reported that Fleischer "blew another hole in Scooter Libby's story. … Fleischer was in the Bush inner circle," and he "admitted that he had passed on to a few reporters that 'Wilson's wife works there,' meaning the CIA. Fleischer described it as a casual conversation that included NBC's David Gregory," but "as the leak investigation intensified, Fleischer said he worried that he could be in big trouble."

The AP (1/30, Apuzzo) reports that "Fleischer reminded Washington on Monday why he was considered one of the city's most unshakable spinmasters. … It was almost like he was back at the White House 2- 1/2 years ago, parrying questions from reporters," and his "testimony was the most damaging yet." However, "True to his reputation, Fleischer offered few behind-the-scenes glimpses of the Bush administration." USA Today/AP (1/30, 4A, Sniffen) notes, "Fleischer said he again heard about Plame four days later from White House communications director Dan Bartlett. Defense attorney William Jeffress suggested that Fleischer might have heard the Plame story first from" then-White House communications director Dan Bartlett, "but Fleischer insisted he learned about her from Libby first."

Under the headline "Former Press Secretary Says Libby Told Him of Plame," the Washington Post (1/30, A3, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) notes, "The unusual spectacle of a president's top spokesman testifying in open court widened the rare view the trial is providing the jury -- and the public -- of the inner workings of a White House that has proudly guarded its privacy." The Post adds, "Fleischer testified that neither Libby nor Bartlett invoked a White House protocol under which colleagues warned him when they were providing classified information that could not be discussed with reporters. He said he 'never in my wildest dreams thought this information would be classified.'"

In his Washington Post (1/30, A2, 690K) "Washington Sketch" column, Dana Milbank writes that Fleischer "has lost nothing off the old curveball," and "Libby's defense team learn what any reporter could have told them: The longer you question Fleischer, the less knowledge you take away from the experience." Milbank notes, "Jeffress asked Fleischer if Bartlett had been talking to him when he said, aboard Air Force One, that Plame was the one who sent Wilson on the trip to Niger. 'He said it out loud,' Fleischer answered. 'He was talking to you?' 'He said it out loud and I heard him,' Fleischer repeated."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/30, Lewis, 1.16M) reports Fleischer "was followed to the stand by a prosecution witness regarded as perhaps the most secretive and publicity-averse employee in the White House, David S. Addington. … He is widely reported to be the theoretician behind Mr. Cheney's belief in a powerful executive branch, in which the president may exert wide authority unchecked by Congress or the courts." Addington testified about a meeting at which "Libby had quizzed him as to whether the C.I.A. would have records showing when someone sent a relative on a mission. … As he provided the far-from-simple answer, he said that Mr. Libby had held out both hands in front, palms down, as if to remind him the information was sensitive. 'He said, "Keep it down,"' Mr. Addington testified."

Defense May Attack Fleischer Immunity Deal. The AP (1/30) reports, "Fleischer testified under an immunity deal with prosecutors, which means he cannot be prosecuted for having revealed that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. He arrived in court with his attorneys. … Fleischer said he sought the deal after reading an article about the investigation. 'I thought, "Oh my God. Did I somehow play a role in outing a CIA operative?"' Fleischer said." The AP notes, "Libby's attorneys plan to argue during cross-examination that the immunity deal makes Fleischer's testimony less credible. … Prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg sought to head off that argument early in Fleischer's testimony by having him describe his deal. … 'I cannot be prosecuted for what I did with the information I was provided,' Fleischer said. 'The immunity provides no protection for perjury.'"

DOJ_NMG_0123956

Testimony Said To Show Fleischer Often Was Kept In Dark. The New York Times (1/30, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "As White House press secretary, Ari Fleischer was the omnipresent television face of government power, the confident insider who spoke for President Bush and seemed to know everything but reveal only what he chose." However, Fleischer's testimony showed that "he only knew what the truly powerful chose to tell him, and sometimes that was not much. On occasion he would pronounce with great authority the administration's position on a topic only to find it had changed and nobody had bothered to let him know."

Robinson Compares Cheney's Office To "The Sopranos." In his Washington Post (1/30, 690K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "If you've been following the…Libby perjury trial, I can understand how you might confuse Dick Cheney with Tony Soprano. Cheney's office is beginning to sound a lot like the Bada Bing, minus the dancers." Robinson adds, "You get the sense of Cheney and his crew as a semi-independent power center, a family within the larger family. You see them hunkered down in their office suite, much like Tony and crew in the back room of the Bada Bing, plotting ways to cover their behinds and do in their rivals -- whether those rivals are found in Baghdad, Tehran or the West Wing."

Miller To Testify Today. The AP (1/30, Apuzzo) reports, "Journalists will take center stage at the CIA leak trial as Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald begins calling reporters as witnesses. Fitzgerald said Judith Miller was to take the stand Tuesday," and "prosecutors say Libby discussed Plame…with Miller three times" – twice "before Libby says he first remembered learning Plame's identity from…NBC newsman Tim Russert." The AP notes, "Like so many other government witnesses in the case, Miller's credibility will be an issue under cross-examination. She made some inconsistent statements in her grand jury testimony, defense attorneys say."

Russert Says He Did Not Tell Libby That Plame Worked At CIA. The AP (1/30, Evans) reports, "NBC News reporter Tim Russert said Monday that he did not tell vice presidential aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby that a prominent war critic's wife worked at the CIA, as Libby has claimed. Russert, who spoke in Tulsa and Oklahoma City at functions sponsored by Oklahoma State University's Spears School of Business, said he expects to be called to testify." Russert noted, "He called in protest to something he had seen on MSNBC "Hardball," and that was the extent of it.. He didn't call me as a confidential source, as such. He was calling me as a viewer to complain."

DOJ Plans $200 Million Grant Program To Curb Violent Crime. USA Today (1/30, Johnson) reports, "The Bush administration is proposing a $200 million grant program to help law enforcement agencies respond to surging violent-crime rates in cities across the nation, Justice Department officials said Monday." USA continues, "The program would help local and state police agencies pay for officers' overtime, equipment and other expenses stemming from new regional task forces aimed at curbing violent crime, Domingo Herraiz, director of the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Assistance, told USA TODAY." USA adds, "The program has not been announced publicly; Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled to begin briefing law enforcement officials on it this week. … The task forces would be staffed with federal, state and local officers to deal with a range of growing crime problems, including recent increases in gang-related violence, gun-related crimes and illegal sales of methamphetamine. … The grant plan marks the administration's broadest recognition yet of the threat posed by rising violent-crime rates." USA notes, "The FBI reports that violent crimes — homicides, rapes, robberies and aggravated assaults — increased 2.3% nationwide in 2005 compared with 2004, the first such rise since 1991. The trend has continued through the first half of 2006, the FBI reports. … If approved by Congress as part of President Bush's spending plan for the budget year that begins in October, the program also would symbolize a renewed interest in federal funding for local police initiatives, which often have taken a backseat to homeland security programs since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. … The grant program — known as the Violent Crime Reduction Partnership Initiative — would not, however, be designed to help police agencies hire new officers. … Instead, it would allow local and state agencies to apply for grants of $30,000-$200,000 to better deploy and equip officers who make up the anti-crime task forces, said Herraiz and Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, the Justice Department's director legal policy."

DOJ_NMG_0123957

Indiana Man Sentenced To Ten Years For Sexually Enticing Teen Online. The Northwest (IN) Times (1/30, Carlson) reports from Hammond, IN, "A 21-year-old Indiana man became one of the first in the nation Monday to receive a 10-year prison term for attempting to sexually entice a child through an Internet chatroom." The Times continues, "Mark Gledhill, of Syracuse, was nabbed along with 25 other men last summer in a wide-ranging federal sting for child sexual predators who use chatrooms to lure their victims. … Gledhill was among the half-dozen men in the sting who earlier pleaded guilty. He became the first to receive his sentence in U.S. District Court in Hammond." The Times adds, "The Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, which was signed into law by President Bush on July 27, increased the penalty for child enticement and other sex crimes to a 10-year minimum. … Weeks later, Gledhill and two dozen others were indicted in the Northern District of Indiana for enticement as part of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' Project Safe Childhood. … Gledhill was caught after he allegedly had sexual chats over the Internet with a government agent posing as a 13-year-old girl. He was arrested after driving to Valparaiso to meet the 'girl.'"

FBI Investigating California Lawmaker's Land Deals. The San Gabriel Valley Tribune (1/30, Ortega, Scott) reports, "FBI investigators have contacted current and former city officials in Monrovia and Fontana about Rep. Gary Miller's land sales in those cities. Miller, R-Brea, came under public scrutiny in August when a government watchdog group filed a complaint with the Internal Revenue Service alleging that Miller failed to report or pay capital gains tax on a nearly $11.8 million sale of 165 hillside acres to the city of Monrovia for a wildland preserve." The Tribune notes, "Officials with the IRS and the FBI would not confirm that they are investigating Miller," and "Miller said Friday that he was unaware of any federal investigation into his land dealings."

Williams Testifies She Did Not Try To Steal Coke Formula. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/30, Weber) reports Coca-Cola formula theft defendant Joya Williams "denied at her trial Monday that she committed a crime. Asked by her lawyer if she took part in a conspiracy, a teary-eyed…Williams told jurors she did not." She said that Javier Sanchez Lamelas, "Coca-Cola's global brand director, was constantly on her back, so in a desperate attempt to hold onto her $46,000-a-year job she started copying every document she put her hands on and taking them home. … Williams said she needed to hold onto the job because the company health insurance paid for her medications for immune deficiency and pulmonary disorders she suffers from." The AP notes, "The government's final witness was FBI agent Jerry Reichard, who testified Monday about a $4,000 cash deposit that posted to Williams' bank account on June 19, 2006. That was three days after Reichard gave" co-defendant Ibrahim Dimson "$30,000 in cash in exchange for a sample of a new Coca-Cola product that was part of so-called Project Lancelot."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/30, Stanford, 379K) reports, "During two hours of testimony, Williams tried to convince jurors that she was the victim of two ex-cons who pleaded guilty to trying to sell secret Coke documents to an undercover FBI agent last year for $1.5 million. Williams said one of those men, Edmund Duhaney, was a longtime family friend. Williams said she is the godmother of Duhaney's two children, but now the family considers her 'the enemy.'" The AJC notes, "Last week, Duhaney testified that he gave $4,000 in cash to Williams from money he got from the undercover FBI agent. Prosecutors on Monday provided bank statements showing Williams deposited $4,000 cash into her bank account just days after Duhaney met with the agent. Williams said the cash came from a friend in Alpharetta who has not been called to testify in the case."

Dangerous MS-13 Fugitive Arrested In Texas. KHOU-TV Houston (1/29, McShan) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "An MS-13 gang member accused of cutting off the heads of his girlfriend's parents is in custody in Houston. In late September, FBI agents and Houston police were involved in a shootout with MS-13 gang members in a hotel parking lot on the city's southeast side. … That night an FBI agent was wounded, but when it was all said and done, four gang members were apprehended and taken to jail. A fifth suspect, 26-year-old Albin Zelaya, somehow managed to get away. The dangerous man fled Houston, crossed the border and eventually ended up in Honduras, where he was spotted just outside the tiny town of San Pedro Sula." KHOU noted that the HPD gang squad "was assisted by HPD SWAT and, we were told, the FBI," in arresting Zelaya.

DOJ_NMG_0123958

Four Oklahoma Men Convicted Of Attending Cock Fight. The AP (1/30) reports, "A federal jury has convicted four men of being spectators at a cockfight held on Indian land south of Carnegie, U.S. Attorney Sheldon Sperling said Monday. The jury convicted Clay McHone, 47, of Harrah; Carl 'Hank' Bardsher, 46, of Lawton; Donald Underwood, 71, of Foster; and Robert Langford, 54, of Wichita Falls, Texas." The AP notes, "Agents from the FBI and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, aided by Oklahoma Highway Patrol troopers, raided the T.F.C. Cockfighting Facility where the cockfights were being held on July 22, and federal authorities eventually charged 75 people with various cockfighting offenses, Sperling said. … Most of the 70 have entered guilty pleas and been assessed fines ranging from $300 to $600, Sperling said."

US Alleges Pennsylvania Child Porn Suspect Also Had Sex With Child. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/30, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "A Drexel Hill woman charged last week with helping a Delaware County man tape pornographic movies of children also engaged in sex with at least one child, a prosecutor said yesterday. The new accusation against Dorothy Prawdzik, 43, alleges that she engaged in a sexual encounter that also involved a 39-year-old man and a young girl. 'The victim was approximately 10 years old at the time ... when she was forced to participate in those sex acts,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Michelle T. Rotella said in a court filing yesterday." The Inquirer notes, "The FBI, which was brought into the case by local authorities, said it recovered from" John Jackey Worman's "computers 11,000 video clips of Worman having sex with children. The computers also contained more than 1.2 million other images, many of them pornographic. The victims ranged in age from 3 months to 15 years."

FBI Internet Sex Solicitation Sting Snares Kentucky Man. The Louisville Courier-Journal (1/30, White) reports Kishor Patel of Lyndon, Ken., "was arrested by federal agents inside Mall St. Matthews Monday afternoon after authorities said he tried to meet a 14-year-old girl there for sex." He "will be arraigned in federal court Tuesday, said David Beyer, a spokesman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation office in Louisville. Beyer said Patel had a 'look of surprise on his face' as FBI agents handcuffed him and walked him out of the mall." FBI Louisville SAC Tracy Reinhold "said Patel had been communicating online with an undercover agent whom Patel believed to be a 14-year-old girl."

Serial Child Molester Given Maximum Term In California. The New York Times (1/30, Marshall) reports from San Francisco, "A man who the authorities said had sexually abused hundreds of young boys in several states was sentenced Monday in a California courtroom to 152 years to life in prison for molesting two 12-year-olds." The Times continues, "The man, Dean Arthur Schwartzmiller, 65, was convicted by a Santa Clara County jury last year for sexually abusing the two boys at his San Jose home from 2002 to 2005. On Monday in San Jose, he was given the maximum penalty for the 11 felony charges of child molestation and one misdemeanor charge of possessing child pornography. … The authorities have labeled Mr. Schwartzmiller, a former handyman, one of the 'most prolific child molesters' in United States history." The Times adds, "At the time of his arrest in May 2005, a police search of his home led to the discovery of written accounts describing his sexual exploits with boys ranging in age from 8 to 18, some dating back decades. The manuscripts included at least seven spiral notebooks with 1,500 pages of log entries detailing the sexual acts he said he had performed on hundreds of boys. … 'If anyone deserved the maximum sentence, it was Mr. Schwartzmiller,' said a Santa Clara County prosecutor, Steven Fein, who tried the case. … Mr. Schwartzmiller, who represented himself during most of the three-week trial, has already filed an appeal in the Santa Clara County Superior Court, said a defense lawyer who handled the sentencing proceedings. The lawyer, Melinda Hall, a Santa Clara County public defender, said the sentence should have been no more than 30 years to life. … 'The sentence wasn't unexpected,' Ms. Hall said, 'but I don't know if it will survive on appeal.'"

Judge Declines Probe Into AIPAC Case Leaks. The New York Sun (1/30, Gerstein) reports, "A federal judge overseeing a criminal case against two former pro-Israel lobbyists has declined to order an investigation into what the defense alleged were repeated leaks of grand jury information by government officials." The Sun continues,

DOJ_NMG_0123959

"Judge Thomas Ellis III ruled that the news reports cited by the former employees of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, Steven Rosen and Keith Weissman, did not reflect grand jury deliberations and therefore did not constitute a breach of the secrecy obligations under federal court rules. … 'Leaks of information from law enforcement investigations that relate to matters under grand jury investigation do not concern "matters before the grand jury," unless, of course, they disclose secret details about proceedings inside the grand jury room,' Judge Ellis wrote in a 10-page opinion dated Friday. 'The media reports identify no grand jury witnesses, disclose no questions that were asked or would be asked of witnesses in the grand jury, nor do the reports even describe or summarize any grand jury witness' testimony. Indeed, the reports never even mention a grand jury investigation.'" The Sun adds, "Judge Ellis recently set a trial date of June 4 for Messrs. Rosen and Weissman, who were indicted in 2005 on charges that they conspired to convey classified information to journalists and foreign officials not authorized to receive it. The two lobbyists, who were fired by Aipac, have pleaded not guilty. The case has drawn First Amendment scrutiny because it is unprecedented for individuals outside of government to be charged criminally with passing on classified information, except in cases where espionage was alleged."

Connecticut Man Gets Probation For False Chemical Attack Report. The AP (1/30) reports Robert Robishaw of Uncasville, Conn., "was sentenced to two years of probation Monday for lying to federal authorities about being the victim of a chemical attack." Robishaw "pleaded guilty in November to one count of making false statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, prosecutors said. He was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Hartford nearly a year after telling Groton fire authorities that an unknown substance fell out of a newspaper that he purchased at a Waterford convenience store. He told authorities the off-white, powdery substance caused his skin to turn red and tingle."

Florida Man Sentenced To Probation For JetBlue Hoax Bomb Threat. The AP (1/30) reports, "A federal judge sentenced a Florida man to two years probation for calling in a fake bomb threat after arriving too late to board his flight at Long Beach Airport. Yechezkel Wells, 22, of Miami Beach, also was ordered Monday to spend six months confined to his home, perform 200 hours of community service and pay a $1,000 fine. Wells pleaded guilty in October, acknowledging he made the fake threat in an effort to keep his Jet Blue flight to Fort Lauderdale from leaving. … The flight was delayed while bomb-sniffing dogs searched the plane, and FBI agents detained Wells for questioning."

Chicago Alderman Says Powder Found In Corruption Raid Was Not Drug. WBBM-TV (1/29, Dellimore) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "As she fights federal corruption charges, 20th Ward Alderman Arenda Troutman now says it was a dietary aid, not drugs that were found in her possession. … Troutman says she doesn't do drugs, and she believes the powder found was psyllium husk, a substance vegetarians like her use to clean out their digestive systems. And she says the FBI should have known that immediately. FBI spokesman — Agent Ross Rice — says no field test was performed on the powder because such tests can be unreliable and results from the crime lab haven't been received yet. The FBI denies Troutman's suggestion that the agency just trying to muddy up her character."

Judge Rules Alderman Convicted Of Corruption May Run Again. The Chicago Tribune (1/30, 617K) reports, "Former Ald. Virgil Jones (15th), who was convicted on corruption charges in 1999, can run to regain a seat on the City Council in the Feb. 27 election, a Cook County judge decided Monday. Circuit Judge Alfred Paul ruled that a state law that would ban Jones from the race is unconstitutional because it applies only to ex-felons running in local races and not statewide elections." The Tribune notes, "Jones was convicted of pocketing $7,000 in payoffs from an FBI informant and was sentenced to 41 months in prison."

Editorial Calls For DOJ To Charge Niagara Falls Official, Or Drop Probe. The Niagara Falls Reporter (1/30) editorializes, "Thursday, May 3, will mark the two-year anniversary of the day agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation came to the offices of this paper and left with unimpeachable documentation attesting to the fact that Mayor Vincenzo V. Anello took $40,000 from downtown developer 'Smokin' Joe' Anderson immediately before and just after being elected in 2003." The Reporter adds, "The FBI agents involved believed they had developed an airtight case. But the Justice Department began dragging its heels on the matter after Michael Battle was replaced by Terrance

DOJ_NMG_0123960

Flynn as Buffalo's U.S. Attorney in 2006. Investigators are frustrated by the delay, and one longtime FBI man requested and received a transfer off the task force in protest. By May 3…the campaign season will be in full swing," and "it's time for Flynn to either press charges or drop them, with the same sort of ballyhoo that attended the announcement of the investigation's beginning. To do any less would make the Justice Department guilty of perpetrating a gross injustice indeed."

Hackers Search For Computer Bugs For Bounties. The New York Times (1/30, Stone) reports, "Microsoft says its new operating system, Windows Vista, is the most secure in the company's history. Now the bounty hunters will test just how secure it is." The Times continues, "When its predecessor, Windows XP, was released five years ago, software bugs were typically hunted by hackers for fame and glory, not financial reward. But now software vulnerabilities — as with stolen credit-card numbers and spammable e-mail addresses — carry real financial value. They are commonly bought, sold and traded online, both by legitimate security companies, which say they are providing a service, and by nefarious hackers and thieves. … Vista, which will be installed on millions of new PCs starting today, provides the latest target." The Times adds, "This month, iDefense Labs, a subsidiary of the technology company VeriSign, said it was offering $8,000 for the first six researchers to find holes in Vista, and $4,000 more for the so-called exploit, the program needed to take advantage of the weakness. … IDefense sells such information to corporations and government agencies, which have already begun using Vista, so they can protect their own systems." The times notes, "Companies like Microsoft do not endorse such bounty programs, but they have even bigger problems: the willingness of Internet criminals to spend large sums for early knowledge of software flaws that could provide an opening for identity-theft schemes and spam attacks. … The Japanese security firm Trend Micro said in December that it had found a Vista flaw for sale on a Romanian Web forum for $50,000. Security experts say that the price is plausible, and that they regularly see hackers on public bulletin boards or private online chat rooms trying to sell the holes they have discovered, and the coding to exploit them. … Especially prized are so-called zero-day exploits, bits of disruption coding that spread immediately because there is no known defense."

Virginia Men Face Federal Charges For Peddling Phony Purses. The Washington Post (1/30, A1, Markon) reports, "They are known as 'purse parties,' modern-day Tupperware parties with a twist: hundreds of designer handbags selling for hundreds of dollars off. Women known as 'the purse ladies' run the gatherings at private homes. … 'They were all the rage,' said Peggy Stypula, an Alexandria resident who attended parties in Arlington and Fairfax counties. 'The purses were spread out all over the house, and you walked around and picked out what you wanted.' … But one partygoer in Northern Virginia suspected counterfeit couture and called police. Federal agents soon seized 30,000 purses from a Fairfax warehouse, including some from a tractor-trailer that pulled up during the search." The Post continues, "Now, prosecutors are taking to federal court the men they say provided phony merchandise. A father and son are scheduled to go on trial tomorrow in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, accused of supplying thousands of counterfeit handbags for the purse parties and also selling them at kiosks in malls throughout the Washington region, including Tysons Corner Center, Montgomery Mall and the Old Post Office Pavilion." The Post adds, "The trial in one of the nation's largest counterfeiting prosecutions will feature testimony from representatives of Gucci, Kate Spade and other leading designer labels, according to court documents. Exhibit A will be a sampling of hundreds of purses, hauled into the courtroom one box at a time. … The case is bringing scrutiny to a widespread problem that has been publicly visible for years: trafficking in handbags and other counterfeit goods. Shoppers in Washington and other major cities can find fake fancy designer purses on street vendor carts, but purse parties -- though perhaps more underground with the heightened law enforcement attention -- are still held in the suburbs. … Purse parties began in New York City 10 to 15 years ago and gradually spread, experts say. Some are advertised in the suburbs through mass e-mailings. Many who attend them believe they are getting either a good fake or stolen property, according to experts on counterfeiting."

WPost Examines Four DC Weekend Murders. The Washington Post (1/30, B1, Klein, Montes) reports, "In just five hours, one man was beaten to death with a baseball bat, another was slain during a dice game, a third was shot by an assailant after barricading himself in his bathroom, and the last was killed in a botched robbery." The Post continues, "It was a violent weekend in Washington, with four unrelated killings in three quadrants. Police have made one arrest -- in the baseball bat beating near the Shaw neighborhood. Detectives have not identified the victim. .. 'Any homicide in the city is one too many,' said Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D), appearing beside acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier in the 800 block of Yuma Street SE, where Kevin Vincent Bradshaw, 41, was slain after four men took his money. 'But four is unacceptable.'" The Post adds, "They pledged to redouble their efforts, forge stronger partnerships with federal agencies and work more closely with the community."

DOJ_NMG_0123961

Alleged Maryland Call Girl Found Dead Of Apparent Suicide Before Trial. The Washington Post (1/30, B1, Johnson) reports, "She was a former college professor who had lost almost everything -- her stellar academic reputation, her financial well-being and her anonymity in the swanky suburban neighborhood where she was accused of working as a high-priced prostitute." The Post continues, "With Brandy Britton's trial planned to start next week, the former University of Maryland Baltimore County professor apparently took her own life over the weekend, hanging herself in her living room, Howard County police say. A family member found the body Saturday afternoon. Police say they do not suspect foul play. … It was a grievous end to a life that friends and colleagues say was once filled with remarkable promise and ambition." The Post adds, "Britton, 43, was the first in her family to go to college, double-majoring in biology and sociology. Her first sociology professor, Sheila Cordray, told The Washington Post last year that Britton was 'ne of the brightest students I've ever had.' … The woman whose looks matched her intelligence may still have possessed the long, blond hair, the glossy pink lips and the glamorous figure of her youth. And she may have still projected the warm, friendly demeanor of a small-town girl from Oregon. … But she was facing the world's toughest truth: She had no idea who she was about to become. … Her trial date on four counts of prostitution -- which she had decided to fight in a jury trial instead of accepting a plea agreement -- was set for Monday. Police would get a chance to air their version of Brandy Britton: that in her $400,000 home at the end of a cul-de-sac where children ride Razor scooters and moms drive minivans with soccer decals, Britton had been selling herself as a call girl."

Warden Claims Florida Inmate Showed No Pain During Execution. The AP (1/30, Davis) reports from Tampa, FL, "A convicted killer whose execution was botched last year was never in any pain, and appeared to be straining to see a clock, not grimacing as some witnesses claimed, the warden told a panel reviewing Florida's lethal injection procedures Monday. … But the condemned man's lawyer said his client was clearly suffering from the incorrectly injected chemicals, and he mocked the notion that the inmate was looking at a clock. … 'What, was he late for an appointment? Come on, that's ridiculous,' said Angel Nieves Diaz's attorney, Neal Dupree, who also witnessed the execution and testified. 'I certainly thought he knew something was wrong.'" The AP continues, "Questions about whether lethal injection is inhumane have put executions on hold in nine U.S. states - Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio and South Dakota. … Diaz' death took 34 minutes - twice as long as usual - and required a rare second dose of lethal chemicals because the needles were incorrectly inserted, a medical examiner reported. An autopsy found chemical burns in both his arms. … Death penalty opponents point to Diaz's execution to support their claims that Florida's lethal injection procedure violates the U.S. Constitution's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. Condemned inmates have also pursued that issue in court, but to no avail."

Miami Herald Says FBI "Dropped The Ball" On Foley Emails. Under the headline "A Missed Warning," the Miami Herald (1/30, 286K) editorializes, "In refusing last summer to investigate the e-mails that former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley sent to a former congressional page, the FBI ignored its own child-safety guidelines, says a report from the Justice Department's inspector general. The Foley e-mails given to the FBI in July 2006 by a whistle-blower group didn't contain sexually explicit references, but their language indicated behavior that the FBI warns about in A Parent's Guide to Internet Safety on its website. The agency should review how it handles complaints about public officials." The Herald adds, "While the agency clearly has more-pressing duties in the era of terrorism than tracking congressmen with a penchant for befriending House pages, the FBI dropped the ball. … The FBI should take the Justice report's conclusions equally seriously."

DOJ_NMG_0123962

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Suit Alleges Boehringer Ingelheim Inflated Drug Prices. The AP (1/29) reports from Boston, "Federal prosecutors filed a lawsuit Monday against Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane Inc. and related entities, alleging that the pharmaceutical company inflated prices for several of its drugs." The AP continues, The U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston said it has intervened in a whistleblower lawsuit originally filed by a Florida company, Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc., and its principals. … In its suit, the U.S. Attorney's Office alleges that Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane engaged in a scheme to report fraudulent and inflated prices for several products, knowing that federal health care programs established reimbursement rates based on those reported prices." The AP adds, "Roxane, based in Columbus, Ohio, sells generic drugs that are reimbursed by Medicare and Medicaid, two federal health care programs. … The difference between the government reimbursement rates and the actual price paid by healthcare providers for a drug is referred to as the 'spread.' The larger the spread on a drug, the larger the profit for the provider. … The government claims that Roxane used artificially inflated spreads to market, promote and sell the drugs to existing and potential customers. Because reimbursement from federal programs was based on the fraudulent prices, prosecutors claim that Roxane caused false claims to be submitted to federal healthcare programs."

US Alleges Florida Lab Owner Bilked Medicare For $17 Million. The Sarasota (FL) Herald Tribune (1/29, Ruger) reports, "The owner of a Sarasota-based medical laboratory company altered patients' medical histories and bilked Medicare for $17 million over six years, federal officials say." The Tribune continues, "Joseph T. Degregorio, 49, the owner of Acculab Laboratories Inc., is in the Sarasota County jail, charged with child sexual battery, which could carry a life prison term. … It was uncovered during the three-year fraud investigation." The Tribune adds, "The investigation began in 2003, after a phlebotomist at Acculab became suspicious of the way the company told her to fill out Medicare forms, court records state. .. .The woman said she didn't have patient medical records, or know whether the patients had cancer, yet was told to enter a cancer diagnosis so the government would pay for the blood tests. … She filed a whistle-blower lawsuit detailing her experiences. The government is now leading the lawsuit, seeking at least $2.7 million in damages and penalties, with testimony of at least eight unnamed former employees and Medicare billing audits that show 80 percent of claims were unsubstantiated." The Tribune notes, "Degregorio also altered patients' permanent medical histories to reflect a diagnosis that didn't exist, such as prostate, breast or ovarian cancer, investigators say. Acculab shut its doors last year after federal agents raided the main office and seized truckloads of evidence. … Federal officials reviewed Acculab's Medicare records and found errors in 87 percent of the claims submitted in 2003, and 80 percent of claims from 2004."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

NAACP Seeks DOJ Probe Of New Orleans Police Shootings. The AP (1/30, Foster) reports from New Orleans, "Six of the seven police officers indicted in a deadly bridge shooting following Hurricane Katrina returned to work Monday, unarmed and in low-profile jobs, a development that an NAACP leader said erodes public confidence in the department. … 'The assurance that the officers will be assigned to desk duties does not allay that crisis in confidence,' Danatus King, president of the New Orleans branch of the NAACP, said at an afternoon news conference." The AP continues, "King said the NAACP has decided to ask the U.S. Attorney and the civil rights division of the Justice Department to investigate the shootings; and he said the decision to let the officers return to police jobs smacks of favoritism. … King said he worries that the officers will have access to police records and other information that might reveal the identities of witnesses that might testify against them. … 'None of them have access to the public or to sensitive records,' said Assistant Police Superintendent Marlon Defillo, who is in charge of the police Public Integrity Bureau." The AP adds, "U.S. Attorney Jim Letten confirmed receiving the letter from the NAACP Monday afternoon. His office, the Justice Department and the FBI have been monitoring the investigation, Letten said. He described that as routine."

Witnesses In Mississippi Voting Rights Case Say They Were Not Told To Discriminate. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (1/30, Gates) reports, "No one shaped their decision on how to count absentee ballots, including county Democratic Executive Committee head Ike Brown, black poll managers testified Monday in a trial alleging discrimination against white voters." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "The defense began putting on its case Monday in the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States where the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of attempting to discriminate against white voters." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "The first defense witness, Robin Mason, a poll manager during the Aug. 5, 2003, Democratic primary, said she saw black voters and white voters being assisted at the polls in the same manner. … Asked whether Ike Brown told her how to rule on absentee ballots, Mason replied, 'No.' … The government alleges Brown and those acting in concert with him have rejected absentee ballots cast by white voters on the grounds they were defective under state law while counting similar ballots cast by black voters. … 'No one instructed us how to go through the ballots,' Mason testified Monday when asked whether Brown had told them what to do." The Clarion-Ledger notes, "Attorneys for the Democratic Executive Committee, Brown and the Noxubee County Election Commission asked for the case to be dismissed after the government rested its case Monday. … U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee denied the request. … Before resting its case, the Justice Department recalled to the stand one of its witnesses who testified last week. … Nikki Nicole Halbert, who testified last week that she filed an absentee ballot but the signature on the envelope wasn't hers, said Monday she had been harassed and an attempt was made to get her to come back and change her earlier testimony. … Halbert said individuals came to her home and said 'Us blacks should stick together.' … A Justice Department attorney also told Lee another black witness refused to testify for the government because he had been intimidated."

DOJ_NMG_0123963

Judge Denies Bond For Seale. The Clarion-Ledger (1/30, Mitchell) reports, "Reputed Klansman James Ford Seale walked away in chains Monday after a judge ruled he must remain behind bars until he goes on trial on kidnapping and conspiracy charges in the 1964 killings of two African-American teenagers. Defense lawyers say they may appeal the decision," which "would result in a second bond hearing, this one in front of U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate, who is presiding over the trial, tentatively set for April 2. 'This is one of the most horrific crimes I've ever heard of,' argued Paige Fitzgerald, who works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington. … Because he faces a possible life sentence if convicted, 'There's no incentive for him to stay,' she said." The AP (1/30) also briefly reports on the ruling.

Editorial Lauds Cold-Case Efforts, Legislation. The Kalamazoo Gazette (MI) (1/30) editorializes, "Some Americans may not be interested in stories about prosecuting aging suspects in murders that took place decades ago. … Fortunately, federal authorities don't share that view, especially in cases that have sprung from the civil rights movements of the 1960s." The Gazette continues, "Last week in Mississippi, the FBI arrested 71-year-old James F. Seale, a former sheriff's deputy and alleged ex-member of the Ku Klux Klan. Seale was indicted in Jackson, and will face kidnapping charges in connection with the brutal killing of two 19-year-old black men in 1964. … Age should be no barrier in prosecuting, to the full extent of the law, people accused of such crimes. … Charges against Seale have drawn attention to other unsolved cases. A bill now in Congress would create a cold-cases unit in the Justice Department to track down unpunished civil rights-era killers. … Such legislation is appropriate."

DOJ Names Las Vegas As Major Human Trafficking Destination. The Las Vegas Sun (1/30, Skolnik) reports, "The federal government believes Las Vegas is a top destination for 'human trafficking' victims - from indentured servants to massage parlor workers and prostitutes held captive and forced to commit sex acts." The Sun continues, "This belief has led the Justice Department to grant hundreds of thousands of dollars to Metro Police to tackle the problem. … But first, the Anti Trafficking League Against Slavery (ATLAS), an office within Metro that opened last month, needs to try to answer a basic question: Is there a human-trafficking problem here, and if so, how big is it?" The Sun adds, "Terri Miller, ATLAS's civilian director and long one of the top Nevada activists against the sexual exploitation of women and children, and her boss, Metro Capt. Terry Lesney, say the need for the group is clear: There is a 'huge' and growing sex-oriented trafficking problem in Las Vegas. … Yet they quickly add that no statistics have ever been gathered and law enforcers never before have made it a top priority - so the scope of the problem still needs to be determined." The Sun notes, "Police in the past haven't paid sufficient attention to the signs that the prostitutes or others they're investigating may also be trafficking victims, they say - meaning the problem has gone underreported for years. … Miller says the problem has been made worse by Las Vegas' aggressive advertising promotions that encourage tourists to come here and sin all they like. … ATLAS was formed as an extension of the ad hoc Nevada Human Trafficking Task Force, an interagency group set up by the U.S. attorney's office in Las Vegas in 2004. … Between 17,000 and 20,000 people are trafficked into the United States annually, according to State Department estimates. Of those, it is unknown how many are brought to Nevada. … Rarely have defendants in Las Vegas been prosecuted as human traffickers, Lesney says, though there is a tough federal law passed in 2000 and even newer state laws that target those crimes. Until this month, she said, Metro didn't even have a booking code for alleged human trafficking violators."

DOJ_NMG_0123964

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Decision On Mittal Steel Still Up In Air. The West Virginia State Journal (1/30, Echemann) reports, "The Department of Justice had given Mittal Steel only until Sunday to rid itself of a canadian tin producer. … But Monday, there's still no word on what the Justice Department intends to do." The Journal continues, "A spokesman for the department said he did not expect an announcement for a few days. They are waiting on a district court to issue a final judgement in the case. They get five days after that. … As Mittal grew with buyouts, they ran into problems for having too much control over the tin market. The Justice Department doesn't like to see monopolies, and it told Mittal to get rid of one of three plants. … Now that list has been narrowed down to plant at Weirton and Sparrows Point near Baltimore." The Journal adds, "Weirton has appeared to be the likely candidate since Independent Steelworkers Union has said it would welcome a sale. … The two interested buyers are Esmark -- the former Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Co. -- and a man named Mitch Hecht, a former executive for International Steel Group."

FTC Approves Bridgestone Acquisition Of Bandag. The AP (1/30) reports, "Bridgestone Americas Holding Inc.'s $1 billion acquisition of Bandag Inc., a retread tire maker, on Monday received early approval from federal regulators." The AP continues, "The Federal Trade Commission ended a required 30-day waiting period for the acquisition ahead of schedule, Bandag said in a prepared statement. The 30-day period was not scheduled to end until Feb. 8, the company said. … Early terminations are not granted unless both the FTC and the Justice Department's antitrust division have completed their reviews and decided against taking any enforcement actions, the FTC says on its Web site." The AP adds, "Bridgestone Americas Holding, the U.S. subsidiary of Japan-based Bridgestone Corp., the largest tire and rubber company in the world, announced Dec. 5 that it would acquire Bandag for $50.75 per share in cash, or $1.05 billion. … Bandag said the acquisition remains subject to shareholder and other regulatory approvals. Bridgestone's American depository shares rose 50 cents to close at $42.90, while shares of Bandag increased 10 cents to close at $50.75 on the New York Stock Exchange."

Microsoft Launches Marketing Campaign For Vista. The New York Times (1/30, Lohr) reports, "Microsoft's power in the technology industry, some analysts insist, is waning. It faces a host of rivals from a reinvigorated Apple on the desktop to Web-based challengers like Google, delivering services and software online. … But yesterday, on the eve of the arrival of new models of Microsoft's flagship products, the Windows operating system and the Office programs, the skeptics were overshadowed and drowned out by the opening salvos in the software giant's marketing campaign." The Times continues, "Windows Vista and Office 2007 start appearing today, available in retail stores as a shrink-wrapped package and shipped on new machines sold by personal computer makers. The new Microsoft offerings were available to large corporate customers at the end of November. … Steven A. Ballmer, the company's chief executive, called today 'the biggest product launch in Microsoft's history,' and the rollout will be backed by a first-year marketing budget of hundreds of millions of dollars." The Times adds, "New versions of Windows and Office move across the technology industry like a powerful weather system, driving sales of personal computers and other hardware, software and services. The pace is typically gradual but steady, yet the impact on the rest of the industry is significant. … Over 5,000 software and hardware products are ready to run on Vista, and Microsoft has more than 500,000 industry partners worldwide, including resellers, retailers and consultants as well as hardware and software companies. Millions of developers write programs that run on Windows. … For every dollar Microsoft makes on Windows Vista, the rest of the industry will collect $18 of revenue, estimates IDC, a technology research firm. Indeed, those that build products and services on top of and around Microsoft's technology constitute an industry ecosystem that business professors have studied. And Microsoft's long investment in nurturing that network of mutual support, they say, is a major reason that Windows holds more than 90 percent of the market for PC operating systems."

DOJ_NMG_0123965

Delta Open To Future Deals Despite Resistance To US Airways Bid. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A3, Dade) reports, "Delta Air Lines Inc. has assured creditors that it won't rule out the possibility of merging with another airline after exiting from bankruptcy if it defeats a hostile takeover offer from US Airways Group Inc., according to people familiar with the situation." The Journal continues, "To build support for its plan to remain independent, Delta appears close to agreeing with its official creditors committee on several provisions designed to clear a path toward an eventual tie-up. The parties are moving toward an accord to exclude from Delta's new corporate charter and bylaws any so-called poison pill that could pose an insurmountable hurdle to future mergers, according to one person familiar with the discussions." The Journal adds, "In addition, the committee would have a strong hand in selecting Delta's post-bankruptcy board, according to knowledgeable people. The creditors committee wants a board that favors consolidation as a strategic option, people close to the board have said. … Delta, based in Atlanta, had been reluctant to grant some of the concessions, but in recent weeks the committee made it clear that it required them as a condition for approving Delta's standalone plan over the US Airways merger." The Journal notes, "Delta's apparent willingness to consider a future deal could breathe life back into widespread hopes for an industry consolidation wave, which airline observers thought could be dashed if the US Airways-Delta merger failed. Airlines are looking for partners in an effort to reduce the number of seats in the air, lower operating costs and gain greater pricing power."

Time May Be Running Out For Airline Deal. CNNMoney.com (1/30, Isidore) reports, "Time could be running out on US Airways Group's hostile bid for Delta Air Lines and with it much of the talk about consolidation within the airline industry." CNNMoney continues, "Industry experts say the recent retreat in airline stock prices, despite some strong financial results, is attributable at least partly to the growing belief among investors that the US Air bid for Delta isn't winning the necessary support of Delta creditors as it faces deadlines this week and next. … And just as it was US Air's hostile bid for Delta in November that sparked talk of a round of industry consolidation involving AMR unit American Airlines, UAL unit United Airlines, Continental Airlines and Northwest Airlines, many experts now believe that the merger talk will again quiet down without a US Air-Delta deal shaking up the industry status quo. … 'You only have two guys, United and US Air, who are advocating consolidation,' said airline consultant Michael Boyd. 'Everyone else thinks it's a dumb idea. It's different if they get forced into something. But I don't think anyone else wants to do a deal.'"

Delta Pilots Make Their Presence Known. The New York Times (1/30, Bailey) reports, "The remarkable turnaround of the airline industry has rewarded investors with rising share prices, and the $9.87 billion price tag that US Airways Group is offering for Delta Air Lines in a hostile takeover bid is further proof that the industry is again in favor with investors and lenders. … With most of the industry returning to profitability — in part by extracting billions of dollars of pay cuts from workers — pilots are demanding that they should recoup some of the pay and other benefits they gave up in recent years and share in the improved fortunes. The pilots' agenda is playing an important role in the merger talks over Delta. The Delta pilots have backed management's stand-alone plan to exit bankruptcy, and are jointly fighting the US Airways bid." The Times continues, "In all, the Delta pilots have $2.1 billion in claims. … The pilots are motivated to support management in part by self-interest — they believe that they would have less job security under US Airways ownership. And that support could be persuasive when the pilots next want something from Delta management. … They, in fact, accepted a slightly lower price in selling several hundred million dollars in bankruptcy claims so that they could hang onto the voting rights those claims represented to provide maximum support to management's plan, according to people familiar with the pilots' dealings." The Times adds, "Delta pilots are counting on the unusual contract they negotiated in bankruptcy to help them recoup their most recent 13 percent pay cut over the next three years by helping the airline achieve certain performance improvements. They also could win profit-sharing bonuses on top of that. … US Airways was asked over the weekend by some Delta creditors to again raise its bid. The airline has been frustrated because the official creditors committee in Delta's bankruptcy, the only party that can force Delta to allow due diligence by US Airways and otherwise get the merger talks started, has been silent. … So, according to a person involved in the talks, US Airways management set the following conditions: if the official creditors committee would tell Delta by Thursday to allow due diligence, to also make a filing starting antitrust review of the proposed merger, and postpone a hearing on Delta's stand-alone plan to exit bankruptcy, then US Airways management would take to its board a proposal to increase its bid by another $1 billion. It did not officially raise its bid." … Yesterday, there were talks among creditors but no word from the official committee, this person said."

DOJ_NMG_0123966

Merrill Lynch To Purchase First Republic. The Financial Times (1/30, Wighton) reports, "Merrill Lynch on Monday underlined the lure of the rich for Wall Street banks by paying $1.8bn for First Republic, a California-based private bank and wealth management company." The Times continues, "In its biggest acquisition in 10 years, Merrill is paying a 44 per cent premium for First Republic, which will retain its name as a separate business within Merrill Lynch Bank & Trust. … The deal highlights the high prices big banks are prepared to offer to expand in the fast-growing business of serving the US's ultra-rich. In November, Bank of America paid Charles Schwab 30 times 2006 earnings for its US Trust private banking unit and other US and overseas banks are looking to buy in the sector."

The New York Times/Bloomberg (1/30) reports, "First Republic, which has 43 branches and specializes in mortgages on luxury homes, gives Merrill more wealthy customers who might buy brokerage services. … 'Luxury lending and wealth management, those are higher-end customers,' said Steve Roukis, managing director at Matrix Asset Advisors. of New York. 'It's a continuation of their strategy to focus on their core business and either build or acquire whatever gives them a better return on their cost of capital.' … Merrill, based in New York, said it expects the transaction to add modestly to earnings by the end of 2008."

Citigroup To Purchase British Bank. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, C16, Mollenkamp, McDonald) reports, "Citigroup Inc.'s £575 million ($1.13 billion) purchase of Egg Banking PLC from Prudential PLC," one of Britain's largest insurers, "sets the stage for the U.S. financial-services company to step up its battle in the British credit-card market against entrenched banks such as Barclays PLC and Bank of America Corp. For Prudential…the transaction is part of a broad review of its United Kingdom business." The deal, "which is expected to close by April pending regulatory approval, gives Citigroup access to online bank Egg's three million customers, 2.9 million of whom are Egg card customers. Before this deal, Citigroup had just 800,000 card customers in the U.K. Egg's share totals about 5.7% of U.K. credit-card outstanding balances.

The New York Times (1/30, Dash) reports Citigroup agreed yesterday to buy British online bank Egg Banking. The agreement is "the latest in a series of small deals to expand" Citigroup's "retail presence abroad." The acquisition will allow Citigroup to "quadruple its number of credit card customers…and broaden its reach by the use of an Internet site to open savings accounts and mortgages in a country where it has five retail branches. But at a time when the British banking sector has been hurt by a barrage of bad loans and bankruptcies, some analysts are questioning the deal." The Times adds that Egg, "which was among the first online banks when it was established in 1998, has struggled as of late."

Lawmakers Push For Bank Ownership Limits. The AP (1/30, Gordon) reports a group of House lawmakers Monday "renewed a push for legislation that would block commercial companies like Wal-Mart and Home Depot from owning a special sort of bank that has been proliferating in recent years." The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.'s "six-month halt on new approvals of companies' applications to establish or acquire the banks known as industrial loan corporations ends Wednesday," and the agency's directors are meeting that day "to consider whether to extend it, lift it or take other action." Extending the moratorium "would give the new Congress a chance to consider the legislation."

EU To Threaten Banks, Credit Card Firms With Anti-Competition Fines. Bloomberg (1/30, Newman, Rega) reports, "European Union regulators will threaten banks and credit card companies with potential fines for blocking competition, according to a draft of a report to be delivered this week." Bloomberg continues, "The European Commission, the EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, may probe banks and payment card providers for colluding on prices and using practices aimed at keeping competitors out of their markets, the regulator said in a draft summary obtained by Bloomberg News. The report doesn't identify any companies. … The EU agency 'will not hesitate to exercise its powers of enforcement' under antitrust rules 'to ensure that the competition rules are respected in retail banking,' the 10-page summary said. The commission will release the report on Jan. 31." Bloomberg adds, "The regulator, which can fine companies as much as 10 percent of worldwide sales for antitrust violations, already has challenged how transaction fees are set by Visa International Inc. and MasterCard Inc., the two biggest credit-card networks. … Disputes with Visa and MasterCard have centered on fees paid between banks that are known as interchange. When a consumer pays with a card, the retailer's bank pays the interchange to the consumer's bank. MasterCard and Visa don't collect the fee. Rather, they set guidelines on what banks should charge each other, unless the banks agree otherwise."

DOJ_NMG_0123967

Amaranth's Rivals Profited From Its Collapse. In a front-page story, the Wall Street Journal (1/30, A1, Davis, Zuckerman, Sender) reports, "When Amaranth LLC collapsed in the fall, after swiftly losing more than $6 billion, it was the biggest hedge-fund failure ever. Now as investors slowly get back what's left of their money, it's becoming clear the debacle also had some big winners: other players in the high-stakes energy market who profited from a crippled rival's travails." The "Amaranth case shows how Wall Street dealt with a fund after it had traded its way into a deep hole. Information the fund revealed about its holdings as it grasped for a lifeline let other commodity-market players, Wall Street firms included, exploit its positions. As they drove prices relentlessly against Amaranth, its losses swelled, and instead of facing a big but possibly survivable setback, it collapsed." The "case also reflects an incentive structure in the world of hedge funds that can tempt some to assume heavy risk."

Patent And Trademark Office Seeking New Examiners. The Washington Post's (1/30, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The US Patent and Trademark Office" plans "to hire 1,200 examiners for each of the next five years," at an "average starting salary [of] about $62,000, and electrical engineers and computer engineers may qualify for an $8,800 signing bonus because the PTO has a hard time recruiting in those fields." The Post adds, "In recent months, the PTO has been swamped with patent applications, for such things as computer software, cellphones and interactive videos, and could face a backlog of 800,000 cases before year's end," according to John J. Doll, the commissioner of patents." The Post notes that the "PTO is in competition with the private sector to hire college graduates and others with degrees in engineering and science" and "as part of its employment package, PTO pays retention bonuses to keep electrical and computer engineers from going to the private sector" and "tries to be a family-friendly employer, giving some leeway to examiners on when they start their work each day…"

ENVIRONMENT:

Climate Change Efforts Gaining Momentum In Congress. USA Today (1/30, Watson, 2.27M) reports, "After years of being on Congress' back burner, global warming will be a focus of the new Democratic majority trying to follow cities and states that have tackled the issue. Today, the Senate holds its first global warming hearing of the year." The Environment and Public Works Committee, which is holding the hearing, is "headed by Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., who has been named an environmental 'champion' by groups such as the League of Conservation Voters. She takes over from Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., who once called global warming a 'hoax.'" And "House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., plans to form a special committee to study global warming and energy independence. She directed House committees to pass global warming bills by July 4." However, "[i]t is far from a given that Congress will pass strict legislation to address global warming." Inhofe "has vowed to block any bills calling for mandatory actions by industry to curb greenhouse gas emissions. Breaking that freeze would take the approval of 60 senators."

Ban Mulls Summit Of World Leaders On Greenhouse Gases. The Financial Times (1/30, Harvey, Daniel, Aglionby) reports, "Plans for an emergency summit of world leaders to break the international impasse on cutting greenhouse gases are being discussed by Ban Ki-moon, United Nations secretary-general. At the summit, mooted for September, heads of state would discuss the possibility of a successor to the Kyoto protocol on climate change, the main provisions of which expire in 2012." Ban "has chosen to stake some political capital on climate change, surprising US president George W. Bush by raising it at their meeting two weeks ago." Bush "is the leader most likely to decline" a summit invitation. He "has shunned mandatory caps on emissions, and officials have dismissed hopes of the US engaging in discussions about a post-Kyoto accord."

DOJ_NMG_0123968

UN Climate Change Panel Set To Issue Report. The New York Times (1/30, Kanter, Revkin, 1.16M) reports, "Scientists from across the world gathered Monday to hammer out the final details of an authoritative report on climate change that is expected to project centuries of rising temperatures and sea levels unless there are curbs in emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases that trap heat in the atmosphere." The "report is the fourth since 1990 from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, which is overseen by the United Nations. The report, several of the authors said, will describe a growing body of evidence that warming is likely to cause a profound transformation of the planet."

BP Faces Expanding Criminal Probe Over Texas Refinery Problems. Bloomberg (1/30, Calkins, Fisk) reports, "BP Plc is facing a growing federal investigation into possible criminal environmental and safety violations at its Texas refinery, where a 2005 explosion killed 15 workers, lawyers suing the company said." Bloomberg continues, "The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has joined a federal investigation begun in October by the U.S. attorney in Houston, the lawyers said. Five Washington-based representatives of the Justice Department, the EPA and the Federal Bureau of Investigations went to Texas this month to meet attorneys for workers hurt in the blast, a victims' lawyer at the meeting said. … 'They were looking at anything and everything we had,' said attorney Joseph Gourrier, whose firm represents 150 injured workers suing BP. 'They are looking for things that can be used to bring criminal charges against the upper management of BP, both at the refinery site and further up the company.'" Bloomberg adds, "The multiagency investigation represents an expansion of the government's probe into London-based BP, Europe's second-largest oil company. The Texas City explosion, one of the worst industrial accidents in recent U.S. history, spurred more than 1,700 lawsuits, a record $21 million fine by the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration and a finding by the U.S. Chemical Safety Board that BP endangered workers by cutting costs. …BP, which has set aside $1.6 billion to resolve the lawsuits, has settled more than 1,200 claims, including all the death suits. BP acknowledged safety shortcomings at the plant."

Court Invalidates Salmon Rider In Appropriations Bill. The Hill (1/30, Schor) reports, "On paper, the debate deals with swimming salmon and spilling water. … But in Congress, the federal court decision that last week invalidated a rider written by Senate Appropriations Committee member Larry Craig (R-Idaho) threatens to upend the influential panel's authority." The Hill continues, "The unanimous ruling allows a small group of salmon-watchers to stay on the job while reminding appropriators of a hard truth they rarely acknowledge: Earmarks included in report language, but not bill text, do not have the force of law. … Craig was so aggravated in 2005 at what he deemed biased reporting by the Portland-based Fish Passage Center that he moved to eliminate its $1.3 million budget through an Appropriations Committee report. Several local groups filed suit against Craig's effort, and the longtime appropriations cardinal said their victory last Wednesday would set a worrisome example for future challenges to appropriations decisions. … 'It's very significant,' Craig said in an interview. 'We've always viewed report language as having the force of law.'" The Hill adds, "Sen. Thad Cochran (Miss.), the senior Appropriations Republican, declined to judge the case definitively until the Justice Department decides whether to pursue an appeal to the Supreme Court. But he said 'it may be that [the decision] is wrong. … Report language explains the intent of Congress in appropriating money and limits on the use of funds,' Cochran said. '[It has] been effective in explaining what Congress intended. We will stay tuned, because this story may not be over yet.'" The Hill notes, "During the earmark-transparency debate that briefly imperiled the Senate's ethics bill this month, lawmakers acknowledged that federal agencies are not required to follow instructions made only in appropriations reports that have all the weight of 'sending a note from your sister,' as Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) put it. Yet agencies still remain loyal to the appropriators who fund them, making the court decision a triumph for fiscal watchdog groups."

Yosemite Suit May Affect Public Access To Park. The AP (1/30, Burke) reports from Yosemite National Park in California, "The plunging waterfalls and soaring crags chiseled by the Merced River draw millions of visitors each year, but the crowds are precisely what threatens the waterway and the park. … Efforts to safeguard the Merced have spawned a court battle over the future of development in Yosemite National Park's most popular stretch. The case may come down to the challenge facing all of America's parks: Should they remain open to everyone, or should access be limited in the interest of protecting them?" The AP continues, "In November, a federal judge barred crews from finishing $60 million in construction projects in Yosemite Valley, siding with a small group of environmentalists who sued the federal government, saying further commercial development would bring greater numbers of visitors, thus threatening the Merced's fragile ecosystem. … The government is appealing, fearing the ruling could force the National Park Service to limit the number of people allowed into Yosemite each day, a precedent it doesn't want to see echoed in other parks." The AP adds, "The case has Yosemite's most loyal advocates sharply divided over how to balance preservation with access to public lands. Even environmentalists can't agree on how to minimize the human footprint - some believe cars should be kept out entirely; others say visitors should have to make reservations in advance. … Park spokesman Scott Gediman called the plaintiffs a 'fringe group' pushing a radical agenda. … Well-known conservation groups like the Sierra Club and Nature Conservancy aren't directly involved in the fight, though the Sierra Club was among more than 60 organizations that signed a legal brief supporting an earlier version of the suit."

DOJ_NMG_0123969

Proposal To Drop Gray Wolves From Protection May Spark Legal Challenge. USA Today (1/30, 3A, O'Driscoll) reports from Denver, "The gray wolf, hunted to near-extinction in the last century, has rebounded so well in six states that it can now be taken off the endangered species list, federal wildlife officials said Monday." USA continues, "Federal protection for about 4,000 gray wolves in three western Great Lakes states -- northern parts of Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan -- will end in about a month, the Fish and Wildlife Service announced. … Plans to do the same in Montana, Idaho and Wyoming probably will take the rest of this year, service director H. Dale Hall said. A formal proposal, with public hearings and a two-month comment period, will be published this week." USA adds, "Two wildlife advocacy groups — the Defenders of Wildlife and Sinapu, a Colorado-based wolf advocacy group — warned they might sue to prevent taking wolves in the Rockies off the endangered list. Another group, the Center for Biological Diversity, claims the proposal will 'end in the mass killing of wolves.' … The groups contend that state management of wolves in the Rockies will do too little to maintain the animal's remarkable recovery since the mid-1990s, when 66 wild wolves from Canada were released in Yellowstone National Park and central Idaho. The population has mushroomed to more than 1,200 today." USA notes, "Hunters say wolves compete for elk, deer and other game. Ranchers complain they kill too many livestock. An anti-wolf group, Friends of the Northern Yellowstone Elk Herd, says it plans to sue to remove endangered status immediately. … Dropping federal protection would make states responsible for managing the wolf population. They could allow hunting and lethal control as long as at least 10 wolf packs and 100 animals remain in each state."

NYTimes Says Bush Fuel Economy Proposal Promises Only Hypothetical Results. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/30, 1.16M), writes, "Except for minor tweaks, Congress has refused to raise fuel efficiency requirements or close a gaping loophole that lets S.U.V.'s and pickups be measured by a more lenient standard." Those who heard Bush's State of the Union address "can be forgiven for thinking he was finally ready to change that." But all he "really asked for was the authority to set mileage standards in a different way." Bush "asked the country to take it on faith that this new measurement system, combined with technological advances, would lead to annual mileage improvements of 4 percent a year." Sen. Barack Obama "plans to reintroduce a bill that would set a 4 percent annual increase in efficiency as a target, just what Mr. Bush says he wants." The "bill could be an important first step. It commands some bipartisan support, and unlike Mr. Bush's approach, it promises real as opposed to hypothetical results."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In San Diego, 4 Drug Suspects Extradited From Mexico Plead Not Guilty. The AP (1/30, Hoffman) reports, "Four Mexican drug traffickers who were extradited to the U.S. this month pleaded not guilty Monday to an array of federal drug charges. They include brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, top figures in the Arellano Felix drug cartel, based in Tijuana, Mexico. A court-appointed defender entered not guilty pleas on their behalf to charges of racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges stemming from a sweeping 2003 indictment that named 11 people." The judge "ordered all four held without bail pending a detention hearing Thursday." There are more than 70 media references to the suspects' pleas. News outlets that used the AP story include FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, San Jose Mercury News, Houston Chronicle, Miami Herald, Fort Worth Star Telegram, and KLTV-TV, Longview Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0123970

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/29) reported that the others in court included Jesus Hector Palma Salazar, who authorities "say left the Arellano cartel and went on to lead the rival Sinaloa drug cartel. He was indicted in San Diego in 1995 on charges of conspiring to import and distribute a ton of cocaine. The fourth man in court was Jose Albert Marquez, indicted in 2002 on drug charges, but also suspected of being the Arellano Felix cartel's link to the Mexican Mafia prison gang."

Man Described As Juárez Cartel "Gatekeeper" Faces Charges In US. The El Paso (TX) Times (1/29) reported a man "identified as a 'gatekeeper' for the Juárez cartel and two other alleged members of the drug ring are among the drug lords extradited last weekend by Mexico to face charges in the United States. … Drug Enforcement Administration head Karen Tandy said during a press conference this week that the group included Gracielo Gardea Carrasco, 'a gatekeeper who was responsible for controlling drug smuggling across the border for the Juárez cartel.' … Gardea was indicted in Midland in 2000 on drug conspiracy charges for allegedly smuggling marijuana from Mexico to a Midland gang known as 'Los Tres de la Sierra,' or the three from the mountain."

Seven Puerto Rican Doctors Accused Of Participating In Internet Pharmacy Scheme. The AP (1/30) reports seven Puerto Rican doctors "have been indicted…in connection with an Internet scheme that allegedly dispensed controlled substances without a legitimate medical purpose. The physicians were accused of working with Internet pharmacies that solicited customers seeking drugs such as the addictive painkiller hydrocodone and appetite suppressant phentermine, according to a statement from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. … The alleged scheme started in 2003." Australia's Sydney Morning Herald and The Age used the AP story.

Convicted Drug-Ring Members To Be Sentenced In Kentucky. The Grayson County (KY) News Gazette (1/29) reports sentencing "has been set for April in Owensboro federal court for [three] members of a drug ring that delivered and sold marijuana and methamphetamine in Texas, Kentucky and Indiana totaling over $2.7 million. … The case was initiated when Louisville Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agents received information from the San Antonio, Tex. DEA office that drug traffickers in Texas were transporting loads of marijuana to an individual residing in Owensboro. … Over 1,100 pounds of marijuana was transported from February 2003 through April 2005. The conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine involved over 3 pounds."

Authorities Say Smuggling Tunnels Under US-Mexico Border Remain Unfilled. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Marosi) reports seven of the largest tunnels "discovered under the U.S.-Mexico border in recent years have yet to be filled in, authorities said, raising concerns they could be reused for smuggling people or drugs. Among them is the longest tunnel yet found — extending nearly half a mile from San Diego to Tijuana. Nearby, another sophisticated passage once known as the Taj Mahal of tunnels has been sitting unfilled for 13 years. … Because of overlapping jurisdictions among federal border agencies, the responsibility for subterranean work was unclear for years. The Border Patrol and the Drug Enforcement Administration each had some responsibility. After the Department of Homeland Security was created in 2003, the responsibility for filling tunnels was assigned to one agency: Customs and Border Protection."

Supporters Seek To Change Montana's Medical Marijuana Law. The AP (1/29) reported Rep. Ron Erickson said Montana's medical marijuana law "needs to be changed to let patients grow more plants and posses more marijuana. … He also told a House committee on Monday that the law needs to be changed to allow those registered with the state to have six 'mature' marijuana plants, rather than just six plants. More young plants are needed to replace old ones that die, he argued." Erickson's measure "was supported by those behind the 2004 initiative that voters approved with 62 percent of the vote. … The House Judiciary Committee did not take immediate action on the bill."

Seattle-Based US Marshal Resigns. The AP (1/30) reports, "Seattle-based U.S. Marshal Eric Robertson, who oversaw security at the new federal courthouse downtown and led efforts to round up fugitives and sex offenders in Western Washington, is resigning to become the administrator of a fire district." The AP continues, "His deputies worked with local authorities to help track down and arrest more than 3,000 suspects in 36 states and eight foreign countries during his five-year tenure. He also created a new unit to deal with threats to judges after Seattle police shot and killed a man who brandished a defused grenade in the courthouse lobby in June 2005. … His resignation, announced in an interview with The Associated Press on Monday, takes effect in March. His chief deputy at the Seattle U.S. marshal's office, 22-year veteran David Miller, is expected to be named his acting replacement until a new marshal is confirmed by the Senate. … 'Our focus has really been on crimes of violence, weapons, sex offenders - go out, work with the locals and to find out who are the bad actors in their community,' Robertson said." The AP adds, "In his new position, Robertson, 43, will oversee the creation of a fire district covering 65,000 people in Auburn, Algona and Pacific, northeast of Tacoma. The joint fire authority was established by voters last November. Robertson lives in eastern Pierce County and represented the area in the Legislature for two terms in the 1990s. … Among the accomplishments of his office, Robertson cites the 2003 arrest of Jesus C. Mezquia, who was later convicted in the rape and strangulation of rising punk rock star Mia Zapata, whose body was found in Seattle's Central Area in 1993. Marshals Service deputies from Seattle located Mezquia in the Florida Keys after DNA evidence linked him to the crime. … Along with former U.S. Attorney John McKay, who resigned earlier this month and took a job teaching law at Seattle University, Robertson also helped boost the presence of federal law enforcement in rapidly growing southwest Washington, much to the relief of local authorities there. He opened an office in Clark County - where federal prosecutors have made a point of going after felons found with weapons - and stationed a deputy there permanently."

DOJ_NMG_0123971

Florida Legislature Criticized For Easing Gun Laws. The New York Times (1/30, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Twenty years ago, the Florida Legislature cravenly decided to allow 'law abiding' citizens to carry concealed weapons merely by declaring their preference for self-defense. Then last July, at the prodding of the gun lobby, the current crop of state lawmakers proved they could be even more corrupt and cowardly than their predecessors by deciding to make the list of gun-toting Floridians a secret." But the Florida Sun-Sentinel has "given residents of the state a final look at their representatives' gruesome handiwork. When the law was first enacted, there were fewer than 25,000 licensed gun holders. Since then, the state roll has boomed to 410,000 and counting." The paper also laid "bare the fact that more than 1,400 people easily got gun licenses despite pleading guilty or no contest to felonies that included manslaughter, burglary and child molestation."

IMMIGRATION:

Coalition Optimistic About Immigrant Farm Worker Overhaul. The Hill (1/30, Swanson) reports a "coalition of groups representing farm workers and employers says those it represents have the best opportunity in years to win congressional approval of legislation overhauling immigration rules for migrant workers, either as a stand-alone bill or part of a wider immigration bill." Supporters "say their optimism springs from the combination of Democrats controlling Congress and rising pressure on lawmakers representing agricultural districts to alleviate a farm laborer shortage as increasing momentum for the Agriculture Jobs Opportunity and Benefits Act (AgJOBS)." Craig Regelbrugge of the Agriculture Coalition for Immigration Reform "sees two possible scenarios for AgJOBS this year. The bill could become part of a wider immigration overhaul, similar to what happened when Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) added the bill in an amendment to immigration legislation passed by the Senate last year." But Regelbrugge "said a scaled-down package for agriculture might still be able to move through Congress given support for the bill from farm employers and workers."

Seven Border Tunnels Yet To Be Filled In. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, A1, Marosi, 850K) reports, "Seven of the largest tunnels discovered under the U.S.-Mexico border in recent years have yet to be filled in, authorities said, raising concerns they could be reused for smuggling people or drugs." Among them "is the longest tunnel yet found — extending nearly half a mile from San Diego to Tijuana. Nearby, another sophisticated passage once known as the Taj Mahal of tunnels has been sitting unfilled for 13 years, authorities say." Though "concrete plugs usually close off the tunnels where they cross under the border and at main entrance and exit points, the areas in between remain largely intact. Filling the seven tunnels would cost about $2.7 million, according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials." But "accessing tunnels that run under private property is also a problem, as is a lack of coordination with Mexican authorities."

DOJ_NMG_0123972

TAX:

US Settles Tax Prosecution Claims With Texas Attorney. The San Antonio Express-News (1/30, Robbins) reports, "Already stung by its failure to convict a defense lawyer despite years of investigation, the federal government has agreed to pay the San Antonio attorney $1.34 million to settle claims that revenue agents maliciously targeted him." The Express-News continues, "The settlement finalized last week effectively ends more than six years of legal feuding, which began when Alan Brown's office manager fell for a cocaine smuggler and, in an effort to win her lover leniency, told federal agents that Brown routinely cheated on his taxes." The Express-News adds, "The government did not admit to any fault in its part of the compromise, but Brown counted the agreement among the multiple legal victories he and his lawyers won en route to his 2005 acquittal on tax-evasion charges. .. The 63-year-old attorney said he considered himself lucky to squeeze any compensation from the government, but he described the sum as a small measure of justice compared with the financial and emotional costs of the prosecution. … 'According to the terms of the deal, Brown will split the money with his wife, lawyer Jean Brown, who also was indicted before the government dropped the charges, and his firm, including partner Jay Norton. … Claiming investigators distorted evidence and relentlessly targeted them, the lawyers' lawsuit had forced the government to disclose more than it typically reveals about prosecutions." The Express-News notes, "Julie Zatz, assistant chief of the civil division there, declined to detail the reasons for settling the case but said they had nothing to do with allegations of investigative misconduct."

WSJournal Critical Of Reliance On "Tax Gap." The Wall Street Journal (1/30, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "When something sounds too good to be true, it usually is. So now is an apt time to deconstruct the much-discussed 'tax gap,' that mythical golden goose that the Beltway political class is counting on to fund its spending agenda." The "tax gap" is "the difference between what the Internal Revenue Service thinks taxpayers should be paying and what it collects. The IRS currently estimates this at about $290 billion a year. Ask any Congressional chairman how he intends to close the deficit, expand the Medicare drug benefit, reform the Alternative Minimum Tax or subsidize college education, and the answer is invariably 'close the tax gap.'" But "all voluntary tax compliance systems have their limits. Under today's tax code, the only way the feds can raise compliance is to place extraordinary burdens on taxpayers."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

In Midst Of "Export Boom," Bush To Promote New Trade Deals. The Washington Post (1/30, D1, Goodman, Henderson, 690K) reports, "The United States is in the midst of an export boom, with foreign sales chipping away at the country's enormous trade deficit while providing a modest cushion against the declining housing market. In the first 11 months of 2006, U.S. exports reached $1.31 trillion, a jump of 13.1 percent over the corresponding period in 2005, the Commerce Department said. That was an improvement over the 10.7 percent gain of the year before." The Post adds, "Exports to China -- whose dominance on American store shelves stokes worry -- increased by 33 percent in the first 11 months of 2006. Combined with Hong Kong, China now stands as the United States' third-largest export market, behind only Canada and Mexico." President Bush "is scheduled to travel today to Peoria, Ill., to visit Caterpillar, the giant maker of construction equipment, as he presses Congress to approve new trade agreements. Caterpillar is one of the companies having notable success selling American-made gear abroad."

Executive Order Said To Give White House More Control Over Federal Rules. The New York Times (1/30, A1, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "President Bush has signed a directive that gives the White House much greater control over the rules and policy statements that the government develops to protect public health, safety, the environment, civil rights and privacy. In an executive order published last week in the Federal Register, Mr. Bush said that each agency must have a regulatory policy office run by a political appointee, to supervise the development of rules and documents providing guidance to regulated industries." The White House "will thus have a gatekeeper in each agency to analyze the costs and the benefits of new rules and to make sure the agencies carry out the president's priorities. This strengthens the hand of the White House in shaping rules that have, in the past, often been generated by civil servants and scientific experts." In an interview, Jeffrey A. Rosen, general counsel at the White House Office of Management and Budget, said, "This is a classic good-government measure that will make federal agencies more open and accountable." Business groups "welcomed the executive order, saying it had the potential to reduce what they saw as the burden of federal regulations. … Consumer, labor and environmental groups denounced" it, "saying it gave too much control to the White House and would hinder agencies' efforts to protect the public."

DOJ_NMG_0123973

Stark Says Bush Healthcare Plan "Doesn't Deserve Congress' Consideration." Rep. Pete Stark, chairman of the health subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee, writes in USA Today (1/30, 10A, 2.27M), "President Bush is to be commended for finally recognizing the needs of 47 million Americans denied health care for lack of insurance." But his proposal would do little to help them. In a few years it would raise taxes for 160 million workers who receive group health insurance benefits." Stark also writes, "Much like Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, 'gold-plated' health insurance is a figment of the president's imagination. The problem with our health system is not that Americans can afford to use too much health care; it's that too many can't afford any." The plan "would destroy the very system through which the vast majority of people get their coverage today and fail to replace it with an alternative means of obtaining quality care. It doesn't deserve Congress' consideration."

In an editorial, USA Today (1/30, 2.27M) says "Bush's plan is no magic cure to all that ails America's health care system. In fact, it falls far short of what's happening in some states." But it "still has merits worth considering. … Rejecting it without serious debate might score political points, but does nothing to help those who suffer from the inequities of the status quo."

Man Says Bush Initiative Will Curb Ability To Insure Hemophilic Son. In a "Web exclusive," Newsweek (1/29, Conant, 3.12M) reported, "Bush's State of the Union address may not have done much to improve his popularity. But it did succeed in jump-starting debate over one of the leading --- and most contentiously lobbied issues -- on his domestic agenda: health-care reform. … Democrats on Capitol Hill, along with labor unions and consumer groups, pilloried the Bush plan, arguing his proposal would do little to help America's nearly 47 million uninsured -- and could wind up hastening the demise of employer-provided healthcare." Newsweek interviewed Colorado resident Nathan J. Wilkes, who "was so worried about the possible effects of Bush's proposal on his ability to provide coverage for his chronically ill son that he decided to travel to the capital to make some noise." In the interview, Wilkes, who earns more than $100,000 per year, said he was "worried" about Bush's proposal because his son's hemophilia has increased the costs his employer-provided health insurance. Wilkes: "His claims have increased health-care costs for everyone I work with. My company is very socially responsible, but because of our high claims, no other insurance company will touch us. We're trapped with the same provider, which keeps raising prices and last year introduced a $1 million lifetime cap on coverage. Even if my son has no injuries, we'll hit that cap in the next one to three months."

Schwarzenegger Plan Conflicts With Bush Budget Goals. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "wants $3.7 billion a year in new federal funding to cover a big chunk of his healthcare plan for Californians, putting him on a collision course with budget hawks in the nation's capital and leaders in other states seeking assistance." But the "sheer size of the federal allocation Schwarzenegger's plan would require is raising eyebrows." Sen. Judd Gregg, ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee, said, "That's a big number on an annual basis. California hasn't yet passed a law [implementing the governor's plan], but when they do, I would think people are going to take a deep breath." The Times adds the "cost of helping states fund their health plans has already attracted the attention of budget cutters because it is complicating President Bush's stated goal of balancing the federal budget in five years. In his new budget, scheduled to go to Congress on Monday, Bush is expected to call for a substantial slowdown in federal healthcare spending. Some of the cuts Bush proposes could affect programs Schwarzenegger is counting on to help pay for his plan, such as Medicaid."

Bush Civilian Reserve Corps Proposal Yet To Be Fleshed Out. The Washington Times (1/30, Dinan, 88K) reports President Bush's "call last week for a Civilian Reserve Corps to help troubled countries is either a solid idea whose time has come or yet another throwaway applause line in a State of the Union speech and it's up to Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0123974

Bush to decide how it turns out." For a "proposal during the annual address to Congress arguably the biggest presidential stage this one is mostly bare-bones. There is no plan or legislation, just a pledge to work with Congress to try to create something." Carlos Pascual, who "worked on the idea when he was director of the State Department's Office of Reconstruction and Stabilization," said, "The big question right now is whether the White House is really going to seriously act on it."

Number Of American Volunteers Swells. The Christian Science Monitor (1/30, Green, 59K) reports, "More Americans than ever before are volunteering. In 2005, 29 percent of adults were serving – a 30-year high, according to a December report by the Corporation for National and Community Service (CNCS)." As "mentoring, drug rehabilitation, and other programs depend primarily on volunteers, and as religious groups reach far beyond their congregations to address social problems, the trend is poised to engender real change, says David Eisner, chief executive of the CNCS." Three age groups – "older teens, baby boomers, and seniors – are driving the upsurge. And as these teens grow and boomers retire, bucking the expectation they will slow down, together they could expand volunteerism even more, Eisner says. The CNCS, a federal agency that since 1993 has fostered civic engagement through community service, has launched a push to boost the number of US volunteers by 10 million to 75 million by 2010."

Bush Says He Wasn't "Trying To Needle" By Referring To "Democrat" Party. The AP (1/30, Feller) reports, "This one has gotten a little ic-ky for the White House. President Bush said Monday he wasn't trying to disparage the party now running Congress by referring to it as the 'Democrat majority,' as opposed to the 'Democratic majority,' in his State of the Union speech." In an interview with National Public Radio, Bush said, "That was an oversight. … I mean, I'm not trying to needle." The AP adds, "Bush's dropping of the 'ic' at the end of the word prompted grumbling by Democrats that he purposely got their name wrong. This is not a new charge. President Reagan used to refer to the 'Democrat Party.' Democratic leaders have long considered it demeaning when their suffix is omitted."

The Washington Post (1/30, A15, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "White House press secretary Tony Snow seemed peeved with reporters asking about the Bush mispronunciation at his morning press 'gaggle' yesterday, accusing the reporters of making 'three mountains out of a molehill' and suggesting that the press was not much interested when Democrats bashed Bush with language calling him a 'loser' or a 'liar.'" Said Snow, "This looks like an exercise of looking for a fence rather than looking for a way to work together. … There was no intentional slight of anyone."

The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Reynolds, 850K) says "experts of political locution say it's a deliberate, if ungrammatical, linguistic strategy. 'The word "democratic" has such positive emotional valence ... So they politicize it to use it as a term to describe a group of political rivals,' said Roderick P. Hart, a professor of communications and government at the University of Texas in Austin." Hart also said "'Democrat Party' is not common usage in Texas…noting that the only people he has heard use it are 'sitting Republican legislators.'"

The New York Times (1/30, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports that "last weekend, Mr. Bush put his bipartisan spirit on display, right there on the schedule distributed by the White House: 'The president makes remarks to the House Democrat Conference.' But late yesterday a new version of the schedule was released. 'Democratic conference,' it said."

Schumer Says Cheney Is "Brain Wave" Of Administration. Sen. Charles Schumer was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (1/29, Matthews), "What's the brain wave of this administration? Is it George Bush?" Schumer replied, "No, Cheney. ... Cheney's the keeper of the flame, Bush listens to him, and that's why they've lost touch."

Senate To Take Up Minimum Wage Bill, Business Tax Cuts. The New York Times (1/30, Zernike, 1.16M) reports the Senate is "expected to clear the way on Tuesday for an increase in the minimum wage that Democrats and some Republicans agree is overdue. But the Senate's approval may not mean that workers will actually start receiving bigger paychecks in the immediate future." The Senate bill "differs from the one that cleared the House, and includes $8.3 billion in tax breaks for small businesses that Republicans and some Democrats say are necessary to offset the cost of the wage increase." Aides to "some House leaders say they would be willing to allow some of the tax breaks. But others, including Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, are insisting that they will not concede any tax cuts." House Democrats "say that by forcing a vote on a clean bill they would force Senate Republicans to put themselves on record as opposing a wage increase, which was a popular campaign issue in the midterm elections."

DOJ_NMG_0123975

Bill Includes Restrictions On Executive Pay. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A4, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "The Senate's likely passage this week of legislation raising taxes on executive pay is just the beginning of a tough look by the new Democratic Congress at big corporate compensation packages." The provision, attached to the minimum wage bill, "would cap at $1 million a year the amount an employee could place in certain tax-deferred-compensation plans. Currently, there is no limit on how much compensation can be deferred into the plans, allowing executives to put off taxes for years on millions of dollars in pay." The legislation also "would limit the income-tax deductions companies can claim for high-paid executives who left the firm during the year. Combined, the two measures would raise about $900 million in new tax revenue over 10 years, according to congressional estimates."

Kennedy Objects To Tax Breaks. The Washington Times (1/30, Hurt, 88K) reports that during an "impassioned floor speech last week, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy lashed out at Republicans for insisting on tax cuts targeted for small businesses to offset the cost of raising the minimum wage." Kennedy said, "How many more billions of dollars do we have to give you, Mr. Republican? How many more dollars do we have to give you to get an increase in the minimum wage? It is shocking. It is disgraceful." The Times adds, "The Senate Finance Committee -- headed by Sen. Max Baucus, Montana Democrat -- added up the amount of tax cuts that it had included in the minimum-wage bill that the panel approved earlier this month. The $8.3 billion in tax cuts were aimed at the small businesses that hire most minimum-wage workers." Senate Republicans "were quick to note that the $8.3 billion in tax cuts for small businesses nationwide is less than the $8.5 billion federal funding cap placed on Boston's Big Dig highway project. Mr. Kennedy has been the principal sponsor of the project, which has been riddled with corruption, cost overruns, delays and safety woes."

House Democratic Leaders Drop Plans For Pay Raise. The AP (1/30, Taylor) reports House Democratic leaders "abandoned attempts to revive an annual pay raise cherished by rank and file lawmakers, a decision prompted by lingering GOP anger over last year's campaign." Lawmakers' pay "will be frozen at $165,200 for this year in a dispute fueled by the Democrats' use of the issue in last year's campaign, violating a yearslong understanding that the competing parties would not attack each other over pay raises." The issue concerns "the annual congressional cost of living adjustment, or COLA, under which lawmakers automatically get a pay hike unless Congress votes to block it."

The New York Times (1/30, Hulse, 1.16M) reports the cost-of-living adjustment "is on the verge of being eaten up in political payback. Republicans, who were attacked by Democrats in the 2006 campaign for accepting annual raises while not increasing the federal minimum wage for 10 years, say they are inclined to oppose any increase for representatives. And Democrats say they are not likely to enact one on their own, which would open them to attack in the next campaign." Republican leaders "point a finger at the hard-hitting Democratic campaign operation of last year, saying Monday that making the raises a political issue violated a longtime unwritten agreement between the parties."

Democrats Finalize $463.5 Billion Stop-Gap Funding Bill. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A3, Rogers, 2.04M) reports Democrats "put the final touches on a $463.5 billion spending bill designed to keep the government operating for the rest of the fiscal year and bridge the gap left by the collapse of the budget process last fall." Reflecting the "new Democratic majority, the largest funding increases would go to veterans' medical care, Pell Grants for low-income college students, law enforcement, and fighting AIDS and malaria overseas. The White House appeared receptive to much of the package, but it would have to accept an almost $3.6 billion cut from its fiscal 2007 request for military construction and base-closing funds." Faced with "a Feb. 15 deadline, speed is essential and the House is scheduled to vote tomorrow without a formal committee markup. The Senate will be more of an obstacle, and Democrats hope that concessions to conservatives and weeks of negotiations with federal agencies will hasten action there as well."

Democratic Plan Bill To Authorize Generic Biological Drugs. The Hill (1/30, Young) reports senior Democratic lawmakers "are close to introducing legislation to create a pathway for the approval of generic biological drugs in the hopes that the cheaper medicines will create billions of dollars in budget savings, which could be used to offset some of the cost of expanding federal health programs." But the "biotechnology companies that manufacture biologic pharmaceuticals caution that their products are not as easily reproduced as traditional, chemically based drugs, and are calling for legislators to include stricter safety and effectiveness testing requirements in the bill." Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), "the senior member of the Energy and Commerce Committee who is taking the lead on drafting the biologics bill, asserted that his legislation could have a big impact on healthcare spending." Waxman said, "There's a great deal of savings that can be achieved."

DOJ_NMG_0123976

Pelosi Courts Liberal Bloggers. The AP (1/30, Werner) reports shortly after "her swearing-in as the first female House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi took time to field questions from a few dozen Internet bloggers on a conference call that was off limits to mainstream media." Last week, Pelosi's aides "arranged for bloggers to question two Democratic House leaders on another conference call shortly before President Bush's State of the Union speech." Pelosi also "hired a full-time staff member this month dedicated to blogger outreach, and is making plans to launch a blog of her own. The day she was sworn in, bloggers were given special accommodations at the Capitol to cover the event, and fed lunch." It is "all evidence of the newfound attention bloggers from left-leaning Web sites are commanding on Democratic-run Capitol Hill, especially from the new speaker, a San Franciscan with an appreciation for the power of the Internet and grass-roots activism."

GSA Offering Incentives For Managers, Execs To Work From Telework Centers. The Washington Post's (1/30, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The General Services Administration announced yesterday it will allow federal supervisors, managers and executives to work for free from one of GSA's telework centers in hopes that trial runs might build enthusiasm for telecommuting. GSA operates 14 telework centers that provide workstations equipped with computers, telephones, printers, copiers and other equipment. The centers are outside the Beltway in Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia. Agencies pay $25 to $49 per day to reserve a workstation."

White House Hires New Pastry Chef. The AP (1/30) reports there's a new name behind the decadent desserts at the White House: William Yosses." Yosses has "been named as the executive pastry chef for the White House, first lady Laura Bush announced Monday. He will design and oversee the desserts for state dinners, social events, official luncheons and holiday parties."

Cheney Refusal To Discuss Daughter's Pregnancy Seen As Hypocritical. In a New York Times guest column (1/30), Stacy Schiff says, "Last week Wolf Blitzer asked Dick Cheney about his pregnant lesbian daughter. The vice president looked as if his arm had made contact with that meat grinder. Mr. Blitzer was, he growled, seriously out of line." Neither Senator Jim Webb "nor Vice President Cheney wins points for his social graces. But what Letitia Baldrige said of the Webb encounter — "It was an uncivil reply to an uncivil remark" — does not apply equally to the vice president. Mr. Cheney has openly promoted an anti-gay agenda. His own base has called his daughter's pregnancy unconscionable. Family values have been his calling card. And our Prohibitionist vice president can't summon the courage to address the gin mill in the basement? Mr. Webb was rude on principle; Mr. Cheney rude out of hypocrisy. One man took a stand. The other scurried away."

Supreme Court Urged To Permit Issue Ads Before Elections. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, 850K) says in an editorial, "The US Supreme Court astonished everyone in 2003 when it upheld the constitutionality of severe limits on political speech. The good news is that the court may be having some sober second thoughts about that dubious decision." The "speech-curtailing measure at issue is part of the broader McCain-Feingold campaign finance law. The centerpiece of that law banned 'soft money' contributions to political parties that were used to circumvent limits on how much donors could contribute to candidates for federal office. What is glaringly offensive to the 1st Amendment is an accompanying ban on 'electioneering communications' paid for out of the treasuries of independent organizations." There are "a lot of phoney 'issue ads' out there ('Tell Sen. Smith you disagree with him about Iraq' can sound a lot like an endorsement for challenger Jones), but the court has to err on the side of preserving political speech. When it comes to speaking out about a candidate, opponents (and news outlets like ours) should not have a monopoly in the closing days of a campaign, especially if the outside organization weighing in is genuinely acting on its own."

DOJ_NMG_0123977

WSJournal Urges Bush To Stick To Voucher Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A16, 2.04M) writes in an editorial about reauthorization of the No Child Left Behind Act, "The big news so far is that President Bush is resurrecting the voucher proposal from his first term." Mr. Bush "campaigned on this concept in 2000, too, only to throw NCLB's choice provisions over the side to cut a bipartisan deal with Senator Ted Kennedy and Representative George Miller." But, "let's hope Mr. Bush isn't merely using 'choice' again as a negotiating ploy" because he "could pick worse fights than arguing that poor kids should be able to escape failing schools."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Getting Positive Reviews. The Washington Post (1/30, D1, Henderson, 690K) reports, "The new chairman of the Federal Reserve got off to a rocky start last spring. Inflation was surging, the housing market was slumping, and Ben S. Bernanke's initial responses caused turmoil on Wall Street." But "a year into Bernanke's tenure, the picture has turned considerably brighter. Inflation is falling; unemployment is low; wages are rising; and the economy, despite continued problems in housing, is growing at a brisk clip. Bernanke is earning plaudits from Wall Street to Capitol Hill." Robert DiClemente, chief U.S. economist at Citigroup Global Markets said, "His stewardship in the first year has to be applauded by markets, investors and other policymaker. … He was able to arrest inflation without killing the expansion. That's really the ultimate victory." Sen. Kent Conrad), chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, said. "I think he's doing his level best to manage monetary policy in a way that will accommodate growth." The Post adds, "Certainly, the Bernanke Fed remains a work in progress. He promised greater openness, but despite months of discussion, the central bank's arcane methods of communicating with the public have not changed much. And the chairman's skills as a leader remain untested by a financial crisis or serious conflict among members of the policymaking Federal Open Market Committee."

Offering a similar criticism, the New York Times (1/30, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "When…Bernanke took over as chairman of the Federal Reserve Board one year ago this week, he brought with him a long-held conviction that the central bank should be more explicit about its goals and less personalized than it had been under Alan Greenspan. Yet as Mr. Bernanke celebrates his first anniversary on the job, the Fed is still far away from acting on his major proposal of setting an explicit target for inflation." Bernanke "has long argued that publicly committing the central bank to an inflation target -- probably 1 to 2 percent a year -- would make its policy more transparent and open to the public. Its decisions would be easier for investors to anticipate, he argued, and the public might have greater confidence that inflation would indeed remain low. It is an idea that Mr. Greenspan staunchly opposed, arguing that it would bind the Fed to rigid rules and deprive it of crucial flexibility in reacting to economic surprises." But "even though a majority of those on the Fed board agree with Mr. Bernanke in principle, officials have, if anything, become more cautious over the last year about making a change."

But USA Today (1/30, 1B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M), in a story titled "Bernanke Quietly Guides Economy," calls "Bernanke's relative anonymity…a major departure from the days of his predecessor," adding that "as he finishes his first year as chairman, the unassuming Bernanke, 53, doesn't have Greenspan's head-turning sway over the general public, at least not yet, but he does have firm control of the central bank and the growing confidence of financial markets." He "has steered the central bank through a turning point in an economy that was confronting a tumbling housing market and uncomfortably high inflation."

As Recession Fears Fade, Fed Unlikely To Ease Rates. The Christian Science Monitor (1/30, Trumbull, 59K) reports the US economy "was expected to cool a bit along with temperatures this winter, but that slow patch is looking more like business as usual. The housing slump is still serious. Detroit carmakers are still in trouble. But with oil prices dropping since last summer, overall economic activity keeps chugging along even as inflation looks to be easing." The Monitor adds, "The momentum has spoiled hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates anytime soon. The Fed is expected to note signs of strength in the economy, and continued vigilance against inflation, when it releases its latest policy statement Wednesday. Otherwise, however, this is good news that eases worries about a possible recession – and suggests a year of economic growth that is closer to normal."

Stocks See Modest Gains. NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 7, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks managed to finish the day with some modest gains.

DOJ_NMG_0123978

The Dow was up almost four points [to close at 12,490.78] on the day. NASDAQ gained nearly six points [to close at 2,441.09]."

US Law Firm Makes Inroads In China. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, B1, Koppel, Batson) reports, "For brand-name law firms bent on global expansion, China poses a conundrum. Economic activity is generating plenty of legal work, but opening an office on the mainland is fraught with hurdles, from a shortage of legal talent to regulations that limit the work foreign lawyers can do. … Now, a U.S. firm thinks it has found a way to build business in China while avoiding some of the burdens. McDermott Will & Emery, a 1,000-lawyer firm founded in Chicago, has entered into a strategic alliance with Yuan Da Law Offices of Shanghai, which has around 25 lawyers. It's the first formal tie-up between a Western and a mainland China firm, and a bold move, given that regulations bar international firms from fully merging with Chinese counterparts." The firms will share clients -- for instance, each providing legal assistance in their areas of expertise. But, to comply with Chinese law, McDermott and MWE can't share the profit. The U.S. firm must account separately for its work and the revenue it brings in. … The strategic alliance is structured so that McDermott stands to reduce its costs if MWE increases the amount of work it does for clients." The Journal adds, "Many other big law firms have flocked to mainland China to advise multinational clients and snag new ones in the country's burgeoning corporate sector. Last year, 14 foreign firms opened offices in mainland China, about the same as in each of the two previous years, according to legal consultant Hildebrandt International Inc. When firms enter the market, they mostly send partners to China and hire local Chinese lawyers. … The problem isn't a lack of business. Last year saw $69.5 billion in foreign direct investment into China -- fueling demand for cross-border legal services in such areas as securities offerings, deals and trade disputes. … But mainland China poses particular challenges for these outside lawyers. Besides unfriendly regulations, there's a shortage of top legal talent and there are clients who recoil at Western billing rates for lawyers' advice."

Fenty Taps Nonprofit Head As Next DC Attorney General. The Washington Post (1/30, B03, Cauvin) reports, "Linda Singer was not looking for a new job, she said. She was not even looking to practice law anymore. … She was running a nonprofit group in the District, and for years, she had told the state of New York -- where she had been admitted to the bar -- that she was retired from the law, with no intention of practicing again." The Post continues, "So, Singer said, she was surprised when D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D) came calling and offered her the job as attorney general over breakfast at Four Seasons. … The 40-year-old Harvard Law School graduate was not a member of the D.C. Bar until this month, despite having lived and worked in Washington for more than a decade. For 13 years, she had led a Washington-based network of nonprofit organizations called Appleseed, which harnesses pro bono work by law firms to study problems in such areas as education, health care and immigration." The Post adds, "Singer's work at Appleseed focused on policy -- stimulating ideas, advocating change and raising money. It was very little like the job as the city's top lawyer that she assumed this month. And in law offices around town, that has people wondering whether she is the right fit for her new post, which she holds in an acting capacity as she awaits confirmation by the D.C. Council. … She takes charge of a staff of several hundred people with a variety of responsibilities, which include reviewing the city's bond deals on Wall Street, defending municipal agencies in court, prosecuting juvenile offenders, and cracking down on deadbeat parents and usurious lenders."

Unused Embryos Pose Dilemma For Couples. USA Today (1/30, 1A, Stone, 2.27M) reports in a front page story that as Congress "renews debate about funding stem cell research using human embryos," people who have used in vitro fertilization to conceive children "are thinking hard about what to do with excess embryos after their families are complete. Only they — not politicians, doctors or ethicists — are legally entitled to make the call." How they "decide will help determine the future of research into embryonic stem cells, the master cells from which scientists hope to develop treatments for diabetes, Alzheimer's and other diseases. Scientists hope to find cures using adult or amniotic fluid stem cells, but researchers like George Daley of Harvard say they are not a substitute for embryonic stem cells, which potentially can become any cell in the body."

GOP Right Restive Over Possible '08 Presidential Candidates. The Politico (1/30, Martin) reports, "Contemplating the current field of Republican presidential candidates, Rush Limbaugh sounded like a man with malaise." On his radio show, Limbaugh said, "To be honest with you, there's nobody out there that revs me up, so why should I pretend there is?" The Politico adds, "What for much of the past year has been an undercurrent of grumbling on the right about the top tier of Republican contenders -- Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani -- is lately on the rise in both frequency and volume. Limbaugh's sour note is the most striking of examples." From "consultants to bloggers to talk show hosts, there is a climate of suspicion -- at times bordering on contempt -- among conservative activists about their 2008 choices." McCain is "courting social and economic conservatives this year, but still faces grave doubts because of his past attacks on conservative religious leaders and his frequent willingness to make common cause with Democrats." Romney "faces charges of opportunism because of his recent past as a social moderate," while Giuliani's "potential candidacy would test whether a leader with liberal views on abortion and gay rights could prosper in a party whose activists are steadfastly opposed to both." Some activists "see all three men failing the test."

DOJ_NMG_0123979

Romney Able To Skirt Some Campaign Finance Rules. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A1, Cummings, 2.04M) reports in a front page story that because he "doesn't hold federal office," former Massachusetts Gov. Mit Romney "became subject to the federal rules only after he set up a presidential exploratory committee earlier this month. Until then, his team took advantage of a little-noticed gap between federal and state law. While most states limit political donations, about a dozen don't. Mr. Romney's political team set up fund-raising committees in three of those: Michigan, Iowa and Alabama. During that time, his political action committees raised $7 million." As a result, Romney "was able to hit the ground running, a big advantage in what has already become a feverish race. A week after announcing his possible bid, having already taken care of basic campaign logistics such as hiring and office space, the former governor held a Boston fund-raiser that netted $6.5 million in pledges. Mr. Romney also used the cash to build a broad network of financial backers and grass-roots allies."

Romney Still Avoids Taking Stand On Immigration. The Hill (1/30, Youngman) reports Romney "assuaged the concerns of many gathered at National Review Institute's Conservative Summit last weekend, at least on issues of abortion and gay marriage." But aside from "a brief mention of the importance of learning English during a nearly hour-long speech, Romney stayed away from the ongoing and heated immigration debate." While the Republican Party "was divided over the immigration debate last year, Romney, like other governors-cum-presidential candidates before him, was not forced to vote on a hot issue," and he has "by and large avoided the most contentious part of the immigration debate."

Former New Hampshire GOP Chief, Von Dongen Back Giuliani. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani "has recruited a recent New Hampshire Republican chairman to lead his political operations in this first-in-the-nation primary state." Giuliani "announced the appointment Monday of veteran GOP activist Wayne Semprini." Semprini, "who until Saturday was the state Republican Party chairman, has been involved in New Hampshire politics since 1972." During his visit this weekend, Giuliani "would not say when he would make a final decision, although his speeches at Bretton Woods and Manchester were campaign-style addresses."

Roll Call (1/30, Whittington) reports, "Washington, D.C., superlobbyist Dirk Van Dongen has agreed to serve as D.C. finance chairman for Republican Rudy Giuliani's nascent 2008 presidential bid, and allies of the former New York mayor say the move is only a preview of the high-profile, inside-the-Beltway support he is building." Van Dongen, "who heads the National Association of Wholesaler-Distributors and is a top Republican fundraiser with close ties to President Bush, represents a big catch for Giuliani among the president's top money men — the group of 'Rangers and Pioneers' who helped pour millions into his two White House campaigns." It also "signals some of the first tangible evidence of the former mayor's outreach to Washington insiders as he lays the groundwork for a 2008 run."

Boston Ace Pitcher Schilling Endorses McCain. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports Sen. John McCain "won the support of two Senate colleagues from Maine Monday, and then scored big with a plug from Boston Red Sox pitcher Curt Schilling." Schilling "helped pitch the Boston Red Sox to a World Series title in 2004, a source of pride during the tenure of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. But he apparently won't be supporting Romney in the race for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination." Schilling "told WEEI-AM: 'I'm actually kind of excited about the fact that I think Senator McCain is going to do something official here, and he's going to be the man I'm going to back.'"

DOJ_NMG_0123980

Snowe, Collins Endorse McCain. Roll Call (1/30) reports Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) "announced Monday that Maine Sens. Olympia Snowe (R) and Susan Collins (R) will serve as co-chairwomen of his presidential exploratory effort in the Pine Tree State." State Rep. Josh Tardy, "the House Republican leader, will serve as vice chairman of McCain's campaign in the state." The "endorsements of Snowe and Collins, both centrists, are not surprising despite the fact that they both endorsed then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush and not McCain in the 2000 Republican primary."

Hutchison Says She'd Consider VP Spot In 2008 Ticket. The Washington Times (1/30, Hallow, 88K) reports, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, the largest Republican vote-getter in the 2006 congressional elections and the most popular Republican in Texas, said yesterday she would consider an offer to run for vice president next year. 'If our party's nominee called me and said we are putting everything in the grid, and we think you are the best person, would I say no? I can't imagine that I would say no,' she said." She also told the Times, "Would I seek it or do something to promote it? Absolutely not."

Hillary Clinton's Visit To Iowa Continues To Draw Attention. The CBS Evening News (1/29, story 5, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported that before her first weekend in Iowa, "everyone expected" Sen. Hillary Clinton "to be asked about her stance on the war. That is not what people are talking about, is it?" CBS (Borger) added, "No, it isn't. What has Washington buzzing the way Hillary Clinton chose to answer what seemed like seemingly innocuous question about how she would deal with the bad actors on the world stage." Sen. Hilary Clinton: "In the gentlemen's words we face a lot of evil men. You know, people like Osama bin Laden comes to mind. And what in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" Borger: "The question was about foreign leaders, but the candidate's answer at the very least was playfully ambiguous." Joe Trippi, Democratic political strategist: "I assume she was referring to Bill Clinton." Borger: "Some political strategists figure it was part of a plan to deal with the inevitable questions about her marriage early with humor and some attitude." CBS also noted Clinton's explanation of her Iraq war vote, showing Clinton saying: "If we had known then what we know now, there never would have been a vote and I never would have voted to give this President that authority." Borger: "That's a very complicated answer. Some of the other Democratic presidential candidates have just decided to simplify. They just say they made a mistake."

The Politico (1/30, Smith) reports that in her "first tour of Iowa last weekend, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton emerged as a candidate hard-edged enough to threaten violence, yet explicitly female enough to make women feel so comfortable that one mentioned menopause in front of crowd of more than 1,000 people." Clinton "never called attention to her gender during her six years as Democratic senator from New York the way she did at a Des Moines town meeting where she raised the question 'Would we ever elect a woman as president?' and mused openly about the challenges she faces as a female candidate." Clinton also has "rarely deployed the masculine language of violence the way she did in Iowa, where she said she would 'deck' anyone who attacked her politically, and called on President Bush to 'bring the hammer down' on Iraq's political leaders." But while, within the large and small rooms, Clinton seemed to be speaking most directly to the women present, she drew headlines for the new intensity of her words, which seemed to catch supporters and reporters who have covered her for years a bit by surprise."

Clinton's Off-Key National Anthem Posted On Internet. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports the "online world discovered that" former First Lady Hillary Clinton "had a hard time with a tough tune when someone posted a video Sunday of Clinton caught on an open MSNBC microphone singing an off-key rendition of 'The Star-Spangled Banner' during a campaign event in Iowa. By Monday morning, the 1-minute, 8-second clip had been viewed more than 660,000 times, making it the top-viewed video for the day at that point."

Clinton Meets With Food Workers Union. The New York Times/AP (1/30) reports Sen. Clinton "met privately Monday with the board of the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, a 1.3 million-member labor group whose support will be critical to any Democratic candidate." Clinton "traveled to Naples, Fla., to address the annual board meeting of the union. UFCW spokeswoman Jill Cashen said the New York senator had been invited to speak on issues affecting the union, such as health care, immigration and boosting the minimum wage." Cashen added "other 2008 presidential contenders would be invited to address the UFCW board throughout the year. Cashen declined to say whether the union intends to endorse a candidate."

DOJ_NMG_0123981

Clinton Urged To Use Gender To Her Advantage. In a USA Today op-ed (1/30, 11A), author Harriet Rubin says, "Gender doesn't have to work against female candidates. In fact, the right mix of femininity and strength might be just what the electorate ordered." Even the "most powerful woman in politics can't yet hold her own against the most powerful man, it seems: When Bill and Hillary Clinton take a stage together, he makes her disappear, like a magician and his assistant. How then would she look on stage against Republican Sen. John McCain? She'll have to draw consistently on her 'mamisma,' not machismo." Mamisma is "femininity defined by mature and maternal qualities. It lets a female candidate make men look like wimps while doing the taboo-dance, enticing people to fall in love with her."

Edwards Admits He May Have Lacked Experience In 2004. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports John Edwards "acknowledged Monday that he may have been too inexperienced in national politics for his White House run in 2004." Edwards was "serving his first and only Senate term four years ago when he declared himself a presidential candidate. During a forum at Wake Forest University on Monday, Edwards said he might agree with critics who said he left Congress too soon to seek the presidency," but he added "the experience he has gained since the election has now prepared him for another run in 2008." Edwards said, "When I ran in 2004, I spent most of my time thinking about being a good candidate. These days I think about what I want to do as president of the United States."

Clinton, McCain Visit Center For Wounded Vets. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John McCain, "their parties leading presidential candidates, put politics aside for a time Monday to dedicate a rehabilitation center to treat the increasing number of severely wounded Iraq war veterans." Clinton and McCain, "members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, thanked the wounded for their service and told them the nation owed them a debt. Both senators avoided questions about the unpopular war."

Vilsack Takes Post At Drake University. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack "was named a visiting professor of law at Drake University, a private college in Des Moines, school officials said Monday." College officials said Vilsack "will be in residence at the school 'for several days' during 2007. He'll deliver the keynote speech at the schools Supreme Court celebration in March, host a symposium on risk and responsibility later in the spring, and help teach a short course on legal issues surrounding rural development."

Hunter Criticizes Kerry For Calling US "International Pariah." The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports, "White House hopeful Rep. Duncan Hunter on Monday criticized Sen. John Kerry for telling an overseas conference that the United States was 'a sort of international pariah.'" Hunter, a "long-shot presidential candidate, complained about Kerry's remarks this past weekend at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. Responding to a question, Kerry said the Bush administration had failed to adequately address a number of foreign policy issues." Kerry said, "So we have a crisis of confidence in the Middle East — in the world, really. I've never seen our country as isolated, as much as a sort of international pariah for a number of reasons as it is today." The AP adds Hunter 'told a New Hampshire audience Monday: 'It was terrible for him to say that.'"

Weak Fundraising Raises Questions About Hagel's Reelection Plans. The Hill (1/30, Blake) reports Sen. Chuck Hagel's (R-Neb.) "year-end financial filing shows that he raised just $80,000 for his campaign committee in the final three months of 2006, bringing his cash on hand to $140,000 from $110,000." As of his "third-quarter filing, Hagel had the least cash on hand of the 33 senators up for reelection in 2008. The potential presidential candidate's most recent filing shows he increased his campaign fundraising over the $20,000 he raised in the third quarter." But unlike retiring Sen. Wayne Allard, "who was one of Democrats' top three targets, Hagel appears unlikely to face a serious Senate challenge in 2008." At the "same time, he has left open the possibility that he would retire, whether or not he would seek the presidency. Last week, he rebuffed a report that said he has assured the National Republican Senatorial Committee that he will seek reelection."

Schumer Says "Middle Class Imagination" Key To 2008. Sen. Charles Schumer said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/29, Matthews), "Middle class voters in 2004 went overwhelmingly for George Bush. In 2006, they voted for us, but mainly because they didn't like Bush anymore. And

DOJ_NMG_0123982

2008's going to be a real seminal election, and whichever party can create a platform that captures the middle class imagination, I think, will be the party that will be dominant for a generation."

GOP Campaigns Try To Avoid Allen's Fate. The Politico (1/30, Budoff) reports, "The fear gnaws at senators, embodied in a catchphrase that conveys their dread: Don't be the next George Allen." In Republican "campaign strategy sessions and conference calls, candidates and consultants are invoking Allen's name as a verb -- to be 'George Allen-ed' -- and devising tactics to avoid a fate similar to that of the former Virginia senator, taken down by a shaky, 51-second video that volleyed around the country via YouTube." Sen. John Ensign, Nev., chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said, "You have to assume there is a recording device of some kind on you at all times -- that is what I am telling all of my people." The Politico adds that with "the method (cell phones) of capturing embarrassing moments and the means (the Internet) of disseminating them so universally, early discussions about surviving the 2008 election cycle are all about control. A list of rules, if one existed, would nix jokes, stumbling or snoozing in public. Don't berate aides, ambush an opponent at a news conference or do anything humiliating enough to tank a career."

Franken To Leave Air America, May Run For Senate. The Hill (1/30, Blake) reports, "Comedian and potential Minnesota Senate candidate Al Franken will leave liberal talk radio station Air America in two weeks, he announced yesterday on his show." The announcement "paves the way for Franken to explore a possible Democratic challenge to freshman Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) in 2008."

Google Moves To Defuse "Google Bombs." The Washington Post (1/30, D3, Goo, 690K) reports that for "many years, Google said it wouldn't rectify the antics of pranksters who rigged search terms, like having 'miserable failure' bring up a White House biography of George W. Bush as a top result on its search engine." But Google "last week reversed its position, changing its algorithms to eliminate so-called 'Google bombs' that yield political or humorous results." On its "blog targeted at Web engineers, Google disclosed that it made changes to minimize the impact of the most popular Google bombs. Too many people started to think the results reflected the company's political opinion, it said."

Drinan Remembered. The Washington Post (1/30, C1, 690K) runs a piece on the Rev. Robert Drinan by Colman McCarthy, a former Washington Post columnist who directs the Center for Teaching Peace. McCarthy describes the former congressman as a "model of moral tenacity," and criticizes Pope John Paul II for asking him to leave politics.

Humane Society Becoming "A Tiger" Among DC Interest Groups. The Washington Post (1/30, A15, Birnbaum, 690K) reports, "Many people may consider the Humane Society of the United States a pussycat. But with 10 million donors and a $120 million budget, it is becoming a tiger among Washington's interest groups. Just ask Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.). Actually, make that former governor and then-representative." The Humane Society "targeted both in last year's elections after Ehrlich supported bear hunting and Pombo supported commercial whaling and trapping in wildlife refuges." The society also "spent lavishly to help pass an initiative in Arizona, fought by agribusiness, that bans inhumane factory farming. And it bested the National Rifle Association on a measure that prohibits the shooting of mourning doves for sport in Michigan."

California Praised For Moving Up Primary. In his Washington Post column (1/30, A17), E.J. Dionne says California's politicians "have decided to give its voters a say in selecting the Republican and Democratic presidential nominees. And as befits a place that helped give birth to the Goldwater Right, the New Left, the counterculture, environmentalism, modern libertarianism and the tax revolt, California doesn't mind if it throws an already flawed presidential nominating system into chaos. Fearing that California will bigfoot its way into dominance by moving its primary to Feb. 5, 2008, Illinois, Florida and New Jersey are maneuvering to do exactly the same thing. Thus would this diverse group of states give its voters a say just two weeks after the New Hampshire primary, three weeks after the Iowa caucuses, and also close to the contests in Nevada and South Carolina, which the Democrats have moved up in their order of battle." The "revolt of the big states may not slow the process and might even enhance the importance of the outcomes in Iowa, New Hampshire and the two other early states. But by forcing themselves forward, California, Illinois,

DOJ_NMG_0123983

New Jersey, Florida (and who knows who else?) will definitely let many more voters, and many more kinds of voters, in on an important choice."

WSJournal Warns Against Efforts To Ease Unionization. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "The Labor Department reported last week that U.S. union membership keeps shrinking, which helps explain why unions have made easing the rules for organizing one of their top political priorities. And in some places, they've got a good chance to succeed." Big Labor's "response has been to redouble efforts to rig the rules to make union organizing much easier. So in Congress the number one AFL-CIO priority is 'card check' legislation, which would end secret ballots for organizing elections at worksites. Union reps would know which workers voted 'no' and thus be able to exert enormous peer pressure to conform. Given union history, this would surely include threats and other intimidation. Democrats on Capitol Hill are likely to bring 'card check' up for a vote on very short notice -- the better to prevent business from mobilizing against it." Meanwhile, at the state level, unions "are trying to exploit their legislative victories in November by overturning right-to-work laws." Iowa is "emerging as the first test of this effort, thanks to Democratic control of the Governorship and both legislative houses for the first time in 40 years."

WPost Criticizes School Using Church For Graduation Ceremony. The Washington Post (1/30, A16, 690K) in an editorial, criticizes Montgomery Blair High School's use of the Jericho City of Praise church in Landover for its graduation ceremony. That decision "overruled a decision by Superintendent Jerry D. Weast" that was intended to avoid "a possible lawsuit by groups who see use of the church as violating the constitutional separation of church and state" and to take account of "those discomfited by walking into a building that proclaims 'Jesus Is The Lord!!!'" The Post concludes, "Montgomery County must do a better job of providing a proper setting for all its students -- and their families -- to celebrate graduation."

Talks With Pyongyang To Resume Next Week. The AP (1/30, Ang) reports a US Treasury official in Beijing for negotiations with Pyongyang said Tuesday he was "hopeful" of progress, "as a report indicated full talks on the North would resume Feb. 8." Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser told reporters in Beijing ahead of meetings Tuesday with his North Korean counterpart, "We're prepared to go through these talks as long as it takes for us to get through our agenda." Meanwhile, Japanese public broadcaster NHK reported Tuesday that China had informed Tokyo that six-party talks would resume Feb. 8.

The Financial Times (1/30, Fifield) says talks due to resume today between US and North Korean officials on Tuesday over the "US-instigated financial crackdown on Pyongyang" are "likely to be pivotal to determining the success" next week's anticipated six-party talks.

Ban Urged To Seek Nuclear-Free Korean Peninsula. Paul B. Stares, vice president for conflict analysis and prevention at the United States Institute of Peace, writes in a New York Times (1/30, 1.16M) op-ed, "Of all the crises facing the new United Nations secretary general, Ban Ki-moon, the fraying nuclear nonproliferation system is arguably the most consequential." Stares says that "with North Korea having declared after its test last October that it now possesses a nuclear deterrent, the understandable temptation will be to focus on Iran." But "this would be a mistake," according to Stares, because North Korea is "still some way off from having a reliable nuclear weapon." Therefore, he urges Ban to seek a "United Nations-sponsored initiative to formally end the Korean War and dismantle the present armistice arrangements. As part of a peace treaty, the principal signatories -- the United States, China and the two Koreas -- would commit themselves to establishing normal diplomatic relations, recognizing the territorial integrity of both Koreas and, most important, ensuring a nuclear-free peninsula."

Cheney To Visit Japan, Australia. AFP (1/30) reports Vice President Dick Cheney will travel to Japan and Australia the week of February 19 "for talks on Asian security and the global war on terrorism," his office announced. Cheney, who will also visit US troops stationed in Guam, will also meet with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and Australian Prime Minister John Howard "to thank them for their help in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Separately, AFP (1/30) says Australian Prime Minister John Howard "has welcomed" Cheney's upcoming visit "as an opportunity to consult on the progress of the Iraq war." Howard, who announced last week he would not pull Australian troops out of Iraq, said, "I think given the larger things that are at stake with the alliance and the fact you do stick by your close allies when things are difficult, I think that would do a lot of damage to the alliance."

DOJ_NMG_0123984

US Offers Air Support For Somali Peacekeepers. AFP (1/30) reports the United States is "ready to contribute air support to an African Union peacekeeping force in Somalia," Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, Jendayi Frazer, said. The Assistant Secretary told AFP that she had made the offer during talks on the sidelines of the African Union summit in Addis Ababa with the head of the AU commission, Alpha Oumar Konare.

Palestinian Factions Continue Fighting Despite Ceasefire. The AP (1/30, Barzak) reports Palestinian "infighting raged in the Gaza Strip Tuesday morning despite a cease-fire declaration by warring Hamas and Fatah factions." There were reports of gunfire and explosions were in downtown Gaza City "as gunmen from the rival factions ignored the cease-fire, reached at a midnight meeting between Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh and a representative of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas announced the agreement early Tuesday, saying it "stipulated that all security forces must return to their bases, that suspects in killings were to be handed over, and that all hostages still being held…were to be released." However, the AP reports that "none of those steps appeared to have been taken after the 3 a.m. deadline passed."

Suicide Attack Kills 3 In Israeli Resort. NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 3, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported on "a Palestinian suicide attack at a bakery in the southern resort town Eilat. … One group taking responsibility said it was trying to end weeks of fighting between Palestinian factions by aiming at Israel instead."

The New York Times (1/30, A14, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "After nine months without a suicide bombing in Israel, a Palestinian walked from Egypt across the open desert border, hitched a ride from a wary Israeli motorist and then blew himself up on Monday inside a bakery in the Red Sea resort town of Eilat," Israeli officials said. The attack "complicated the latest effort to restart Israeli-Palestinian negotiations." With the United States scheduled to host of talks Friday, the White House said in statement Monday that if the Palestinian government failed to prevent terrorism, it would "undermine the aspirations of the Palestinian people for a state of their own."

The Washington Post (1/30, A10, Wilson, 690K) says the attack "brought sharp condemnation from Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the White House and leaders of the relatively moderate Fatah faction led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. But the governing Hamas movement and Islamic Jihad…called the attack a legitimate response to Israel's occupation of territories that Palestinians envision as part of their future state."

State Department Tells Congress Israel May Have Misused Cluster Bombs. In a highly anticipated move, the Washington Post (1/30, A13, Kessler, 690K) reports the State Department notified Congress yesterday that Israel "may have violated US rules prohibiting the use of American-made cluster bombs in civilian areas during last summer's war in Lebanon." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "declined to confirm that the preliminary findings related to Israel's use of the weapons in civilian areas, citing classified military-sales agreements between Israel and the United States. But the State Department said last August that it opened the investigation because human rights groups complained that cluster weapons" were responsible "for many civilian deaths." The Washington Times/AP (1/30, Gedda) also reports on the State Department's move.

Egypt Tightens Control On Press. The Christian Science Monitor (1/30, Gauch, 59K) reports two recent cases "have given journalists, bloggers, and human rights activists in Egypt cause to fear an impending crackdown on the country's outspoken independent press and its young, activist bloggers, who have been primary agitators for democratic reform." Over the past year, the government "has steadily rolled back political reforms implemented since 2004 after the Bush administration singled out Egypt as ripe for democratic reform." And "many worry Egypt's relative freedom of expression may be ending, too."

Al-Jubeir Named New Saudi Ambassador. The Washington Times (1/30, Morrison, 88K) reports in its "Embassy Row" column that Adel al-Jubeir Monday was officially named as Saudi Arabia's new ambassador to the United States. Al-Jubeir is expected to take up his position next month.

Chinese General To Be Pressed On Missile Test. The Washington Times (1/30, Gertz, 88K) reports

DOJ_NMG_0123985

China's "most senior military war planner is visiting the United States, and Pentagon officials plan to question him about Beijing's recent anti-satellite test." Gen. Ge Zhenfeng, deputy chief of the general staff, arrived in Hawaii on Sunday, where he is leading "a delegation of officers that are part of a US-China military exchange program." Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates is "not expected to meet with Gen. Ge, and the Pentagon is seeking to play down the visit by giving Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker the lead role in the 11-day visit." Defense officials "said they do not expect Gen. Ge to be more forthcoming than other Chinese officials who have refused to explain" the test, but one defense official said, "This is something that we'll continue to press them on."

Russian Presidential Candidates Seek Putin's Backing. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A6, Cullison, 2.04M) reports, "Even though the vote is more than a year away, presidential jockeying in Russia already is in full swing." The "race to succeed Vladimir Putin, who is obliged by a two-term limit to step down next year, is a kind of Kabuki theater, where contenders maneuver to score points for themselves and undermine suspected rivals with the only constituency that really matters: Mr. Putin and the Kremlin elite." The "behind-the-scenes struggle" has "triggered waves of conspiracy theories as events ranging from corruption scandals to contract killings to the poisoning of a former security agent are dissected for clues to what it says about the presidential race." Meanwhile, politicians and analysts "agree that there is little suspense about who will decide the outcome of the elections, slated for March 2008" as "Putin will be able to ensure victory for whichever candidate he endorses."

Saudi Arabia Cuts Crude Output In Effort To Bolster Prices. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A3, Bahree, 2.04M) reports, "Saudi Arabia, which already has aggressively shaved its oil output in a battle to shore up prices, is tightening its spigots further this week. A senior Saudi oil official said yesterday the kingdom had advised its customers of the impending 158,000 barrel-a-day cut, which takes effect Feb. 1." The "reductions, part of a broader campaign by [OPEC], are intended to shrink inventories of oil that had ballooned last year as demand growth for petroleum faltered." Word of the Saudi move "comes as traders are trying to parse whether OPEC is going to cut its production in line with its announced plans." The kingdom's "one-million-barrel reduction -- made over a roughly six-month period -- is nearly double the total cuts it agreed to make under two output reductions hammered out by OPEC at meetings in Doha, Qatar, in October and in Abuja, Nigeria, in December."

French Ambassador Says Ties With US Improving. The Washington Times (1/30, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports on its front page that relations between France and the United States "are back on track after years of tumult and should remain that way regardless of who wins the French presidential election this spring," according to French Ambassador Jean-David Levitte. In an interview with the newspaper, Levitte said, "Today, our relationship is back on the right track." His comments "on Lebanon's political crisis, Syria's behavior, Iran's nuclear program and its larger role in the Middle East were almost identical to the Bush administration's positions," the Times notes. Levitte also "echoed the administration's recent observations that the U.N. Security Council's December resolution that imposed limited sanctions on Tehran over its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment is affecting Iranian public opinion." Regarding Iraq, the ambassador said France is "advocating 'a perspective,' rather than a timetable, that would put just enough pressure on the Iraqi government to get its act together and start improving security."

Ghana To Chair African Union In Snub To Sudan. The Washington Post/AP (1/30, A14, Neuhaus, De Montesquiou) reports, "Bloodshed in Sudan's Darfur region dominated discussion at the African Union summit Monday, blocking Sudan's bid to lead the 53-country group as the U.N. chief described scorched-earth military policies as 'a terrifying feature of life' in the vast, arid area." With Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir "looking on," U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon said that "the toll of the crisis remains unacceptable." Ban also "called on African leaders to end the deadlock created by Sudan's refusal to allow U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur." Hours later, the African Union chose Ghana's president, John Kufuor, to head the bloc, "deflecting Sudan's bid for the second year in a row." Sudanese Foreign Ministry spokesman Ali Sadiq called the move a "very unfortunate development."

WPost Welcomes Ghana's Selection. The Washington Post (1/30, A16, 690K) editorializes, "The Darfur crisis has demonstrated the limits of US influence. President Bush and administration officials have described it as genocide and pushed intermittently for sanctions, peacekeeping deployments, and a deal between Sudan's government and its rebel opponents, but their efforts have been hampered by the hesitancy of other players." However, the Post says "yesterday brought a small victory in the effort to force action" as Sudan was again denied chairmanship of the AU. The "next test" for Sudan, "involves Chinese President Hu Jintao, who today begins a 12-day tour of Africa that includes a stop in Sudan." The African Union "snub and the Chinese leader's visit provide an opportunity to regain the initiative on Darfur," but "the question for Mr. Hu is whether he merely wants to create an illusion of diplomatic progress on Sudan to protect China from the appearance of complicity in genocide or whether he means to ensure that peacekeepers are deployed."

DOJ_NMG_0123986

LATimes Welcomes Northern Ireland Peace Initiative. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, 850K) editorializes, "In a once-unthinkable concession, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army voted Sunday to recognize the authority of the new Police Service of Northern Ireland." The Times says the "genius of the Good Friday agreement, supported by Britain and the predominantly Catholic Republic of Ireland, is that it finessed the issue of whether Northern Ireland is British or Irish." Calling it "a delicate compromise" the Times cautions, "i f it is to survive, those who police the north must be -- and be seen as -- evenhanded."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Unfilled Tunnels A Weak Link At Border."
"Wings Of Song For The Dying."
"The Race That Barbaro Could Not Win."
"Fooling Nature, And The Fertility Doctor."
"Doomsday Cult Said To Be At Center Of Iraqi Battle."

USA Today:
"Feds Plan $200m Grant Program Aimed At Curbing Violent Crime."
"Each Stored Embryo Is A Stem Cell Debate."
"16 States See Road Deaths Slashed."

New York Times:
"Bush Directive Increases Sway On Regulation."
"Europe Resists U.S. Push To Curb Iran Ties."
"Spitzer's Education Agenda Promises Aid Increase."
"A Lively Market, Legal And Not, For Software Bugs."
"Chinese United By Common Goal: A Hot Stock Tip."
"Ex-Bush Aide, In Testimony, Disputes Libby."
"After 8 Months, Setback Ends Barbaro's Battle."

Washington Post:
"Fairfax Shines In Jobs Report."
"Iraqis Describe Plot To Kill Shiite Clerics."
"With Iran Ascendant, U.S. Is Seen At Fault."
"Barbaro Euthanized."
"Virginia Men Face U.S. Trial In Peddling Of Phony Purses."
"Accusations Devastate 2 Va. Churches."

Washington Times:
"How The 'Axis' Seeks The Killer Missile."
"Iraqis Thewart Plot To Kill Shi'ite Clergy."
"Civilian Reserve Just Words In A Speech."
"French Diplomat Says Ties With US Are On The Mend."
"District Seeks To Compete As Convention Destination."

Detroit Free Press:
"How GM Raised The Voltage."
"System Overhaul Could Be Only Hope."
"Pfizer Gives Michigan Dose Of What's Needed In A Modern Economy."
"Rebounding Wolves Lose Their Endangered Species Protection."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Bill; 9 Jurors To Give Death."
"In Atlanta, It's Traffic."
"Who'll Pick Up Slack For Cobbs Pre-k."
"Flash Now, Being Later For Vista?"
"Aquarium Deaths Reopen Captivity Debate."

Houston Chronicle:
"Ot Officer's Work Hours In Dispute."
"Barbaro's Battle Is Over."
"UTEP's Don't Add Up."
"Cantu DA's New Views Get A Tough Reception In Texas."
"Up To 1 Million Texans Could Face Dreaded Tax."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Barbaro Was Put Down; Iraqi Battles; Center for The Intrepid; Libby Trial; The US Auto Industry; Home Depot Hiring; School Urine Testing; Microsoft Vista; Woodruff A Year Later.
CBS: Iran-Aides Insurgents; Iraqi Battles; US Death Toll-Iraq; Center For The Intrepid; Sen. Clinton Presidential Campaign;

DOJ_NMG_0123987

Barbaro -- "Euthanized"; Airport Security; Pilot Mandatory Retirement; Microsoft Vista; Power Ball Winners; Kimberly Dozier Returns.

NBC: Iraqi Battles; Center Of The Intrepid; Palestinian Suicide Bomber; Bush Harsh Words-Iran; Libby Trial; Visiting New Orleans; Stock Market; Government Spending; Teenage Driving; Father Robert Drinan-Obit; Barbaro -- "Euthanized".

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Microsoft-New Operating System; IL-Car Plows Into School Cafeteria; Sen. Obama-New Orleans; Iraq-US KIAs; Tokyo Stock Exchange.

CBS: Senate-Minimum Wage; Senate-Iraq Resolution; Bush-Iran; Federal Reserve-Policy Meetings; Barbaro Euthanized; Microsoft-New Operating System.

NPR: Bush-Iran; Iraq; State Dept.-Israel Might Have Violated Agreement Not To Use Cluster Bombs; UN Secretary General-Darfur; Senate Armed Services Committee- Admiral William Fallon; Tokyo Stock Exchange; CA-Lengthy Sentence For Convicted Child Molester; St. Louis Family Wins Powerball.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a tour of Caterpillar, Inc. Peoria, Ill.; delivers remarks on the economy, Caterpillar, Inc. Peoria, Ill.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Hearing on global climate change. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on the nomination of Adm. William Fallon to be reappointed admiral and be commander of the US Central Command. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full committee. Hearing on the Negroponte nomination. Location: Room 216, Hart.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on defining long term fiscal challenges. Robert Reischauer of the Urban Institute, Robert Greenstein of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, and Eugene Steuerle of the Urban Institute. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the status of federal land management agencies' efforts to contain the costs of their wildfire suppression activities. Interior Secretary Kempthorne; Agriculture Undersecretary Mark Rey; Phyllis K. Fong, inspector general, USDA; Robin Nazzaro, GAO; James Caswell, Wildland Fire Leadership Council; Bruce McDowell, National Academy of Public Administration; Arizona State Forester Kirk Rowdabaugh. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on Congress' constitutional power to end a war. Panel I: David J. Barron, Professor of Law, Harvard Law School, Cambridge, Mass.; Bradford Berenson, Partner, Sidley Austin LLP, Washington, D.C. ; Walter Dellinger, Douglas B. Maggs Professor of Law, Duke University School of Law, Former Acting Solicitor General of the United States, Durham, N.C; Louis Fisher, Specialist in Constitutional Law, Law Library, Library of Congress, Washington, DC; and Robert F. Turner, Center for National Security Law, University of Virginia School of Law, Charlottesville, Va. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

1 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on alternative plans for Iraq. Iraq Study Group co-chairs James Baker III and Lee Hamilton. Location: Room 216, Hart.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on transportation sector fuel economy, including challenges to and incentives for increased oil savings. Betty Lowery, vice president, public policy, General Motors; William Logue, executive vice president, FedEx Express; John German, American Honda Motor Co.; Walter S. McManus, University of Michigan; Menahem Anderman - president, Advanced Automotive Batteries; David Greene, Oak Ridge National Laboratory. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed hearing assessing intelligence issues in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10:30 a.m. The House meets for morning hour and turns to legislative business at noon. Highlights: Suspensions (5 bills): 1) H.Res. 24 - Establishing the House Democracy Assistance Commission for the One Hundred Tenth Congress. 2) H.Con.Res. 20 - Calling on the Government of the United Kingdom to immediately establish a full, independent, and public judicial inquiry into the murder of Northern Ireland defense attorney Patrick Finucane, as recommended by Judge Peter Cory as part of the Weston Park Agreement, in order to move forward on the Northern Ireland peace process. 3) H.Res. 59 - Supporting the goals and ideals of National Engineers Week, and for other purposes. 4) H.Con.Res. 34 - Honoring the life of Percy Lavon Julian, a pioneer in the field of organic chemistry research and development and the first and only African American chemist to be inducted into the National Academy of Sciences. 5) H. Con. Res. 5 - Expressing support for the designation and goals of ``Hire a Veteran Week'' and encouraging the President to issue a proclamation supporting those goals.

DOJ_NMG_0123988

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the situation in Afghanistan. James Dobbins, RAND Corp.; Karl F. Inderfurth, professor, George Washington University; Ali A. Jalali, National Defense University; Anthony H. Cordesman, Center for Strategic and International Studies. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the CBO budget forecast. CBO Director Peter Orszag. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on security concerns at the Los Alamos National Lab. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full committee. Hearing on political interference allegations with the work of climate change scientists. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on the Coast Guard's Integrated Deepwater System. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on trade and globalization and integration of markets. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Military Personnel Subcommittee. Hearing on the force requirements determination process. Maj.r Gen. Richard Formica, Deputy Army Chief of Staff. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

2 p.m. SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY _ Energy and Environment Subcommittee. Hearing on H.R. 547 - Advanced Fuels Infrastructure Research and Development Act. John Eichberger, National Association of Convenience Stores; Bob Dineen, Renewable Fuels Association; Richard Kassel, Natural Resources Defense Council. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Railroads, Pipelines and Hazardous Materials Subcommittee. Hearing on reauthorization of railroad safety programs. Joseph Boardman, Administrator of the Federal Railroad Administration; Robert Sumwalt, Vice Chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board; Calvin Scovel, Inspector General of the U.S. Department of Transportation; Katherine Siggerud, Director of Physical Infrastructure Issues with the US General Accounting Office. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

4 p.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Select Revenue Measures Subcommittee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room B-318, Rayburn.

Other: AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS _ The National Air Traffic Controllers Association (NATCA) National Legislative Committee holds a Washington conference. Highlights: 12 p.m. - 5:30 p.m. Congressional appointments. 5:30 p.m. Congressional reception. Note: This event will be held in the cafeteria of the Rayburn House Office Building. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

GOP LEADERSHIP _ 10 a.m. There will be a GOP leadership stakeout for an availability with Republican Leader John Boehner, Republican Whip Roy Blunt, and Conference Chairman Adam Putnam. Location: Room HC-9, Capitol.

INSLEE-GREEN VEHICLE _ 10 a.m. - 4 p.m. Rep. Jay Inslee, D-Wash., will bring a plug-in hybrid concept car, the Chevrolt Volt, to Capitol Hill for members of Congress to preview. Location: South Capitol Street in front of the Rayburn Building horseshoe.

COPYRIGHT INDUSTRIES _ 11 a.m. Reps. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., Bob Goodlatte, R-Va., and Lamar Smith, R-Texas, will join the International Intellectual Property Alliance and its member associations to present a report, ``Copyright Industries in the US Economy: The 2006 Report, on the copyright industries significant contributions to the U.S. economy. Location: Room SC-6, Capitol.

HOYER _ 11 a.m. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer will hold his regular pen and pad briefing. He will discuss the upcoming continuing resolution, the President's budget, and Iraq. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

FEDERAL TAX GAP _ 11:15 a.m. Senx. Max Baucus, D-Mont., and Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, will speak briefly in the, on the topic of the Federal tax gap. The senators will have just completed an in-depth discussion with IRS experts on the $345 billion annual tax gap - the gulf between taxes legally owed and taxes actually collected in a timely fashion. Location: Lobby of the IRS Headquarters building, 1111 Constitution Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0123989

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE _ 11:30 a.m. Reps. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., Frank Pallone Jr., D-N.J., George Radanovich, R-Calif., and Joe Knollenberg, R-Mich., will hold a press conference to announce the introduction of legislation calling on the president and his administration to fully recognize the Armenian Genocide. Mrs. Sirarpi Khoyan, a genocide survivor who recently turned 100, also will be in attendance. Location: Room 1334, Longworth House Office Building.

EMERGING DEMOCRACIES _ 12:15 p.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a panel discussion on priorities and problems for democratizing nations, with Thomas Carothers, of the endowment, Jack Snyder of Columbia University and Francis Fukuyama of SAIS. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CHAO-PERFORMANCE _ 12:30 p.m. Secretary of Labor Elaine L. Chao will deliver the keynote address, ``Driving Performance.'' at the Performance Institutes Government Performance Summit. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, Hampton Room, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

DEMOCRATS _ 12:30 p.m. The Democratic Policy Committee holds a closed meeting. Location: Room S-211, Capitol. Notes: Stakeout note: Gallery escort for policy luncheons leaves at 11:30 a.m. from the Ohio Clock Corridor.

DISPLACED IRAQIS _ 12:30 p.m. The International Organization for Migration (IOM) and SAIS Foreign Policy Institute host a discussion led by IOMs Iraq Displacement Specialist, Dana Graber, who will present IOMs Iraq Displacement Report 2006. The discussion will be moderated by Dr. Thomas Keaney, Executive Director, Foreign Policy Institute of The Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS). Since February 22, 2006, assessments carried out by IOM confirm that 360,000 individuals have been displaced due to sectarian violence, military clashes, and criminality. Location: SAIS Rome Building Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

FAA-BLAKELY _ 12:30 p.m. FAA Administrator Marion Blakely addresses a National Press Club luncheon. Location: National Press Club.

IRAQ _ 12:30 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a presentation by Dana Graber, Iraq displacement specialist for the International Organization for Migration, discussing the IOMs newest report, ``Iraq Displacement 2006 Year in Review, `` which is being released on Jan. 30, The report says 360,000 people in Iraq have been displaced due to sectarian violence, military clashes and criminality. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

NELSON _ 12:30 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds a discussion with Sen. Bill Nelson, who will discuss his trip to Syria last month. Location: Washington Club, 14 Dupont Circle.

OCEANS REPORT CARD _ 12:30 p.m. The Joint Ocean Commission Initiative holds a media teleconference to release its report card on the status of U.S. efforts to protect the oceans. Areas graded include: national, state, and regional governance; research, science, and education; funding; fisheries management; and international leadership. The report card highlights developments in key states including California, Washington, Oregon, New York, Massachusetts, and the Gulf region. Briefers: Leon E. Panetta and Admiral James D. Watkins (USN, ret.), co-chairmen, Joint Ocean Commission Initiative. Contacts: Monisha Som, 202-293-6200 ext 219.

RELIGIOUS-MINIMUM WAGE _ 12:30 p.m. Senators Edward M. Kennedy, Sherrod Brown, and other senators join leaders in the religious community for a press conference on the urgency and moral obligation of paying Americas workers a fair wage. Location: Room S-324, Capitol.

REPUBLICANS _ 12:30 p.m. The Republican Policy Committee holds a closed meeting. Location: Room S-207, Capitol. Notes: Stakeout note: Gallery escort for policy luncheons leaves at 11:30 a.m. from the Ohio Clock Corridor.

LOCAL MEDIA DIVERSITY _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Center for American Progress Action fund hosts a panel, ``Local Media Diveristy Matter to All Americans,'' as the FCC revisits its media ownership rules, considering the impact of media consolidation on the opportunities for democratic deliberation of all Americans. Keynote Speaker: Rep, Xavier Becerra, D-Calif. Panelists: Robert Entman, J.B. and Maurice Shapiro Professor of Media and Public Affairs, George Washington University; Philip M. Napoli, Director of the Donald McGannon Communication Research Center, Fordham University; and Federico Subervi, Professor, School of Journalism and Mass Communication, Texas State University-San Marcos. Location: Room B-340, Rayburn House Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0123990

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTON FUNDING _ 1 p.m. Reps. Marty Meehan, D-Mass.; Christopher Shays, R-Conn.; and David Price, D-N.C., hold a press conference to discuss what they say is the need for reform of the presidential public financing system and to introduce their Presidential Funding Act legislation. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

SCIENTISTS-CLIMATE CHANGE _ 1 p.m. The Union of Concerned Scientists and the Government Accountability Project hold a teleconference on their release of a report that they say has uncovered new evidence of suppression and manipulation of climate science in seven federal agencies. Notes: Phone: 866-814-8448. Pass code: Climate Survey.

INTERNET FREEDOM _ 1 p.m. - 4 p.m. The Global Internet Freedom Task Force (GIFT), which is jointly chaired by Paula Dobriansky, Under Secretary for Democracy and Global Affairs, and Josette Sheeran, Under Secretary for Economic, Energy and Agricultural Affairs, will host its first conference on Global Internet Freedom. Location: U.S. Department of State, Marshall Center.

CONGRESS-NATIONAL GUARD _ 2 p.m. National Guard advocates in both the Senate and House hold a news conference to announce the introduction of legislation to strengthen the National Guards voice in Pentagon policy decisions affecting the Guard. Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Kit Bond, R-Mo., co-chairs of the Senate National Guard Caucus, will be joined by other House and other Guard Caucus members as they announce the introduction of the National Guard Empowerment Act of 2007. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

KIDNAPPED ISRAELI SOLDIER _ 2 p.m. Karnit Goldwasser, wife of kidnapped Israeli soldier Ehud Goldwasser, and Israeli Ambassador Sallai Meridor, join the new Chairman and Ranking Member of the House Subcommittee on the Middle East and South Asia Reps. Gary Ackerman and Mike Pence as well as Foreign Affairs Committee Ranking Member Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen at a press conference for the introduction of a resolution calling for the immediate release of her husband, as well as Eldad Regev and Gilad Shalit. Location: Room 2255, Rayburn House Office Building.

IRAQ-AFGHANISTAN DELEGATION _ 3 p.m. Speaker Nancy Pelosi and members of the bipartisan congressional delegation that recently returned from Iraq and Afghanistan hold a news conference to discuss their experiences and observations. In addition to Pelosi, participants are Chairman Ike Skelton, Armed Services Committee; Chairman Tom Lantos, Foreign Affairs Committee; Chairman Silvestre Reyes, Intelligence Committee; Chairman John Murtha, Defense Appropriations Subcommittee; Chairwoman Nita Lowey, State, Foreign Operations, and Related Programs Appropriations Subcommittee; Congressman David Hobson, Ranking Member, Energy and Water Development Appropriations Subcommittee. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn House Office Building.

GUTIERREZ-TRAVEL _ 4 p.m. Secretary of Commerce Carlos M. Gutierrez discusses how travel and tourism keeps our economy strong at a meeting of the Travel and Tourism Advisory Board. Location: Department of Commerce, 1401 Constitution Ave. NW.

DARFUR _ 6:30 p.m. - 8 p.m. Senior Advisor at the International Crisis Group John Prendergast will discuss ``Genocide in Darfur: What International Action and When? Prendergast, an expert on African affairs, will be joined by Paul Williams, GW visiting associate professor of international affairs. Location: George Washington University, Elliott School of International Affairs, Room 213, 1957 E St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JANUARY 30, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Attorneys Condemn Chinese Uighurs' Detention Conditions 3
Man Faces Terror Charges Stemming From Attack Against US Troops In Iraq 3
Al Qaeda Leader In Turkey, 47 Seven Other Terror Suspects Arrested 4
Gonzales' Remarks On Habeas Mark New Test On Executive Powers 4
NYTimes Celebrates Canada's Apology To Arar 5

Homeland Response:

Lack Of Screening For Airport Workers Said To Leave "Gaping Hole" In Security 5
NRC Rejects Petition To Harden Nuclear Plants Against Air Attack 5
Affidavit Details Aggressive Investigation Of Rhode Island Trucking Student 5
DHS IG Criticizes Coast Guard Modernization Program 6
Super Bowl Security Is Massive Coordinated Effort 6
Maine PUC Sets Domestic Surveillance Contempt Hearing For Verizon 6
Senators Criticize Administration At Katrina Hearing In New Orleans 7

War News:

Bush Warns Iran Against Interfering In Iraq 7
Iraqi Forces Said To Have Performed Poorly In Weekend Battle . 9
Bush Says He Expects Iraqis To Take The Lead In Ending Violence 10
Additional 21,500 Troops Going To Iraq Said To Lack Equipment 12
Senate Vote On Iraq Resolutions Could Be Put Off Until Next Week 12
20,000 US Soldiers Have Been Wounded, 500 Have Lost Limbs In Iraq 13
Former CPA Official Sentenced To Prison For Fraud 13
US Urged To Reach Out to Iraqi Refugees 13
Corrupt Afghan Officials Stealing Reconstruction Aid 13
Iraqi Prison Officials Tour South Carolina Jails For Ideas 14

Corporate Scandals:

KLA-Tencor Changes Options Report Citing Unintentional Backdating 14
British Bankers Again Seek Dismissal Of Enron-Related Charges 14
Former Officials Spared Prison Time In Cendant Accounting Scandal 15
SEC Approves Market-Based Method To Value Stock Options . 15
Former CA Official Sentenced To Six Months Home Detention.. 15
Fannie Mae CEO Received 25% Raise In 2006 15

Criminal Law:

"Unflappable" Fleischer Testifies Against Libby 15
DOJ Plans $200 Million Grant Program To Curb Violent Crime.. 17
Indiana Man Sentenced To Ten Years For Sexually Enticing Teen Online 17
FBI Investigating California Lawmaker's Land Deals 17
Williams Testifies She Did Not Try To Steal Coke Formula 17
Dangerous MS-13 Fugitive Arrested In Texas 18
Four Oklahoma Men Convicted Of Attending Cock Fight 18
US Alleges Pennsylvania Child Porn Suspect Also Had Sex With Child 18
FBI Internet Sex Solicitation Sting Snares Kentucky Man 18
Serial Child Molester Given Maximum Term In California 18
Judge Declines Probe Into AIPAC Case Leaks 19
Connecticut Man Gets Probation For False Chemical Attack Report 19
Florida Man Sentenced To Probation For JetBlue Hoax Bomb Threat 19
Chicago Alderman Says Powder Found In Corruption Raid Was Not Drug 19
Editorial Calls For DOJ To Charge Niagara Falls Official, Or Drop Probe 20
Hackers Search For Computer Bugs For Bounties 20
Virginia Men Face Federal Charges For Peddling Phony Purses20
WPost Examines Four DC Weekend Murders 21
Alleged Maryland Call Girl Found Dead Of Apparent Suicide Before Trial 21
Warden Claims Florida Inmate Showed No Pain During Execution 21
Miami Herald Says FBI "Dropped The Ball" On Foley Emails 21

Civil Law:

DOJ Suit Alleges Boehringer Ingelheim Inflated Drug Prices..... 21
US Alleges Florida Lab Owner Bilked Medicare For $17 Million . 22

Civil Rights:
NAACP Seeks DOJ Probe Of New Orleans Police Shootings.... 22
Witnesses In Mississippi Voting Rights Case Say They Were Not Told To Discriminate 22
Judge Denies Bond For Seale 23
DOJ Names Las Vegas As Major Human Trafficking Destination23

Antitrust:
DOJ Decision On Mittal Steel Still Up In Air..... 23
FTC Approves Bridgestone Acquisition Of Bandag..... 24
Microsoft Launches Marketing Campaign For Vista..... 24
Delta Open To Future Deals Despite Resistance To US Airways Bid 24
Merrill Lynch To Purchase First Republic 25
Citigroup To Purchase British Bank 25
Lawmakers Push For Bank Ownership Limits..... 26
EU To Threaten Banks, Credit Card Firms With Anti-Competition Fines 26
Amaranth's Rivals Profited From Its Collapse 26
Patent And Trademark Office Seeking New Examiners..... 26

Environment:
Climate Change Efforts Gaining Momentum In Congress 26
BP Faces Expanding Criminal Probe Over Texas Refinery Problems..... 27
Court Invalidates Salmon Rider In Appropriations Bill 27
Yosemite Suit May Affect Public Access To Park 28
Proposal To Drop Gray Wolves From Protection May Spark Legal Challenge 28
NYTimes Says Bush Fuel Economy Proposal Promises Only Hypothetical Results 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
In San Diego, 4 Drug Suspects Extradited From Mexico Plead Not Guilty 28
Seven Puerto Rican Doctors Accused Of Participating In Internet Pharmacy Scheme 29
Convicted Drug-Ring Members To Be Sentenced In Kentucky .. 29
Authorities Say Smuggling Tunnels Under US-Mexico Border Remain Unfilled..... 29
Supporters Seek To Change Montana's Medical Marijuana Law 29
Seattle-Based US Marshal Resigns 29
Florida Legislature Criticized For Easing Gun Laws..... 30

Immigration:
Coalition Optimistic About Immigrant Farm Worker Overhaul..... 30

Tax:
US Settles Tax Prosecution Claims With Texas Attorney..... 30
WSJournal Critical Of Reliance On "Tax Gap." 31

Congress-Administration:
In Midst Of "Export Boom," Bush To Promote New Trade Deals 31
Executive Order Said To Give White House More Control Over Federal Rules..... 31
Stark Says Bush Healthcare Plan "Doesn't Deserve Congress' Consideration."..... 31
Bush Civilian Reserve Corps Proposal Yet To Be Fleshed Out.. 32
Bush Says He Wasn't "Trying To Needle" By Referring To "Democrat" Party..... 32
Schumer Says Cheney Is "Brain Wave" Of Administration 33
Senate To Take Up Minimum Wage Bill, Business Tax Cuts 33
House Democratic Leaders Drop Plans For Pay Raise 33
Democrats Finalize $463.5 Billion Stop-Gap Funding Bill 34
Democratic Plan Bill To Authorize Generic Biological Drugs 34
Pelosi Courts Liberal Bloggers..... 34
GSA Offering Incentives For Managers, Execs To Work From Telework Centers..... 34
White House Hires New Pastry Chef..... 34
Cheney Refusal To Discuss Daughter's Pregnancy Seen As Hypocritical 34
Supreme Court Urged To Permit Issue Ads Before Elections..... 34
WSJournal Urges Bush To Stick To Voucher Proposal 35

Other News:
Bernanke Getting Positive Reviews..... 35
US Law Firm Makes Inroads In China 36
Fenty Taps Nonprofit Head As Next DC Attorney General 36
Unused Embryos Pose Dilemma For Couples 36
GOP Right Restive Over Possible '08 Presidential Candidates .. 36
Romney Able To Skirt Some Campaign Finance Rules..... 37
Former New Hampshire GOP Chief, Von Dongen Back Giuliani 37
Boston Ace Pitcher Schilling Endorses McCain 37
Hutchison Says She'd Consider VP Spot In 2008 Ticket..... 37
Hillary Clinton's Visit To Iowa Continues To Draw Attention 38
Edwards Admits He May Have Lacked Experience In 2004 38
Clinton, McCain Visit Center For Wounded Vets..... 39
Vilsack Takes Post At Drake University..... 39
Hunter Criticizes Kerry For Calling US "International Pariah."..... 39
Weak Fundraising Raises Questions About Hagel's Reelection Plans 39
Schumer Says "Middle Class Imagination" Key To 2008 39
GOP Campaigns Try To Avoid Allen's Fate 39
Franken To Leave Air America, May Run For Senate 39
Google Moves To Defuse "Google Bombs."..... 39
Drinan Remembered..... 40
Humane Society Becoming "A Tiger" Among DC Interest Groups40
California Praised For Moving Up Primary 40
WSJournal Warns Against Efforts To Ease Unionization..... 40
WPost Criticizes School Using Church For Graduation Ceremony 40
Talks With Pyongyang To Resume Next Week 40
Cheney To Visit Japan, Australia..... 41
US Offers Air Support For Somali Peacekeepers 41
Palestinian Factions Continue Fighting Despite Ceasefire..... 41
State Department Tells Congress Israel May Have Misused Cluster Bombs 41
Egypt Tightens Control On Press 42
Al-Jubeir Named New Saudi Ambassador 42
Chinese General To Be Pressed On Missile Test..... 42
Russian Presidential Candidates Seek Putin's Backing..... 42
Saudi Arabia Cuts Crude Output In Effort To Bolster Prices..... 42

DOJ_NMG_0123993

French Ambassador Says Ties With US Improving 42
Ghana To Chair African Union In Snub To Sudan 42
LATimes Welcomes Northern Ireland Peace Initiative 43

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 43

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 44

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Attorneys Condemn Chinese Uighurs' Detention Conditions. The Washington Post (1/30, A4, Smith, Tate) reports, "Chinese Uighurs who have been imprisoned for the past month at a new state-of-the-art detention camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, are being held around the clock in near-total isolation, a circumstance their lawyers say is rapidly degrading their mental health, according to an affidavit filed in federal court yesterday." The Post continues, "The lawyers' complaint is the latest step in their efforts to force an expedited review of the Uighurs' confinement by the U.S. Court of Appeals, a review that the Bush administration opposes and that Congress made more difficult in legislation it passed late last year. … The Uighurs' (pronounced weegurs) detention by the U.S. military, after being sold for bounty by Pakistanis in early 2002, has long attracted controversy. The men had just arrived from Afghanistan, where, they said, they had received limited military training because they opposed Chinese government control of their native region. But they said they never were allied with the Taliban or opposed to the United States, and had fled to Pakistan only to escape the U.S. bombing campaign." The Post adds, "By 2005, U.S. military review panels determined that five of the 18 captured Uighurs were 'no longer enemy combatants,' but they continued to be held at the Guantanamo Bay prison until their release last year. The panels did not reach that conclusion about the other 13, though all had given similar accounts of their activities during the reviews, according to declassified transcripts of the sessions. … U.S. District Judge James Robertson ruled in December 2005 that the government was unlawfully imprisoning the Uighurs who were found not to be combatants." The Post notes, "The Justice Department, in court papers, has maintained that the appellate court should delay reviewing the Uighurs' detention until cases related to other detainees are resolved. It also has said that legislation passed last year by Congress, which created new military panels to try Guantanamo Bay detainees on criminal charges, seriously limits the court's jurisdiction to question government decisions on their detention."

Man Faces Terror Charges Stemming From Attack Against US Troops In Iraq. The Washington Times (1/30, Seper, 88K) reports, "An Iraqi-born Dutch citizen pleaded not guilty yesterday in federal court in Washington to charges of conspiring with insurgents to attack U.S. military personnel in Iraq -- the first US criminal prosecution arising from terrorist activities in Iraq." Wesam al-Delaema, "extradited from the Netherlands on Saturday, had been sought by the US government since 2003, when he and other members of the 'Mujahideen from Fallujah' videotaped themselves planting explosives along an Iraqi road used by US troops." FBI Assistant Director Joseph Persichini Jr., "who heads the bureau's Washington field office, said Mr. al-Delaema's extradition 'sends a clear message of the FBI's unwavering dedication to our mission to detect, deter and bring to justice any individual who conspires to commit terrorist acts against any US citizen either in this country or on foreign soil.'"

The Washington Post (1/30, A4, Eggen, 690K) says "the unusual extradition agreement would allow Delaema to return to the Netherlands to serve his prison sentence if he is convicted, Dutch and US officials said. … Victor Koppe, who served as Delaema's attorney in the Netherlands, said the arrangement guarantees that Delaema will not be designated an enemy combatant or tried by a US military commission. Dutch courts also will be able to review and possibly modify the terms of any US sentence once Delaema is returned home, Koppe and U.S. officials said."

USA Today/AP (1/30) reports Al-Delaema's lawyers "have argued the US does not have the right to try him." Prosecutor Gregg Maisel "said the government would be seeking hair and saliva samples from al-Delaema, which the Justice Department said could link him to the crimes."

ABC News (1/30, Ryan, Thomas) reports, "Charges against Delaema include: conspiracy to kill U.S. citizens abroad; conspiracy to use a weapon of mass destruction (explosives); conspiracy to maliciously damage or destroy U.S. government property by means of an explosive; possession of a destructive device (explosives) during a crime of violence; conspiracy to possess a destructive device (explosives) during a crime of violence; and teaching or demonstrating the making or use of an explosive with the intent to further a crime of violence. … At the time of his arrest in the Netherlands, foreign media outlets reported that Dutch anti-terrorism police found video tapes of insurgent attacks and operations in Iraq at Delaema's residence. … Delaema was extradited to the United States from the Netherlands late Saturday night by the FBI and U.S. Marshals. He will be held without bond until his status conference and detention hearing on February 5."

DOJ_NMG_0123994

United Press International (1/30, Waterman) reports, "Monday, the U.S. District Court in Washington gave prosecutors permission to obtain DNA swabs from Delaema, so that they could be compared with a database of DNA obtained from bomb fragments and 'other physical items' recovered from attack scenes and other terrorist sites. … The database is compiled by the Terrorist Explosive Device Analytical Center -- a multi-agency effort between the U.S. Department of Defense and federal law enforcement agencies which functions as a repository for all kinds of forensic evidence from terror attacks in Iraq and elsewhere." UPI adds, "According to court filings, the center "conducts a full range of forensic and technical analysis on such items, utilizing analytical protocols that include photography, latent fingerprint analysis, trace evidence (hair and fiber), DNA, electronic and cryptographic analysis, and tool marks."" UPI notes, "According to the indictment and other court documents, Delaema was arrested May 2005 in the Dutch city of Amersfoort. One report at the weekend said Dutch authorities had been originally been tipped to Delaema by U.S. intelligence, and the court documents say Dutch police monitored telephone conversations he had with people in Iraq. … European counter-terrorist officials have broken up several networks recruiting and making travel arrangements for European Muslim extremists who want to go to fight the U.S. military in Iraq."

Al Qaeda Leader In Turkey, 47 Seven Other Terror Suspects Arrested. The New York Times (1/30, Arsu, 1.16M) reports, "In simultaneous operations carried out in five Turkish cities on Monday, the police arrested 47 people suspected of being Islamic militants, including the leader of Al Qaeda in Turkey, the semi-official Anatolian news agency reported." The Times adds, "Police acted on information warning of 'sensational attacks' by Turkish groups in coordination with Al Qaeda, the report said. No details were available on the nature of possible targets."

Gonzales' Remarks On Habeas Mark New Test On Executive Powers. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Savage) reports, "Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales provided laugh lines for comedians and fodder for outraged bloggers when he told senators recently that the Constitution does not specifically grant individuals the right to habeas corpus." The Times continues, "The Constitution appears to contradict him on that historic doctrine, which says those taken into custody have the right to plead their innocence before a judge. 'The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended,' it says, 'unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.' … Most constitutional experts agree that phrase clearly guarantees the right of habeas corpus. And Gonzales himself later clarified that he believes Americans do have that right. … But in a clumsy way, Gonzales was making a claim that underpins the Bush administration's controversial view that 'enemy combatants,' including the prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, are not entitled to fight the government in court." The Times adds, "The dispute involves not only the Constitution but also a separate law that spells out the reach of habeas corpus. The issue, which sparked the lively exchange between Gonzales and senators, is the focus of a bill before Congress as well as cases involving 'enemy combatants' that appear headed to the Supreme Court. … Many senators, including Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and its ranking Republican, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), believe the right to habeas corpus should apply broadly and include foreign terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay. … But they lost last year when the issue came before Congress. … In a 51-48 vote, the Senate joined the House in affirming the Bush administration's view that habeas corpus should not cover 'aliens' held as terrorism suspects or 'enemy combatants.'" The Times notes, "The new law, known as the Military Commissions Act, overturned a Supreme Court ruling that had extended habeas corpus rights to the detainees at Guantanamo Bay. But in that decision, in the case of Rasul vs. Bush, the justices said they were ruling only on the statutory law, not on the Constitution. … Now that Congress has overridden the high court's view, the next round of litigation in the 'war on terror' is focusing on the right to habeas corpus in the Constitution. … Although everyone — including, apparently, the attorney general — agrees the Constitution protects a right to habeas corpus, there is considerable debate over the reach of that right."

Virginian-Pilot Blasts Gonzales For Habeas Stance. The Virginian-Pilot (1/30) editorializes, "Even when White House policies seem ill-conceived, they at least have a veneer of defensible logic. If America doesn't like the idea of government agents examining its library habits, the practice does make a certain quaint, paranoid sense. … But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has ceased even trying to maintain the pretense of reason." The Virginian-Pilot continues, "Appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales abandoned cogency altogether for bald assertion of illogic as truth. … Gonzales, the highest officer of the law in the nation, asserted that because the framers don't specifically enumerate habeas corpus, it's not guaranteed, for example, to American citizens held in detention indefinitely without charge - precisely the kind of thing that habeas was designed to prevent. … The Constitution doesn't explicitly give people the freedom to have children or breathe the air, but nobody would claim Americans don't have the right to each of those things. … Gonzales' logic leads to the notion that only rights included in the Constitution actually exist, a little worrisome since it's a document silent on both babies and breathing. Still, if common sense and logic were the worst of Gonzales' violations, we'd be comforted."

DOJ_NMG_0123995

NYTimes Celebrates Canada's Apology To Arar. The New York Times (1/30, 1.16M) editorializes, "Canada set an important example of decency when it offered a formal apology and compensation worth millions of dollars to a Syrian-born Canadian citizen who was a victim of President Bush's use of open-ended detention, summary deportation and even torture in the name of fighting terrorism. Last week's announcement by Prime Minister Stephen Harper came more than four years after the nightmare began for the Canadian, Maher Arar, a 36-year-old software engineer," which was "part of a legally and morally unsupportable practice known as extraordinary rendition, the deportation of terrorism suspects to countries where the regimes are known to use torture and to disdain basic human rights protections. Four months ago, a Canadian government panel concluded that Mr. Arar had never had a terrorism connection, and that Americans had misled Canada about their plans for him. The Bush administration stonewalled the inquiry."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Lack Of Screening For Airport Workers Said To Leave "Gaping Hole" In Security. The CBS Evening News (1/29, story 7, 3:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported that at America's airport "there's still a gaping hole in the security net, because while 700 million travelers were subjected last year to metal detectors -- that even includes pilots, flight attendants and their carry-on baggage -- there was no similar screening of tens of thousands of airport workers." The TSA said in a statement that "employees working in secure areas '…are subject to multiple security areas,' including '…random screening at any time and without notice,' and '…are required to undergo extensive background checks.' But how extensive can those checks really be when just last year 65 illegal immigrants got into the TSA system and were working in some of the most secure areas of several major US airports before finally being arrested?"

NRC Rejects Petition To Harden Nuclear Plants Against Air Attack. Under the headline, "Nuclear Agency: Air Defenses Impractical," the Washington Post (1/30, A4, Mufson, 690K) reports, "Federal regulators plunged into an energy and national security controversy yesterday by ruling that the nation's 103 nuclear power plants do not need to protect themselves from potential attacks by terrorists using airplanes. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission's 5-to-0 ruling was in response to a 2004 petition by the Committee to Bridge the Gap, a Los Angeles nonprofit group, that said nuclear plants should build shields made of steel I-beams and cabling or take other steps to prevent a release of radiation in case of an air attack. Eight state attorneys general backed the petition. … 'Nuclear power plants are pre-emplaced nuclear weapons near major cities,' said Daniel Hirsch, president of the Committee to Bridge the Gap. 'They can't blow up like a nuclear bomb, but they can release a thousand times the radiation of the Hiroshima bomb. They are the most attractive target for a terrorist to hit in our country.'" But "NRC Chairman Dale Klein said, 'Nuclear power plants are inherently robust structures that our studies show provide adequate protection in a hypothetical attack by an airplane.'" The NRC may "impose stricter requirements on new plants," but for now, "the NRC said that guarding against airborne attacks was the job of the military and other agencies."

The New York Times/AP (1/30, Press) notes that the NRC said, "[p]lant operators should instead focus on limiting radioactive releases and public exposure from any such airborne attack, the agency said in a revised defense plan for nuclear plants. 'The active protection against airborne threats is addressed by other federal organizations, including the military,' the commission said."

Under the headline, "Idea To 'Cage' Atomic Plants Is Rejected; A California group had asked that steel shields and other anti-terrorism measures be mandated," the Los Angeles Times (1/30, Weikel, 850K) reports that the NRC "adopted regulations similar to security directives it imposed in April 2003, without public hearings, on operators of commercial reactors. The directives deal with the size, training and composition of security forces; reactor security; barriers to protect against truck or car bombs; the dimensions of security perimeters; and the numbers of terrorists that plants must defend against." Still, "some fear that a terrorist attack could breach a reactor or a plant's nuclear waste storage facilities and release harmful radiation."

Affidavit Details Aggressive Investigation Of Rhode Island Trucking Student. The Providence Journal (1/30, Ziner, 167K) reports, "Shortly after Mohammed Mullawala's arrest in Rhode Island last month, investigators discovered he was a man on the move who ricocheted from state to state, city to city and apartment to apartment. But a state police affidavit draws a more complicated picture of the man whose behavior at a Smithfield trucking school in November triggered a nationwide investigation that involves the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and multiple state police fusion centers tasked with homeland security concerns. Mullawala, a 28-year-old Indian national, faces a deportation hearing today." The Journal notes, "The timeline revolves around 11 addresses in four states that Mullawala says he lived at. Only 7 have checked out so far, some of which he apparently stayed at for only a month. … The affidavit underscores how vigorously FBI agents and state police detectives attached to the FBI's Joint Anti-Terrorism Task Force have been pursuing leads tied to Mullawala, despite the lack of any criminal charges against him. … It states that federal agents are still trying to determine if Mullawala lived where he said he lived."

DOJ_NMG_0123996

DHS IG Criticizes Coast Guard Modernization Program. In its "Fleecing of America" segment, NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 8, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Federal government is spending billions of dollars to improve the fleet of the US Coast Guard, but a new watchdog report charges the program has serious problems. Ships that are way over budget and perhaps not even completely seaworthy." NBC (Meyers) adds that according to a report by federal watchdogs, a 418-foot Coast Guard cutter that had been "hailed as a crucial new weapon in the war on terror" suffers from "significant design flaws likely to shorten its useful life, increase maintenance costs and limit its ability to venture far from US shores. And the cost of building just two of these ships has roughly doubled to almost $1billion." Myers added that the report "is merely the latest debacle in a $24 billion program, known as Deepwater, to upgrade the Coast Guard fleet." Some "see a larger problem in the agency that oversees the Coast Guard." Rep. Bennie G. Thompson was shown saying, "We have assumed that the Department Of Homeland Security was shipshape. But in reality, they are just ships of fools."

The AP (1/29, Caterinicchia) reported that in a written response to the report from the Department of Homeland Security's IG, "the Coast Guard said it had 'serious concerns' with the investigators' approach to reviewing and analyzing the program. 'The report contains selective inclusion of documents that do not represent the most current, comprehensive, or technically accurate data,' the Coast Guard said."

Super Bowl Security Is Massive Coordinated Effort. The AP (1/30, Anderson) reports from Miami, "Gavin moved quickly around the spacious convention center, searching for a hidden bomb. Near a glass box containing a fire extinguisher, he sniffed the air and abruptly sat down. Inside was a pound of live high explosives, wrapped in black plastic. … For successfully finding the 'bomb,' Gavin got a treat from his handler, Special Agent L.A. Bykowsky of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. His training exercise over, the 7-year-old golden Labrador retriever is ready for duty conducting bomb-sniffing sweeps for the Super Bowl and its related events and hotels." The AP continues, "Gavin will be among 66 specialized canine bomb teams working as part of a massive local, state and federal security effort to protect one of the world's highest-profile public events from terrorists, foreign and domestic. The dog teams are one element of a 6-inch-thick security plan, which includes jet fighters and helicopters, tactical weapons teams, mobile bomb labs and robots, high-tech X-ray machines and sensors, intelligence databases and hundreds of uniformed police officers. … 'We don't have any specific threat to this event,' said Julie Torres, chief of the ATF's Miami office and the designated federal coordinator for Super Bowl security. 'It is the biggest event in the nation as far as a sporting event. It is vulnerable as far as any terrorist activity. We have to plan excessively so we can provide proper security.' … Those plans began to take shape two weeks after last year's Super Bowl in Detroit. This year's game is the sixth since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, which forever changed the security landscape for any major U.S. public event. The Super Bowl is a Level One national security event, right behind a presidential inauguration in importance." The AP notes, "The FBI plays a major role in coordinating the dissemination of intelligence and law enforcement databases - and investigating any suspected terrorism plots. … 'Information dissemination is one of our highest priorities,' said Stuart McArthur, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami field office and head of the South Florida Joint Terrorism Task Force. 'Every threat that comes in will be checked out by the South Florida JTTF.'"

Maine PUC Sets Domestic Surveillance Contempt Hearing For Verizon. The AP (1/30, Quinn) reports, "The Maine Public Utilities Commission unanimously voted Monday to schedule a hearing next month to allow Verizon Communications Inc. to argue why it should not be held in contempt for its response to a commission order stemming from allegations about domestic surveillance by the federal government." The AP continues, "The case involves a multi-customer complaint filed last May effectively seeking to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant. … The complaint followed media reports about a National Security Agency eavesdropping program." The AP adds, "Verizon, in answer to the customer complaint, issued a response on May 19, 2006, in which it referred to points made in two press releases, including one that declared the company was not asked for records by the NSA and did not provide such records. … The PUC subsequently ordered Verizon, on Aug. 9, to affirm in writing that its representations to the commission were true. … On Aug. 21, the same day that the U.S. Justice Department filed suit against the PUC and Verizon asserting that the PUC was pre-empted by federal law from investigating the alleged spying program, Verizon said it would not submit an affirmation, citing legal action by the federal government. … Since then, the PUC has sought to have the federal suit dismissed and the complaint case has not moved forward." The AP notes, "The Bush administration has agreed to let a panel of federal judges oversee the government's domestic spying program. .. .The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will have final say in approving wiretaps on communications involving people with suspected terror links, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said earlier this month in a letter to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee."

DOJ_NMG_0123997

Senators Criticize Administration At Katrina Hearing In New Orleans. The New York Times (1/30, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports, "Three United States senators sounded off on Monday about the slow pace of recovery from Hurricane Katrina at a hearing in the French Quarter, criticizing federal officials for perceived inequities in aid to Louisiana and for imposing rules that are halting government assistance." Sens. Barack Obama and Mary L. Landrieu "focused on why Louisiana, which had far more damage than Mississippi, did not receive a larger proportion of federal aid." Responding to the senators, Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator of Gulf Coast rebuilding, "said Congress had put a cap on how much aid money any one state could get. The senators complained about federal rules requiring a local match for aid after disasters; Mr. Powell said that in some cases, like the removal of the tons of debris that inundated the landscape here, the rules had been waived." The senators also "used the occasion to echo local laments that President Bush did not mention New Orleans in his State of the Union address.

NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 6, 2:00, Savidge, 9.87M) reported that it was up to Powell "to take the heat" from the Democratic senators. Powell was shown saying, "Progress is being made. The President has stood in Jackson Square and vowed that the Gulf Coast would be rebuilt stronger and better." Savidge: "The senators are frustrated by a lack of progress from the so-called 'Road Home Program.'" Sen. Joseph Lieberman: "The numbers are stunning, over 101,000 homeowners have applied for assistance under this program, but less than 300 homeowners have actually received funding." Savidge: "Powell said the problem wasn't the lack of Federal will, but a lack of local leadership, local leaders pointed finger back at government."

The Chicago Tribune (1/30, Dorning, 617K) reports Obama "blasted the Bush administration, saying, "There is not a sense of urgency in this administration to get this done." The Tribune adds, "The broken homes and vacant streets of the city's flood-damaged neighborhoods remain a potent political symbol." The Tribune also noted that Obama "echoed" criticism of the lack of a Gulf Coast mention in the State of the Union address, saying, "Those of us who are concerned all across the country wonder if we're in danger of forgetting about New Orleans, and that's shameful." Powell "said he was confident that when the history of the recovery effort is written 'it will also be a story of modern renaissance.'"

Landrieu Says Terror Attack Would Have Been Preferable, Calls Mississippi Most Corrupt State. Roll Call (1/30, Pershing) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column this morning that though they had "thought it likely everything that could be said about the tragedy already had been said," Landrieu "had some highly original things to say" at Monday's hearing. "'I often think we would have been better off if the terrorists had blown up our levees. Maybe we'd have gotten more attention,' Landrieu said, according to a report from the New Orleans station WWL-TV." Landrieu continued that there is a bias against her state in Washington, D.C., and that "Mississippi is actually the most corrupt state in the union." Landrieu communications director Adam Sharp said that in referencing terrorism, Landrieu "was just reflecting on the priorities of the [Bush] administration." And "Landrieu makes no apologies" for referring to Mississippi as the most corrupt state in the union.

Business Group Releases Disaster Response Recommendations. The Washington Post (1/30, A15, Hsu, 690K) reports following complaints from business leaders that "too many efforts to help the US disaster response were thwarted by red tape" after Hurricane Katrina, Business Executives for National Security, a nonprofit, nonpartisan advisory group representing disaster-related industries, has released "a plan for public-private disaster coordination." Among other thing, the plan, released yesterday, recommends a rewrite of "the nation's disaster laws and the National Response Plan to include the private sector; tackle issues such as liability, medical and regulatory waivers; and make businesses eligible for federal aid when carrying out disaster responsibilities, such as providing security for emergency repairs."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Warns Iran Against Interfering In Iraq. President Bush was interviewed Monday on NPR (1/29), where he said, "If Iran escalates its military action in Iraq to the detriment of our troops and/or innocent Iraqi people, we will respond firmly." The interview generated only limited coverage, and, although Bush discussed a variety of issues, media reports focused primarily on his remarks on Iran. The CBS Evening News (1/29, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M), for example, noted the President had warned Iran to "back off," while in a brief report, NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 4, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) said Bush "added, however, that he has no intention of invading Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0123998

The AP (1/30, Hunt) reports Bush "also acknowledged skepticism concerning US intelligence about Iran, because Washington was wrong in accusing Iraq of harboring weapons of mass destruction before the US-led invasion in 2003." The President said he is "like a lot of Americans that say, 'Well, if it wasn't right in Iraq, how do you know it's right in Iran.'"

The Chicago Tribune (1/30, Silva, 617K) reports that on the issue of Iran's nuclear ambitions, Bush "insist[ed] that he is confident in the power of diplomacy to resolve it." The President also "repeatedly has asserted the right of US forces to intervene in the Iranian shipment of weaponry into Iraq," but "insists he has no plans to invade Iran, despite worries voiced in Congress."

The Washington Times (1/30, Dinan, 88K) reports Bush "also accused Iran of being part of an effort to bring down Lebanon's government as well," saying it is working with Syria and Hezbollah to "foment violence." Meanwhile, "trying to shore up support for his new plan to secure Iraq," he told NPR that senators would be sending "a contradictory message" if they vote for a resolution opposing the troop increase because those lawmakers voted just last week in favor of a new military commander who says the troops are needed.

In addition, says AFP (1/30), the President also "deplored" recent violence in Lebanon and warned that Iran, Syria and Hezbollah must be "called to account" for trying to destabilize that country. In a statement, Bush said, "While Lebanon's friends seek to help the Lebanese government build a free, sovereign, and prosperous country, Syria, Iran and Hezbollah are working to destabilize Lebanese society," noting that "those responsible for creating chaos must be called to account."

US Military Says It Has "Proof Positive" Of Iran Involvement In Iraq Violence. The CBS Evening News (1/29, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The United States has repeatedly warned Iran against meddling in Iraq." Bush "has accused Iran of supplying insurgents with weapons that have killed nearly 200 servicemen and women and wounded nearly 600 since the war began. Iran has denied it, but tonight the US military says it has proof positive…[which] can only worsen the tension between the US and Iran." CBS (Martin) added, "Outright war between the US and Iran remains only a remote possibility. But they are already fighting a proxy war inside Iraq. Some, but by no means all, of the violence there is stoked by Iran. US officials say there is clear evidence Iran wants to make the United States bleed as much as possible." CBS added, "US officials tell CBS News serial numbers on parts used to make advanced explosive devices powerful enough to breach the armor on an American tank have been traced directly back to Iran. These officials also say rocket propelled grenade launchers and assault rifles found in Iraq bear Iranian factory markings."

US Official Says North Korea, Iran Cooperating On Missile Development. The Washington Times (1/30, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports in a front page article that North Korea and Iran "are cooperating in developing long-range missiles," the deputy director of the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency said yesterday. During an address at the George C. Marshall Institute, Army Brig. Gen. Patrick O'Reilly "said…North Korea test fired a long-range Taepodong missile in July, and Iran is working on a space launcher that would help develop an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) that could hit the US." North Korea, he noted, "uses its missiles as 'geopolitical leverage' over the United States and its allies and also to raise money by selling them abroad," while Iran is building missiles for "both asymmetric threats and conventional threats" to US and allied forces. The speech "marked the first time the Pentagon publicly disclosed the missile cooperation between Pyongyang and Tehran," he noted.

Arab Nations Anxious Over Rise In Iran's Influence. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/30, A1, Shadid, 690K) reports, "Four years after the United States invaded Iraq, in part to transform the Middle East, Iran is ascendant, many in the region view the Americans in retreat, and Arab countries, their own feelings of weakness accentuated, are awash in sharpening sectarian currents that many blame the United States for exacerbating." As struggle for influence in the region deepens, "many in the Arab world find themselves on the sidelines. They are increasingly anxious over worsening tension between Sunni and Shiite Muslims across the Middle East, even as some accuse the United States of stoking that tension as a way to counter predominantly Shiite Iran. Fear of Iranian dominance is coupled, sometimes in the same conversation, with suspicion of US intentions in confronting Iran."

Iran, Saudi Arabia Seek To Mediate Lebanon Agreement. Under the headline "US Ally And Foe Are Trying To Avert War In Lebanon," the New York Times (1/30, A6, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "In an unusual collaboration that could complicate American policy in the region, Iran and Saudi Arabia have been mediating an agreement to end Lebanon's violent political crisis." Hezbollah officials "have recently visited the Saudi king in Riyadh, according to officials who attended the meeting. And Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi chief security adviser, has met with his Iranian counterpart, Ali Larijani, in Riyadh and Tehran to try to stop Lebanon's slide into civil war." However, the Saudi-Iranian efforts "have put Washington in an awkward position, since it is trying to reduce Iran's regional influence. But since a stable Lebanon is also an American priority, American officials have watched the efforts without interfering."

DOJ_NMG_0123999

Bolton Criticizes US Policy In Iran, Iraq. The Washington Times (1/30, Morrison, 88K) reports in its "Embassy Row" column that former US Ambassador to the UN, John Bolton, "dropped diplomatic niceties" in an interview with the French daily Le Monde, "calling for the replacement of the Iranian government, criticizing some US moves in Iraq and fretting about the US troop surge." He told the newspaper, in an interview published yesterday, that the "negotiations [with Iran] have failed," adding that the only way to deal with the Iranian regime is to "isolate them on the international level." He also "criticized the Bush administration's early administrative control over Iraq through the Coalition Provisional Authority," which, he said, deprived the Iraqis of "political responsibilities" and "gave the terrorists and the remainders of [Saddam Hussein's] Ba'ath Party a chance to gather." On the subject of Bush's proposed troop "surge," Bolton called it "the best of a series of bad options."

Europeans Resisting US Calls To Curb Ties With Iran. The New York Times (1/30, A1, Weisman, 1.16M) reports on its front page that European governments "are resisting Bush administration demands that they curtail support for exports to Iran and that they block transactions and freeze assets of some Iranian companies," officials on both sides say. Their resistance "threatens to open a new rift between Europe and the United States over Iran." At issue now is how the most recent UNSC resolution is to be carried out, "with Europeans resisting American appeals for quick action, citing technical and political problems related to the heavy European economic ties to Iran and its oil industry." American officials are pressing Italy, Germany, France, Spain, Austria, the Netherlands, Sweden and Britain, because they all have "extensive business dealings with Iran, particularly in energy."

Shell Iran Plan May Lead To US Sanctions. The Financial Times (1/30, Crooks) reports US authorities will "take a look at" a "controversial" agreement signed over the weekend by Royal Dutch Shell "that could ultimately lead to a multi-billion dollar investment in Iran," a US State Department official said. Shell and its partner Repsol of Spain have signed a service agreement with the Iranian government "to continue work on developing blocks 13 and 14 of the giant South Pars gas field, in spite of mounting international pressure over the country's nuclear program." Assistant Secretary McCormack said Monday that US government lawyers and policymakers "would take a look at the Shell deal, to see whether to take any action."

Legislation Targets Surplus Sales To Iran. The AP (1/30, Theimer) reports Sen. Ron Wyden (D-OR) has proposed legislation to "cut off all Pentagon sales of surplus F-14 parts, saying the military's marketing of the spares 'defies common sense' in light of their importance to Iran." The measure "would ban the Defense Department from selling surplus F-14 parts and prohibit buyers who have already acquired surplus Tomcat parts from exporting them."

Ahmadinejad Faces Mounting Domestic Criticism. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A5, Spindle, 2.04M) reports, "With another confrontational moment in Iran's nuclear standoff approaching next month, criticism of the country's president at home is increasing." President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad now "suddenly faces a concerted effort by political foes to constrain both his populist economic policies and his public defiance of the West." Many of Tehran's elite politicians and clerics "have long harbored concerns about Mr. Ahmadinejad… But the immense popularity he generated among Iran's poor and working-class voters kept many of his critics from speaking out or openly moving against his policies." However, a round of elections late last year "has undermined Mr. Ahmadinejad's political momentum and unleashed a flood of public criticism and moves to clip his wings."

Iraqi Forces Said To Have Performed Poorly In Weekend Battle. The New York Times (1/30, Santora, 1.16M) reports, "Iraqi forces were surprised and nearly overwhelmed by the ferocity of an obscure renegade militia in a weekend battle near the holy city of Najaf and needed far more help from American forces than previously disclosed, American and Iraqi officials said Monday." They "said American ground troops -- and not just air support as reported Sunday -- were mobilized to help the Iraqi soldiers, who appeared to have dangerously underestimated the strength of the militia, which calls itself the Soldiers of Heaven and had amassed hundreds of heavily armed fighters." The Iraqis and Americans "eventually prevailed in the battle. But the Iraqi security forces' miscalculations about the group's strength and intentions raised troubling questions about their ability to recognize and deal with a threat."

ABC World News (1/29, story 2, 2:40, Karl, 8.78M) said "Iraqis may have been in the lead here, but several hundred American troops were involved and most of the killing ultimately done by US air power." ABC also noted President Bush's comments in an NPR interview, saying Bush "seemed buoyed by the performance of the Iraqi troops."

NBC Nightly News (1/29, lead story, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "if it wasn't hard enough to figure out all the factions in the fighting in Iraq, tonight there is word from a battlefield in the desert halfway around the world that there is a new force to worry about and it is being described as a cult. You may have heard of the big attack yesterday that left 200 Iraqis dead. They were fighting US soldiers and their fellow Iraqis, Shiite on Shiite. And tonight all indications are this group was bent on making a big kill before they themselves were killed in the fight." NBC (Arraf) added, "One of those killed, according to Iraqi official, the leader of the group. An Iraqi who believed he was a messenger of God. His group came out of nowhere and waged one of the biggest battles fought by Iraqi forces. The group called Soldiers of Heaven was using the cover of hundreds of thousands of Shi'as on their way to the holy cities. Their goal was to attack the pilgrims the holy sites and to kill top Shi'a clerics."

DOJ_NMG_0124000

The CBS Evening News (1/29, story 2, 2:00, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "An Iraqi official said there were women and children among the detainees from the battlefield, describing them as family members who had been tricked into joining the cult. And an Iraqi soldier with military intelligence told CBS News that he saw women and children among the dead."

USA Today/AP (1/30, 5A), Los Angeles Times (1/30, Roug, Daragahi, 850K), Washington Post (1/30, A1, Partlow, Sarhan, 690K) and Washington Times/AP (1/30, Gamel) also report on the battle. The Christian Science Monitor (1/30, Murphy, 59K), in a story titled "Battle Suggests New Sectarian Divides In Iraq," says that "what precisely happened near the Shiite shrine city of Najaf Sunday is still being sorted out, but it seems likely that at its root was an unusual new wrinkle in Iraqi violence: a Shiite plan to attack Shiites. … The incident is a reminder of the swirling agendas now at play in Iraq and the turbulent political waters US troops are wading into as more soldiers arrive and President Bush has vowed to stand by Shiite Islamist Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki."

Bush Says He Expects Iraqis To Take The Lead In Ending Violence. President Bush, in an interview with NPR's All Things Considered yesterday (1/29, Williams), addressed his expectations once his new Iraq strategy is implemented. Bush, also reacting to yesterday's battle between US and Iraqi forces and an insurgent group, said, "One of the things that I expect to see is the Iraqis take the lead and show the American people that they're willing to do the hard work necessary to secure their democracy. And our job is to help them. ... We can debate terms, but what can't be debated is the fact that Iraq is violent. And the violence is caused by Sunni Arabs, like al Qaeda, who have made it clear that they want to create chaos and drive the United States out so they can have safe haven, and then they could launch attacks against America." ABC World News (1/29, story 2, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) briefly noted Bush's comments as part of its coverage of violence in Iraq, saying Bush "seemed buoyed by the performance of the Iraqi troops."

Baker Agrees To Testify Before Congress Today. The Hill (1/30, Bolton) reports, "James A. Baker III, the co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, has ended weeks of resistance and today will testify before Congress on the war, avoiding a split with his fellow co-chairman, former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.). Sources familiar with the efforts to persuade Baker to testify said he did not want to appear to be lobbying against President Bush at the height of his push for 21,500 additional troops in Iraq." Baker "will answer senators' questions today during a hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which includes three Democratic presidential hopefuls and Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), the chamber's most forceful Republican critic of the war, who also is mulling a White House bid."

Lugar Says Bush Plan A "Draw Play On Third Down With 20 Yards To Go In The First Quarter." Sen. Richard Lugar, ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, writes in the Washington Post (1/30, A17, 690K), "Some commentators have compared the Bush plan to a 'Hail Mary' pass in football -- a desperate heave deep down the field by a losing team at the end of the game. Actually, a far better analogy for the Bush plan is a draw play on third down with 20 yards to go in the first quarter. The play does have a chance of working if everything goes perfectly, but it is more likely to gain a few yards and set up a punt on the next down, after which the game can be continued under more favorable circumstances." Lugar adds, "The president's plan is an early episode in a much broader Middle East realignment that began with our invasion of Iraq and that may not end for years. … The administration must avoid becoming so quixotic in its attempt to achieve the optimal outcome in Iraq that it fails to adjust to shifts in the region or political realities within Iraq. Although any administration would be reluctant to talk about a Plan B when its primary plan is still in motion, the president and Congress must reach a consensus on how to protect our broader strategic interests regardless of what happens in those Baghdad neighborhoods or on the floor of the Senate."

McCaskill Says Bush Strategy Showcases Wrong Priorities. Democratic Sen. Claire McCaskill said on Fox News' Your World (1/29, Cavuto), "My problem with what…Bush is asking of the American people is that we have not required that the Maliki government show us anything. They've been talking and I think the American public has been very patient. I don't think we've been impatient. It's been four years, and every time the Maliki government has said we will stand up and do something, they have failed to do it. ... This plan, if you really scrub it, is a law enforcement operation on steroids. The city is divided into large precincts, and they are going to be going out with the Iraqi military and the Iraqi police and helping them with the lawlessness that has enveloped Baghdad. ... If we do not have the Iraqi police and the Iraqi military and we do not have any kind of criminal justice system within the country, that should come first before we spend more of our precious lives and more of our treasures."

DOJ_NMG_0124001

Nelson Says Proposed Surge Too Small To Help. The AP (1/30, Flaherty) reports Armed Services Committee member Sen. Bill Nelson, in "remarks prepared for a speech Tuesday," "said only another 200,000 or 300,000 U.S. troops would make a substantial difference in Iraq. ... Nelson also was expected to deliver a sharp rebuke of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Nelson said al-Maliki 'either lacks the will, or the nerve, to take on the Shiite militias.'" The AP adds, "Public sentiment has turned strongly against a war that has dragged on for nearly four years with more than 3,000 American dead and violence unabated by insurgents and sectarian militias."

Huckabee Expresses Support For Bush Plan. Former Arkansas Governor and 2008 presidential candidate Mike Huckabee said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/29, Blitzer) that Bush "has got to be given a chance to succeed with the plan that he has and that Gen. Petraeus is telling the Congress will work. ... I can't tell you it's going to work, because I don't know. But I do know that it's time to stand behind our troops, and see if the President's plan of increasing the patrols in Baghdad will at least work for bringing some stability." Asked what gives him "confidence that this new strategy might work," Huckabee replied, "Because it comes from a trusted general, Gen. Petraeus, who is there, and whose method of operations when he was with the 101st Airborne, I think, was a successful operation. Let's hope it's going to be this time."

Decision On Iraq War Attributed To Water Cooler-Style Deliberation. In his Washington Post column (1/30), Richard Cohen says, "A better name" for the Iraq war "would be the War of the Water Cooler. This, I'm sure, is where it all started. You can scour the vast literature about the Iraq war and how it started and not find the single moment when George W. Bush decided he had to go to war -- and why. The minutes of all the pertinent meetings, all of them surely monitored by Bob Woodward, either have produced nothing or will produce nothing because nothing was produced in these meetings. This war, I am sure, was the product of what Dick Cheney said to Bush at the White House water cooler. No one was present to take any of this down on paper."

More Commentary. Bret Stephens writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/30, A16, 2.04M), "These are our options in Iraq: We can withdraw troops and equipment as fast as our Galaxys and Globemasters can carry them home (or to Okinawa). This is the Murtha Way. We can cap troop levels at 140,000 and withdraw them no later than Inauguration Day, 2009. This is Hillary's Way. We can redeploy our forces outside of Iraqi cities, conduct limited training and counterterrorism missions, urge reconciliation among the various political factions and seek diplomatic openings with Syria and Iran. This is the way of Sens. Chuck Hagel and Joe Biden. We can advocate and facilitate the partition of Iraq. This is the (Peter) Galbraith Way. Or we can surge troops into the toughest neighborhoods of Baghdad, Ramadi and Najaf and keep them there indefinitely. That is the President's Way." Bush's approach "is going to mean many more American casualties -- perhaps as many in the months ahead as we've seen over the past four years. It may fail for lack of troops, or insufficient cooperation from the Iraqi government. It could be defeated in the field, or it could succeed -- only to be undermined in Washington, much as Gen. Creighton Abrams's 1972 battlefield victories in Vietnam were. It lacks an endgame. It's a political loser." But "it is the only strategy on the table that aims at victory and has a chance of succeeding."

Fouad Ajami, who teaches at Johns Hopkins, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/30, A17, 2.04M), "So this government in Baghdad, fighting for its life, has not mastered even the grim science of the gallows, and has no knowledge of the 'drop charts' used for hangings around the world. The Tikritis had been much better at this sort of thing." Iraq "has been fought over, and a verdict can already be discerned -- rough balance between its erstwhile Sunni rulers and its Shia inheritors, and a special, autonomous life for the Kurds. Against all dire expectations, the all-important question of the distribution of oil wealth appears close to a resolution. … This is the country midwifed by American power. We were never meant to stay there long. Iraq will never approximate the expectations we projected onto it in more innocent times. But we should be able to grant it the gift of acceptance, and yet another dose of patience as it works its way out of its current torments. … This may not be the stuff of glory, but it has power and legitimacy all its own."

Author Milton Viorst writes in the New York Times (1/30, 1.16M) that Bush "seems not to have noticed, but what stands between hostile sectarian forces and the resumption of all-out civil war in Lebanon is the Arab League, whose diplomacy 17 years ago put an end to a conflict in which tens of thousands of Lebanese died. Is there not a lesson here, for the president and the Democratic Congress, that is applicable to Iraq? … Curiously, the Iraq Study Group, in acknowledging Iraqi distrust of the United States, suggested a greater diplomatic role for Syria and Iran, the very countries that have an interest in Iraq's instability. Though better relations with these two countries might be in Washington's long-term interest, they are surely not going to help matters in Iraq. That's where the Arab League comes in. Because it is Arab, it can count on a level of trust, even among suspicious Iraqis, not available to the United States or its Western allies." Viorst adds "critics argue that the Arab League, being heavily Sunni, can have no influence on Iraq's Shiites." But "they forget that the bulk of the Iraqi Army that defeated Iran in the 1980-88 war was Shiite. This fact alone tells us that Iraqi Shiites, much as they want to be rid of the American occupation, are not ready to become Iranian. The Arab League can work from this premise to restore Iraq's stability. The United States cannot."

DOJ_NMG_0124002

Additional 21,500 Troops Going To Iraq Said To Lack Equipment. The Washington Post (1/30, A12, Tyson, 690K) reports, "Boosting US troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 would create major logistical hurdles for the Army and Marine Corps, which are short thousands of vehicles, armor kits and other equipment needed to supply the extra forces, US officials said." The increase would also "further degrade the readiness of U.S.-based ground forces, hampering their ability to respond quickly, fully trained and well equipped in the case of other military contingencies around the world and increasing the risk of U.S. casualties, according to Army and Marine Corps leaders. 'The response would be slower than we might like, we would not have all of the equipment sets that ordinarily would be the case, and there is certainly risk associated with that,' the Marine Corps commandant, Gen. James Conway, told the House Armed Services Committee last week." The Post adds, "US commanders privately expressed doubts that Iraq-bound units would receive a full complement of Humvees."

Senate Vote On Iraq Resolutions Could Be Put Off Until Next Week. Roll Call (1/30, Stanton, Pierce, Yachnin) reports, "With a vote on one or more nonbinding resolutions opposing President Bush's decision to boost troop levels in Iraq likely a week away, Senate Democratic leaders are expected to use the delay to push back against tough White House rhetoric and attempt to build a bipartisan coalition on the issue, aides said Monday. A senior Democratic leadership aide said Monday that while no talks with Republicans who oppose Bush's Iraq strategy have been scheduled, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) likely will 'extend some olive branches' later in the week as the chamber moves closer to next week's vote." Republicans "are expected to oppose any effort by Reid to bring the minimum-wage debate to a close before Thursday. Because of that, a plan to begin debate on a resolution sponsored by Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Joseph Biden (D-Del.) will be put off until sometime next week, Democratic aides said." Democrats "are deeply skeptical of GOP indications that they would like to use all of the time allowed to them procedurally before wrapping up this week's debate on minimum wage. … If Republicans use all the time available to them under Senate rules on the minimum-wage bill, debate on the Iraq resolution likely would begin at the end of this week at the earliest." Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell "has said repeatedly that he does not want to block a vote on an Iraq resolution, but that he will not allow a vote on the Democrats' Iraq resolution without an agreement to also have several other votes on GOP-sponsored resolutions less critical of the president."

Also reporting on the Senate debate, USA Today (1/30, Kiely, 2.27M) says "one focus will be on a group of lawmakers with special expertise: the ones who know what it's like to fight a war that has lost the support of the American public. … When it comes to President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, however, Congress' Vietnam veterans are divided." In the Senate, "four Vietnam combat veterans are playing key roles in the debate: Hagel authored the resolution opposing Bush's plan; his close friend, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a former prisoner of war in Hanoi, is a leading backer of the Bush plan. … Then there are Kerry and Sen. Jim Webb. During the 2004 presidential campaign, Webb, D-Va., leveled withering criticisms of Kerry's anti-war activities in the 1970s. This time, Webb voted with Kerry for Hagel's resolution."

The Washington Post (1/30, A3, Weisman, Tyson, 690K), under the headline "Soldier's Death Strengthens Senators' Antiwar Resolve," says "just before Christmas, an Army captain named Brian Freeman cornered Sens. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) at a Baghdad helicopter landing zone. The war was going badly, he told them. Troops were stretched so thin they were doing tasks they never dreamed of, let alone trained for." Freeman, "took a short holiday leave to see his 14-month-old daughter and 2-year-old son, returned to his base in Karbala, Iraq, and less than two weeks ago died in a hail of bullets and grenades. Insurgents, dressed in U.S. military uniforms, speaking English and driving black American SUVs, got through a checkpoint and attacked, kidnapped four soldiers and later shot them. Freeman died in the assault, the fifth casualty of the brazen attack." Freeman's death "has radicalized Dodd, energized Kerry and girded the ever-more confrontational stance of Democrats in the Senate."

Bush Sees Contradiction Between Senate Resolutions, Vote For Pretraeus. During a NPR's All Things Considered interview yesterday, (1/29, Williams), President Bush was asked about his reaction to the Senate debate about his Iraq plans. He replied, "My feeling to the Senate echoes what Joe Lieberman said the other day, and that is, it is ironic that the Senate would vote 81-0 to send a general into Iraq who believes he needs more troops to do the job, and then send a contradictory message. The legislators will do what they feel like they've got to do. And we want to work with them as best we can to make it clear what the stakes of failure will be, and also make it clear to them that I think they have a responsibility to make sure our troops have what they need to do the missions."

McConnell echoed that point on Fox News' Your World (1/29, Cavuto), "Gen. Petraeus, having just been promoted without opposition, ought to be given a chance to succeed in his mission. It seems to me it hardly makes sense to confirm the general, head him out to Iraq, and then turn around and say, 'but your mission can't possibly succeed.' ... We're going to have a series of different votes on different kinds of resolutions. None of them are going to be binding. All of them, as virtually every measure in the Senate, will require 60 votes. There is a reasonable chance none of them will pass."

DOJ_NMG_0124003

Feingold To Challenge Democrats' "Timidity," Call For Cutting Off Funds. The Politico (1/30) reports, "Senate Democrats oppose the war in Iraq, they just don't plan on stopping it. They have discovered that standing up to the president is not quite as easy as vilifying him." Sen. Russ Feingold "has decided, however, to challenge what he calls the 'timidity' of Democratic leaders. He is going to introduce legislation cutting off funding for the Iraq war and he may do it, he told me, as early as this week."

The AP (1/30, Flaherty) reports "the new Democratic-led Congress is on a collision course with the White House over how far lawmakers can or should go to stop the war in Iraq, a dispute that could test the bounds of the Constitution. … Some Democrats say Congress must consider tougher alternatives to force the president's hand, including cutting funding, capping the number of troops allowed in Iraq and setting an end date for the war. 'This Congress was never meant to be a rubber stamp,' Sen. Barbara Boxer told her colleagues last week. 'Read the Constitution.'"

More Commentary. Dona Brazile writes in Roll Call (1/30), "The current US occupation (along with a dwindling number of coalition forces) of Iraq is just a drop in the bucket when you have 1,300 years to avenge; they, clearly, have a lot of patience. But for many Americans, our patience with the incompetent mismanagement of the war has grown thin. It's time we have this debate and discussion in Congress. I hope the House Democrats tell the president to stay tuned."

20,000 US Soldiers Have Been Wounded, 500 Have Lost Limbs In Iraq. CBS Evening News (1/29, story 3, :10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In addition to the more than 3,000 American servicemen and women who have been killed in Iraq, more than 20,000 have been wounded. 500 of them have lost limbs."

Former CPA Official Sentenced To Prison For Fraud. The Washington Post (1/30, D8, Witte, 690K) reports a "former official of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority was sentenced yesterday to nine years in prison and ordered to forfeit $3.6 million for his role in one of the largest fraud schemes to emerge from the reconstruction of Iraq, the Justice Department said yesterday." Robert J. Stein, 52, "of North Carolina was arrested in November 2005 and pleaded guilty in February 2006 to charges that included bribery, money laundering and conspiracy. He was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Washington." In his "role as comptroller and funding officer for the Coalition Provisional Authority in south-central Iraq, Stein worked with other Defense Department officials to rig the bids on reconstruction contracts so that all the work went to American businessman Philip H. Bloom, according to prosecutors. In exchange, Bloom gave the officials more than $1 million in cash, plus such luxury gifts as SUVs, a motorcycle, jewelry, computers, airline tickets, liquor and promises of future employment."

US Urged To Reach Out to Iraqi Refugees. Adam Goodheart, Hodson Trust-Griswold Director of the Starr Center for the Study of the American Experience at Washington College in Chestertown, MD, and John R. Bohrer, a political writer and blogger, write in USA Today (1/30, 11A, 2.27M), "Efforts for increasing the flow of Iraqi immigrants also have been stymied by post-9/11 counterterrorism laws that make it difficult for anyone from the Middle East to enter the USA. That's an especially cruel irony, since the refugees in greatest peril are those who have put their lives on the line for what President Bush has declared is a war against terrorism. In late 1975, less than eight months after the first refugee landed in the USA, the State Department declared the resettlement effort successfully completed (at a total cost of $405 million). … If the Bush administration is prepared to reaffirm those ideals [President[Ford so eloquently invoked, it should extend a similar welcome in 2007."

Corrupt Afghan Officials Stealing Reconstruction Aid. The Washington Times (1/30, Chamberlain, 88K) reports, "Corrupt Afghan police and tribal leaders are stealing vast quantities of reconstruction aid intended to improve the lives of people and turn them away from the Taliban, US and British officials said. In some cases, all the aid earmarked for an area has ended up in the wrong hands, officials said." NATO "forces in the south of the country fear corrupt police will steal aid if handed out through them. A Pentagon official said thousands of cars and trucks intended for use by the Afghan police had been sold instead. … A committee of British lawmakers plans to investigate the corruption, which has dogged operations in Afghanistan since the Taliban were driven from power in 2001."

Course To Defeat Taliban Proposed. Selig S. Harrison, who covered Afghanistan as South Asia bureau chief of the Washington Post (1/30, A17, 690K), writes this morning that "to prevent a continued Taliban upsurge, the United States should condition future economic and military aid to Islamabad on meaningful measures to shut down Taliban camps and staging areas on the Pakistani side of the border. At the same time, the Pentagon should shift to a low-profile military strategy in which air attacks are the rare exception and peace initiatives like those of the Musa Qala elders are welcomed."

DOJ_NMG_0124004

Iraqi Prison Officials Tour South Carolina Jails For Ideas. The AP (1/30, Kinnard) reports, "Iraqi prison officials looking to rebuild their nation's jail system toured a state prison Monday, gathering ideas — including electronic door locks and an onsite license plate plant — to take back to their country." The AP continues, "A delegation that included U.S. Justice Department officials and their Iraqi counterparts visited the maximum security Broad River Correctional Institution, where the Iraqis watched inmates make South Carolina license plates and traffic signs. … Iraqi prisoners don't have a place to work, one visitor said through an interpreter." The AP adds, "The plant enables an inmate 'to help himself and his family. We can have productive inmates, not just consumer inmates,' said the warden of a Nasiriyah prison, whose name was withheld by the Justice Department for his own safety. … The group also was interested in the prison's security system, which includes electronically locking doors and video monitoring. … The delegation visited South Carolina because the state prison system was similar in size and organization to the existing Iraqi system, said Georgette Thornton, who works in Baghdad with the department's International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program. … The two-week visit to South Carolina will include trips to other state prisons as well as a federal prison."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

KLA-Tencor Changes Options Report Citing Unintentional Backdating. Dow Jones (1/30) reports, "KLA-Tencor Corp., one of the nation's largest chip-equipment makers, booked a $370 million non-cash charge related to stock options it intentionally backdated. … It also may face a lawsuit from its former chief executive officer, who in a role as an adviser to the company was fired in connection with its option- accounting investigation." Dow Jones continues, "In a Securities and Exchange Commission filing Monday, KLA-Tencor said it took a charge of $348 million for stock options it granted from July 1994 through June 2005 and a $22 million charge for the year ended June 30, 2006, due to erroneous accounting methods. … The San Jose, Calif., chip-equipment maker was forced to record the charges after a special board committee found that the company had granted stock options to executive officers and other employees at advantageous prices." Dow Jones adds, "In essence, KLA-Tencor awarded stock options at prices that were lower than those on the option-grant dates it recorded on its books. … The company began its internal investigation in May. The Justice Department and the SEC also are investigating KLA-Tencor. … KLA-Tencor said in the filing that it stopped misdating stock options after June 2002, with a few 'immaterial exceptions.[It found no wrongdoing by its current management team, now led by CEO Rick Wallace. … By filing restated financial statements, the company also said it expects to comply with Nasdaq reporting requirements, meaning its stock shouldn't face delisting."

British Bankers Again Seek Dismissal Of Enron-Related Charges. Bloomberg (1/30, Calkins) reports, "Three former British bankers accused in an Enron Corp.-related fraud scheme have again asked a federal judge in Houston to dismiss charges they cheated their onetime employer, Greenwich NatWest Ltd." Bloomberg continues, "David Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew argued that the indictment, which accuses them of skimming $7.35 million from the sale of an Enron-related partnership, improperly applied U.S. criminal law to British citizens acting in the U.K. In December, U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein revised the charges without dropping any counts. … 'The wire fraud statute does not extend to the foreign scheme alleged,' the bankers said in court papers filed Jan. 22. They claim the U.S. Congress didn't intend to criminalize the activity of 'a foreign national who allegedly defrauded his foreign employer in a foreign country.'" Bloomberg adds, "Bermingham, 44, Darby 44, and Mulgrew, 45, were extradited to the U.S. in July and are charged with seven counts each of wire fraud. If convicted, they face as much as 35 years in prison. Prosecutors said the three skimmed millions in 2000 by misleading Greenwich NatWest about the value of an Enron partnership. They are free on $1 million bond each and scheduled to go on trial in September. … The original 2002 indictment relied on the legal theory that the bankers had deprived Greenwich NatWest, which has since been acquired by Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc, of their honest services. To bolster their latest request to drop the charges, the bankers cited a December decision by Werlein to remove references to honest services from the indictment. … The honest-services argument was struck down in August by an appeals court in another criminal case stemming from a transaction at Houston-based Enron. The appeals court said an employee didn't deprive his company of honest services if he acted in the company's best interests and in line with management goals. … 'The United States will proceed at trial against defendants solely on the grounds that they deprived NatWest of money and property,' Steven Tyrrell, acting U.S. attorney in the Justice Department's Fraud Section, wrote in December. Removing the honest-services allegations 'does not deny the defendants their grand jury rights,' he said. … Jaclyn Lesch, a Justice Department spokeswoman, declined to comment on the bankers' request, saying the government will respond in court at the proper time."

DOJ_NMG_0124005

Former Officials Spared Prison Time In Cendant Accounting Scandal. The AP (1/30, Christoffersen) reports, "Two former executives were spared prison time Monday for their roles in a massive accounting scandal at Cendant Corp. that cost the company and its investors more than $3 billion." The AP continues, "Anne Pember, 47, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy in 2000, was sentenced to two years of probation and 200 hours of community service. … Casper Sabatino, 54, a former accountant at CUC who pleaded guilty to wire fraud charges and cooperated with federal prosecutors, was also sentenced to two years of probation." The AP adds, "Pember asked to be spared prison time, citing her extensive cooperation with federal investigators. Prosecutors agreed. … 'I think your cooperation and your testimony was quite extraordinary,' said Senior U.S. District Judge Alan H. Nevas. … Pember, who faced five years in prison under sentencing guidelines, apologized for her conduct." The AP notes, "Pember was controller at CUC International of Stamford, which merged with HFS Inc. of Parsippany, New Jersey, to create Cendant in December 1997. Pember became Cendant's senior vice president for accounting. … Nevas noted that Sabatino was one of the whistleblowers and was the first person to voluntarily cooperate with prosecutors. … Prosecutors say the scheme inflated the stock of CUC International, Cendant's predecessor, by $500 million."

SEC Approves Market-Based Method To Value Stock Options. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, C5, Reilly, Ng) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission for the first time has blessed a method for valuing employee stock options that relies on market forces rather than academic models. … The change potentially paves the way for companies to use techniques that lessen the hit to profit they take from this type of compensation." The Journal continues, "In a Jan. 25 letter, SEC Chief Accountant Conrad Hewitt said an auction system designed by Zions Bancorp of Salt Lake City could be used to derive 'market' values for employee stock options. The SEC had rejected earlier attempts at market-based methods, including a plan pitched by computer-networking company Cisco Systems Inc. in 2005. … Ever since accounting rule makers decreed that starting in 2006 companies would have to book an expense for issuing stock options, a number of companies and financial institutions have tried to develop new ways to value the instruments." The Journal adds, "Both the SEC and accounting rule makers have said they believe market-based approaches are best for valuing options. Mr. Hewitt said yesterday that the problem is that the models currently in use produce 'hypothetical numbers.' Market-based approaches produce what 'may be a real number,' he added. … So far, though, no one had devised a market-based method that passed regulatory muster."

Former CA Official Sentenced To Six Months Home Detention. The New York Times/AP (1/30) reports, "A former executive at Computer Associates was sentenced to six months of home detention yesterday after pleading guilty to conspiracy charges in connection with a scheme to bolster the company's quarterly revenue artificially through backdated sales contracts." The AP continues, "Judge I. Leo Glasser of Federal District Court sentenced David Kaplan, former senior vice president for finance, at a hearing in Brooklyn. Mr. Kaplan was also ordered to serve three years of supervised release." The AP adds, "Mr. Kaplan was one of several executives at the company, now known as CA Inc., to plead guilty to criminal charges in 2004 and to cooperate with the government."

Fannie Mae CEO Received 25% Raise In 2006. The Washington Post (1/30, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) reports, "Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd received salary, stock and bonuses of more than $14.4 million in 2006, an increase of about 25 percent from the year before, the government-chartered mortgage funding company disclosed. Mudd's pay included a bonus of $3.5 million, restricted shares worth nearly $10 million and a salary of $950,000. That was up from a bonus of $2.6 million, restricted shares worth $8 million and a salary of $908,121 in 2005. For 2007, Mudd's salary was increased to $990,000." The Post adds, "Mudd was promoted to interim chief executive from chief operating officer in 2004 after an accounting scandal drove out his predecessor, former federal budget director Franklin D. Raines. Mudd's appointment was later made permanent. One of his top responsibilities is restoring the company's financial systems. More than two years after the accounting problems came to light, Fannie Mae remains unable to file timely financial statements, and its shares continue trading on the New York Stock Exchange by special dispensation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

"Unflappable" Fleischer Testifies Against Libby. ABC World News (1/29, story 4, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer testified yesterday "for the prosecution in the perjury trial of Scooter Libby," telling "the jury that Libby had leaked to him the identity of a CIA employee whose husband criticized the President's Iraq policy." ABC (Thomas) added, "Fleischer quoted Libby as saying, 'This is hush-hush; on the QT. Not many very people know about this.' … Perhaps most damaging to Libby, Fleischer testified that the meeting happened on July 7th, several days before Libby told authorities he learned of the identity from the reporters." ABC noted that "under defense cross-examination challenging his credibility, Fleischer's previous training of being grilled by reporters appeared to help him. He was largely unflappable."

DOJ_NMG_0124006

NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 5, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) noted that "the former number two man to Vice President Cheney is currently on trial," and "we've already heard a lot about how concerned the White House was about press coverage, especially where it pertained to the buildup to the Iraq war." NBC (O'Donnell) reported that Fleischer "blew another hole in Scooter Libby's story. … Fleischer was in the Bush inner circle," and he "admitted that he had passed on to a few reporters that 'Wilson's wife works there,' meaning the CIA. Fleischer described it as a casual conversation that included NBC's David Gregory," but "as the leak investigation intensified, Fleischer said he worried that he could be in big trouble."

The AP (1/30, Apuzzo) reports that "Fleischer reminded Washington on Monday why he was considered one of the city's most unshakable spinmasters. … It was almost like he was back at the White House 2- 1/2 years ago, parrying questions from reporters," and his "testimony was the most damaging yet." However, "True to his reputation, Fleischer offered few behind-the-scenes glimpses of the Bush administration." USA Today/AP (1/30, 4A, Sniffen) notes, "Fleischer said he again heard about Plame four days later from White House communications director Dan Bartlett. Defense attorney William Jeffress suggested that Fleischer might have heard the Plame story first from" then-White House communications director Dan Bartlett, "but Fleischer insisted he learned about her from Libby first."

Under the headline "Former Press Secretary Says Libby Told Him of Plame," the Washington Post (1/30, A3, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) notes, "The unusual spectacle of a president's top spokesman testifying in open court widened the rare view the trial is providing the jury -- and the public -- of the inner workings of a White House that has proudly guarded its privacy." The Post adds, "Fleischer testified that neither Libby nor Bartlett invoked a White House protocol under which colleagues warned him when they were providing classified information that could not be discussed with reporters. He said he 'never in my wildest dreams thought this information would be classified.'"

In his Washington Post (1/30, A2, 690K) "Washington Sketch" column, Dana Milbank writes that Fleischer "has lost nothing off the old curveball," and "Libby's defense team learn what any reporter could have told them: The longer you question Fleischer, the less knowledge you take away from the experience." Milbank notes, "Jeffress asked Fleischer if Bartlett had been talking to him when he said, aboard Air Force One, that Plame was the one who sent Wilson on the trip to Niger. 'He said it out loud,' Fleischer answered. 'He was talking to you?' 'He said it out loud and I heard him,' Fleischer repeated."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/30, Lewis, 1.16M) reports Fleischer "was followed to the stand by a prosecution witness regarded as perhaps the most secretive and publicity-averse employee in the White House, David S. Addington. … He is widely reported to be the theoretician behind Mr. Cheney's belief in a powerful executive branch, in which the president may exert wide authority unchecked by Congress or the courts." Addington testified about a meeting at which "Libby had quizzed him as to whether the C.I.A. would have records showing when someone sent a relative on a mission. … As he provided the far-from-simple answer, he said that Mr. Libby had held out both hands in front, palms down, as if to remind him the information was sensitive. 'He said, "Keep it down,"' Mr. Addington testified."

Defense May Attack Fleischer Immunity Deal. The AP (1/30) reports, "Fleischer testified under an immunity deal with prosecutors, which means he cannot be prosecuted for having revealed that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. He arrived in court with his attorneys. … Fleischer said he sought the deal after reading an article about the investigation. 'I thought, "Oh my God. Did I somehow play a role in outing a CIA operative?"' Fleischer said." The AP notes, "Libby's attorneys plan to argue during cross-examination that the immunity deal makes Fleischer's testimony less credible. … Prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg sought to head off that argument early in Fleischer's testimony by having him describe his deal. … 'I cannot be prosecuted for what I did with the information I was provided,' Fleischer said. 'The immunity provides no protection for perjury.'"

Testimony Said To Show Fleischer Often Was Kept In Dark. The New York Times (1/30, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "As White House press secretary, Ari Fleischer was the omnipresent television face of government power, the confident insider who spoke for President Bush and seemed to know everything but reveal only what he chose." However, Fleischer's testimony showed that "he only knew what the truly powerful chose to tell him, and sometimes that was not much. On occasion he would pronounce with great authority the administration's position on a topic only to find it had changed and nobody had bothered to let him know."

Robinson Compares Cheney's Office To "The Sopranos." In his Washington Post (1/30, 690K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "If you've been following the…Libby perjury trial, I can understand how you might confuse Dick Cheney with Tony Soprano. Cheney's office is beginning to sound a lot like the Bada Bing, minus the dancers." Robinson adds, "You get the sense of Cheney and his crew as a semi-independent power center, a family within the larger family. You see them hunkered down in their office suite, much like Tony and crew in the back room of the Bada Bing, plotting ways to cover their behinds and do in their rivals -- whether those rivals are found in Baghdad, Tehran or the West Wing."

DOJ_NMG_0124007

Miller To Testify Today. The AP (1/30, Apuzzo) reports, "Journalists will take center stage at the CIA leak trial as Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald begins calling reporters as witnesses. Fitzgerald said Judith Miller was to take the stand Tuesday," and "prosecutors say Libby discussed Plame…with Miller three times" – twice "before Libby says he first remembered learning Plame's identity from…NBC newsman Tim Russert." The AP notes, "Like so many other government witnesses in the case, Miller's credibility will be an issue under cross-examination. She made some inconsistent statements in her grand jury testimony, defense attorneys say."

Russert Says He Did Not Tell Libby That Plame Worked At CIA. The AP (1/30, Evans) reports, "NBC News reporter Tim Russert said Monday that he did not tell vice presidential aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby that a prominent war critic's wife worked at the CIA, as Libby has claimed. Russert, who spoke in Tulsa and Oklahoma City at functions sponsored by Oklahoma State University's Spears School of Business, said he expects to be called to testify." Russert noted, "He called in protest to something he had seen on MSNBC "Hardball," and that was the extent of it.. He didn't call me as a confidential source, as such. He was calling me as a viewer to complain."

DOJ Plans $200 Million Grant Program To Curb Violent Crime. USA Today (1/30, Johnson) reports, "The Bush administration is proposing a $200 million grant program to help law enforcement agencies respond to surging violent-crime rates in cities across the nation, Justice Department officials said Monday." USA continues, "The program would help local and state police agencies pay for officers' overtime, equipment and other expenses stemming from new regional task forces aimed at curbing violent crime, Domingo Herraiz, director of the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Assistance, told USA TODAY." USA adds, "The program has not been announced publicly; Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled to begin briefing law enforcement officials on it this week. … The task forces would be staffed with federal, state and local officers to deal with a range of growing crime problems, including recent increases in gang-related violence, gun-related crimes and illegal sales of methamphetamine. … The grant plan marks the administration's broadest recognition yet of the threat posed by rising violent-crime rates." USA notes, "The FBI reports that violent crimes — homicides, rapes, robberies and aggravated assaults — increased 2.3% nationwide in 2005 compared with 2004, the first such rise since 1991. The trend has continued through the first half of 2006, the FBI reports. … If approved by Congress as part of President Bush's spending plan for the budget year that begins in October, the program also would symbolize a renewed interest in federal funding for local police initiatives, which often have taken a backseat to homeland security programs since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. … The grant program — known as the Violent Crime Reduction Partnership Initiative — would not, however, be designed to help police agencies hire new officers. … Instead, it would allow local and state agencies to apply for grants of $30,000-$200,000 to better deploy and equip officers who make up the anti-crime task forces, said Herraiz and Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, the Justice Department's director legal policy."

Indiana Man Sentenced To Ten Years For Sexually Enticing Teen Online. The Northwest (IN) Times (1/30, Carlson) reports from Hammond, IN, "A 21-year-old Indiana man became one of the first in the nation Monday to receive a 10-year prison term for attempting to sexually entice a child through an Internet chatroom." The Times continues, "Mark Gledhill, of Syracuse, was nabbed along with 25 other men last summer in a wide-ranging federal sting for child sexual predators who use chatrooms to lure their victims. … Gledhill was among the half-dozen men in the sting who earlier pleaded guilty. He became the first to receive his sentence in U.S. District Court in Hammond." The Times adds, "The Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, which was signed into law by President Bush on July 27, increased the penalty for child enticement and other sex crimes to a 10-year minimum. … Weeks later, Gledhill and two dozen others were indicted in the Northern District of Indiana for enticement as part of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' Project Safe Childhood. … Gledhill was caught after he allegedly had sexual chats over the Internet with a government agent posing as a 13-year-old girl. He was arrested after driving to Valparaiso to meet the 'girl.'"

FBI Investigating California Lawmaker's Land Deals. The San Gabriel Valley Tribune (1/30, Ortega, Scott) reports, "FBI investigators have contacted current and former city officials in Monrovia and Fontana about Rep. Gary Miller's land sales in those cities. Miller, R-Brea, came under public scrutiny in August when a government watchdog group filed a complaint with the Internal Revenue Service alleging that Miller failed to report or pay capital gains tax on a nearly $11.8 million sale of 165 hillside acres to the city of Monrovia for a wildland preserve." The Tribune notes, "Officials with the IRS and the FBI would not confirm that they are investigating Miller," and "Miller said Friday that he was unaware of any federal investigation into his land dealings."

Williams Testifies She Did Not Try To Steal Coke Formula. In a widely-distributed story, the AP

DOJ_NMG_0124008

(1/30, Weber) reports Coca-Cola formula theft defendant Joya Williams "denied at her trial Monday that she committed a crime. Asked by her lawyer if she took part in a conspiracy, a teary-eyed…Williams told jurors she did not." She said that Javier Sanchez Lamelas, "Coca-Cola's global brand director, was constantly on her back, so in a desperate attempt to hold onto her $46,000-a-year job she started copying every document she put her hands on and taking them home. … Williams said she needed to hold onto the job because the company health insurance paid for her medications for immune deficiency and pulmonary disorders she suffers from." The AP notes, "The government's final witness was FBI agent Jerry Reichard, who testified Monday about a $4,000 cash deposit that posted to Williams' bank account on June 19, 2006. That was three days after Reichard gave" co-defendant Ibrahim Dimson "$30,000 in cash in exchange for a sample of a new Coca-Cola product that was part of so-called Project Lancelot."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/30, Stanford, 379K) reports, "During two hours of testimony, Williams tried to convince jurors that she was the victim of two ex-cons who pleaded guilty to trying to sell secret Coke documents to an undercover FBI agent last year for $1.5 million. Williams said one of those men, Edmund Duhaney, was a longtime family friend. Williams said she is the godmother of Duhaney's two children, but now the family considers her 'the enemy.'" The AJC notes, "Last week, Duhaney testified that he gave $4,000 in cash to Williams from money he got from the undercover FBI agent. Prosecutors on Monday provided bank statements showing Williams deposited $4,000 cash into her bank account just days after Duhaney met with the agent. Williams said the cash came from a friend in Alpharetta who has not been called to testify in the case."

Dangerous MS-13 Fugitive Arrested In Texas. KHOU-TV Houston (1/29, McShan) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "An MS-13 gang member accused of cutting off the heads of his girlfriend's parents is in custody in Houston. In late September, FBI agents and Houston police were involved in a shootout with MS-13 gang members in a hotel parking lot on the city's southeast side. … That night an FBI agent was wounded, but when it was all said and done, four gang members were apprehended and taken to jail. A fifth suspect, 26-year-old Albin Zelaya, somehow managed to get away. The dangerous man fled Houston, crossed the border and eventually ended up in Honduras, where he was spotted just outside the tiny town of San Pedro Sula." KHOU noted that the HPD gang squad "was assisted by HPD SWAT and, we were told, the FBI," in arresting Zelaya.

Four Oklahoma Men Convicted Of Attending Cock Fight. The AP (1/30) reports, "A federal jury has convicted four men of being spectators at a cockfight held on Indian land south of Carnegie, U.S. Attorney Sheldon Sperling said Monday. The jury convicted Clay McHone, 47, of Harrah; Carl 'Hank' Bardsher, 46, of Lawton; Donald Underwood, 71, of Foster; and Robert Langford, 54, of Wichita Falls, Texas." The AP notes, "Agents from the FBI and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, aided by Oklahoma Highway Patrol troopers, raided the T.F.C. Cockfighting Facility where the cockfights were being held on July 22, and federal authorities eventually charged 75 people with various cockfighting offenses, Sperling said. … Most of the 70 have entered guilty pleas and been assessed fines ranging from $300 to $600, Sperling said."

US Alleges Pennsylvania Child Porn Suspect Also Had Sex With Child. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/30, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "A Drexel Hill woman charged last week with helping a Delaware County man tape pornographic movies of children also engaged in sex with at least one child, a prosecutor said yesterday. The new accusation against Dorothy Prawdzik, 43, alleges that she engaged in a sexual encounter that also involved a 39-year-old man and a young girl. 'The victim was approximately 10 years old at the time ... when she was forced to participate in those sex acts,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Michelle T. Rotella said in a court filing yesterday." The Inquirer notes, "The FBI, which was brought into the case by local authorities, said it recovered from" John Jackey Worman's "computers 11,000 video clips of Worman having sex with children. The computers also contained more than 1.2 million other images, many of them pornographic. The victims ranged in age from 3 months to 15 years."

FBI Internet Sex Solicitation Sting Snares Kentucky Man. The Louisville Courier-Journal (1/30, White) reports Kishor Patel of Lyndon, Ken., "was arrested by federal agents inside Mall St. Matthews Monday afternoon after authorities said he tried to meet a 14-year-old girl there for sex." He "will be arraigned in federal court Tuesday, said David Beyer, a spokesman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation office in Louisville. Beyer said Patel had a 'look of surprise on his face' as FBI agents handcuffed him and walked him out of the mall." FBI Louisville SAC Tracy Reinhold "said Patel had been communicating online with an undercover agent whom Patel believed to be a 14-year-old girl."

Serial Child Molester Given Maximum Term In California. The New York Times (1/30, Marshall) reports from San Francisco, "A man who the authorities said had sexually abused hundreds of young boys in several states was sentenced Monday in a California courtroom to 152 years to life in prison for molesting two 12-year-olds." The Times continues, "The man, Dean Arthur Schwartzmiller, 65, was convicted by a Santa Clara County jury last year for sexually abusing the two boys at his San Jose home from 2002 to 2005. On Monday in San Jose, he was given the maximum penalty for the 11 felony charges of child molestation and one misdemeanor charge of possessing child pornography. … The authorities have labeled Mr. Schwartzmiller, a former handyman, one of the 'most prolific child molesters' in United States history." The Times adds, "At the time of his arrest in May 2005, a police search of his home led to the discovery of written accounts describing his sexual exploits with boys ranging in age from 8 to 18, some dating back decades. The manuscripts included at least seven spiral notebooks with 1,500 pages of log entries detailing the sexual acts he said he had performed on hundreds of boys. … 'If anyone deserved the maximum sentence, it was Mr. Schwartzmiller,' said a Santa Clara County prosecutor, Steven Fein, who tried the case. … Mr. Schwartzmiller, who represented himself during most of the three-week trial, has already filed an appeal in the Santa Clara County Superior Court, said a defense lawyer who handled the sentencing proceedings. The lawyer, Melinda Hall, a Santa Clara County public defender, said the sentence should have been no more than 30 years to life. … 'The sentence wasn't unexpected,' Ms. Hall said, 'but I don't know if it will survive on appeal.'"

DOJ_NMG_0124009

Judge Declines Probe Into AIPAC Case Leaks. The New York Sun (1/30, Gerstein) reports, "A federal judge overseeing a criminal case against two former pro-Israel lobbyists has declined to order an investigation into what the defense alleged were repeated leaks of grand jury information by government officials." The Sun continues, "Judge Thomas Ellis III ruled that the news reports cited by the former employees of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, Steven Rosen and Keith Weissman, did not reflect grand jury deliberations and therefore did not constitute a breach of the secrecy obligations under federal court rules. … 'Leaks of information from law enforcement investigations that relate to matters under grand jury investigation do not concern "matters before the grand jury," unless, of course, they disclose secret details about proceedings inside the grand jury room,' Judge Ellis wrote in a 10-page opinion dated Friday. 'The media reports identify no grand jury witnesses, disclose no questions that were asked or would be asked of witnesses in the grand jury, nor do the reports even describe or summarize any grand jury witness' testimony. Indeed, the reports never even mention a grand jury investigation.'" The Sun adds, "Judge Ellis recently set a trial date of June 4 for Messrs. Rosen and Weissman, who were indicted in 2005 on charges that they conspired to convey classified information to journalists and foreign officials not authorized to receive it. The two lobbyists, who were fired by Aipac, have pleaded not guilty. The case has drawn First Amendment scrutiny because it is unprecedented for individuals outside of government to be charged criminally with passing on classified information, except in cases where espionage was alleged."

Connecticut Man Gets Probation For False Chemical Attack Report. The AP (1/30) reports Robert Robishaw of Uncasville, Conn., "was sentenced to two years of probation Monday for lying to federal authorities about being the victim of a chemical attack." Robishaw "pleaded guilty in November to one count of making false statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, prosecutors said. He was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Hartford nearly a year after telling Groton fire authorities that an unknown substance fell out of a newspaper that he purchased at a Waterford convenience store. He told authorities the off-white, powdery substance caused his skin to turn red and tingle."

Florida Man Sentenced To Probation For JetBlue Hoax Bomb Threat. The AP (1/30) reports, "A federal judge sentenced a Florida man to two years probation for calling in a fake bomb threat after arriving too late to board his flight at Long Beach Airport. Yechezkel Wells, 22, of Miami Beach, also was ordered Monday to spend six months confined to his home, perform 200 hours of community service and pay a $1,000 fine. Wells pleaded guilty in October, acknowledging he made the fake threat in an effort to keep his Jet Blue flight to Fort Lauderdale from leaving. … The flight was delayed while bomb-sniffing dogs searched the plane, and FBI agents detained Wells for questioning."

Chicago Alderman Says Powder Found In Corruption Raid Was Not Drug. WBBM-TV (1/29, Dellimore) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "As she fights federal corruption charges, 20th Ward Alderman Arenda Troutman now says it was a dietary aid, not drugs that were found in her possession. … Troutman says she doesn't do drugs, and she believes the powder found was psyllium husk, a substance vegetarians like her use to clean out their digestive systems. And she says the FBI should have known that immediately. FBI spokesman — Agent Ross Rice — says no field test was performed on the powder because such tests can be unreliable and results from the crime lab haven't been received yet. The FBI denies Troutman's suggestion that the agency just trying to muddy up her character."

Judge Rules Alderman Convicted Of Corruption May Run Again. The Chicago Tribune (1/30, 617K) reports, "Former Ald. Virgil Jones (15th), who was convicted on corruption charges in 1999, can run to regain a seat on the City Council in the Feb. 27 election, a Cook County judge decided Monday. Circuit Judge Alfred Paul ruled that a state law that would ban Jones from the race is unconstitutional because it applies only to ex-felons running in local races and not statewide elections." The Tribune notes, "Jones was convicted of pocketing $7,000 in payoffs from an FBI informant and was sentenced to 41 months in prison."

DOJ_NMG_0124010

Editorial Calls For DOJ To Charge Niagara Falls Official, Or Drop Probe. The Niagara Falls Reporter (1/30) editorializes, "Thursday, May 3, will mark the two-year anniversary of the day agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation came to the offices of this paper and left with unimpeachable documentation attesting to the fact that Mayor Vincenzo V. Anello took $40,000 from downtown developer 'Smokin' Joe' Anderson immediately before and just after being elected in 2003." The Reporter adds, "The FBI agents involved believed they had developed an airtight case. But the Justice Department began dragging its heels on the matter after Michael Battle was replaced by Terrance Flynn as Buffalo's U.S. Attorney in 2006. Investigators are frustrated by the delay, and one longtime FBI man requested and received a transfer off the task force in protest. By May 3…the campaign season will be in full swing," and "it's time for Flynn to either press charges or drop them, with the same sort of ballyhoo that attended the announcement of the investigation's beginning. To do any less would make the Justice Department guilty of perpetrating a gross injustice indeed."

Hackers Search For Computer Bugs For Bounties. The New York Times (1/30, Stone) reports, "Microsoft says its new operating system, Windows Vista, is the most secure in the company's history. Now the bounty hunters will test just how secure it is." The Times continues, "When its predecessor, Windows XP, was released five years ago, software bugs were typically hunted by hackers for fame and glory, not financial reward. But now software vulnerabilities — as with stolen credit-card numbers and spammable e-mail addresses — carry real financial value. They are commonly bought, sold and traded online, both by legitimate security companies, which say they are providing a service, and by nefarious hackers and thieves. … Vista, which will be installed on millions of new PCs starting today, provides the latest target." The Times adds, "This month, iDefense Labs, a subsidiary of the technology company VeriSign, said it was offering $8,000 for the first six researchers to find holes in Vista, and $4,000 more for the so-called exploit, the program needed to take advantage of the weakness. … IDefense sells such information to corporations and government agencies, which have already begun using Vista, so they can protect their own systems." The times notes, "Companies like Microsoft do not endorse such bounty programs, but they have even bigger problems: the willingness of Internet criminals to spend large sums for early knowledge of software flaws that could provide an opening for identity-theft schemes and spam attacks. … The Japanese security firm Trend Micro said in December that it had found a Vista flaw for sale on a Romanian Web forum for $50,000. Security experts say that the price is plausible, and that they regularly see hackers on public bulletin boards or private online chat rooms trying to sell the holes they have discovered, and the coding to exploit them. … Especially prized are so-called zero-day exploits, bits of disruption coding that spread immediately because there is no known defense."

Virginia Men Face Federal Charges For Peddling Phony Purses. The Washington Post (1/30, A1, Markon) reports, "They are known as 'purse parties,' modern-day Tupperware parties with a twist: hundreds of designer handbags selling for hundreds of dollars off. Women known as 'the purse ladies' run the gatherings at private homes. … 'They were all the rage,' said Peggy Stypula, an Alexandria resident who attended parties in Arlington and Fairfax counties. 'The purses were spread out all over the house, and you walked around and picked out what you wanted.' … But one partygoer in Northern Virginia suspected counterfeit couture and called police. Federal agents soon seized 30,000 purses from a Fairfax warehouse, including some from a tractor-trailer that pulled up during the search." The Post continues, "Now, prosecutors are taking to federal court the men they say provided phony merchandise. A father and son are scheduled to go on trial tomorrow in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, accused of supplying thousands of counterfeit handbags for the purse parties and also selling them at kiosks in malls throughout the Washington region, including Tysons Corner Center, Montgomery Mall and the Old Post Office Pavilion." The Post adds, "The trial in one of the nation's largest counterfeiting prosecutions will feature testimony from representatives of Gucci, Kate Spade and other leading designer labels, according to court documents. Exhibit A will be a sampling of hundreds of purses, hauled into the courtroom one box at a time. … The case is bringing scrutiny to a widespread problem that has been publicly visible for years: trafficking in handbags and other counterfeit goods. Shoppers in Washington and other major cities can find fake fancy designer purses on street vendor carts, but purse parties -- though perhaps more underground with the heightened law enforcement attention -- are still held in the suburbs. … Purse parties began in New York City 10 to 15 years ago and gradually spread, experts say. Some are advertised in the suburbs through mass e-mailings. Many who attend them believe they are getting either a good fake or stolen property, according to experts on counterfeiting."

DOJ_NMG_0124011

WPost Examines Four DC Weekend Murders. The Washington Post (1/30, B1, Klein, Montes) reports, "In just five hours, one man was beaten to death with a baseball bat, another was slain during a dice game, a third was shot by an assailant after barricading himself in his bathroom, and the last was killed in a botched robbery." The Post continues, "It was a violent weekend in Washington, with four unrelated killings in three quadrants. Police have made one arrest -- in the baseball bat beating near the Shaw neighborhood. Detectives have not identified the victim. .. 'Any homicide in the city is one too many,' said Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D), appearing beside acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier in the 800 block of Yuma Street SE, where Kevin Vincent Bradshaw, 41, was slain after four men took his money. 'But four is unacceptable.'" The Post adds, "They pledged to redouble their efforts, forge stronger partnerships with federal agencies and work more closely with the community."

Alleged Maryland Call Girl Found Dead Of Apparent Suicide Before Trial. The Washington Post (1/30, B1, Johnson) reports, "She was a former college professor who had lost almost everything -- her stellar academic reputation, her financial well-being and her anonymity in the swanky suburban neighborhood where she was accused of working as a high-priced prostitute." The Post continues, "With Brandy Britton's trial planned to start next week, the former University of Maryland Baltimore County professor apparently took her own life over the weekend, hanging herself in her living room, Howard County police say. A family member found the body Saturday afternoon. Police say they do not suspect foul play. … It was a grievous end to a life that friends and colleagues say was once filled with remarkable promise and ambition." The Post adds, "Britton, 43, was the first in her family to go to college, double-majoring in biology and sociology. Her first sociology professor, Sheila Cordray, told The Washington Post last year that Britton was 'ne of the brightest students I've ever had.' … The woman whose looks matched her intelligence may still have possessed the long, blond hair, the glossy pink lips and the glamorous figure of her youth. And she may have still projected the warm, friendly demeanor of a small-town girl from Oregon. … But she was facing the world's toughest truth: She had no idea who she was about to become. … Her trial date on four counts of prostitution -- which she had decided to fight in a jury trial instead of accepting a plea agreement -- was set for Monday. Police would get a chance to air their version of Brandy Britton: that in her $400,000 home at the end of a cul-de-sac where children ride Razor scooters and moms drive minivans with soccer decals, Britton had been selling herself as a call girl."

Warden Claims Florida Inmate Showed No Pain During Execution. The AP (1/30, Davis) reports from Tampa, FL, "A convicted killer whose execution was botched last year was never in any pain, and appeared to be straining to see a clock, not grimacing as some witnesses claimed, the warden told a panel reviewing Florida's lethal injection procedures Monday. … But the condemned man's lawyer said his client was clearly suffering from the incorrectly injected chemicals, and he mocked the notion that the inmate was looking at a clock. … 'What, was he late for an appointment? Come on, that's ridiculous,' said Angel Nieves Diaz's attorney, Neal Dupree, who also witnessed the execution and testified. 'I certainly thought he knew something was wrong.'" The AP continues, "Questions about whether lethal injection is inhumane have put executions on hold in nine U.S. states - Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio and South Dakota. … Diaz' death took 34 minutes - twice as long as usual - and required a rare second dose of lethal chemicals because the needles were incorrectly inserted, a medical examiner reported. An autopsy found chemical burns in both his arms. … Death penalty opponents point to Diaz's execution to support their claims that Florida's lethal injection procedure violates the U.S. Constitution's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. Condemned inmates have also pursued that issue in court, but to no avail."

Miami Herald Says FBI "Dropped The Ball" On Foley Emails. Under the headline "A Missed Warning," the Miami Herald (1/30, 286K) editorializes, "In refusing last summer to investigate the e-mails that former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley sent to a former congressional page, the FBI ignored its own child-safety guidelines, says a report from the Justice Department's inspector general. The Foley e-mails given to the FBI in July 2006 by a whistle-blower group didn't contain sexually explicit references, but their language indicated behavior that the FBI warns about in A Parent's Guide to Internet Safety on its website. The agency should review how it handles complaints about public officials." The Herald adds, "While the agency clearly has more-pressing duties in the era of terrorism than tracking congressmen with a penchant for befriending House pages, the FBI dropped the ball. … The FBI should take the Justice report's conclusions equally seriously."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Suit Alleges Boehringer Ingelheim Inflated Drug Prices. The AP (1/29) reports from Boston, "Federal prosecutors filed a lawsuit Monday against Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane Inc. and related entities, alleging that the pharmaceutical company inflated prices for several of its drugs." The AP continues, The U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston said it has intervened in a whistleblower lawsuit originally filed by a Florida company, Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc., and its principals. … In its suit, the U.S. Attorney's Office alleges that Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane engaged in a scheme to report fraudulent and inflated prices for several products, knowing that federal health care programs established reimbursement rates based on those reported prices." The AP adds, "Roxane, based in Columbus, Ohio, sells generic drugs that are reimbursed by Medicare and Medicaid, two federal health care programs. … The difference between the government reimbursement rates and the actual price paid by healthcare providers for a drug is referred to as the 'spread.' The larger the spread on a drug, the larger the profit for the provider. … The government claims that Roxane used artificially inflated spreads to market, promote and sell the drugs to existing and potential customers. Because reimbursement from federal programs was based on the fraudulent prices, prosecutors claim that Roxane caused false claims to be submitted to federal healthcare programs."

DOJ_NMG_0124012

US Alleges Florida Lab Owner Bilked Medicare For $17 Million. The Sarasota (FL) Herald Tribune (1/29, Ruger) reports, "The owner of a Sarasota-based medical laboratory company altered patients' medical histories and bilked Medicare for $17 million over six years, federal officials say." The Tribune continues, "Joseph T. Degregorio, 49, the owner of Acculab Laboratories Inc., is in the Sarasota County jail, charged with child sexual battery, which could carry a life prison term. … It was uncovered during the three-year fraud investigation." The Tribune adds, "The investigation began in 2003, after a phlebotomist at Acculab became suspicious of the way the company told her to fill out Medicare forms, court records state. .. .The woman said she didn't have patient medical records, or know whether the patients had cancer, yet was told to enter a cancer diagnosis so the government would pay for the blood tests. … She filed a whistle-blower lawsuit detailing her experiences. The government is now leading the lawsuit, seeking at least $2.7 million in damages and penalties, with testimony of at least eight unnamed former employees and Medicare billing audits that show 80 percent of claims were unsubstantiated." The Tribune notes, "Degregorio also altered patients' permanent medical histories to reflect a diagnosis that didn't exist, such as prostate, breast or ovarian cancer, investigators say. Acculab shut its doors last year after federal agents raided the main office and seized truckloads of evidence. … Federal officials reviewed Acculab's Medicare records and found errors in 87 percent of the claims submitted in 2003, and 80 percent of claims from 2004."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

NAACP Seeks DOJ Probe Of New Orleans Police Shootings. The AP (1/30, Foster) reports from New Orleans, "Six of the seven police officers indicted in a deadly bridge shooting following Hurricane Katrina returned to work Monday, unarmed and in low-profile jobs, a development that an NAACP leader said erodes public confidence in the department. … 'The assurance that the officers will be assigned to desk duties does not allay that crisis in confidence,' Danatus King, president of the New Orleans branch of the NAACP, said at an afternoon news conference." The AP continues, "King said the NAACP has decided to ask the U.S. Attorney and the civil rights division of the Justice Department to investigate the shootings; and he said the decision to let the officers return to police jobs smacks of favoritism. … King said he worries that the officers will have access to police records and other information that might reveal the identities of witnesses that might testify against them. … 'None of them have access to the public or to sensitive records,' said Assistant Police Superintendent Marlon Defillo, who is in charge of the police Public Integrity Bureau." The AP adds, "U.S. Attorney Jim Letten confirmed receiving the letter from the NAACP Monday afternoon. His office, the Justice Department and the FBI have been monitoring the investigation, Letten said. He described that as routine."

Witnesses In Mississippi Voting Rights Case Say They Were Not Told To Discriminate. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (1/30, Gates) reports, "No one shaped their decision on how to count absentee ballots, including county Democratic Executive Committee head Ike Brown, black poll managers testified Monday in a trial alleging discrimination against white voters." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "The defense began putting on its case Monday in the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States where the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of attempting to discriminate against white voters." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "The first defense witness, Robin Mason, a poll manager during the Aug. 5, 2003, Democratic primary, said she saw black voters and white voters being assisted at the polls in the same manner. … Asked whether Ike Brown told her how to rule on absentee ballots, Mason replied, 'No.' … The government alleges Brown and those acting in concert with him have rejected absentee ballots cast by white voters on the grounds they were defective under state law while counting similar ballots cast by black voters. … 'No one instructed us how to go through the ballots,' Mason testified Monday when asked whether Brown had told them what to do." The Clarion-

DOJ_NMG_0124013

Ledger notes, "Attorneys for the Democratic Executive Committee, Brown and the Noxubee County Election Commission asked for the case to be dismissed after the government rested its case Monday. … U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee denied the request. … Before resting its case, the Justice Department recalled to the stand one of its witnesses who testified last week. … Nikki Nicole Halbert, who testified last week that she filed an absentee ballot but the signature on the envelope wasn't hers, said Monday she had been harassed and an attempt was made to get her to come back and change her earlier testimony. … Halbert said individuals came to her home and said 'Us blacks should stick together.' … A Justice Department attorney also told Lee another black witness refused to testify for the government because he had been intimidated."

Judge Denies Bond For Seale. The Clarion-Ledger (1/30, Mitchell) reports, "Reputed Klansman James Ford Seale walked away in chains Monday after a judge ruled he must remain behind bars until he goes on trial on kidnapping and conspiracy charges in the 1964 killings of two African-American teenagers. Defense lawyers say they may appeal the decision," which "would result in a second bond hearing, this one in front of U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate, who is presiding over the trial, tentatively set for April 2. 'This is one of the most horrific crimes I've ever heard of,' argued Paige Fitzgerald, who works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington. … Because he faces a possible life sentence if convicted, 'There's no incentive for him to stay,' she said." The AP (1/30) also briefly reports on the ruling.

Editorial Lauds Cold-Case Efforts, Legislation. The Kalamazoo Gazette (MI) (1/30) editorializes, "Some Americans may not be interested in stories about prosecuting aging suspects in murders that took place decades ago. … Fortunately, federal authorities don't share that view, especially in cases that have sprung from the civil rights movements of the 1960s." The Gazette continues, "Last week in Mississippi, the FBI arrested 71-year-old James F. Seale, a former sheriff's deputy and alleged ex-member of the Ku Klux Klan. Seale was indicted in Jackson, and will face kidnapping charges in connection with the brutal killing of two 19-year-old black men in 1964. … Age should be no barrier in prosecuting, to the full extent of the law, people accused of such crimes. … Charges against Seale have drawn attention to other unsolved cases. A bill now in Congress would create a cold-cases unit in the Justice Department to track down unpunished civil rights-era killers. … Such legislation is appropriate."

DOJ Names Las Vegas As Major Human Trafficking Destination. The Las Vegas Sun (1/30, Skolnik) reports, "The federal government believes Las Vegas is a top destination for 'human trafficking' victims - from indentured servants to massage parlor workers and prostitutes held captive and forced to commit sex acts." The Sun continues, "This belief has led the Justice Department to grant hundreds of thousands of dollars to Metro Police to tackle the problem. … But first, the Anti Trafficking League Against Slavery (ATLAS), an office within Metro that opened last month, needs to try to answer a basic question: Is there a human-trafficking problem here, and if so, how big is it?" The Sun adds, "Terri Miller, ATLAS's civilian director and long one of the top Nevada activists against the sexual exploitation of women and children, and her boss, Metro Capt. Terry Lesney, say the need for the group is clear: There is a 'huge' and growing sex-oriented trafficking problem in Las Vegas. … Yet they quickly add that no statistics have ever been gathered and law enforcers never before have made it a top priority - so the scope of the problem still needs to be determined." The Sun notes, "Police in the past haven't paid sufficient attention to the signs that the prostitutes or others they're investigating may also be trafficking victims, they say - meaning the problem has gone underreported for years. … Miller says the problem has been made worse by Las Vegas' aggressive advertising promotions that encourage tourists to come here and sin all they like. … ATLAS was formed as an extension of the ad hoc Nevada Human Trafficking Task Force, an interagency group set up by the U.S. attorney's office in Las Vegas in 2004. … Between 17,000 and 20,000 people are trafficked into the United States annually, according to State Department estimates. Of those, it is unknown how many are brought to Nevada. … Rarely have defendants in Las Vegas been prosecuted as human traffickers, Lesney says, though there is a tough federal law passed in 2000 and even newer state laws that target those crimes. Until this month, she said, Metro didn't even have a booking code for alleged human trafficking violators."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Decision On Mittal Steel Still Up In Air. The West Virginia State Journal (1/30, Echemann) reports, "The Department of Justice had given Mittal Steel only until Sunday to rid itself of a canadian tin producer. … But Monday, there's still no word on what the Justice Department intends to do." The Journal continues, "A spokesman for the department said he did not expect an announcement for a few days. They are waiting on a district court to issue a final judgement in the case. They get five days after that. … As Mittal grew with buyouts, they ran into problems for having too much control over the tin market. The Justice Department doesn't like to see monopolies, and it told Mittal to get rid of one of three plants. … Now that list has been narrowed down to plant at Weirton and Sparrows Point near Baltimore." The

DOJ_NMG_0124014

Journal adds, "Weirton has appeared to be the likely candidate since Independent Steelworkers Union has said it would welcome a sale. … The two interested buyers are Esmark -- the former Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Co. -- and a man named Mitch Hecht, a former executive for International Steel Group."

FTC Approves Bridgestone Acquisition Of Bandag. The AP (1/30) reports, "Bridgestone Americas Holding Inc.'s $1 billion acquisition of Bandag Inc., a retread tire maker, on Monday received early approval from federal regulators." The AP continues, "The Federal Trade Commission ended a required 30-day waiting period for the acquisition ahead of schedule, Bandag said in a prepared statement. The 30-day period was not scheduled to end until Feb. 8, the company said. … Early terminations are not granted unless both the FTC and the Justice Department's antitrust division have completed their reviews and decided against taking any enforcement actions, the FTC says on its Web site." The AP adds, "Bridgestone Americas Holding, the U.S. subsidiary of Japan-based Bridgestone Corp., the largest tire and rubber company in the world, announced Dec. 5 that it would acquire Bandag for $50.75 per share in cash, or $1.05 billion. … Bandag said the acquisition remains subject to shareholder and other regulatory approvals. Bridgestone's American depository shares rose 50 cents to close at $42.90, while shares of Bandag increased 10 cents to close at $50.75 on the New York Stock Exchange."

Microsoft Launches Marketing Campaign For Vista. The New York Times (1/30, Lohr) reports, "Microsoft's power in the technology industry, some analysts insist, is waning. It faces a host of rivals from a reinvigorated Apple on the desktop to Web-based challengers like Google, delivering services and software online. … But yesterday, on the eve of the arrival of new models of Microsoft's flagship products, the Windows operating system and the Office programs, the skeptics were overshadowed and drowned out by the opening salvos in the software giant's marketing campaign." The Times continues, "Windows Vista and Office 2007 start appearing today, available in retail stores as a shrink-wrapped package and shipped on new machines sold by personal computer makers. The new Microsoft offerings were available to large corporate customers at the end of November. … Steven A. Ballmer, the company's chief executive, called today 'the biggest product launch in Microsoft's history,' and the rollout will be backed by a first-year marketing budget of hundreds of millions of dollars." The Times adds, "New versions of Windows and Office move across the technology industry like a powerful weather system, driving sales of personal computers and other hardware, software and services. The pace is typically gradual but steady, yet the impact on the rest of the industry is significant. … Over 5,000 software and hardware products are ready to run on Vista, and Microsoft has more than 500,000 industry partners worldwide, including resellers, retailers and consultants as well as hardware and software companies. Millions of developers write programs that run on Windows. … For every dollar Microsoft makes on Windows Vista, the rest of the industry will collect $18 of revenue, estimates IDC, a technology research firm. Indeed, those that build products and services on top of and around Microsoft's technology constitute an industry ecosystem that business professors have studied. And Microsoft's long investment in nurturing that network of mutual support, they say, is a major reason that Windows holds more than 90 percent of the market for PC operating systems."

Delta Open To Future Deals Despite Resistance To US Airways Bid. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A3, Dade) reports, "Delta Air Lines Inc. has assured creditors that it won't rule out the possibility of merging with another airline after exiting from bankruptcy if it defeats a hostile takeover offer from US Airways Group Inc., according to people familiar with the situation." The Journal continues, "To build support for its plan to remain independent, Delta appears close to agreeing with its official creditors committee on several provisions designed to clear a path toward an eventual tie-up. The parties are moving toward an accord to exclude from Delta's new corporate charter and bylaws any so-called poison pill that could pose an insurmountable hurdle to future mergers, according to one person familiar with the discussions." The Journal adds, "In addition, the committee would have a strong hand in selecting Delta's post-bankruptcy board, according to knowledgeable people. The creditors committee wants a board that favors consolidation as a strategic option, people close to the board have said. … Delta, based in Atlanta, had been reluctant to grant some of the concessions, but in recent weeks the committee made it clear that it required them as a condition for approving Delta's standalone plan over the US Airways merger." The Journal notes, "Delta's apparent willingness to consider a future deal could breathe life back into widespread hopes for an industry consolidation wave, which airline observers thought could be dashed if the US Airways-Delta merger failed. Airlines are looking for partners in an effort to reduce the number of seats in the air, lower operating costs and gain greater pricing power."

Time May Be Running Out For Airline Deal. CNNMoney.com (1/30, Isidore) reports, "Time could be running out on US Airways Group's hostile bid for Delta Air Lines and with it much of the talk about consolidation within the airline industry." CNNMoney continues, "Industry experts say the recent retreat in airline stock prices, despite some strong financial results, is attributable at least partly to the growing belief among investors that the US Air bid for Delta isn't winning the necessary support of Delta creditors as it faces deadlines this week and next. … And just as it was US Air's hostile bid for Delta in November that sparked talk of a round of industry consolidation involving AMR unit American Airlines, UAL unit United Airlines, Continental Airlines and Northwest Airlines, many experts now believe that the merger talk will again quiet down without a US Air-Delta deal shaking up the industry status quo. … 'You only have two guys, United and US Air, who are advocating consolidation,' said airline consultant Michael Boyd. 'Everyone else thinks it's a dumb idea. It's different if they get forced into something. But I don't think anyone else wants to do a deal.'"

DOJ_NMG_0124015

Delta Pilots Make Their Presence Known. The New York Times (1/30, Bailey) reports, "The remarkable turnaround of the airline industry has rewarded investors with rising share prices, and the $9.87 billion price tag that US Airways Group is offering for Delta Air Lines in a hostile takeover bid is further proof that the industry is again in favor with investors and lenders. … With most of the industry returning to profitability — in part by extracting billions of dollars of pay cuts from workers — pilots are demanding that they should recoup some of the pay and other benefits they gave up in recent years and share in the improved fortunes. The pilots' agenda is playing an important role in the merger talks over Delta. The Delta pilots have backed management's stand-alone plan to exit bankruptcy, and are jointly fighting the US Airways bid." The Times continues, "In all, the Delta pilots have $2.1 billion in claims. … The pilots are motivated to support management in part by self-interest — they believe that they would have less job security under US Airways ownership. And that support could be persuasive when the pilots next want something from Delta management. … They, in fact, accepted a slightly lower price in selling several hundred million dollars in bankruptcy claims so that they could hang onto the voting rights those claims represented to provide maximum support to management's plan, according to people familiar with the pilots' dealings." The Times adds, "Delta pilots are counting on the unusual contract they negotiated in bankruptcy to help them recoup their most recent 13 percent pay cut over the next three years by helping the airline achieve certain performance improvements. They also could win profit-sharing bonuses on top of that. … US Airways was asked over the weekend by some Delta creditors to again raise its bid. The airline has been frustrated because the official creditors committee in Delta's bankruptcy, the only party that can force Delta to allow due diligence by US Airways and otherwise get the merger talks started, has been silent. … So, according to a person involved in the talks, US Airways management set the following conditions: if the official creditors committee would tell Delta by Thursday to allow due diligence, to also make a filing starting antitrust review of the proposed merger, and postpone a hearing on Delta's stand-alone plan to exit bankruptcy, then US Airways management would take to its board a proposal to increase its bid by another $1 billion. It did not officially raise its bid." … Yesterday, there were talks among creditors but no word from the official committee, this person said."

Merrill Lynch To Purchase First Republic. The Financial Times (1/30, Wighton) reports, "Merrill Lynch on Monday underlined the lure of the rich for Wall Street banks by paying $1.8bn for First Republic, a California-based private bank and wealth management company." The Times continues, "In its biggest acquisition in 10 years, Merrill is paying a 44 per cent premium for First Republic, which will retain its name as a separate business within Merrill Lynch Bank & Trust. … The deal highlights the high prices big banks are prepared to offer to expand in the fast-growing business of serving the US's ultra-rich. In November, Bank of America paid Charles Schwab 30 times 2006 earnings for its US Trust private banking unit and other US and overseas banks are looking to buy in the sector."

The New York Times/Bloomberg (1/30) reports, "First Republic, which has 43 branches and specializes in mortgages on luxury homes, gives Merrill more wealthy customers who might buy brokerage services. … 'Luxury lending and wealth management, those are higher-end customers,' said Steve Roukis, managing director at Matrix Asset Advisors. of New York. 'It's a continuation of their strategy to focus on their core business and either build or acquire whatever gives them a better return on their cost of capital.' … Merrill, based in New York, said it expects the transaction to add modestly to earnings by the end of 2008."

Citigroup To Purchase British Bank. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, C16, Mollenkamp, McDonald) reports, "Citigroup Inc.'s £575 million ($1.13 billion) purchase of Egg Banking PLC from Prudential PLC," one of Britain's largest insurers, "sets the stage for the U.S. financial-services company to step up its battle in the British credit-card market against entrenched banks such as Barclays PLC and Bank of America Corp. For Prudential…the transaction is part of a broad review of its United Kingdom business." The deal, "which is expected to close by April pending regulatory approval, gives Citigroup access to online bank Egg's three million customers, 2.9 million of whom are Egg card customers. Before this deal, Citigroup had just 800,000 card customers in the U.K. Egg's share totals about 5.7% of U.K. credit-card outstanding balances.

The New York Times (1/30, Dash) reports Citigroup agreed yesterday to buy British online bank Egg Banking. The agreement is "the latest in a series of small deals to expand" Citigroup's "retail presence abroad." The acquisition will allow Citigroup to "quadruple its number of credit card customers…and broaden its reach by the use of an Internet site to open savings accounts and mortgages in a country where it has five retail branches. But at a time when the British banking sector has been hurt by a barrage of bad loans and bankruptcies, some analysts are questioning the deal." The Times adds that Egg, "which was among the first online banks when it was established in 1998, has struggled as of late."

DOJ_NMG_0124016

Lawmakers Push For Bank Ownership Limits. The AP (1/30, Gordon) reports a group of House lawmakers Monday "renewed a push for legislation that would block commercial companies like Wal-Mart and Home Depot from owning a special sort of bank that has been proliferating in recent years." The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.'s "six-month halt on new approvals of companies' applications to establish or acquire the banks known as industrial loan corporations ends Wednesday," and the agency's directors are meeting that day "to consider whether to extend it, lift it or take other action." Extending the moratorium "would give the new Congress a chance to consider the legislation."

EU To Threaten Banks, Credit Card Firms With Anti-Competition Fines. Bloomberg (1/30, Newman, Rega) reports, "European Union regulators will threaten banks and credit card companies with potential fines for blocking competition, according to a draft of a report to be delivered this week." Bloomberg continues, "The European Commission, the EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, may probe banks and payment card providers for colluding on prices and using practices aimed at keeping competitors out of their markets, the regulator said in a draft summary obtained by Bloomberg News. The report doesn't identify any companies. … The EU agency 'will not hesitate to exercise its powers of enforcement' under antitrust rules 'to ensure that the competition rules are respected in retail banking,' the 10-page summary said. The commission will release the report on Jan. 31." Bloomberg adds, "The regulator, which can fine companies as much as 10 percent of worldwide sales for antitrust violations, already has challenged how transaction fees are set by Visa International Inc. and MasterCard Inc., the two biggest credit-card networks. … Disputes with Visa and MasterCard have centered on fees paid between banks that are known as interchange. When a consumer pays with a card, the retailer's bank pays the interchange to the consumer's bank. MasterCard and Visa don't collect the fee. Rather, they set guidelines on what banks should charge each other, unless the banks agree otherwise."

Amaranth's Rivals Profited From Its Collapse. In a front-page story, the Wall Street Journal (1/30, A1, Davis, Zuckerman, Sender) reports, "When Amaranth LLC collapsed in the fall, after swiftly losing more than $6 billion, it was the biggest hedge-fund failure ever. Now as investors slowly get back what's left of their money, it's becoming clear the debacle also had some big winners: other players in the high-stakes energy market who profited from a crippled rival's travails." The "Amaranth case shows how Wall Street dealt with a fund after it had traded its way into a deep hole. Information the fund revealed about its holdings as it grasped for a lifeline let other commodity-market players, Wall Street firms included, exploit its positions. As they drove prices relentlessly against Amaranth, its losses swelled, and instead of facing a big but possibly survivable setback, it collapsed." The "case also reflects an incentive structure in the world of hedge funds that can tempt some to assume heavy risk."

Patent And Trademark Office Seeking New Examiners. The Washington Post's (1/30, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The US Patent and Trademark Office" plans "to hire 1,200 examiners for each of the next five years," at an "average starting salary [of] about $62,000, and electrical engineers and computer engineers may qualify for an $8,800 signing bonus because the PTO has a hard time recruiting in those fields." The Post adds, "In recent months, the PTO has been swamped with patent applications, for such things as computer software, cellphones and interactive videos, and could face a backlog of 800,000 cases before year's end," according to John J. Doll, the commissioner of patents." The Post notes that the "PTO is in competition with the private sector to hire college graduates and others with degrees in engineering and science" and "as part of its employment package, PTO pays retention bonuses to keep electrical and computer engineers from going to the private sector" and "tries to be a family-friendly employer, giving some leeway to examiners on when they start their work each day…"

ENVIRONMENT:

Climate Change Efforts Gaining Momentum In Congress. USA Today (1/30, Watson, 2.27M) reports, "After years of being on Congress' back burner, global warming will be a focus of the new Democratic majority trying to follow cities and states that have tackled the issue. Today, the Senate holds its first global warming hearing of the year." The Environment and Public Works Committee, which is holding the hearing, is "headed by Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., who has been named an environmental 'champion' by groups such as the League of Conservation Voters. She takes over from Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., who once called global warming a 'hoax.'" And "House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., plans to form a special committee to study global warming and energy independence. She directed House committees to pass global warming bills by July 4." However, "[i]t is far from a given that Congress will pass strict legislation to address global warming." Inhofe "has vowed to block any bills calling for mandatory actions by industry to curb greenhouse gas emissions. Breaking that freeze would take the approval of 60 senators."

DOJ_NMG_0124017

Ban Mulls Summit Of World Leaders On Greenhouse Gases. The Financial Times (1/30, Harvey, Daniel, Aglionby) reports, "Plans for an emergency summit of world leaders to break the international impasse on cutting greenhouse gases are being discussed by Ban Ki-moon, United Nations secretary-general. At the summit, mooted for September, heads of state would discuss the possibility of a successor to the Kyoto protocol on climate change, the main provisions of which expire in 2012." Ban "has chosen to stake some political capital on climate change, surprising US president George W. Bush by raising it at their meeting two weeks ago." Bush "is the leader most likely to decline" a summit invitation. He "has shunned mandatory caps on emissions, and officials have dismissed hopes of the US engaging in discussions about a post-Kyoto accord."

UN Climate Change Panel Set To Issue Report. The New York Times (1/30, Kanter, Revkin, 1.16M) reports, "Scientists from across the world gathered Monday to hammer out the final details of an authoritative report on climate change that is expected to project centuries of rising temperatures and sea levels unless there are curbs in emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases that trap heat in the atmosphere." The "report is the fourth since 1990 from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, which is overseen by the United Nations. The report, several of the authors said, will describe a growing body of evidence that warming is likely to cause a profound transformation of the planet."

BP Faces Expanding Criminal Probe Over Texas Refinery Problems. Bloomberg (1/30, Calkins, Fisk) reports, "BP Plc is facing a growing federal investigation into possible criminal environmental and safety violations at its Texas refinery, where a 2005 explosion killed 15 workers, lawyers suing the company said." Bloomberg continues, "The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has joined a federal investigation begun in October by the U.S. attorney in Houston, the lawyers said. Five Washington-based representatives of the Justice Department, the EPA and the Federal Bureau of Investigations went to Texas this month to meet attorneys for workers hurt in the blast, a victims' lawyer at the meeting said. … 'They were looking at anything and everything we had,' said attorney Joseph Gourrier, whose firm represents 150 injured workers suing BP. 'They are looking for things that can be used to bring criminal charges against the upper management of BP, both at the refinery site and further up the company.'" Bloomberg adds, "The multiagency investigation represents an expansion of the government's probe into London-based BP, Europe's second-largest oil company. The Texas City explosion, one of the worst industrial accidents in recent U.S. history, spurred more than 1,700 lawsuits, a record $21 million fine by the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration and a finding by the U.S. Chemical Safety Board that BP endangered workers by cutting costs. …BP, which has set aside $1.6 billion to resolve the lawsuits, has settled more than 1,200 claims, including all the death suits. BP acknowledged safety shortcomings at the plant."

Court Invalidates Salmon Rider In Appropriations Bill. The Hill (1/30, Schor) reports, "On paper, the debate deals with swimming salmon and spilling water. … But in Congress, the federal court decision that last week invalidated a rider written by Senate Appropriations Committee member Larry Craig (R-Idaho) threatens to upend the influential panel's authority." The Hill continues, "The unanimous ruling allows a small group of salmon-watchers to stay on the job while reminding appropriators of a hard truth they rarely acknowledge: Earmarks included in report language, but not bill text, do not have the force of law. … Craig was so aggravated in 2005 at what he deemed biased reporting by the Portland-based Fish Passage Center that he moved to eliminate its $1.3 million budget through an Appropriations Committee report. Several local groups filed suit against Craig's effort, and the longtime appropriations cardinal said their victory last Wednesday would set a worrisome example for future challenges to appropriations decisions. … 'It's very significant,' Craig said in an interview. 'We've always viewed report language as having the force of law.'" The Hill adds, "Sen. Thad Cochran (Miss.), the senior Appropriations Republican, declined to judge the case definitively until the Justice Department decides whether to pursue an appeal to the Supreme Court. But he said 'it may be that [the decision] is wrong. … Report language explains the intent of Congress in appropriating money and limits on the use of funds,' Cochran said. '[It has] been effective in explaining what Congress intended. We will stay tuned, because this story may not be over yet.'" The Hill notes, "During the earmark-transparency debate that briefly imperiled the Senate's ethics bill this month, lawmakers acknowledged that federal agencies are not required to follow instructions made only in appropriations reports that have all the weight of 'sending a note from your sister,' as Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) put it. Yet agencies still remain loyal to the appropriators who fund them, making the court decision a triumph for fiscal watchdog groups."

DOJ_NMG_0124018

Yosemite Suit May Affect Public Access To Park. The AP (1/30, Burke) reports from Yosemite National Park in California, "The plunging waterfalls and soaring crags chiseled by the Merced River draw millions of visitors each year, but the crowds are precisely what threatens the waterway and the park. … Efforts to safeguard the Merced have spawned a court battle over the future of development in Yosemite National Park's most popular stretch. The case may come down to the challenge facing all of America's parks: Should they remain open to everyone, or should access be limited in the interest of protecting them?" The AP continues, "In November, a federal judge barred crews from finishing $60 million in construction projects in Yosemite Valley, siding with a small group of environmentalists who sued the federal government, saying further commercial development would bring greater numbers of visitors, thus threatening the Merced's fragile ecosystem. … The government is appealing, fearing the ruling could force the National Park Service to limit the number of people allowed into Yosemite each day, a precedent it doesn't want to see echoed in other parks." The AP adds, "The case has Yosemite's most loyal advocates sharply divided over how to balance preservation with access to public lands. Even environmentalists can't agree on how to minimize the human footprint - some believe cars should be kept out entirely; others say visitors should have to make reservations in advance. … Park spokesman Scott Gediman called the plaintiffs a 'fringe group' pushing a radical agenda. … Well-known conservation groups like the Sierra Club and Nature Conservancy aren't directly involved in the fight, though the Sierra Club was among more than 60 organizations that signed a legal brief supporting an earlier version of the suit."

Proposal To Drop Gray Wolves From Protection May Spark Legal Challenge. USA Today (1/30, 3A, O'Driscoll) reports from Denver, "The gray wolf, hunted to near-extinction in the last century, has rebounded so well in six states that it can now be taken off the endangered species list, federal wildlife officials said Monday." USA continues, "Federal protection for about 4,000 gray wolves in three western Great Lakes states -- northern parts of Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan -- will end in about a month, the Fish and Wildlife Service announced. … Plans to do the same in Montana, Idaho and Wyoming probably will take the rest of this year, service director H. Dale Hall said. A formal proposal, with public hearings and a two-month comment period, will be published this week." USA adds, "Two wildlife advocacy groups — the Defenders of Wildlife and Sinapu, a Colorado-based wolf advocacy group — warned they might sue to prevent taking wolves in the Rockies off the endangered list. Another group, the Center for Biological Diversity, claims the proposal will 'end in the mass killing of wolves.' … The groups contend that state management of wolves in the Rockies will do too little to maintain the animal's remarkable recovery since the mid-1990s, when 66 wild wolves from Canada were released in Yellowstone National Park and central Idaho. The population has mushroomed to more than 1,200 today." USA notes, "Hunters say wolves compete for elk, deer and other game. Ranchers complain they kill too many livestock. An anti-wolf group, Friends of the Northern Yellowstone Elk Herd, says it plans to sue to remove endangered status immediately. … Dropping federal protection would make states responsible for managing the wolf population. They could allow hunting and lethal control as long as at least 10 wolf packs and 100 animals remain in each state."

NYTimes Says Bush Fuel Economy Proposal Promises Only Hypothetical Results. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/30, 1.16M), writes, "Except for minor tweaks, Congress has refused to raise fuel efficiency requirements or close a gaping loophole that lets S.U.V.'s and pickups be measured by a more lenient standard." Those who heard Bush's State of the Union address "can be forgiven for thinking he was finally ready to change that." But all he "really asked for was the authority to set mileage standards in a different way." Bush "asked the country to take it on faith that this new measurement system, combined with technological advances, would lead to annual mileage improvements of 4 percent a year." Sen. Barack Obama "plans to reintroduce a bill that would set a 4 percent annual increase in efficiency as a target, just what Mr. Bush says he wants." The "bill could be an important first step. It commands some bipartisan support, and unlike Mr. Bush's approach, it promises real as opposed to hypothetical results."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

In San Diego, 4 Drug Suspects Extradited From Mexico Plead Not Guilty. The AP (1/30, Hoffman) reports, "Four Mexican drug traffickers who were extradited to the U.S. this month pleaded not guilty Monday to an array of federal drug charges. They include brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, top figures in the Arellano Felix drug cartel, based in Tijuana, Mexico. A court-appointed defender entered not guilty pleas on their behalf to charges of racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges stemming from a sweeping 2003 indictment that named 11 people." The judge "ordered all four held without bail pending a detention hearing Thursday." There are more than 70 media references to the suspects' pleas. News outlets that used the AP story include FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, San Jose Mercury News, Houston

DOJ_NMG_0124019

Chronicle, Miami Herald, Fort Worth Star Telegram, and KLTV-TV, Longview Texas.

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/29) reported that the others in court included Jesus Hector Palma Salazar, who authorities "say left the Arellano cartel and went on to lead the rival Sinaloa drug cartel. He was indicted in San Diego in 1995 on charges of conspiring to import and distribute a ton of cocaine. The fourth man in court was Jose Albert Marquez, indicted in 2002 on drug charges, but also suspected of being the Arellano Felix cartel's link to the Mexican Mafia prison gang."

Man Described As Juárez Cartel "Gatekeeper" Faces Charges In US. The El Paso (TX) Times (1/29) reported a man "identified as a 'gatekeeper' for the Juárez cartel and two other alleged members of the drug ring are among the drug lords extradited last weekend by Mexico to face charges in the United States. … Drug Enforcement Administration head Karen Tandy said during a press conference this week that the group included Gracielo Gardea Carrasco, 'a gatekeeper who was responsible for controlling drug smuggling across the border for the Juárez cartel.' … Gardea was indicted in Midland in 2000 on drug conspiracy charges for allegedly smuggling marijuana from Mexico to a Midland gang known as 'Los Tres de la Sierra,' or the three from the mountain."

Seven Puerto Rican Doctors Accused Of Participating In Internet Pharmacy Scheme. The AP (1/30) reports seven Puerto Rican doctors "have been indicted…in connection with an Internet scheme that allegedly dispensed controlled substances without a legitimate medical purpose. The physicians were accused of working with Internet pharmacies that solicited customers seeking drugs such as the addictive painkiller hydrocodone and appetite suppressant phentermine, according to a statement from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. … The alleged scheme started in 2003." Australia's Sydney Morning Herald and The Age used the AP story.

Convicted Drug-Ring Members To Be Sentenced In Kentucky. The Grayson County (KY) News Gazette (1/29) reports sentencing "has been set for April in Owensboro federal court for [three] members of a drug ring that delivered and sold marijuana and methamphetamine in Texas, Kentucky and Indiana totaling over $2.7 million. … The case was initiated when Louisville Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agents received information from the San Antonio, Tex. DEA office that drug traffickers in Texas were transporting loads of marijuana to an individual residing in Owensboro. … Over 1,100 pounds of marijuana was transported from February 2003 through April 2005. The conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine involved over 3 pounds."

Authorities Say Smuggling Tunnels Under US-Mexico Border Remain Unfilled. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Marosi) reports seven of the largest tunnels "discovered under the U.S.-Mexico border in recent years have yet to be filled in, authorities said, raising concerns they could be reused for smuggling people or drugs. Among them is the longest tunnel yet found — extending nearly half a mile from San Diego to Tijuana. Nearby, another sophisticated passage once known as the Taj Mahal of tunnels has been sitting unfilled for 13 years. … Because of overlapping jurisdictions among federal border agencies, the responsibility for subterranean work was unclear for years. The Border Patrol and the Drug Enforcement Administration each had some responsibility. After the Department of Homeland Security was created in 2003, the responsibility for filling tunnels was assigned to one agency: Customs and Border Protection."

Supporters Seek To Change Montana's Medical Marijuana Law. The AP (1/29) reported Rep. Ron Erickson said Montana's medical marijuana law "needs to be changed to let patients grow more plants and posses more marijuana. … He also told a House committee on Monday that the law needs to be changed to allow those registered with the state to have six 'mature' marijuana plants, rather than just six plants. More young plants are needed to replace old ones that die, he argued." Erickson's measure "was supported by those behind the 2004 initiative that voters approved with 62 percent of the vote. … The House Judiciary Committee did not take immediate action on the bill."

Seattle-Based US Marshal Resigns. The AP (1/30) reports, "Seattle-based U.S. Marshal Eric Robertson, who oversaw security at the new federal courthouse downtown and led efforts to round up fugitives and sex offenders in Western Washington, is resigning to become the administrator of a fire district." The AP continues, "His deputies worked with local authorities to help track down and arrest more than 3,000 suspects in 36 states and eight foreign countries during his five-year tenure. He also created a new unit to deal with threats to judges after Seattle police shot and killed a man who brandished a defused grenade in the courthouse lobby in June 2005. … His resignation, announced in an interview with The Associated Press on Monday, takes effect in March. His chief deputy at the Seattle U.S. marshal's office, 22-year veteran David Miller, is expected to be named his acting replacement until a new marshal is confirmed by the Senate. … 'Our focus has really been on crimes of violence, weapons, sex offenders - go out, work with the locals and to find out who are the bad actors in their community,' Robertson said." The AP adds, "In his new position, Robertson, 43, will oversee the creation of a fire district covering 65,000 people in Auburn, Algona and Pacific, northeast of Tacoma. The joint fire authority was established by voters last November. Robertson lives in eastern Pierce County and represented the area in the Legislature for two terms in the 1990s. … Among the accomplishments of his office, Robertson cites the 2003 arrest of Jesus C. Mezquia, who was later convicted in the rape and strangulation of rising punk rock star Mia Zapata, whose body was found in Seattle's Central Area in 1993. Marshals Service deputies from Seattle located Mezquia in the Florida Keys after DNA evidence linked him to the crime. … Along with former U.S. Attorney John McKay, who resigned earlier this month and took a job teaching law at Seattle University, Robertson also helped boost the presence of federal law enforcement in rapidly growing southwest Washington, much to the relief of local authorities there. He opened an office in Clark County - where federal prosecutors have made a point of going after felons found with weapons - and stationed a deputy there permanently."

DOJ_NMG_0124020

Florida Legislature Criticized For Easing Gun Laws. The New York Times (1/30, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Twenty years ago, the Florida Legislature cravenly decided to allow 'law abiding' citizens to carry concealed weapons merely by declaring their preference for self-defense. Then last July, at the prodding of the gun lobby, the current crop of state lawmakers proved they could be even more corrupt and cowardly than their predecessors by deciding to make the list of gun-toting Floridians a secret." But the Florida Sun-Sentinel has "given residents of the state a final look at their representatives' gruesome handiwork. When the law was first enacted, there were fewer than 25,000 licensed gun holders. Since then, the state roll has boomed to 410,000 and counting." The paper also laid "bare the fact that more than 1,400 people easily got gun licenses despite pleading guilty or no contest to felonies that included manslaughter, burglary and child molestation."

IMMIGRATION:

Coalition Optimistic About Immigrant Farm Worker Overhaul. The Hill (1/30, Swanson) reports a "coalition of groups representing farm workers and employers says those it represents have the best opportunity in years to win congressional approval of legislation overhauling immigration rules for migrant workers, either as a stand-alone bill or part of a wider immigration bill." Supporters "say their optimism springs from the combination of Democrats controlling Congress and rising pressure on lawmakers representing agricultural districts to alleviate a farm laborer shortage as increasing momentum for the Agriculture Jobs Opportunity and Benefits Act (AgJOBS)." Craig Regelbrugge of the Agriculture Coalition for Immigration Reform "sees two possible scenarios for AgJOBS this year. The bill could become part of a wider immigration overhaul, similar to what happened when Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) added the bill in an amendment to immigration legislation passed by the Senate last year." But Regelbrugge "said a scaled-down package for agriculture might still be able to move through Congress given support for the bill from farm employers and workers."

Seven Border Tunnels Yet To Be Filled In. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, A1, Marosi, 850K) reports, "Seven of the largest tunnels discovered under the U.S.-Mexico border in recent years have yet to be filled in, authorities said, raising concerns they could be reused for smuggling people or drugs." Among them "is the longest tunnel yet found — extending nearly half a mile from San Diego to Tijuana. Nearby, another sophisticated passage once known as the Taj Mahal of tunnels has been sitting unfilled for 13 years, authorities say." Though "concrete plugs usually close off the tunnels where they cross under the border and at main entrance and exit points, the areas in between remain largely intact. Filling the seven tunnels would cost about $2.7 million, according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials." But "accessing tunnels that run under private property is also a problem, as is a lack of coordination with Mexican authorities."

TAX:

US Settles Tax Prosecution Claims With Texas Attorney. The San Antonio Express-News (1/30, Robbins) reports, "Already stung by its failure to convict a defense lawyer despite years of investigation, the federal government has agreed to pay the San Antonio attorney $1.34 million to settle claims that revenue agents maliciously targeted him." The Express-News continues, "The settlement finalized last week effectively ends more than six years of legal feuding, which began when Alan Brown's office manager fell for a cocaine smuggler and, in an effort to win her lover leniency, told federal agents that Brown routinely cheated on his taxes." The Express-News adds, "The government did not admit to any fault in its part of the compromise, but Brown counted the agreement among the multiple legal victories he and his lawyers won en route to his 2005 acquittal on tax-evasion charges. .. The 63-year-old attorney said he considered himself lucky to squeeze any compensation from the government, but he described the sum as a small measure of justice compared with the financial and emotional costs of the prosecution. … 'According to the terms of the deal, Brown will split the money with his wife, lawyer Jean Brown, who also was indicted before the government dropped the charges, and his firm, including partner Jay Norton. … Claiming investigators distorted evidence and relentlessly targeted them, the lawyers' lawsuit had forced the government to disclose more than it typically reveals about prosecutions." The Express-News notes, "Julie Zatz, assistant chief of the civil division there, declined to detail the reasons for settling the case but said they had nothing to do with allegations of investigative misconduct."

DOJ_NMG_0124021

WSJournal Critical Of Reliance On "Tax Gap." The Wall Street Journal (1/30, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "When something sounds too good to be true, it usually is. So now is an apt time to deconstruct the much-discussed 'tax gap,' that mythical golden goose that the Beltway political class is counting on to fund its spending agenda." The "tax gap" is "the difference between what the Internal Revenue Service thinks taxpayers should be paying and what it collects. The IRS currently estimates this at about $290 billion a year. Ask any Congressional chairman how he intends to close the deficit, expand the Medicare drug benefit, reform the Alternative Minimum Tax or subsidize college education, and the answer is invariably 'close the tax gap.'" But "all voluntary tax compliance systems have their limits. Under today's tax code, the only way the feds can raise compliance is to place extraordinary burdens on taxpayers."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

In Midst Of "Export Boom," Bush To Promote New Trade Deals. The Washington Post (1/30, D1, Goodman, Henderson, 690K) reports, "The United States is in the midst of an export boom, with foreign sales chipping away at the country's enormous trade deficit while providing a modest cushion against the declining housing market. In the first 11 months of 2006, U.S. exports reached $1.31 trillion, a jump of 13.1 percent over the corresponding period in 2005, the Commerce Department said. That was an improvement over the 10.7 percent gain of the year before." The Post adds, "Exports to China -- whose dominance on American store shelves stokes worry -- increased by 33 percent in the first 11 months of 2006. Combined with Hong Kong, China now stands as the United States' third-largest export market, behind only Canada and Mexico." President Bush "is scheduled to travel today to Peoria, Ill., to visit Caterpillar, the giant maker of construction equipment, as he presses Congress to approve new trade agreements. Caterpillar is one of the companies having notable success selling American-made gear abroad."

Executive Order Said To Give White House More Control Over Federal Rules. The New York Times (1/30, A1, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "President Bush has signed a directive that gives the White House much greater control over the rules and policy statements that the government develops to protect public health, safety, the environment, civil rights and privacy. In an executive order published last week in the Federal Register, Mr. Bush said that each agency must have a regulatory policy office run by a political appointee, to supervise the development of rules and documents providing guidance to regulated industries." The White House "will thus have a gatekeeper in each agency to analyze the costs and the benefits of new rules and to make sure the agencies carry out the president's priorities. This strengthens the hand of the White House in shaping rules that have, in the past, often been generated by civil servants and scientific experts." In an interview, Jeffrey A. Rosen, general counsel at the White House Office of Management and Budget, said, "This is a classic good-government measure that will make federal agencies more open and accountable." Business groups "welcomed the executive order, saying it had the potential to reduce what they saw as the burden of federal regulations. … Consumer, labor and environmental groups denounced" it, "saying it gave too much control to the White House and would hinder agencies' efforts to protect the public."

Stark Says Bush Healthcare Plan "Doesn't Deserve Congress' Consideration." Rep. Pete Stark, chairman of the health subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee, writes in USA Today (1/30, 10A, 2.27M), "President Bush is to be commended for finally recognizing the needs of 47 million Americans denied health care for lack of insurance." But his proposal would do little to help them. In a few years it would raise taxes for 160 million workers who receive group health insurance benefits." Stark also writes, "Much like Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, 'gold-plated' health insurance is a figment of the president's imagination. The problem with our health system is not that Americans can afford to use too much health care; it's that too many can't afford any." The plan "would destroy the very system through which the vast majority of people get their coverage today and fail to replace it with an alternative means of obtaining quality care. It doesn't deserve Congress' consideration."

In an editorial, USA Today (1/30, 2.27M) says "Bush's plan is no magic cure to all that ails America's health care system. In fact, it falls far short of what's happening in some states." But it "still has merits worth considering. … Rejecting it without serious debate might score political points, but does nothing to help those who suffer from the inequities of the status quo."

DOJ_NMG_0124022

Man Says Bush Initiative Will Curb Ability To Insure Hemophilic Son. In a "Web exclusive," Newsweek (1/29, Conant, 3.12M) reported, "Bush's State of the Union address may not have done much to improve his popularity. But it did succeed in jump-starting debate over one of the leading --- and most contentiously lobbied issues -- on his domestic agenda: health-care reform. … Democrats on Capitol Hill, along with labor unions and consumer groups, pilloried the Bush plan, arguing his proposal would do little to help America's nearly 47 million uninsured -- and could wind up hastening the demise of employer-provided healthcare." Newsweek interviewed Colorado resident Nathan J. Wilkes, who "was so worried about the possible effects of Bush's proposal on his ability to provide coverage for his chronically ill son that he decided to travel to the capital to make some noise." In the interview, Wilkes, who earns more than $100,000 per year, said he was "worried" about Bush's proposal because his son's hemophilia has increased the costs his employer-provided health insurance. Wilkes: "His claims have increased health-care costs for everyone I work with. My company is very socially responsible, but because of our high claims, no other insurance company will touch us. We're trapped with the same provider, which keeps raising prices and last year introduced a $1 million lifetime cap on coverage. Even if my son has no injuries, we'll hit that cap in the next one to three months."

Schwarzenegger Plan Conflicts With Bush Budget Goals. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "wants $3.7 billion a year in new federal funding to cover a big chunk of his healthcare plan for Californians, putting him on a collision course with budget hawks in the nation's capital and leaders in other states seeking assistance." But the "sheer size of the federal allocation Schwarzenegger's plan would require is raising eyebrows." Sen. Judd Gregg, ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee, said, "That's a big number on an annual basis. California hasn't yet passed a law [implementing the governor's plan], but when they do, I would think people are going to take a deep breath." The Times adds the "cost of helping states fund their health plans has already attracted the attention of budget cutters because it is complicating President Bush's stated goal of balancing the federal budget in five years. In his new budget, scheduled to go to Congress on Monday, Bush is expected to call for a substantial slowdown in federal healthcare spending. Some of the cuts Bush proposes could affect programs Schwarzenegger is counting on to help pay for his plan, such as Medicaid."

Bush Civilian Reserve Corps Proposal Yet To Be Fleshed Out. The Washington Times (1/30, Dinan, 88K) reports President Bush's "call last week for a Civilian Reserve Corps to help troubled countries is either a solid idea whose time has come or yet another throwaway applause line in a State of the Union speech and it's up to Mr. Bush to decide how it turns out." For a "proposal during the annual address to Congress arguably the biggest presidential stage this one is mostly bare-bones. There is no plan or legislation, just a pledge to work with Congress to try to create something." Carlos Pascual, who "worked on the idea when he was director of the State Department's Office of Reconstruction and Stabilization," said, "The big question right now is whether the White House is really going to seriously act on it."

Number Of American Volunteers Swells. The Christian Science Monitor (1/30, Green, 59K) reports, "More Americans than ever before are volunteering. In 2005, 29 percent of adults were serving – a 30-year high, according to a December report by the Corporation for National and Community Service (CNCS)." As "mentoring, drug rehabilitation, and other programs depend primarily on volunteers, and as religious groups reach far beyond their congregations to address social problems, the trend is poised to engender real change, says David Eisner, chief executive of the CNCS." Three age groups – "older teens, baby boomers, and seniors – are driving the upsurge. And as these teens grow and boomers retire, bucking the expectation they will slow down, together they could expand volunteerism even more, Eisner says. The CNCS, a federal agency that since 1993 has fostered civic engagement through community service, has launched a push to boost the number of US volunteers by 10 million to 75 million by 2010."

Bush Says He Wasn't "Trying To Needle" By Referring To "Democrat" Party. The AP (1/30, Feller) reports, "This one has gotten a little ic-ky for the White House. President Bush said Monday he wasn't trying to disparage the party now running Congress by referring to it as the 'Democrat majority,' as opposed to the 'Democratic majority,' in his State of the Union speech." In an interview with National Public Radio, Bush said, "That was an oversight. … I mean, I'm not trying to needle." The AP adds, "Bush's dropping of the 'ic' at the end of the word prompted grumbling by Democrats that he purposely got their name wrong. This is not a new charge. President Reagan used to refer to the 'Democrat Party.' Democratic leaders have long considered it demeaning when their suffix is omitted."

The Washington Post (1/30, A15, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "White House press secretary Tony Snow seemed peeved with reporters asking about the Bush mispronunciation at his morning press 'gaggle' yesterday, accusing the reporters of making 'three mountains out of a molehill' and suggesting that the press was not much interested when Democrats bashed Bush with language calling him a 'loser' or a 'liar.'" Said Snow, "This looks like an exercise of looking for a fence rather than looking for a way to work together. … There was no intentional slight of anyone."

DOJ_NMG_0124023

The Los Angeles Times (1/30, Reynolds, 850K) says "experts of political locution say it's a deliberate, if ungrammatical, linguistic strategy. 'The word "democratic" has such positive emotional valence ... So they politicize it to use it as a term to describe a group of political rivals,' said Roderick P. Hart, a professor of communications and government at the University of Texas in Austin." Hart also said "'Democrat Party' is not common usage in Texas…noting that the only people he has heard use it are 'sitting Republican legislators.'"

The New York Times (1/30, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports that "last weekend, Mr. Bush put his bipartisan spirit on display, right there on the schedule distributed by the White House: 'The president makes remarks to the House Democrat Conference.' But late yesterday a new version of the schedule was released. 'Democratic conference,' it said."

Schumer Says Cheney Is "Brain Wave" Of Administration. Sen. Charles Schumer was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (1/29, Matthews), "What's the brain wave of this administration? Is it George Bush?" Schumer replied, "No, Cheney. ... Cheney's the keeper of the flame, Bush listens to him, and that's why they've lost touch."

Senate To Take Up Minimum Wage Bill, Business Tax Cuts. The New York Times (1/30, Zernike, 1.16M) reports the Senate is "expected to clear the way on Tuesday for an increase in the minimum wage that Democrats and some Republicans agree is overdue. But the Senate's approval may not mean that workers will actually start receiving bigger paychecks in the immediate future." The Senate bill "differs from the one that cleared the House, and includes $8.3 billion in tax breaks for small businesses that Republicans and some Democrats say are necessary to offset the cost of the wage increase." Aides to "some House leaders say they would be willing to allow some of the tax breaks. But others, including Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, are insisting that they will not concede any tax cuts." House Democrats "say that by forcing a vote on a clean bill they would force Senate Republicans to put themselves on record as opposing a wage increase, which was a popular campaign issue in the midterm elections."

Bill Includes Restrictions On Executive Pay. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A4, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "The Senate's likely passage this week of legislation raising taxes on executive pay is just the beginning of a tough look by the new Democratic Congress at big corporate compensation packages." The provision, attached to the minimum wage bill, "would cap at $1 million a year the amount an employee could place in certain tax-deferred-compensation plans. Currently, there is no limit on how much compensation can be deferred into the plans, allowing executives to put off taxes for years on millions of dollars in pay." The legislation also "would limit the income-tax deductions companies can claim for high-paid executives who left the firm during the year. Combined, the two measures would raise about $900 million in new tax revenue over 10 years, according to congressional estimates."

Kennedy Objects To Tax Breaks. The Washington Times (1/30, Hurt, 88K) reports that during an "impassioned floor speech last week, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy lashed out at Republicans for insisting on tax cuts targeted for small businesses to offset the cost of raising the minimum wage." Kennedy said, "How many more billions of dollars do we have to give you, Mr. Republican? How many more dollars do we have to give you to get an increase in the minimum wage? It is shocking. It is disgraceful." The Times adds, "The Senate Finance Committee -- headed by Sen. Max Baucus, Montana Democrat -- added up the amount of tax cuts that it had included in the minimum-wage bill that the panel approved earlier this month. The $8.3 billion in tax cuts were aimed at the small businesses that hire most minimum-wage workers." Senate Republicans "were quick to note that the $8.3 billion in tax cuts for small businesses nationwide is less than the $8.5 billion federal funding cap placed on Boston's Big Dig highway project. Mr. Kennedy has been the principal sponsor of the project, which has been riddled with corruption, cost overruns, delays and safety woes."

House Democratic Leaders Drop Plans For Pay Raise. The AP (1/30, Taylor) reports House Democratic leaders "abandoned attempts to revive an annual pay raise cherished by rank and file lawmakers, a decision prompted by lingering GOP anger over last year's campaign." Lawmakers' pay "will be frozen at $165,200 for this year in a dispute fueled by the Democrats' use of the issue in last year's campaign, violating a yearslong understanding that the competing parties would not attack each other over pay raises." The issue concerns "the annual congressional cost of living adjustment, or COLA, under which lawmakers automatically get a pay hike unless Congress votes to block it."

The New York Times (1/30, Hulse, 1.16M) reports the cost-of-living adjustment "is on the verge of being eaten up in political payback. Republicans, who were attacked by Democrats in the 2006 campaign for accepting annual raises while not increasing the federal minimum wage for 10 years, say they are inclined to oppose any increase for representatives. And Democrats say they are not likely to enact one on their own, which would open them to attack in the next campaign." Republican leaders "point a finger at the hard-hitting Democratic campaign operation of last year, saying Monday that making the raises a political issue violated a longtime unwritten agreement between the parties."

DOJ_NMG_0124024

Democrats Finalize $463.5 Billion Stop-Gap Funding Bill. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A3, Rogers, 2.04M) reports Democrats "put the final touches on a $463.5 billion spending bill designed to keep the government operating for the rest of the fiscal year and bridge the gap left by the collapse of the budget process last fall." Reflecting the "new Democratic majority, the largest funding increases would go to veterans' medical care, Pell Grants for low-income college students, law enforcement, and fighting AIDS and malaria overseas. The White House appeared receptive to much of the package, but it would have to accept an almost $3.6 billion cut from its fiscal 2007 request for military construction and base-closing funds." Faced with "a Feb. 15 deadline, speed is essential and the House is scheduled to vote tomorrow without a formal committee markup. The Senate will be more of an obstacle, and Democrats hope that concessions to conservatives and weeks of negotiations with federal agencies will hasten action there as well."

Democratic Plan Bill To Authorize Generic Biological Drugs. The Hill (1/30, Young) reports senior Democratic lawmakers "are close to introducing legislation to create a pathway for the approval of generic biological drugs in the hopes that the cheaper medicines will create billions of dollars in budget savings, which could be used to offset some of the cost of expanding federal health programs." But the "biotechnology companies that manufacture biologic pharmaceuticals caution that their products are not as easily reproduced as traditional, chemically based drugs, and are calling for legislators to include stricter safety and effectiveness testing requirements in the bill." Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), "the senior member of the Energy and Commerce Committee who is taking the lead on drafting the biologics bill, asserted that his legislation could have a big impact on healthcare spending." Waxman said, "There's a great deal of savings that can be achieved."

Pelosi Courts Liberal Bloggers. The AP (1/30, Werner) reports shortly after "her swearing-in as the first female House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi took time to field questions from a few dozen Internet bloggers on a conference call that was off limits to mainstream media." Last week, Pelosi's aides "arranged for bloggers to question two Democratic House leaders on another conference call shortly before President Bush's State of the Union speech." Pelosi also "hired a full-time staff member this month dedicated to blogger outreach, and is making plans to launch a blog of her own. The day she was sworn in, bloggers were given special accommodations at the Capitol to cover the event, and fed lunch." It is "all evidence of the newfound attention bloggers from left-leaning Web sites are commanding on Democratic-run Capitol Hill, especially from the new speaker, a San Franciscan with an appreciation for the power of the Internet and grass-roots activism."

GSA Offering Incentives For Managers, Execs To Work From Telework Centers. The Washington Post's (1/30, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The General Services Administration announced yesterday it will allow federal supervisors, managers and executives to work for free from one of GSA's telework centers in hopes that trial runs might build enthusiasm for telecommuting. GSA operates 14 telework centers that provide workstations equipped with computers, telephones, printers, copiers and other equipment. The centers are outside the Beltway in Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia. Agencies pay $25 to $49 per day to reserve a workstation."

White House Hires New Pastry Chef. The AP (1/30) reports there's a new name behind the decadent desserts at the White House: William Yosses." Yosses has "been named as the executive pastry chef for the White House, first lady Laura Bush announced Monday. He will design and oversee the desserts for state dinners, social events, official luncheons and holiday parties."

Cheney Refusal To Discuss Daughter's Pregnancy Seen As Hypocritical. In a New York Times guest column (1/30), Stacy Schiff says, "Last week Wolf Blitzer asked Dick Cheney about his pregnant lesbian daughter. The vice president looked as if his arm had made contact with that meat grinder. Mr. Blitzer was, he growled, seriously out of line." Neither Senator Jim Webb "nor Vice President Cheney wins points for his social graces. But what Letitia Baldrige said of the Webb encounter — "It was an uncivil reply to an uncivil remark" — does not apply equally to the vice president. Mr. Cheney has openly promoted an anti-gay agenda. His own base has called his daughter's pregnancy unconscionable. Family values have been his calling card. And our Prohibitionist vice president can't summon the courage to address the gin mill in the basement? Mr. Webb was rude on principle; Mr. Cheney rude out of hypocrisy. One man took a stand. The other scurried away."

Supreme Court Urged To Permit Issue Ads Before Elections. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, 850K) says in an editorial, "The US Supreme Court astonished everyone in 2003 when it upheld the constitutionality of severe limits on political speech. The good news is that the court may be having some sober second thoughts about that dubious decision." The "speech-curtailing measure at issue is part of the broader McCain-Feingold campaign finance law. The centerpiece of that law banned 'soft money' contributions to political parties that were used to circumvent limits on how much donors could contribute to candidates for federal office. What is glaringly offensive to the 1st Amendment is an accompanying ban on 'electioneering communications' paid for out of the treasuries of independent organizations." There are "a lot of phoney 'issue ads' out there ('Tell Sen. Smith you disagree with him about Iraq' can sound a lot like an endorsement for challenger Jones), but the court has to err on the side of preserving political speech. When it comes to speaking out about a candidate, opponents (and news outlets like ours) should not have a monopoly in the closing days of a campaign, especially if the outside organization weighing in is genuinely acting on its own."

DOJ_NMG_0124025

WSJournal Urges Bush To Stick To Voucher Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A16, 2.04M) writes in an editorial about reauthorization of the No Child Left Behind Act, "The big news so far is that President Bush is resurrecting the voucher proposal from his first term." Mr. Bush "campaigned on this concept in 2000, too, only to throw NCLB's choice provisions over the side to cut a bipartisan deal with Senator Ted Kennedy and Representative George Miller." But, "let's hope Mr. Bush isn't merely using 'choice' again as a negotiating ploy" because he "could pick worse fights than arguing that poor kids should be able to escape failing schools."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Getting Positive Reviews. The Washington Post (1/30, D1, Henderson, 690K) reports, "The new chairman of the Federal Reserve got off to a rocky start last spring. Inflation was surging, the housing market was slumping, and Ben S. Bernanke's initial responses caused turmoil on Wall Street." But "a year into Bernanke's tenure, the picture has turned considerably brighter. Inflation is falling; unemployment is low; wages are rising; and the economy, despite continued problems in housing, is growing at a brisk clip. Bernanke is earning plaudits from Wall Street to Capitol Hill." Robert DiClemente, chief U.S. economist at Citigroup Global Markets said, "His stewardship in the first year has to be applauded by markets, investors and other policymaker. … He was able to arrest inflation without killing the expansion. That's really the ultimate victory." Sen. Kent Conrad), chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, said. "I think he's doing his level best to manage monetary policy in a way that will accommodate growth." The Post adds, "Certainly, the Bernanke Fed remains a work in progress. He promised greater openness, but despite months of discussion, the central bank's arcane methods of communicating with the public have not changed much. And the chairman's skills as a leader remain untested by a financial crisis or serious conflict among members of the policymaking Federal Open Market Committee."

Offering a similar criticism, the New York Times (1/30, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "When…Bernanke took over as chairman of the Federal Reserve Board one year ago this week, he brought with him a long-held conviction that the central bank should be more explicit about its goals and less personalized than it had been under Alan Greenspan. Yet as Mr. Bernanke celebrates his first anniversary on the job, the Fed is still far away from acting on his major proposal of setting an explicit target for inflation." Bernanke "has long argued that publicly committing the central bank to an inflation target -- probably 1 to 2 percent a year -- would make its policy more transparent and open to the public. Its decisions would be easier for investors to anticipate, he argued, and the public might have greater confidence that inflation would indeed remain low. It is an idea that Mr. Greenspan staunchly opposed, arguing that it would bind the Fed to rigid rules and deprive it of crucial flexibility in reacting to economic surprises." But "even though a majority of those on the Fed board agree with Mr. Bernanke in principle, officials have, if anything, become more cautious over the last year about making a change."

But USA Today (1/30, 1B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M), in a story titled "Bernanke Quietly Guides Economy," calls "Bernanke's relative anonymity…a major departure from the days of his predecessor," adding that "as he finishes his first year as chairman, the unassuming Bernanke, 53, doesn't have Greenspan's head-turning sway over the general public, at least not yet, but he does have firm control of the central bank and the growing confidence of financial markets." He "has steered the central bank through a turning point in an economy that was confronting a tumbling housing market and uncomfortably high inflation."

As Recession Fears Fade, Fed Unlikely To Ease Rates. The Christian Science Monitor (1/30, Trumbull, 59K) reports the US economy "was expected to cool a bit along with temperatures this winter, but that slow patch is looking more like business as usual. The housing slump is still serious. Detroit carmakers are still in trouble. But with oil prices dropping since last summer, overall economic activity keeps chugging along even as inflation looks to be easing." The Monitor adds, "The momentum has spoiled hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates anytime soon. The Fed is expected to note signs of strength in the economy, and continued vigilance against inflation, when it releases its latest policy statement Wednesday. Otherwise, however, this is good news that eases worries about a possible recession – and suggests a year of economic growth that is closer to normal."

DOJ_NMG_0124026

Stocks See Modest Gains. NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 7, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks managed to finish the day with some modest gains. The Dow was up almost four points [to close at 12,490.78] on the day. NASDAQ gained nearly six points [to close at 2,441.09]."

US Law Firm Makes Inroads In China. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, B1, Koppel, Batson) reports, "For brand-name law firms bent on global expansion, China poses a conundrum. Economic activity is generating plenty of legal work, but opening an office on the mainland is fraught with hurdles, from a shortage of legal talent to regulations that limit the work foreign lawyers can do. … Now, a U.S. firm thinks it has found a way to build business in China while avoiding some of the burdens. McDermott Will & Emery, a 1,000-lawyer firm founded in Chicago, has entered into a strategic alliance with Yuan Da Law Offices of Shanghai, which has around 25 lawyers. It's the first formal tie-up between a Western and a mainland China firm, and a bold move, given that regulations bar international firms from fully merging with Chinese counterparts." The firms will share clients -- for instance, each providing legal assistance in their areas of expertise. But, to comply with Chinese law, McDermott and MWE can't share the profit. The U.S. firm must account separately for its work and the revenue it brings in. … The strategic alliance is structured so that McDermott stands to reduce its costs if MWE increases the amount of work it does for clients." The Journal adds, "Many other big law firms have flocked to mainland China to advise multinational clients and snag new ones in the country's burgeoning corporate sector. Last year, 14 foreign firms opened offices in mainland China, about the same as in each of the two previous years, according to legal consultant Hildebrandt International Inc. When firms enter the market, they mostly send partners to China and hire local Chinese lawyers. … The problem isn't a lack of business. Last year saw $69.5 billion in foreign direct investment into China -- fueling demand for cross-border legal services in such areas as securities offerings, deals and trade disputes. … But mainland China poses particular challenges for these outside lawyers. Besides unfriendly regulations, there's a shortage of top legal talent and there are clients who recoil at Western billing rates for lawyers' advice."

Fenty Taps Nonprofit Head As Next DC Attorney General. The Washington Post (1/30, B03, Cauvin) reports, "Linda Singer was not looking for a new job, she said. She was not even looking to practice law anymore. … She was running a nonprofit group in the District, and for years, she had told the state of New York -- where she had been admitted to the bar -- that she was retired from the law, with no intention of practicing again." The Post continues, "So, Singer said, she was surprised when D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D) came calling and offered her the job as attorney general over breakfast at Four Seasons. … The 40-year-old Harvard Law School graduate was not a member of the D.C. Bar until this month, despite having lived and worked in Washington for more than a decade. For 13 years, she had led a Washington-based network of nonprofit organizations called Appleseed, which harnesses pro bono work by law firms to study problems in such areas as education, health care and immigration." The Post adds, "Singer's work at Appleseed focused on policy -- stimulating ideas, advocating change and raising money. It was very little like the job as the city's top lawyer that she assumed this month. And in law offices around town, that has people wondering whether she is the right fit for her new post, which she holds in an acting capacity as she awaits confirmation by the D.C. Council. … She takes charge of a staff of several hundred people with a variety of responsibilities, which include reviewing the city's bond deals on Wall Street, defending municipal agencies in court, prosecuting juvenile offenders, and cracking down on deadbeat parents and usurious lenders."

Unused Embryos Pose Dilemma For Couples. USA Today (1/30, 1A, Stone, 2.27M) reports in a front page story that as Congress "renews debate about funding stem cell research using human embryos," people who have used in vitro fertilization to conceive children "are thinking hard about what to do with excess embryos after their families are complete. Only they — not politicians, doctors or ethicists — are legally entitled to make the call." How they "decide will help determine the future of research into embryonic stem cells, the master cells from which scientists hope to develop treatments for diabetes, Alzheimer's and other diseases. Scientists hope to find cures using adult or amniotic fluid stem cells, but researchers like George Daley of Harvard say they are not a substitute for embryonic stem cells, which potentially can become any cell in the body."

GOP Right Restive Over Possible '08 Presidential Candidates. The Politico (1/30, Martin) reports, "Contemplating the current field of Republican presidential candidates, Rush Limbaugh sounded like a man with malaise." On his radio show, Limbaugh said, "To be honest with you, there's nobody out there that revs me up, so why should I pretend there is?" The Politico adds, "What for much of the past year has been an undercurrent of grumbling on the right about the top tier of Republican contenders -- Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani -- is lately on the rise in both frequency and volume. Limbaugh's sour note is the most striking of examples." From

DOJ_NMG_0124027

"consultants to bloggers to talk show hosts, there is a climate of suspicion -- at times bordering on contempt -- among conservative activists about their 2008 choices." McCain is "courting social and economic conservatives this year, but still faces grave doubts because of his past attacks on conservative religious leaders and his frequent willingness to make common cause with Democrats." Romney "faces charges of opportunism because of his recent past as a social moderate," while Giuliani's "potential candidacy would test whether a leader with liberal views on abortion and gay rights could prosper in a party whose activists are steadfastly opposed to both." Some activists "see all three men failing the test."

Romney Able To Skirt Some Campaign Finance Rules. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A1, Cummings, 2.04M) reports in a front page story that because he "doesn't hold federal office," former Massachusetts Gov. Mit Romney "became subject to the federal rules only after he set up a presidential exploratory committee earlier this month. Until then, his team took advantage of a little-noticed gap between federal and state law. While most states limit political donations, about a dozen don't. Mr. Romney's political team set up fund-raising committees in three of those: Michigan, Iowa and Alabama. During that time, his political action committees raised $7 million." As a result, Romney "was able to hit the ground running, a big advantage in what has already become a feverish race. A week after announcing his possible bid, having already taken care of basic campaign logistics such as hiring and office space, the former governor held a Boston fund-raiser that netted $6.5 million in pledges. Mr. Romney also used the cash to build a broad network of financial backers and grass-roots allies."

Romney Still Avoids Taking Stand On Immigration. The Hill (1/30, Youngman) reports Romney "assuaged the concerns of many gathered at National Review Institute's Conservative Summit last weekend, at least on issues of abortion and gay marriage." But aside from "a brief mention of the importance of learning English during a nearly hour-long speech, Romney stayed away from the ongoing and heated immigration debate." While the Republican Party "was divided over the immigration debate last year, Romney, like other governors-cum-presidential candidates before him, was not forced to vote on a hot issue," and he has "by and large avoided the most contentious part of the immigration debate."

Former New Hampshire GOP Chief, Von Dongen Back Giuliani. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani "has recruited a recent New Hampshire Republican chairman to lead his political operations in this first-in-the-nation primary state." Giuliani "announced the appointment Monday of veteran GOP activist Wayne Semprini." Semprini, "who until Saturday was the state Republican Party chairman, has been involved in New Hampshire politics since 1972." During his visit this weekend, Giuliani "would not say when he would make a final decision, although his speeches at Bretton Woods and Manchester were campaign-style addresses."

Roll Call (1/30, Whittington) reports, "Washington, D.C., superlobbyist Dirk Van Dongen has agreed to serve as D.C. finance chairman for Republican Rudy Giuliani's nascent 2008 presidential bid, and allies of the former New York mayor say the move is only a preview of the high-profile, inside-the-Beltway support he is building." Van Dongen, "who heads the National Association of Wholesaler-Distributors and is a top Republican fundraiser with close ties to President Bush, represents a big catch for Giuliani among the president's top money men — the group of 'Rangers and Pioneers' who helped pour millions into his two White House campaigns." It also "signals some of the first tangible evidence of the former mayor's outreach to Washington insiders as he lays the groundwork for a 2008 run."

Boston Ace Pitcher Schilling Endorses McCain. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports Sen. John McCain "won the support of two Senate colleagues from Maine Monday, and then scored big with a plug from Boston Red Sox pitcher Curt Schilling." Schilling "helped pitch the Boston Red Sox to a World Series title in 2004, a source of pride during the tenure of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. But he apparently won't be supporting Romney in the race for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination." Schilling "told WEEI-AM: 'I'm actually kind of excited about the fact that I think Senator McCain is going to do something official here, and he's going to be the man I'm going to back.'"

Snowe, Collins Endorse McCain. Roll Call (1/30) reports Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) "announced Monday that Maine Sens. Olympia Snowe (R) and Susan Collins (R) will serve as co-chairwomen of his presidential exploratory effort in the Pine Tree State." State Rep. Josh Tardy, "the House Republican leader, will serve as vice chairman of McCain's campaign in the state." The "endorsements of Snowe and Collins, both centrists, are not surprising despite the fact that they both endorsed then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush and not McCain in the 2000 Republican primary."

Hutchison Says She'd Consider VP Spot In 2008 Ticket. The Washington Times (1/30, Hallow, 88K) reports, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, the largest Republican vote-getter in the 2006 congressional elections and the most popular Republican in Texas, said yesterday she would consider an offer to run for vice president next year. 'If our party's nominee called me and said we are putting everything in the grid, and we think you are the best person, would I say no? I can't imagine that I would say no,' she said." She also told the Times, "Would I seek it or do something to promote it? Absolutely not."

DOJ_NMG_0124028

Hillary Clinton's Visit To Iowa Continues To Draw Attention. The CBS Evening News (1/29, story 5, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported that before her first weekend in Iowa, "everyone expected" Sen. Hillary Clinton "to be asked about her stance on the war. That is not what people are talking about, is it?" CBS (Borger) added, "No, it isn't. What has Washington buzzing the way Hillary Clinton chose to answer what seemed like seemingly innocuous question about how she would deal with the bad actors on the world stage." Sen. Hilary Clinton: "In the gentlemen's words we face a lot of evil men. You know, people like Osama bin Laden comes to mind. And what in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" Borger: "The question was about foreign leaders, but the candidate's answer at the very least was playfully ambiguous." Joe Trippi, Democratic political strategist: "I assume she was referring to Bill Clinton." Borger: "Some political strategists figure it was part of a plan to deal with the inevitable questions about her marriage early with humor and some attitude." CBS also noted Clinton's explanation of her Iraq war vote, showing Clinton saying: "If we had known then what we know now, there never would have been a vote and I never would have voted to give this President that authority." Borger: "That's a very complicated answer. Some of the other Democratic presidential candidates have just decided to simplify. They just say they made a mistake."

The Politico (1/30, Smith) reports that in her "first tour of Iowa last weekend, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton emerged as a candidate hard-edged enough to threaten violence, yet explicitly female enough to make women feel so comfortable that one mentioned menopause in front of crowd of more than 1,000 people." Clinton "never called attention to her gender during her six years as Democratic senator from New York the way she did at a Des Moines town meeting where she raised the question 'Would we ever elect a woman as president?' and mused openly about the challenges she faces as a female candidate." Clinton also has "rarely deployed the masculine language of violence the way she did in Iowa, where she said she would 'deck' anyone who attacked her politically, and called on President Bush to 'bring the hammer down' on Iraq's political leaders." But while, within the large and small rooms, Clinton seemed to be speaking most directly to the women present, she drew headlines for the new intensity of her words, which seemed to catch supporters and reporters who have covered her for years a bit by surprise."

Clinton's Off-Key National Anthem Posted On Internet. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports the "online world discovered that" former First Lady Hillary Clinton "had a hard time with a tough tune when someone posted a video Sunday of Clinton caught on an open MSNBC microphone singing an off-key rendition of 'The Star-Spangled Banner' during a campaign event in Iowa. By Monday morning, the 1-minute, 8-second clip had been viewed more than 660,000 times, making it the top-viewed video for the day at that point."

Clinton Meets With Food Workers Union. The New York Times/AP (1/30) reports Sen. Clinton "met privately Monday with the board of the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, a 1.3 million-member labor group whose support will be critical to any Democratic candidate." Clinton "traveled to Naples, Fla., to address the annual board meeting of the union. UFCW spokeswoman Jill Cashen said the New York senator had been invited to speak on issues affecting the union, such as health care, immigration and boosting the minimum wage." Cashen added "other 2008 presidential contenders would be invited to address the UFCW board throughout the year. Cashen declined to say whether the union intends to endorse a candidate."

Clinton Urged To Use Gender To Her Advantage. In a USA Today op-ed (1/30, 11A), author Harriet Rubin says, "Gender doesn't have to work against female candidates. In fact, the right mix of femininity and strength might be just what the electorate ordered." Even the "most powerful woman in politics can't yet hold her own against the most powerful man, it seems: When Bill and Hillary Clinton take a stage together, he makes her disappear, like a magician and his assistant. How then would she look on stage against Republican Sen. John McCain? She'll have to draw consistently on her 'mamisma,' not machismo." Mamisma is "femininity defined by mature and maternal qualities. It lets a female candidate make men look like wimps while doing the taboo-dance, enticing people to fall in love with her."

Edwards Admits He May Have Lacked Experience In 2004. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports John Edwards "acknowledged Monday that he may have been too inexperienced in national politics for his White House run in 2004." Edwards was "serving his first and only Senate term four years ago when he declared himself a presidential candidate. During a forum at Wake Forest University on Monday, Edwards said he might agree with critics who said he left Congress too soon to seek the presidency," but he added "the experience he has gained since the election has now prepared him for another run in 2008." Edwards said, "When I ran in 2004, I spent most of my time thinking about being a good candidate. These days I think about what I want to do as president of the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0124029

Clinton, McCain Visit Center For Wounded Vets. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John McCain, "their parties leading presidential candidates, put politics aside for a time Monday to dedicate a rehabilitation center to treat the increasing number of severely wounded Iraq war veterans." Clinton and McCain, "members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, thanked the wounded for their service and told them the nation owed them a debt. Both senators avoided questions about the unpopular war."

Vilsack Takes Post At Drake University. The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack "was named a visiting professor of law at Drake University, a private college in Des Moines, school officials said Monday." College officials said Vilsack "will be in residence at the school 'for several days' during 2007. He'll deliver the keynote speech at the schools Supreme Court celebration in March, host a symposium on risk and responsibility later in the spring, and help teach a short course on legal issues surrounding rural development."

Hunter Criticizes Kerry For Calling US "International Pariah." The AP (1/30, Elliott) reports, "White House hopeful Rep. Duncan Hunter on Monday criticized Sen. John Kerry for telling an overseas conference that the United States was 'a sort of international pariah.'" Hunter, a "long-shot presidential candidate, complained about Kerry's remarks this past weekend at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. Responding to a question, Kerry said the Bush administration had failed to adequately address a number of foreign policy issues." Kerry said, "So we have a crisis of confidence in the Middle East — in the world, really. I've never seen our country as isolated, as much as a sort of international pariah for a number of reasons as it is today." The AP adds Hunter 'told a New Hampshire audience Monday: 'It was terrible for him to say that.'"

Weak Fundraising Raises Questions About Hagel's Reelection Plans. The Hill (1/30, Blake) reports Sen. Chuck Hagel's (R-Neb.) "year-end financial filing shows that he raised just $80,000 for his campaign committee in the final three months of 2006, bringing his cash on hand to $140,000 from $110,000." As of his "third-quarter filing, Hagel had the least cash on hand of the 33 senators up for reelection in 2008. The potential presidential candidate's most recent filing shows he increased his campaign fundraising over the $20,000 he raised in the third quarter." But unlike retiring Sen. Wayne Allard, "who was one of Democrats' top three targets, Hagel appears unlikely to face a serious Senate challenge in 2008." At the "same time, he has left open the possibility that he would retire, whether or not he would seek the presidency. Last week, he rebuffed a report that said he has assured the National Republican Senatorial Committee that he will seek reelection."

Schumer Says "Middle Class Imagination" Key To 2008. Sen. Charles Schumer said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/29, Matthews), "Middle class voters in 2004 went overwhelmingly for George Bush. In 2006, they voted for us, but mainly because they didn't like Bush anymore. And 2008's going to be a real seminal election, and whichever party can create a platform that captures the middle class imagination, I think, will be the party that will be dominant for a generation."

GOP Campaigns Try To Avoid Allen's Fate. The Politico (1/30, Budoff) reports, "The fear gnaws at senators, embodied in a catchphrase that conveys their dread: Don't be the next George Allen." In Republican "campaign strategy sessions and conference calls, candidates and consultants are invoking Allen's name as a verb -- to be 'George Allen-ed' -- and devising tactics to avoid a fate similar to that of the former Virginia senator, taken down by a shaky, 51-second video that volleyed around the country via YouTube." Sen. John Ensign, Nev., chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said, "You have to assume there is a recording device of some kind on you at all times -- that is what I am telling all of my people." The Politico adds that with "the method (cell phones) of capturing embarrassing moments and the means (the Internet) of disseminating them so universally, early discussions about surviving the 2008 election cycle are all about control. A list of rules, if one existed, would nix jokes, stumbling or snoozing in public. Don't berate aides, ambush an opponent at a news conference or do anything humiliating enough to tank a career."

Franken To Leave Air America, May Run For Senate. The Hill (1/30, Blake) reports, "Comedian and potential Minnesota Senate candidate Al Franken will leave liberal talk radio station Air America in two weeks, he announced yesterday on his show." The announcement "paves the way for Franken to explore a possible Democratic challenge to freshman Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) in 2008."

Google Moves To Defuse "Google Bombs." The Washington Post (1/30, D3, Goo, 690K) reports that for "many years, Google said it wouldn't rectify the antics of pranksters who rigged search terms, like having 'miserable failure' bring up a White House biography of George W. Bush as a top result on its search engine." But Google "last week reversed its position, changing its algorithms to eliminate so-called 'Google bombs' that yield political or humorous results." On its "blog targeted at Web engineers, Google disclosed that it made changes to minimize the impact of the most popular Google bombs. Too many people started to think the results reflected the company's political opinion, it said."

DOJ_NMG_0124030

Drinan Remembered. The Washington Post (1/30, C1, 690K) runs a piece on the Rev. Robert Drinan by Colman McCarthy, a former Washington Post columnist who directs the Center for Teaching Peace. McCarthy describes the former congressman as a "model of moral tenacity," and criticizes Pope John Paul II for asking him to leave politics.

Humane Society Becoming "A Tiger" Among DC Interest Groups. The Washington Post (1/30, A15, Birnbaum, 690K) reports, "Many people may consider the Humane Society of the United States a pussycat. But with 10 million donors and a $120 million budget, it is becoming a tiger among Washington's interest groups. Just ask Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.). Actually, make that former governor and then-representative." The Humane Society "targeted both in last year's elections after Ehrlich supported bear hunting and Pombo supported commercial whaling and trapping in wildlife refuges." The society also "spent lavishly to help pass an initiative in Arizona, fought by agribusiness, that bans inhumane factory farming. And it bested the National Rifle Association on a measure that prohibits the shooting of mourning doves for sport in Michigan."

California Praised For Moving Up Primary. In his Washington Post column (1/30, A17), E.J. Dionne says California's politicians "have decided to give its voters a say in selecting the Republican and Democratic presidential nominees. And as befits a place that helped give birth to the Goldwater Right, the New Left, the counterculture, environmentalism, modern libertarianism and the tax revolt, California doesn't mind if it throws an already flawed presidential nominating system into chaos. Fearing that California will bigfoot its way into dominance by moving its primary to Feb. 5, 2008, Illinois, Florida and New Jersey are maneuvering to do exactly the same thing. Thus would this diverse group of states give its voters a say just two weeks after the New Hampshire primary, three weeks after the Iowa caucuses, and also close to the contests in Nevada and South Carolina, which the Democrats have moved up in their order of battle." The "revolt of the big states may not slow the process and might even enhance the importance of the outcomes in Iowa, New Hampshire and the two other early states. But by forcing themselves forward, California, Illinois, New Jersey, Florida (and who knows who else?) will definitely let many more voters, and many more kinds of voters, in on an important choice."

WSJournal Warns Against Efforts To Ease Unionization. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "The Labor Department reported last week that U.S. union membership keeps shrinking, which helps explain why unions have made easing the rules for organizing one of their top political priorities. And in some places, they've got a good chance to succeed." Big Labor's "response has been to redouble efforts to rig the rules to make union organizing much easier. So in Congress the number one AFL-CIO priority is 'card check' legislation, which would end secret ballots for organizing elections at worksites. Union reps would know which workers voted 'no' and thus be able to exert enormous peer pressure to conform. Given union history, this would surely include threats and other intimidation. Democrats on Capitol Hill are likely to bring 'card check' up for a vote on very short notice -- the better to prevent business from mobilizing against it." Meanwhile, at the state level, unions "are trying to exploit their legislative victories in November by overturning right-to-work laws." Iowa is "emerging as the first test of this effort, thanks to Democratic control of the Governorship and both legislative houses for the first time in 40 years."

WPost Criticizes School Using Church For Graduation Ceremony. The Washington Post (1/30, A16, 690K) in an editorial, criticizes Montgomery Blair High School's use of the Jericho City of Praise church in Landover for its graduation ceremony. That decision "overruled a decision by Superintendent Jerry D. Weast" that was intended to avoid "a possible lawsuit by groups who see use of the church as violating the constitutional separation of church and state" and to take account of "those discomfited by walking into a building that proclaims 'Jesus Is The Lord!!!'" The Post concludes, "Montgomery County must do a better job of providing a proper setting for all its students -- and their families -- to celebrate graduation."

Talks With Pyongyang To Resume Next Week. The AP (1/30, Ang) reports a US Treasury official in Beijing for negotiations with Pyongyang said Tuesday he was "hopeful" of progress, "as a report indicated full talks on the North would resume Feb. 8." Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser told reporters in Beijing ahead of meetings Tuesday with his North Korean counterpart, "We're prepared to go through these talks as long as it takes for us to get through our agenda." Meanwhile, Japanese public broadcaster NHK reported Tuesday that China had informed Tokyo that six-party talks would resume Feb. 8.

The Financial Times (1/30, Fifield) says talks due to resume today between US and North Korean officials on Tuesday over the "US-instigated financial crackdown on

DOJ_NMG_0124031

Pyongyang" are "likely to be pivotal to determining the success" next week's anticipated six-party talks.

Ban Urged To Seek Nuclear-Free Korean Peninsula. Paul B. Stares, vice president for conflict analysis and prevention at the United States Institute of Peace, writes in a New York Times (1/30, 1.16M) op-ed, "Of all the crises facing the new United Nations secretary general, Ban Ki-moon, the fraying nuclear nonproliferation system is arguably the most consequential." Stares says that "with North Korea having declared after its test last October that it now possesses a nuclear deterrent, the understandable temptation will be to focus on Iran." But "this would be a mistake," according to Stares, because North Korea is "still some way off from having a reliable nuclear weapon." Therefore, he urges Ban to seek a "United Nations-sponsored initiative to formally end the Korean War and dismantle the present armistice arrangements. As part of a peace treaty, the principal signatories -- the United States, China and the two Koreas -- would commit themselves to establishing normal diplomatic relations, recognizing the territorial integrity of both Koreas and, most important, ensuring a nuclear-free peninsula."

Cheney To Visit Japan, Australia. AFP (1/30) reports Vice President Dick Cheney will travel to Japan and Australia the week of February 19 "for talks on Asian security and the global war on terrorism," his office announced. Cheney, who will also visit US troops stationed in Guam, will also meet with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and Australian Prime Minister John Howard "to thank them for their help in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Separately, AFP (1/30) says Australian Prime Minister John Howard "has welcomed" Cheney's upcoming visit "as an opportunity to consult on the progress of the Iraq war." Howard, who announced last week he would not pull Australian troops out of Iraq, said, "I think given the larger things that are at stake with the alliance and the fact you do stick by your close allies when things are difficult, I think that would do a lot of damage to the alliance."

US Offers Air Support For Somali Peacekeepers. AFP (1/30) reports the United States is "ready to contribute air support to an African Union peacekeeping force in Somalia," Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, Jendayi Frazer, said. The Assistant Secretary told AFP that she had made the offer during talks on the sidelines of the African Union summit in Addis Ababa with the head of the AU commission, Alpha Oumar Konare.

Palestinian Factions Continue Fighting Despite Ceasefire. The AP (1/30, Barzak) reports Palestinian "infighting raged in the Gaza Strip Tuesday morning despite a cease-fire declaration by warring Hamas and Fatah factions." There were reports of gunfire and explosions were in downtown Gaza City "as gunmen from the rival factions ignored the cease-fire, reached at a midnight meeting between Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh and a representative of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas announced the agreement early Tuesday, saying it "stipulated that all security forces must return to their bases, that suspects in killings were to be handed over, and that all hostages still being held…were to be released." However, the AP reports that "none of those steps appeared to have been taken after the 3 a.m. deadline passed."

Suicide Attack Kills 3 In Israeli Resort. NBC Nightly News (1/29, story 3, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported on "a Palestinian suicide attack at a bakery in the southern resort town Eilat. … One group taking responsibility said it was trying to end weeks of fighting between Palestinian factions by aiming at Israel instead."

The New York Times (1/30, A14, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "After nine months without a suicide bombing in Israel, a Palestinian walked from Egypt across the open desert border, hitched a ride from a wary Israeli motorist and then blew himself up on Monday inside a bakery in the Red Sea resort town of Eilat," Israeli officials said. The attack "complicated the latest effort to restart Israeli-Palestinian negotiations." With the United States scheduled to host of talks Friday, the White House said in statement Monday that if the Palestinian government failed to prevent terrorism, it would "undermine the aspirations of the Palestinian people for a state of their own."

The Washington Post (1/30, A10, Wilson, 690K) says the attack "brought sharp condemnation from Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the White House and leaders of the relatively moderate Fatah faction led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. But the governing Hamas movement and Islamic Jihad…called the attack a legitimate response to Israel's occupation of territories that Palestinians envision as part of their future state."

State Department Tells Congress Israel May Have Misused Cluster Bombs. In a highly anticipated move, the Washington Post (1/30, A13, Kessler, 690K) reports the State Department notified Congress yesterday that Israel "may have violated US rules prohibiting the use of American-made cluster bombs in civilian areas during last summer's war in Lebanon." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "declined to confirm that the preliminary findings related to Israel's use of the weapons in civilian areas, citing classified military-sales agreements between Israel and the United States. But the State Department said last August that it opened the investigation because human rights groups complained that cluster weapons" were responsible "for many civilian deaths." The

DOJ_NMG_0124032

Washington Times/AP (1/30, Gedda) also reports on the State Department's move.

Egypt Tightens Control On Press. The Christian Science Monitor (1/30, Gauch, 59K) reports two recent cases "have given journalists, bloggers, and human rights activists in Egypt cause to fear an impending crackdown on the country's outspoken independent press and its young, activist bloggers, who have been primary agitators for democratic reform." Over the past year, the government "has steadily rolled back political reforms implemented since 2004 after the Bush administration singled out Egypt as ripe for democratic reform." And "many worry Egypt's relative freedom of expression may be ending, too."

Al-Jubeir Named New Saudi Ambassador. The Washington Times (1/30, Morrison, 88K) reports in its "Embassy Row" column that Adel al-Jubeir Monday was officially named as Saudi Arabia's new ambassador to the United States. Al-Jubeir is expected to take up his position next month.

Chinese General To Be Pressed On Missile Test. The Washington Times (1/30, Gertz, 88K) reports China's "most senior military war planner is visiting the United States, and Pentagon officials plan to question him about Beijing's recent anti-satellite test." Gen. Ge Zhenfeng, deputy chief of the general staff, arrived in Hawaii on Sunday, where he is leading "a delegation of officers that are part of a US-China military exchange program." Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates is "not expected to meet with Gen. Ge, and the Pentagon is seeking to play down the visit by giving Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker the lead role in the 11-day visit." Defense officials "said they do not expect Gen. Ge to be more forthcoming than other Chinese officials who have refused to explain" the test, but one defense official said, "This is something that we'll continue to press them on."

Russian Presidential Candidates Seek Putin's Backing. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A6, Cullison, 2.04M) reports, "Even though the vote is more than a year away, presidential jockeying in Russia already is in full swing." The "race to succeed Vladimir Putin, who is obliged by a two-term limit to step down next year, is a kind of Kabuki theater, where contenders maneuver to score points for themselves and undermine suspected rivals with the only constituency that really matters: Mr. Putin and the Kremlin elite." The "behind-the-scenes struggle" has "triggered waves of conspiracy theories as events ranging from corruption scandals to contract killings to the poisoning of a former security agent are dissected for clues to what it says about the presidential race." Meanwhile, politicians and analysts "agree that there is little suspense about who will decide the outcome of the elections, slated for March 2008" as "Putin will be able to ensure victory for whichever candidate he endorses."

Saudi Arabia Cuts Crude Output In Effort To Bolster Prices. The Wall Street Journal (1/30, A3, Bahree, 2.04M) reports, "Saudi Arabia, which already has aggressively shaved its oil output in a battle to shore up prices, is tightening its spigots further this week. A senior Saudi oil official said yesterday the kingdom had advised its customers of the impending 158,000 barrel-a-day cut, which takes effect Feb. 1." The "reductions, part of a broader campaign by [OPEC], are intended to shrink inventories of oil that had ballooned last year as demand growth for petroleum faltered." Word of the Saudi move "comes as traders are trying to parse whether OPEC is going to cut its production in line with its announced plans." The kingdom's "one-million-barrel reduction -- made over a roughly six-month period -- is nearly double the total cuts it agreed to make under two output reductions hammered out by OPEC at meetings in Doha, Qatar, in October and in Abuja, Nigeria, in December."

French Ambassador Says Ties With US Improving. The Washington Times (1/30, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports on its front page that relations between France and the United States "are back on track after years of tumult and should remain that way regardless of who wins the French presidential election this spring," according to French Ambassador Jean-David Levitte. In an interview with the newspaper, Levitte said, "Today, our relationship is back on the right track." His comments "on Lebanon's political crisis, Syria's behavior, Iran's nuclear program and its larger role in the Middle East were almost identical to the Bush administration's positions," the Times notes. Levitte also "echoed the administration's recent observations that the U.N. Security Council's December resolution that imposed limited sanctions on Tehran over its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment is affecting Iranian public opinion." Regarding Iraq, the ambassador said France is "advocating 'a perspective,' rather than a timetable, that would put just enough pressure on the Iraqi government to get its act together and start improving security."

Ghana To Chair African Union In Snub To Sudan. The Washington Post/AP (1/30, A14, Neuhaus, De Montesquiou) reports, "Bloodshed in Sudan's Darfur region dominated discussion at the African Union summit Monday, blocking Sudan's bid to lead the 53-country group as the U.N. chief described scorched-earth military policies as 'a terrifying feature of life' in the vast, arid area." With Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir "looking on," U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon said that "the toll of the crisis remains unacceptable." Ban also "called on African leaders to end the deadlock created by Sudan's refusal to allow U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur." Hours later, the African Union chose Ghana's president, John Kufuor, to head the bloc, "deflecting Sudan's bid for the second year in a row." Sudanese Foreign Ministry spokesman Ali Sadiq called the move a "very unfortunate development."

DOJ_NMG_0124033

WPost Welcomes Ghana's Selection. The Washington Post (1/30, A16, 690K) editorializes, "The Darfur crisis has demonstrated the limits of US influence. President Bush and administration officials have described it as genocide and pushed intermittently for sanctions, peacekeeping deployments, and a deal between Sudan's government and its rebel opponents, but their efforts have been hampered by the hesitancy of other players." However, the Post says "yesterday brought a small victory in the effort to force action" as Sudan was again denied chairmanship of the AU. The "next test" for Sudan, "involves Chinese President Hu Jintao, who today begins a 12-day tour of Africa that includes a stop in Sudan." The African Union "snub and the Chinese leader's visit provide an opportunity to regain the initiative on Darfur," but "the question for Mr. Hu is whether he merely wants to create an illusion of diplomatic progress on Sudan to protect China from the appearance of complicity in genocide or whether he means to ensure that peacekeepers are deployed."

LATimes Welcomes Northern Ireland Peace Initiative. The Los Angeles Times (1/30, 850K) editorializes, "In a once-unthinkable concession, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army voted Sunday to recognize the authority of the new Police Service of Northern Ireland." The Times says the "genius of the Good Friday agreement, supported by Britain and the predominantly Catholic Republic of Ireland, is that it finessed the issue of whether Northern Ireland is British or Irish." Calling it "a delicate compromise" the Times cautions, "i f it is to survive, those who police the north must be -- and be seen as -- evenhanded."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Unfilled Tunnels A Weak Link At Border."
"Wings Of Song For The Dying."
"The Race That Barbaro Could Not Win."
"Fooling Nature, And The Fertility Doctor."
"Doomsday Cult Said To Be At Center Of Iraqi Battle."

USA Today:
"Feds Plan $200m Grant Program Aimed At Curbing Violent Crime."
"Each Stored Embryo Is A Stem Cell Debate."
"16 States See Road Deaths Slashed."

New York Times:
"Bush Directive Increases Sway On Regulation."
"Europe Resists U.S. Push To Curb Iran Ties."
"Spitzer's Education Agenda Promises Aid Increase."
"A Lively Market, Legal And Not, For Software Bugs."
"Chinese United By Common Goal: A Hot Stock Tip."
"Ex-Bush Aide, In Testimony, Disputes Libby."
"After 8 Months, Setback Ends Barbaro's Battle."

Washington Post:
"Fairfax Shines In Jobs Report."
"Iraqis Describe Plot To Kill Shiite Clerics."
"With Iran Ascendant, U.S. Is Seen At Fault."
"Barbaro Euthanized."
"Virginia Men Face U.S. Trial In Peddling Of Phony Purses."
"Accusations Devastate 2 Va. Churches."

Washington Times:
"How The 'Axis' Seeks The Killer Missile."
"Iraqis Thewart Plot To Kill Shi'ite Clergy."
"Civilian Reserve Just Words In A Speech."
"French Diplomat Says Ties With US Are On The Mend."
"District Seeks To Compete As Convention Destination."

Detroit Free Press:
"How GM Raised The Voltage."
"System Overhaul Could Be Only Hope."
"Pfizer Gives Michigan Dose Of What's Needed In A Modern Economy."
"Rebounding Wolves Lose Their Endangered Species Protection."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Bill; 9 Jurors To Give Death."
"In Atlanta, It's Traffic."
"Who'll Pick Up Slack For Cobbs Pre-k."
"Flash Now, Being Later For Vista?"
"Aquarium Deaths Reopen Captivity Debate."

Houston Chronicle:
"Ot Officer's Work Hours In Dispute."
"Barbaro's Battle Is Over."
"UTEP's Don't Add Up."
"Cantu DA's New Views Get A Tough Reception In Texas."
"Up To 1 Million Texans Could Face Dreaded Tax."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Barbaro Was Put Down; Iraqi Battles; Center for The Intrepid; Libby Trial; The US Auto Industry; Home Depot Hiring; School Urine Testing; Microsoft Vista; Woodruff A Year Later.

DOJ_NMG_0124034

CBS: Iran-Aides Insurgents; Iraqi Battles; US Death Toll-Iraq; Center For The Intrepid; Sen. Clinton Presidential Campaign; Barbaro -- "Euthanized"; Airport Security; Pilot Mandatory Retirement; Microsoft Vista; Power Ball Winners; Kimberly Dozier Returns.
NBC: Iraqi Battles; Center Of The Intrepid; Palestinian Suicide Bomber; Bush Harsh Words-Iran; Libby Trial; Visiting New Orleans; Stock Market; Government Spending; Teenage Driving; Father Robert Drinan-Obit; Barbaro -- "Euthanized".

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Microsoft-New Operating System; IL-Car Plows Into School Cafeteria; Sen. Obama-New Orleans; Iraq-US KIAs; Tokyo Stock Exchange.
CBS: Senate-Minimum Wage; Senate-Iraq Resolution; Bush-Iran; Federal Reserve-Policy Meetings; Barbaro Euthanized; Microsoft-New Operating System.
NPR: Bush-Iran; Iraq; State Dept.-Israel Might Have Violated Agreement Not To Use Cluster Bombs; UN Secretary General-Darfur; Senate Armed Services Committee- Admiral William Fallon; Tokyo Stock Exchange; CA-Lengthy Sentence For Convicted Child Molester; St. Louis Family Wins Powerball.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a tour of Caterpillar, Inc. Peoria, Ill.; delivers remarks on the economy, Caterpillar, Inc. Peoria, Ill.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Hearing on global climate change. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on the nomination of Adm. William Fallon to be reappointed admiral and be commander of the US Central Command. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full committee. Hearing on the Negroponte nomination. Location: Room 216, Hart.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on defining long term fiscal challenges. Robert Reischauer of the Urban Institute, Robert Greenstein of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, and Eugene Steuerle of the Urban Institute. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the status of federal land management agencies' efforts to contain the costs of their wildfire suppression activities. Interior Secretary Kempthorne; Agriculture Undersecretary Mark Rey; Phyllis K. Fong, inspector general, USDA; Robin Nazzaro, GAO; James Caswell, Wildland Fire Leadership Council; Bruce McDowell, National Academy of Public Administration; Arizona State Forester Kirk Rowdabaugh. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on Congress' constitutional power to end a war. Panel I: David J. Barron, Professor of Law, Harvard Law School, Cambridge, Mass.; Bradford Berenson, Partner, Sidley Austin LLP, Washington, D.C. ; Walter Dellinger, Douglas B. Maggs Professor of Law, Duke University School of Law, Former Acting Solicitor General of the United States, Durham, N.C; Louis Fisher, Specialist in Constitutional Law, Law Library, Library of Congress, Washington, DC; and Robert F. Turner, Center for National Security Law, University of Virginia School of Law, Charlottesville, Va. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

1 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on alternative plans for Iraq. Iraq Study Group co-chairs James Baker III and Lee Hamilton. Location: Room 216, Hart.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on transportation sector fuel economy, including challenges to and incentives for increased oil savings. Betty Lowery, vice president, public policy, General Motors; William Logue, executive vice president, FedEx Express; John German, American Honda Motor Co.; Walter S. McManus, University of Michigan; Menahem Anderman - president, Advanced Automotive Batteries; David Greene, Oak Ridge National Laboratory. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed hearing assessing intelligence issues in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10:30 a.m. The House meets for morning hour and turns to legislative business at noon. Highlights: Suspensions (5 bills): 1) H.Res. 24 - Establishing the House Democracy Assistance Commission for the One Hundred Tenth Congress. 2) H.Con.Res. 20 - Calling on the Government of the United Kingdom to immediately establish a full, independent, and public judicial inquiry into the murder of Northern Ireland defense attorney Patrick Finucane, as recommended by Judge Peter Cory as part of the Weston Park Agreement, in order to move forward on the Northern Ireland peace process. 3) H.Res. 59 - Supporting the goals and ideals of National Engineers Week, and for other purposes. 4) H.Con.Res. 34 - Honoring the life of Percy Lavon Julian, a pioneer in the field of organic chemistry research and development and the first and only African American chemist to be inducted into the National Academy of Sciences. 5) H. Con. Res. 5 - Expressing support for the designation and goals of ``Hire a Veteran

DOJ_NMG_0124035

Week" and encouraging the President to issue a proclamation supporting those goals.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the situation in Afghanistan. James Dobbins, RAND Corp.; Karl F. Inderfurth, professor, George Washington University; Ali A. Jalali, National Defense University; Anthony H. Cordesman, Center for Strategic and International Studies. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the CBO budget forecast. CBO Director Peter Orszag. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on security concerns at the Los Alamos National Lab. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full committee. Hearing on political interference allegations with the work of climate change scientists. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on the Coast Guard's Integrated Deepwater System. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on trade and globalization and integration of markets. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Military Personnel Subcommittee. Hearing on the force requirements determination process. Maj.r Gen. Richard Formica, Deputy Army Chief of Staff. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

2 p.m. SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY _ Energy and Environment Subcommittee. Hearing on H.R. 547 - Advanced Fuels Infrastructure Research and Development Act. John Eichberger, National Association of Convenience Stores; Bob Dineen, Renewable Fuels Association; Richard Kassel, Natural Resources Defense Council. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Railroads, Pipelines and Hazardous Materials Subcommittee. Hearing on reauthorization of railroad safety programs. Joseph Boardman, Administrator of the Federal Railroad Administration; Robert Sumwalt, Vice Chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board; Calvin Scovel, Inspector General of the U.S. Department of Transportation; Katherine Siggerud, Director of Physical Infrastructure Issues with the US General Accounting Office. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

4 p.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Select Revenue Measures Subcommittee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room B-318, Rayburn.

Other: AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS _ The National Air Traffic Controllers Association (NATCA) National Legislative Committee holds a Washington conference. Highlights: 12 p.m. - 5:30 p.m. Congressional appointments. 5:30 p.m. Congressional reception. Note: This event will be held in the cafeteria of the Rayburn House Office Building. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

GOP LEADERSHIP _ 10 a.m. There will be a GOP leadership stakeout for an availability with Republican Leader John Boehner, Republican Whip Roy Blunt, and Conference Chairman Adam Putnam. Location: Room HC-9, Capitol.

INSLEE-GREEN VEHICLE _ 10 a.m. - 4 p.m. Rep. Jay Inslee, D-Wash., will bring a plug-in hybrid concept car, the Chevrolt Volt, to Capitol Hill for members of Congress to preview. Location: South Capitol Street in front of the Rayburn Building horseshoe.

COPYRIGHT INDUSTRIES _ 11 a.m. Reps. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., Bob Goodlatte, R-Va., and Lamar Smith, R-Texas, will join the International Intellectual Property Alliance and its member associations to present a report, ``Copyright Industries in the US Economy: The 2006 Report, on the copyright industries significant contributions to the U.S. economy. Location: Room SC-6, Capitol.

HOYER _ 11 a.m. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer will hold his regular pen and pad briefing. He will discuss the upcoming continuing resolution, the President's budget, and Iraq. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

FEDERAL TAX GAP _ 11:15 a.m. Senx. Max Baucus, D-Mont., and Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, will speak briefly in the, on the topic of the Federal tax gap. The senators will have just completed an in-depth discussion with IRS experts on the $345 billion annual tax gap - the gulf between taxes legally owed and taxes actually collected in a timely fashion. Location: Lobby of the IRS Headquarters building, 1111 Constitution Ave. NW.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE _ 11:30 a.m. Reps. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., Frank Pallone Jr., D-N.J., George Radanovich, R-Calif., and Joe Knollenberg, R-Mich., will hold a press conference to announce the introduction of legislation calling on the president and his administration to fully recognize the Armenian Genocide. Mrs. Sirarpi Khoyan, a genocide survivor who recently turned 100, also will be in attendance. Location: Room 1334, Longworth House Office Building.

EMERGING DEMOCRACIES _ 12:15 p.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a panel discussion on priorities and problems for democratizing nations, with Thomas Carothers, of the endowment, Jack Snyder of Columbia University and Francis Fukuyama of SAIS. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CHAO-PERFORMANCE _ 12:30 p.m. Secretary of Labor Elaine L. Chao will deliver the keynote address,

DOJ_NMG_0124036

``Driving Performance." at the Performance Institutes Government Performance Summit. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, Hampton Room, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

DEMOCRATS _ 12:30 p.m. The Democratic Policy Committee holds a closed meeting. Location: Room S-211, Capitol. Notes: Stakeout note: Gallery escort for policy luncheons leaves at 11:30 a.m. from the Ohio Clock Corridor.

DISPLACED IRAQIS _ 12:30 p.m. The International Organization for Migration (IOM) and SAIS Foreign Policy Institute host a discussion led by IOMs Iraq Displacement Specialist, Dana Graber, who will present IOMs Iraq Displacement Report 2006. The discussion will be moderated by Dr. Thomas Keaney, Executive Director, Foreign Policy Institute of The Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS). Since February 22, 2006, assessments carried out by IOM confirm that 360,000 individuals have been displaced due to sectarian violence, military clashes, and criminality. Location: SAIS Rome Building Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

FAA-BLAKELY _ 12:30 p.m. FAA Administrator Marion Blakely addresses a National Press Club luncheon. Location: National Press Club.

IRAQ _ 12:30 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a presentation by Dana Graber, Iraq displacement specialist for the International Organization for Migration, discussing the IOMs newest report, ``Iraq Displacement 2006 Year in Review, `` which is being released on Jan. 30, The report says 360,000 people in Iraq have been displaced due to sectarian violence, military clashes and criminality. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

NELSON _ 12:30 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds a discussion with Sen. Bill Nelson, who will discuss his trip to Syria last month. Location: Washington Club, 14 Dupont Circle.

OCEANS REPORT CARD _ 12:30 p.m. The Joint Ocean Commission Initiative holds a media teleconference to release its report card on the status of U.S. efforts to protect the oceans. Areas graded include: national, state, and regional governance; research, science, and education; funding; fisheries management; and international leadership. The report card highlights developments in key states including California, Washington, Oregon, New York, Massachusetts, and the Gulf region. Briefers: Leon E. Panetta and Admiral James D. Watkins (USN, ret.), co-chairmen, Joint Ocean Commission Initiative. Contacts: Monisha Som, 202-293-6200 ext 219.

RELIGIOUS-MINIMUM WAGE _ 12:30 p.m. Senators Edward M. Kennedy, Sherrod Brown, and other senators join leaders in the religious community for a press conference on the urgency and moral obligation of paying Americas workers a fair wage. Location: Room S-324, Capitol.

REPUBLICANS _ 12:30 p.m. The Republican Policy Committee holds a closed meeting. Location: Room S-207, Capitol. Notes: Stakeout note: Gallery escort for policy luncheons leaves at 11:30 a.m. from the Ohio Clock Corridor.

LOCAL MEDIA DIVERSITY _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Center for American Progress Action fund hosts a panel, ``Local Media Diveristy Matter to All Americans," as the FCC revisits its media ownership rules, considering the impact of media consolidation on the opportunities for democratic deliberation of all Americans. Keynote Speaker: Rep, Xavier Becerra, D-Calif. Panelists: Robert Entman, J.B. and Maurice Shapiro Professor of Media and Public Affairs, George Washington University; Philip M. Napoli, Director of the Donald McGannon Communication Research Center, Fordham University; and Federico Subervi, Professor, School of Journalism and Mass Communication, Texas State University-San Marcos. Location: Room B-340, Rayburn House Office Building.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTON FUNDING _ 1 p.m. Reps. Marty Meehan, D-Mass.; Christopher Shays, R-Conn.; and David Price, D-N.C., hold a press conference to discuss what they say is the need for reform of the presidential public financing system and to introduce their Presidential Funding Act legislation. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

SCIENTISTS-CLIMATE CHANGE _ 1 p.m. The Union of Concerned Scientists and the Government Accountability Project hold a teleconference on their release of a report that they say has uncovered new evidence of suppression and manipulation of climate science in seven federal agencies. Notes: Phone: 866-814-8448. Pass code: Climate Survey.

INTERNET FREEDOM _ 1 p.m. - 4 p.m. The Global Internet Freedom Task Force (GIFT), which is jointly chaired by Paula Dobriansky, Under Secretary for Democracy and Global Affairs, and Josette Sheeran, Under Secretary for Economic, Energy and Agricultural Affairs, will host its first conference on Global Internet Freedom. Location: U.S. Department of State, Marshall Center.

CONGRESS-NATIONAL GUARD _ 2 p.m. National Guard advocates in both the Senate and House hold a news conference to announce the introduction of legislation to strengthen the National Guards voice in Pentagon policy decisions affecting the Guard. Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Kit Bond, R-Mo., co-chairs of the Senate National Guard Caucus, will be joined by other House and other Guard Caucus members as they announce the introduction of the National Guard Empowerment Act of 2007. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

KIDNAPPED ISRAELI SOLDIER _ 2 p.m. Karnit Goldwasser, wife of kidnapped Israeli soldier Ehud Goldwasser, and Israeli Ambassador Sallai Meridor, join the new Chairman and Ranking Member of the House Subcommittee on the Middle East and South Asia Reps. Gary Ackerman and Mike Pence as well as Foreign Affairs Committee Ranking Member Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen at a press conference for the introduction of a resolution calling for the immediate release of her husband, as well as Eldad Regev and Gilad Shalit. Location: Room 2255, Rayburn House Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0124037

IRAQ-AFGHANISTAN DELEGATION _ 3 p.m. Speaker Nancy Pelosi and members of the bipartisan congressional delegation that recently returned from Iraq and Afghanistan hold a news conference to discuss their experiences and observations. In addition to Pelosi, participants are Chairman Ike Skelton, Armed Services Committee; Chairman Tom Lantos, Foreign Affairs Committee; Chairman Silvestre Reyes, Intelligence Committee; Chairman John Murtha, Defense Appropriations Subcommittee; Chairwoman Nita Lowey, State, Foreign Operations, and Related Programs Appropriations Subcommittee; Congressman David Hobson, Ranking Member, Energy and Water Development Appropriations Subcommittee. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn House Office Building.

GUTIERREZ-TRAVEL _ 4 p.m. Secretary of Commerce Carlos M. Gutierrez discusses how travel and tourism keeps our economy strong at a meeting of the Travel and Tourism Advisory Board. Location: Department of Commerce, 1401 Constitution Ave. NW.

DARFUR _ 6:30 p.m. - 8 p.m. Senior Advisor at the International Crisis Group John Prendergast will discuss ``Genocide in Darfur: What International Action and When? Prendergast, an expert on African affairs, will be joined by Paul Williams, GW visiting associate professor of international affairs. Location: George Washington University, Elliott School of International Affairs, Room 213, 1957 E St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, January 30, 2007 8:40 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, January 30, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070130.pdf; dojclips070130.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JANUARY 30, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Uighurs' Detention Conditions Condemned (WP) 5
Dutch Man Face Terror Trial In U.S. (WT) 6
Dutch Citizen Pleads Not Guilty To Terrorism Charges (WP) .. 7
Man Faces U.S. Terror Charges In First Prosecution Of Iraq Troop Targeting (USAT/AP) 8
Iraqi-Born Dutch Citizen Pleads 'Not Guilty' To Charges He Assisted The Insurgency (ABC) 8
Analysis: Dutchman Faces U.S. Iraq Charges (UPI) 9
Turks Arrest 47 On Suspicion Of Terror Links (NYT) 10
Habeas Corpus And An Era Of Limits (LAT) 11
Gonzales' Body Blow Against Habeas Corpus (VAPILOT) 12
Canada's Good Example (NYT) 13

Homeland Response:

Nuclear Agency: Air Defenses Impractical (WP) 14
Panel Rejects Responsibility For Attacks (NYT/AP) 15
Idea To 'Cage' Atomic Plants Is Rejected (LAT) 16
Documents Detail Puzzling Behavior Of Truck-driving Student (PROJO) 17
Homeland Security's Inspector General Blasts Coast Guard Modernization Program (AP) 19
Super Bowl Security A Massive Effort (AP) 20
PUC Sets Contempt Hearing For Verizon (AP) 21
Senators At Louisiana Hearing Criticize Federal Recovery Aid (NYT) 22
Obama Blasts Bush Adminstration On Katrina Recovery (CHIT) 22
Mary Quite Contrary (RC) 23
The Post-Katrina Drawing Board (WP) 25

War News:

Bush Warns Iran Against Action In Iraq (AP) 25
Bush Warns Iran About Aggression In Iraq (CHIT) 26
Bush Vows To Confound Iranian Operations In Iraq (WT) 27
Bush Warns Iran, Syria, Hezbollah On Lebanon (AFP) 28
How The 'Axis' Seeks The Killer Missile (WT) 28
With Iran Ascendant, U.S. Is Seen At Fault (WP) 29
US Ally And Foe Are Trying To Avert War In Lebanon (NYT) .. 32
Embassy Row (WT) 33
Europe Resists US On Curbing Ties With Iran (NYT) 34
Shell Iran Plan Will Come Under US Scrutiny (FT) 36
Senator Targets Surplus Sales To Iran (AP) 36
Iranian President's Setbacks Embolden His Domestic Critics (WSJ) 37
Missteps By Iraqi Forces In Battle Raise Questions (NYT) 39
Iraq: Shiite Cult Behind Najaf Battle (USAT/AP) 40
Leader Of Shiite Religious Cult Killed By U.S., Iraqi Forces (LAT) 40
Iraqis Describe Plot To Kill Shiite Clerics (WP) 42
Iraqis Thwart Plot To Kill Shi'ite Clergy (WT/AP) 44
Battle Suggests New Sectarian Divides In Iraq (CSM) 45
Baker Agrees Reluctantly To Testify On Iraq (HILL) 46
Beyond Baghdad (WP) 47
Fallon Says U.S. Miscalculated Iraq (AP) 48
War Of The Water Cooler (WP) 49
Our Options In Iraq (WSJ) 50
The American Iraq (WSJ) 51
A League Of Their Own (NYT) 54
Equipment For Added Troops Is Lacking (WP) 55
Brakes Thrown On Iraq Fight (RC) 56
Iraq Debate Strains Bond Of Congress' Vietnam Vets (USAT) 58
Soldier's Death Strengthens Senators' Antiwar Resolve (WP) 59
Feingold Calls War Bluff (POL) 61
Congress Tests Bounds Of Its War Power (AP) 65
Democrats Must Not Fold: Hold Bush Accountable At Retreat (RC) 66
Former Coalition Official Sentenced In Fraud Case (WP) 67
As Iraqi Refugees Flee, Let's Not Forget Vietnam (USAT) 68
Reconstruction Aid Falling Into The Wrong Hands (WT) 69
Discarding An Afghan Opportunity (WP) 70

Iraqis Get Ideas From S.C. Prisons (AP) 71

Corporate Scandals:

KLA-Tencor Books Options Charge, Found 'intentional' Mispricing (DOW) 71
`NatWest Three' Again Seek Dismissal Of Enron Charges (Update1) (BLOOM) 72
Former Executives Spared Prison Time In Cendant Case (FINDLAW/AP) 73
SEC Clears Market-Based Way To Value Staff Stock Options (WSJ) 74
6-Month Home Detention For Executive (NYT/AP) 75
Fannie Mae Chief Got 25% Raise Last Year (WP) 75

Criminal Law:

Under Oath, Fleischer Stays On Message (NSDY/AP) 76
Fleischer Tells Of Talk With Libby (USAT/AP) 77
Former Press Secretary Says Libby Told Him Of Plame (WP) 78
Fleischer Handles Questioning In The Usual Fashion (WP) . 79
Ex-Bush Aide, In Testimony, Disputes Libby (NYT) 80
Fleischer: Libby Discussed CIA Officer Over Lunch (FINDLAW/AP) 82
Former Press Secretary Dispels Many Illusions (NYT) 83
The Ba-Da-Boom Crew (WP) 84
Reporter To Take Stand In CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP) 85
Russert: Not Source Of CIA Officer Leak (NSDY/AP) 86
Feds Plan $200M Grant Program Aimed At Curbing Violent Crime (USAT) 86
Man In Internet Sex Sting Sentenced (NTHWSTT) 87
FBI Inquires About Miller Land Deals (SGVT) 87
Former Coke Secretary Testifies In Conspiracy Trial (SDUT/AP) 89
Alleged Coke Spy Tearful At Trial Former Secretary Says Of Allegations She Conspired To Sell Company Secrets: 'I Did Not Do Any Of This.' (AJC) 90
MS-13 Member In Jail, Accused Of Cutting Off Couple's Heads (KHOU) 91
4 Convicted Of Watching Cockfights (AP) 92
FBI Agents Arrest Man At Mall St. Matthews (LCJ) 92
Serial Child Molester Receives Maximum Term In California (NYT) 93
Man Sentenced To Probation In Fake Hazmat Incident (NSDY) 94
Florida Man Gets Probation In Bomb Hoax Case At Airport (BRAH) 94
Troutman Denies Possible Drug Possession (WBBM) 94
Judge: Convicted Ex-alderman Can Run (CHIT) 95
Editorial: TIME FOR FEDS TO ACT IN CITY HALL PROBE (NIAGFR) 95
A Lively Market, Legal And Not, For Software Bugs (NYT) 95
Virginia Men Face U.S. Trial In Peddling Of Phony Purses (WP) 98
Five Deadly Hours In The District (WP) 99
Trial Nearing, Alleged Call Girl Found Dead (WP) 99
Attorney Rejects Warden's Claim That US Inmate Showed No Signs Of Pain In Execution (FINDLAW/AP) 101
A Missed Warning (MH) 101

Civil Law:

Lawsuit Alleges Price Inflation By Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane (AP) 102
Feds Say Lab Owner Stole $17M (HTRIB) 102

Civil Rights:

Police Charged In Shootings Back At Work; NAACP Calls For Probe (AP) 104
Defense Begins Arguments In Election Dispute (JCL) 105
Bond For Seale Denied (JCL) 105
Bail Denied In 1964 Race Killings (NSDY/AP) 106
Editorial: It's Not Too Late For Justice To Be Served (KZGAZETTE) 107
Do We Have A Human Trafficking Problem? (LVS) 107

Antitrust:

Justice Department Deadline Is Up For Mittal Steel (WVSJ) 109
FTC Approves Bridgestone Acquisition (AP) 110
First The Wait For Microsoft Vista; Now The Marketing Barrage (NYT) 110
Delta Says Deal Is An Option, Just Not Now (WSJ) 111
Airline Deals Could Be Grounded (CNN) 112
As Airlines Surge, Pilots Want Share (NYT) 114
Merrill Lynch Acquires First Republic (FT) 115
Merrill To Buy First Republic, Seeking To Add Wealthy Clients (NYT) 116
Citi Will Buy Egg To Raise U.K. Presence (WSJ) 116
Citigroup To Buy Online Bank In Britain To Expand Retail Presence (NYT) 116
Lawmakers Push For Bank Ownership Limits (AP) 117
EU To Threaten Banks, Credit Card Firms, Draft Says (Update1) (BLOOM) 118
HEDGE-FUND HARDBALL Amid Amaranth's Crisis, Other Players Profited (WSJ) 119
Patent Backlog Spurs Demand For Examiners (WP) 123

DOJ_NMG_0124041

Environment:

Global Warming Issue Gains 'Traction' With New Congress (USAT) 124
UN Chief Seeks Climate Change Summit (FT) 125
World Scientists Near Consensus On Warming (NYT) 126
BP Faces Growing Criminal Probe Over Texas Refinery (Update3) (BLOOM) 127
Court Ruling On Salmon Hooks Pork (HILL) 129
Yosemite Case May Affect Public Access (FINDLAW/AP) 130
Gray Wolves To Lose Some Protection (USAT) 132
A Faith-Based Fuel Initiative (NYT) 132

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexican Drug Suspects Plead Not Guilty (AP) 133
Suspected Mexican Drug Cartel Figures Arraigned In S.D. (SDUT) 134
Alleged Juárez Drug Ring Members Extradited (EPT) 134
7 Puerto Rican Doctors Indicted In Alleged Internet Pharmacy Scheme (AP) 135
Sentencing Set For 3-state Drug Ring (GCNG) 135
Large Tunnels On U.S.-Mexico Border Remain Unfilled (LAT) 136
Supporters Of Medical Marijuana Want Changes To The Law (AP) 138
U.S. Marshal In Seattle Steps Down (AP) 139
A Day Without Guns ... (NYT) 140

Immigration:

Farm Groups Are Optimistic On Overhaul Of Immigration (HILL) 140

Tax:

U.S. To Pay S.A. Lawyers $1.34 Million (SAEN) 141
The 'Tax Gap' Myth (WSJ) 142

Congress-Administration:

U.S. Exporters Feel Favorable Trade Winds (WP) 144
Bush Directive Increases Sway On Regulation (NYT) 146
Unworthy Of Consideration (USAT) 148
Our View On Health Care: People Without Health Plans Can't Catch A (tax) Break (USAT) 148
Capital Sources: A Father's Call For Health-Care Reform (NSWK) 149
Schwarzenegger's Healthcare Reform Proposal Could Conflict With Bush's Aim To Balance Federal Budget (LAT) 151
Civilian Reserve Just Words In A Speech (WT) 152
Why Volunteerism Has Reached Historic High In US (CSM) 153
Bush Clarifies 'Democrat Majority' Gaffe (AP) 155
Bush Says Missing '-ic' Was An Oversight (WP) 155
The 'Democrat Majority' Is Still The Talk Of The Capital (LAT) 156
No Offense, But ... (NYT) 157
Senate To Consider Minimum Wage Bill With Tax Breaks (NYT) 157
Strike One For Executive Pay (WSJ) 158
Kennedy, GOP Engage In War Of Words On Tax Cuts (WT) 160
Republicans Block House Pay Raise (AP) 160
Politics Could Scuttle Raising Pay For House Members (NYT) 161
Democrats Craft Spending Bill As Deadline Looms (WSJ) ... 161
In Need Of Cash, Dems See Billions In Biotech (HILL) 163
Pelosi Reaches Out To Blogging Community (AP) 164
White House Brings In New Pastry Chef (AP) 165
Mad About Mary (NYT) 165
Liberate Political Speech (LAT) 166
Voucher Comeback (WSJ) 167

Other News:

Bullish On Bernanke (WP) 167
Fed Has Yet To Set Target On Inflation (NYT) 169
Bernanke Quietly Guides Economy (USAT) 170
Good News, Bad News: US Economy Too Strong For Interest Rate Cuts (CSM) 173
A U.S. Law Firm Takes A New Route Into China (WSJ) 174
Lawyers Split On Fitness For Office (WP) 176
Each Stored Embryo Is A Stem Cell Debate (USAT) 178
GOP Right Sees Lemons In White House Race (POL) 180
TESTING THE LIMITS How Mitt Romney Avoided Campaign-Finance Rules (WSJ) 183
Romney Addresses Most Social Issues; Mum On Immigration (HILL) 186
Red Sox Pitcher Vows To Support McCain (AP) 188
Van Dongen To Boost Giuliani Bid (RC) 190
McCain's Maine Backers (RC) 191
Hutchison Opens Door To No. 2 Spot On Ticket (WT) 191
Clinton Balances Femininity, Toughness (POL) 192
Clinton Meets With Union Leaders (NYT/AP) 194
How 'Mamisma' Can Change Politics (USAT) 194
Hagel Low On Cash On Hand, Raising Retirement Issue (HILL) 196
Franken Off The Air (HILL) 196
Google Moves To Disarm Search 'Bombs' (WP) 196
Father Drinan, Model Of Moral Tenacity (WP) 197
The Humane Society Becomes A Political Animal (WP) 198

DOJ_NMG_0124042

A Voice For More Voters (WP) 200
Iowa Emigration Act (WSJ) 201
The Battle Of Jericho (WP) 202
U.S. To Discuss Finances With N. Korea (AP) 202
Talks On N Korea Financial Squeeze To Resume (FT) 203
To Ban The Bomb, Sign The Peace (NYT) 204
Cheney To Visit Japan, Australia (AFP) 204
Australian PM Welcomes Cheney Visit (AFP) 205
US Offers Air Support For Somali Peacekeepers (AFP) 205
Hamas, Fatah Battle Despite Cease-fire (AP) 206
Suicide Attack Is First In Israel In 9 Months (NYT) 206
Palestinian Suicide Bomber Kills 3 In Israeli Resort City (WP) 208
Israel May Have Misused Cluster Bombs, US Says (WP) 209
U.S. Suspects Illegal Use Of Cluster Bombs (WT/AP) 210
Egypt Steps On The Press As It Backtracks On Democratic Reform (CSM) 211
General To Be Asked About Beijing's Test (WT) 212
A Covert Fight For Putin's Job (WSJ) 212
Saudis To Pare Oil Output Again (WSJ) 214
French Diplomat Says Ties With U.S. Are On The Mend (WT) 215
Ghana To Chair African Union Instead Of Sudan: Top Official (WP/AP) 216
China And Sudan (WP) 217
Optimism In Northern Ireland (LAT) 218

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0124043

TERRORISM NEWS:

Uighurs' Detention Conditions Condemned (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Julie Tate

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Chinese Uighurs who have been imprisoned for the past month at a new state-of-the-art detention camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, are being held around the clock in near-total isolation, a circumstance their lawyers say is rapidly degrading their mental health, according to an affidavit filed in federal court yesterday.

The lawyers' complaint is the latest step in their efforts to force an expedited review of the Uighurs' confinement by the U.S. Court of Appeals, a review that the Bush administration opposes and that Congress made more difficult in legislation it passed late last year.

The Uighurs' (pronounced weegurs) detention by the U.S. military, after being sold for bounty by Pakistanis in early 2002, has long attracted controversy. The men had just arrived from Afghanistan, where, they said, they had received limited military training because they opposed Chinese government control of their native region. But they said they never were allied with the Taliban or opposed to the United States, and had fled to Pakistan only to escape the U.S. bombing campaign.

By 2005, U.S. military review panels determined that five of the 18 captured Uighurs were "no longer enemy combatants," but they continued to be held at the Guantanamo Bay prison until their release last year. The panels did not reach that conclusion about the other 13, though all had given similar accounts of their activities during the reviews, according to declassified transcripts of the sessions.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson ruled in December 2005 that the government was unlawfully imprisoning the Uighurs who were found not to be combatants.

Because China views Uighurs as members of a rebellious ethnic minority, the U.S. government declined to return the five men to China, where they faced retribution, and dozens of other nations refused to accept them. Ultimately they were sent last year from Guantanamo Bay to Albania, where they are housed in a compound run by the United Nations.

Lawyers for the remaining 13 Uighurs say the men were moved in December to Guantanamo Bay's Camp 6, a high-security facility at the base completed last August at a cost of $37.9 million. The lawyers say the government provided no explanation for the move, which came shortly after they filed a court petition in Washington seeking the expedited review.

In Camp 6, the Uighurs are alone in metal cells throughout the day, are prohibited for the most part from conversing with others, and take all their meals through a metal slot in the door, lawyer P. Sabin Willett said in his affidavit, which was based on what he was told during his visit Jan. 15-18. They have little or no access to sunlight or fresh air, have had nothing new to read in their native language for the past several years, and are sometimes told to undertake solitary recreation at night, he said.

"They pass days of infinite tedium and loneliness," according to Willett's court filing. One Uighur's "neighbor is constantly hearing voices, shouting out, and being punished. All describe a feeling of despair . . . and abandonment by the world." Another Uighur, named Abdusumet, spoke of hearing voices himself and appeared extremely anxious during Willett's visit, tapping the floor uncontrollably, he said.

The account matches another offered by Brian Neff, a lawyer who in mid-December visited a Yemeni imprisoned in Camp 6. "Detainees in Camp 6 are not supposed to talk to others, they are punished for shouting, and if they talk during walks outside they will be punished," Neff said in an e-mail yesterday. "We are extremely concerned about the . . . conditions of Camp 6 -- in particular, the fact that the detainees there are being held in near-total isolation, cut off from the outside world and any meaningful contact."

Some other "high-value" detainees are being held at a CIA-run camp at Guantanamo Bay that officials say is reserved for the most dangerous and important suspects, but virtually no information has emerged about their treatment.

DOJ_NMG_0124044

Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a spokesman at Guantanamo Bay, confirmed that Camp 6, which houses 160 detainees, has no communal living spaces. Its design originally included them, but they were omitted after detainees attacked guards at Camp 4 in May 2006. Detainees eat and pray in their cells, he said.

Durand said that as repairs are completed at Camp 4, where communal spaces still exist, "detainees in Camp 6 will have the opportunity to earn their way into Camp 4" after first passing through another camp with medium-security conditions.

He said that while he cannot comment on specific detainees, all "have regular, daily human contact. In Camp 6 they can communicate with other detainees in the cell block. Detainees pray together through the food ports in their doors. . . . When detainees recreate, they do so in individual units in a recreation yard with access to see and speak to other detainees."

Willett said that one of his clients, named Abdulnasser, contends that he was cleared for release from detention during one of the military's annual administrative reviews. But Willett has been unable to confirm that claim, or determine why none of the other detained Uighurs are aware of such annual reviews.

The Justice Department, in court papers, has maintained that the appellate court should delay reviewing the Uighurs' detention until cases related to other detainees are resolved. It also has said that legislation passed last year by Congress, which created new military panels to try Guantanamo Bay detainees on criminal charges, seriously limits the court's jurisdiction to question government decisions on their detention.

Dutch Man Face Terror Trial In U.S. (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

An Iraqi-born Dutch citizen pleaded not guilty yesterday in federal court in Washington to charges of conspiring with insurgents to attack U.S. military personnel in Iraq -- the first U.S. criminal prosecution arising from terrorist activities in Iraq.

Wesam al-Delaema, 33, extradited from the Netherlands on Saturday, had been sought by the U.S. government since 2003, when he and other members of the "Mujahideen from Fallujah" videotaped themselves planting explosives along an Iraqi road used by U.S. troops.

The videotape, which was widely shown on Arabic TV stations, was seized by Dutch police who raided Mr. al-Delaema's house in Amersfoort in May 2005 following a tip from U.S. authorities.

Mr. al-Delaema was returned to the United States after being held in the Netherlands for nearly two years, where he and his attorneys vigorously fought the U.S. extradition request.

"After a lengthy extradition process, this defendant will now face justice for his efforts in orchestrating and launching roadside bomb attacks against our men and women serving in Iraq," said Assistant Attorney General Kenneth L. Wainstein, who heads the Justice Department's national security division. "We in the ranks of federal prosecutors are honored to play a role in protecting our military colleagues against such deadly and cowardly attacks."

Mr. al-Delaema entered his not guilty plea before U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman during a 10-minute court hearing. Assistant U.S. Attorney Gregg Maisel told the judge investigators would seek hair samples and other DNA from Mr. al-Delaema, but did not elaborate.

A grand jury indictment handed up in U.S. District Court in Washington in September 2005 named Mr. al-Delaema on six counts of conspiracy -- to kill U.S. citizens abroad, to use a weapon of mass destruction, to maliciously damage or destroy U.S. government property by means of an explosive, to possess a destructive device during a crime of violence, to use such a device, and to teach the making of an explosive with the intent to further a crime of violence.

The indictment said Mr. al-Delaema traveled from the Netherlands to Iraq in October 2003 after the U.S.-led invasion and, together with his co-conspirators, the Mujahideen from Fallujah, "declared his intentions to kill Americans in Iraq using explosives."

If convicted of all the charges, Mr. al-Delaema could be sentenced to life in prison.

Mr. al-Delaema has claimed he was forced to make the videotape after being kidnapped and beaten, and feared being beheaded if he resisted. Although in a 2003 interview broadcast on Dutch television, Mr. al-Delaema accused the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0124045

government and its allies of waging war in Iraq to control its oil reserves, saying the "Americans and British are coming to our country to steal oil and everyone knows it."

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said that Mr. al-Delaema, who was born in Fallujah, was arrested by Dutch law-enforcement authorities on May 2, 2005, and initially faced similar charges in that country. Following his arrest, Mr. Boyd said, Dutch law-enforcement and prosecution authorities worked with the FBI in its investigation of Mr. al-Delaema's reported terrorist activities.

In September 2005, the U.S. government filed a request with the Netherlands seeking Mr. al-Delaema's extradition. The request was granted by a Dutch court and the Dutch Ministry of Justice and, in December, the request was sustained on appeal in the Netherlands. He was flown to the United States on Saturday, arrested and taken into custody by the FBI.

As part of the extradition agreement, Mr. Boyd said Mr. al-Delaema will be tried in a federal court -- not by a military tribunal such as those set up for terror suspects being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. He said the U.S. government also will not oppose Mr. al-Delaema serving his sentence in a Dutch prison if he is convicted.

"We will continue to be vigilant in our efforts to bring to justice anyone who plots terrorist attacks against our citizens at home or abroad," said U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor in Washington. "We look forward to working cooperatively with the Dutch authorities in prosecuting this defendant under our criminal laws."

FBI Assistant Director Joseph Persichini Jr., who heads the bureau's Washington field office, said Mr. al-Delaema's extradition "sends a clear message of the FBI's unwavering dedication to our mission to detect, deter and bring to justice any individual who conspires to commit terrorist acts against any U.S. citizen either in this country or on foreign soil."

In addition to Mr. Maisel, prosecutors include Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Cohen of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington and trial attorneys Gregg Sofer, Jerome Teresinski and Marla Tusk of the Counterterrorism Section of the National Security Division at the Justice Department.

Dutch Citizen Pleads Not Guilty To Terrorism Charges (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

A Dutch national born in Iraq pleaded not guilty to terrorism charges in federal court yesterday, marking the start of the first U.S. criminal prosecution of an alleged Iraqi insurgent.

Wesam al-Delaema, 33, is charged with four counts of conspiracy and two other crimes for allegedly belonging to a group called "Mujaheddin From Fallujah," which constructed and deployed roadside bombs aimed at U.S. forces in Iraq. Delaema, who was born in Fallujah, traveled to Iraq in October 2003 and was shown making and discussing explosives on a videotape that was seized from his house in the Dutch city of Amersfoort in May 2005, authorities said.

Delaema, who was originally arrested and jailed by Dutch police, has said that he was kidnapped and forced to participate in the videotape, which was widely shown on Arabic television stations.

The prosecution of Delaema in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia follows nearly two years of negotiations between U.S. and Dutch authorities, which led to Delaema's extradition to the United States over the weekend.

The unusual extradition agreement would allow Delaema to return to the Netherlands to serve his prison sentence if he is convicted, Dutch and U.S. officials said. It also marks the first time that U.S. authorities have sought to prosecute an alleged Iraqi insurgent in U.S. criminal courts, rather than pursuing military charges or turning him over to the jurisdiction of Iraqi courts.

Victor Koppe, who served as Delaema's attorney in the Netherlands, said the arrangement guarantees that Delaema will not be designated an enemy combatant or tried by a U.S. military commission. Dutch courts also will be able to review and possibly modify the terms of any U.S. sentence once Delaema is returned home, Koppe and U.S. officials said.

Koppe said the conditions were necessary because the U.S. government no longer can be trusted to treat prisoners humanely. Two of the U.S. charges against Delaema carry possible life sentences.

"It's really that video that is the main and only evidence against him," Koppe said in a telephone interview yesterday. "He acknowledged that he could be seen on that video but that he was forced to do it because he was kidnapped."

DOJ_NMG_0124046

Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond, said it was highly unusual for the U.S. government to submit to the stringent conditions contained in the Delaema extradition agreement.

"I've never heard of a federal court exercising jurisdiction and then being subjected to a tribunal from another jurisdiction," Tobias said. "It's a strange way to proceed, but maybe the U.S. had to take what it could get from the Netherlands."

U.S. prosecutors contend in court papers that the videotape clearly shows Delaema bragging about how he and other insurgents hid bombs targeting American forces.

"This is not the first operation we carry out," Delaema says on the tape, according to prosecutors. "We have executed several operations and most of them were successful. . . . Their casualties have gone beyond your imagination."

Assistant Attorney General Kenneth L. Wainstein, who heads the Justice Department's national security division, said in a statement that Delaema "will now face justice for his efforts in orchestrating and launching roadside bomb attacks against our men and women serving in Iraq."

Delaema made a brief appearance yesterday before U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman. Prosecutors requested that hair and saliva samples be obtained from him to allow DNA identification.

Man Faces U.S. Terror Charges In First Prosecution Of Iraq Troop Targeting (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — An Iraqi-born Dutch citizen pleaded not guilty Monday in what the Justice Department called the first U.S. terror charges against insurgents targeting Americans in Iraq.

Wesam al-Delaema, 33, has been wanted by the United States since 2003, when he and his fellow "Mujahideen from Fallujah" videotaped themselves planting explosives along an Iraq road used by U.S. troops. The explosives did not result in any deaths.

He was extradited from the Netherlands over the weekend after being held there for nearly two years, and will become the first suspect tried in a U.S. court for alleged terrorism in Iraq's bloody insurgency.

"After a lengthy extradition process, this defendant will now face justice for his efforts in orchestrating and launching roadside bomb attacks against our men and women serving in Iraq," Assistant Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein said Monday.

Al-Delaema has claimed he is innocent, and his lawyers have argued the U.S. does not have the right to try him. He nodded his head and spoke in broken English with his attorneys during a 10-minute hearing in front of U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman in Washington. Prosecutor Gregg Maisel said the government would be seeking hair and saliva samples from al-Delaema, which the Justice Department said could link him to the crimes.

As part of the extradition agreement with the Netherlands, Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said that al-Delaema will be tried in a federal court — not by a military commission such as those set up for terror suspects being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The U.S. will also not oppose al-Delaema serving his sentence in a Dutch prison if he is convicted, Boyd said.

Al-Delaema's attorney, Victor Koppe, had argued that he feared al-Delaema could be tortured by U.S. authorities and said the U.S. legal system couldn't be trusted.

Al-Delaema traveled to Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion. Evidence against him includes a videotape he filmed of a group called "Warriors of Fallujah" preparing a roadside bomb, which was widely shown on Arabic TV stations. The tape was seized by police who raided al-Delaema's house in the Dutch city of Amersfoort in May 2005 following a tip from U.S. authorities.

In extradition hearings in the Netherlands, al-Delaema argued that he was forced to make the video after being kidnapped and beaten. He said he feared being beheaded if he resisted.

In a 2003 interview broadcast on Dutch television, al-Delaema accused the U.S. and its allies of waging war in Iraq to control its oil reserves.

"The Americans and British are coming to our country to steal oil and everyone knows it," he said.

"I don't care if I myself die or not. I want to offer myself up for my land, for my people. I'm not more or less important than the women and children who you see on television dying because of America," al-Delaema said.

His family said the interview was intended as a joke.

Iraqi-Born Dutch Citizen Pleads 'Not Guilty' To Charges He Assisted The Insurgency (ABC)

By JASON RYAN And PIERRE THOMAS

ABC News, January 30, 2007

Jan. 29, 2007 — An accused insurgent believed to be the first individual to be charged with directly participating in the Iraq insurgency in the United States pleaded not guilty today in federal court.

The indictment alleges that Wesam Al Delaema, a 33-year-old Iraqi-born Dutch citizen, traveled from the Netherlands to Iraq in October 2003 with a group of co-conspirators who called themselves the "Mujahideen from Fallujah." The group, the indictment says, declared intentions to kill Americans in Iraq using explosives and alleges that that they hid explosives "in a road in or around Fallujah, Iraq."

In a hearing in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., the clerk read the six charges as Delaema, unshackled and dressed in his own clothes, stood before Judge Paul Friedman

Charges against Delaema include: conspiracy to kill U.S. citizens abroad; conspiracy to use a weapon of mass destruction (explosives); conspiracy to maliciously damage or destroy U.S. government property by means of an explosive; possession of a destructive device (explosives) during a crime of violence; conspiracy to possess a destructive device (explosives) during a crime of violence; and teaching or demonstrating the making or use of an explosive with the intent to further a crime of violence.

Delaema waived the use of a translator and briefly smiled when meeting his court-appointed attorneys.

"After a lengthy extradition process, this defendant will now face justice for his efforts in orchestrating and launching roadside bomb attacks against our men and women serving in Iraq," said Assistant Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein of the Justice Department's National Security Division.

At the time of his arrest in the Netherlands, foreign media outlets reported that Dutch anti-terrorism police found video tapes of insurgent attacks and operations in Iraq at Delaema's residence.

Delaema was extradited to the United States from the Netherlands late Saturday night by the FBI and U.S. Marshals. He will be held without bond until his status conference and detention hearing on February 5.

Analysis: Dutchman Faces U.S. Iraq Charges (UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, Upi Homeland And National Security Editor

United Press International, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 (UPI) -- The first man to ever face U.S. criminal charges for his part in the Iraq insurgency was arraigned in federal court Monday.

Iraqi-born naturalized Dutchman Wesam al-Delaema, 32, was extradited from The Netherlands over the weekend after U.S. prosecutors agreed he would not face the death penalty and could serve his time in a Dutch prison.

Federal authorities "worked very closely with our Dutch partners to build this case," U.S. Attorney Jeff Taylor told United Press International after the arraignment. Taylor said his prosecutors were "experienced in putting together these kinds of complex, multi-jurisdictional cases."

Delaema was indicted in the District of Columbia in September 2005 for conspiring to kill U.S. forces by attacking convoys in Fallujah, Iraq.

The evidence against him includes video recordings that he allegedly made -- and allegedly urged others to make -- of roadside bomb attacks against U.S. forces.

Monday, the U.S. District Court in Washington gave prosecutors permission to obtain DNA swabs from Delaema, so that they could be compared with a database of DNA obtained from bomb fragments and "other physical items" recovered from attack scenes and other terrorist sites.

The database is compiled by the Terrorist Explosive Device Analytical Center -- a multi-agency effort between the U.S. Department of Defense and federal law enforcement agencies which functions as a repository for all kinds of forensic evidence from terror attacks in Iraq and elsewhere.

According to court filings, the center "conducts a full range of forensic and technical analysis on such items, utilizing analytical protocols that include photography, latent fingerprint analysis, trace evidence (hair and fiber), DNA, electronic and cryptographic analysis, and tool marks."

DOJ_NMG_0124048

"The goal (in collecting DNA samples) is to gather more evidence to prove the charges," said Taylor.

According to the indictment and other court documents, Delaema was arrested May 2005 in the Dutch city of Amersfoort. One report at the weekend said Dutch authorities had been originally been tipped to Delaema by U.S. intelligence, and the court documents say Dutch police monitored telephone conversations he had with people in Iraq.

European counter-terrorist officials have broken up several networks recruiting and making travel arrangements for European Muslim extremists who want to go to fight the U.S. military in Iraq.

So-called graduates of such networks are especially feared by U.S. counter-terrorism officials because of their operational experience and that fact that with European passports, they can easily travel to the United States without a visa.

The documents say Delaema, who was born in Fallujah, returned there in October 2003, driving in his Opel Omega.

"While in Iraq," the documents say, "Delaema traveled to an area near Fallujah, Iraq, where he met with at least six other individuals. Delaema and his associates, each of whom wore a hooded mask over his head, created a video of their meeting" during which "Delaema gave a speech in Arabic" proclaiming him and his associates as "The Mujahedin of Fallujah."

Delaema and his associates also videoed themselves demonstrating how to bury improvised explosive devices under the road, and set them off with remote controlled detonators. On the video, they discussed separating charges by 50 feet or more, so as to strike more than one vehicle in the target convoy, the documents say.

The videotapes and other video recordings were seized at his apartment.

In the telephone conversations Dutch authorities monitored "with various individuals, known and unknown, in Iraq," after his return, "Delaema encouraged other individuals to videotape attacks against the Americans and to provide Delaema with the videotapes."

He also "promised to provide camera equipment to an individual in Iraq" so that attacks could be filmed.

His prosecution will likely cast a spotlight on the shadowy networks that distributes, on the Web and via DVD, video of attacks on U.S. and coalition forces in Iraq.

The indictment charges Delaema with conspiracy to kill U.S. citizens abroad; conspiracy to use a weapon of mass destruction (which under federal law includes large explosive devices); conspiracy to use explosives against U.S. government property; possession of explosives during a crime of violence; conspiracy to possess explosives during a crime of violence; and teaching or demonstrating the making or use of explosives to further a crime of violence.

Because the indictment does not link the attacks Delaema conspired in to any actual deaths, the maximum penalty he faces under federal law if convicted is life imprisonment, the Justice Department said in a statement at the time.

Netherlands Justice Ministry spokesman Ivo Hommes told CNN over the weekend that U.S. officials had guaranteed Delaema would not be handed over for trial as an enemy combatant by military tribunal, and would not face additional charges -- effectively guaranteeing he would not face the death penalty.

European law generally prohibits extradition where the defendant might face execution.

"The offenses for which Delaema is charged were not death (penalty) eligible," Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd told UPI in an e-mail Sunday evening. "We also agreed in our extradition request not to object to Delaema serving his sentence in the Netherlands."

Turks Arrest 47 On Suspicion Of Terror Links (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

TRABZON, Turkey, Jan. 29 — In simultaneous operations carried out in five Turkish cities on Monday, the police arrested 47 people suspected of being Islamic militants, including the leader of Al Qaeda in Turkey, the semi-official Anatolian news agency reported.

Police acted on information warning of “sensational attacks” by Turkish groups in coordination with Al Qaeda, the report said. No details were available on the nature of possible targets.

DOJ_NMG_0124049

Turkey is home to a deadly Islamic militant movement that has managed a number of spectacular attacks in the last several years, though none recently. In 2003, small trucks laden with explosives fixed on two synagogues, the British Consulate and the Turkish headquarters of the British-owned HSBC bank in Istanbul, killing more than 60 people and wounding hundreds.

More than 60 people are on trial for those crimes, though the police say many of the ringleaders managed to flee the country.

On Friday, a Turkish court jailed seven Islamists accused of plotting to kill President Bush during a NATO summit meeting in Istanbul in 2004, [a news agency] reported. The men were members of Ansar al Islam, an Islamist group believed to have links to Al Qaeda.

Among those taken into custody on Monday was Ekrem K, identified as the suspected leader locally of Al Qaeda. Ekrem K, who the police said went by the name Usame, was captured in Konya, 150 miles south of Ankara, along with 22 other suspects, according to the Anatolian report.

He was suspected of communicating with Al Qaeda in a coded language and also of training new recruits for the network.

Late last year, the police detained another man, a lawyer, who claimed to be the leader of Al Qaeda in Turkey.

Habeas Corpus And An Era Of Limits (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

Constitution says those in custody can seek liberty in court, but what of Guantanamo?

WASHINGTON — Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales provided laugh lines for comedians and fodder for outraged bloggers when he told senators recently that the Constitution does not specifically grant individuals the right to habeas corpus.

The Constitution appears to contradict him on that historic doctrine, which says those taken into custody have the right to plead their innocence before a judge. "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended," it says, "unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

Most constitutional experts agree that phrase clearly guarantees the right of habeas corpus. And Gonzales himself later clarified that he believes Americans do have that right.

But in a clumsy way, Gonzales was making a claim that underpins the Bush administration's controversial view that "enemy combatants," including the prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, are not entitled to fight the government in court.

The dispute involves not only the Constitution but also a separate law that spells out the reach of habeas corpus. The issue, which sparked the lively exchange between Gonzales and senators, is the focus of a bill before Congress as well as cases involving "enemy combatants" that appear headed to the Supreme Court.

Many senators, including Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and its ranking Republican, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), believe the right to habeas corpus should apply broadly and include foreign terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay.

But they lost last year when the issue came before Congress.

In a 51-48 vote, the Senate joined the House in affirming the Bush administration's view that habeas corpus should not cover "aliens" held as terrorism suspects or "enemy combatants."

The new law, known as the Military Commissions Act, overturned a Supreme Court ruling that had extended habeas corpus rights to the detainees at Guantanamo Bay. But in that decision, in the case of Rasul vs. Bush, the justices said they were ruling only on the statutory law, not on the Constitution.

In 1789, two years after the Constitution was written, the first Congress adopted a law saying that judges may hear writs of habeas corpus. This law was later expanded to say "any person" who is deprived of liberty by the government may file such a petition.

In 2004, speaking for a 6-3 majority, Justice John Paul Stevens interpreted "any person" to mean that the men held at Guantanamo Bay had a right to appeal their detention in court.

Now that Congress has overridden the high court's view, the next round of litigation in the "war on terror" is focusing on the right to habeas corpus in the Constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0124050

Although everyone — including, apparently, the attorney general — agrees the Constitution protects a right to habeas corpus, there is considerable debate over the reach of that right.

On Thursday, for example, lawyers for Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, an Arab immigrant who was arrested in Peoria, Ill., in 2001 and later sent to a military brig as an "enemy combatant," are going before a U.S. appeals court in Virginia seeking his release.

Bush administration lawyers say his case should be thrown out because the Military Commissions Act says federal judges have no authority "over pending and future habeas corpus actions filed by … detained aliens" who are deemed to be "enemy combatants." They say the reach of habeas corpus should be set by the law enacted by Congress, not by interpreting the Constitution.

In reply, al-Marri's lawyers contend the recently enacted law is unconstitutional. "Like American citizens, aliens in the United States have a constitutional right to habeas corpus. Absent a valid suspension of the writ, Congress could not repeal habeas jurisdiction [for] a lawful resident alien like al-Marri," they said.

The Supreme Court appeared to agree three years ago when it ruled in the case of Hamdi vs. Rumsfeld. "All agree that, absent suspension, the writ of habeas corpus remains available to every individual detained within the United States," said Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

But the constitutional rule is less clear for the detainees at Guantanamo Bay, because they are not within the territory of this country. A dispute over their status is pending before a U.S. appeals court in Washington.

When Gonzales went before the Judiciary Committee on Jan. 18, his written testimony objected to the bill sponsored by Leahy and Specter that would restore habeas rights to "aliens." The new law "prevents terrorists captured on the battlefield from continuing to fight us in our courts," his statement said.

That set the stage for a perplexing exchange between Specter and Gonzales.

The senator incorrectly said the Supreme Court had already ruled the Constitution protects the habeas rights of detainees at Guantanamo.

Gonzales responded by suggesting the Constitution does not protect habeas corpus at all. "The fact that the Constitution — again, there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution. There is a prohibition against taking it away," he said.

"Now, wait a minute," Specter interrupted. "The Constitution says you can't take it away except in case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus?"

Gonzales refused to concede the point. "I meant by that comment the Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States, or every citizen, is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas."

Later in the same hearing, the attorney general softened his tone. "I believe that the right of habeas is something that's very, very important, one of our most cherished rights," he said.

Most constitutional scholars and legal experts reject Gonzales' view that the Constitution does not include an "express grant" of a right to habeas corpus.

"He is completely wrong on the history," said Eric Freedman, a Hofstra law professor and expert on habeas corpus.

Added Pepperdine Law Professor Douglas W. Kmiec, "The historical consensus among scholars is contrary" to the attorney general's statement.

At the Justice Department last week, two lawyers delicately tried to explain what the attorney general meant.

"This didn't come out as cleanly and crisply as we might have hoped," said one, who spoke on the condition that he not be identified. "The question is not whether Americans have a right to habeas corpus. That is undisputed. What's at issue is the scope of the right."

*

david.savage@latimes.com

Gonzales' Body Blow Against Habeas Corpus (VAPILOT)

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124051

Even when White House policies seem ill-conceived, they at least have a veneer of defensible logic. If America doesn't like the idea of government agents examining its library habits, the practice does make a certain quaint, paranoid sense.

But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has ceased even trying to maintain the pretense of reason.

Appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales abandoned cogency altogether for bald assertion of illogic as truth.

It was Gonzales, you might remember, who couldn't find in law a barrier to torture, but could find permission to tap our telephones - despite a law explicitly forbidding it. The subject last week was the right to habeas corpus mentioned in Article I, Section 9 of the U.S. Constitution: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

Habeas corpus essentially guarantees you the right to freedom from wrongful imprisonment, and it dates to the Magna Carta in the early 13th century. Government assault on habeas corpus was one of the central complaints against British rule in the American colonies.

The right to freedom of the body, in fact, was considered so basic that the framers felt no need to enumerate it in the Constitution the way they guaranteed lesser rights, like freedom of speech or religion.

Still you don't need to know what habeas corpus does for you or its history to understand - and find alarming - what happened last week.

Gonzales, the highest officer of the law in the nation, asserted that because the framers don't specifically enumerate habeas corpus, it's not guaranteed, for example, to American citizens held in detention indefinitely without charge - precisely the kind of thing that habeas was designed to prevent.

"Again," said Gonzales, "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution - there is a prohibition against taking it away. But it's never been the case... "

Here an incredulous Sen. Arlen Specter interrupted him: "Wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away, except in case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus unless there's an invasion or rebellion?"

That is, Specter argued, wouldn't Americans be presumed to have a right if the Constitution mentions only taking it away?

Specter's contention assumes - quite correctly, according to historians - that the framers didn't attempt to list all possible rights because they were God's to give, not man's. Some fundamental rights weren't listed because freedom was presumed, and because the framers were writing a Constitution, not a laundry list.

"I meant by that comment the Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States," Gonzales said, "or every citizen, is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas. It doesn't say that. It simply says the right of habeas corpus shall not be suspended except by -"

Here Specter, a Republican, again interrupts: "You may be... violating common sense."

Indeed. The Constitution doesn't explicitly give people the freedom to have children or breathe the air, but nobody would claim Americans don't have the right to each of those things.

Gonzales' logic leads to the notion that only rights included in the Constitution actually exist, a little worrisome since it's a document silent on both babies and breathing. Still, if common sense and logic were the worst of Gonzales' violations, we'd be comforted.

Canada's Good Example (NYT)

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Canada set an important example of decency when it offered a formal apology and compensation worth millions of dollars to a Syrian-born Canadian citizen who was a victim of President Bush's use of open-ended detention, summary deportation and even torture in the name of fighting terrorism.

Last week's announcement by Prime Minister Stephen Harper came more than four years after the nightmare began for the Canadian, Maher Arar, a 36-year-old software engineer. On his way back from a family vacation, he was detained by U.S. officials at Kennedy Airport on the basis of unsubstantiated information from the Canadian police. After being held in solitary confinement in a Brooklyn detention center and interrogated without proper access to legal counsel, he was sent to Syria, where he was imprisoned for nearly a year and tortured.

DOJ_NMG_0124052

It was all part of a legally and morally unsupportable practice known as extraordinary rendition, the deportation of terrorism suspects to countries where the regimes are known to use torture and to disdain basic human rights protections.

Four months ago, a Canadian government panel concluded that Mr. Arar had never had a terrorism connection, and that Americans had misled Canada about their plans for him. The Bush administration stonewalled the inquiry. It has responded to a new Canadian request to remove Mr. Arar from a United States security watch list by rudely telling Canada, its democratic northern neighbor and strategic ally, to mind its own business.

Not only has the Bush administration refused to apologize to Mr. Arar, but Justice Department lawyers are also brandishing a dubious claim of state secrets and fighting a lawsuit brought by Mr. Arar in this country. Bush administration officials insist that they have "new intelligence" that justifies keeping Mr. Arar on the watch list. That intelligence has not been disclosed, but Canadian officials who have reviewed the information are unpersuaded.

Questioned about the Arar case at a recent Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales provided no specifics that would explain Mr. Arar's continued presence on the watch list, or why he was deported to Syria in the first place. The committee's chairman, Senator Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, is right to demand that the administration face up to its bad behavior in this case and renounce its renditions policy.

This is not just about making amends with Canada, or doing the right thing by what appears to be an innocent man. It is a matter of trying to restore this country's reputation as a defender and protector of human rights.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Nuclear Agency: Air Defenses Impractical (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Federal regulators plunged into an energy and national security controversy yesterday by ruling that the nation's 103 nuclear power plants do not need to protect themselves from potential attacks by terrorists using airplanes.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission's 5-to-0 ruling was in response to a 2004 petition by the Committee to Bridge the Gap, a Los Angeles nonprofit group, that said nuclear plants should build shields made of steel I-beams and cabling or take other steps to prevent a release of radiation in case of an air attack. Eight state attorneys general backed the petition.

The group cited the 9/11 Commission, which said in its report that the al-Qaeda plot to hit the World Trade Center towers and the Pentagon in 2001 had originally contemplated hijacking 10 planes and striking one or more nuclear power plants.

"Nuclear power plants are pre-emplaced nuclear weapons near major cities," said Daniel Hirsch, president of the Committee to Bridge the Gap. "They can't blow up like a nuclear bomb, but they can release a thousand times the radiation of the Hiroshima bomb. They are the most attractive target for a terrorist to hit in our country."

But NRC Chairman Dale Klein said, "Nuclear power plants are inherently robust structures that our studies show provide adequate protection in a hypothetical attack by an airplane."

The commission might impose stricter requirements on new plants, which some nuclear foes hope will add costs or delay licenses for industry expansion.

For now, however, the NRC said that guarding against airborne attacks was the job of the military and other agencies. It added that nuclear plant operators were already required to be prepared to respond to fires or explosions, whatever the cause. The commission said that it was toughening requirements for reactor operators to repel "multiple, coordinated groups of attackers, suicide attacks and cyber threats."

Some members of Congress said that the NRC's steps fell short of what was needed.

"I am disappointed," said Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.). The NRC decision "reflects an inadequate, industry-influenced approach that sacrifices security in favor of corporate profits."

DOJ_NMG_0124053

On Friday, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who chairs the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, had written to the agency that "the communities that surround existing plants need to be confident that the NRC, as the regulator charged with nuclear safety, did all it could to ensure that plants defend against current security threats" -- including, she added, "large attacking forces and commercial aircraft."

Yesterday, Boxer said that her "initial reaction" was that the NRC "did not follow the direction of Congress to ensure that our nuclear power plants are protected from air- or land-based terrorist threats."

The 9/11 Commission called nuclear plants "vital facilities" and pointed to evidence that the plants had attracted al-Qaeda's attention. The commission's report said that senior al-Qaeda planner Khalid Sheik Mohammed told interrogators after his capture that nuclear plants were on his original target list. And the commission said that during a meeting in Spain in July 2001, Mohamed Atta, thought to be the lead hijacker on Sept. 11, had considered targeting a nuclear facility he had seen during familiarization flights near New York -- a target he and his conspirators referred to as "electrical engineering." In the end, Atta did not have a chance to discuss the idea with senior al-Qaeda leaders.

Timothy J. Roemer, a member of the 9/11 Commission, said that "there should be agencies in our government that make this as high a priority as al-Qaeda makes it." He also said that as the nuclear industry expands, "they should also shoulder some of the burden of our environment and our defense."

The question of whether nuclear facilities should be required to protect themselves against air attacks is frequently mentioned as a cost issue by electric power companies interested in building nuclear plants. There has not been a new order placed for a nuclear reactor in the United States since the 1979 Three Mile Island accident in Pennsylvania. Tax incentives in the Energy Policy Act of 2005 have sparked preliminary planning on about 19 nuclear power projects, and several companies are expected to seek NRC approval later this year.

Many of the industry's critics have seized on national security as a reason to block new plants or to raise the costs of construction. Hirsch said, however, that building an I-beam and cabling shield would add only about 1 percent to the cost of a plant.

"Where are the resources best put to use to protect our population?" said Steven Kerekes, a spokesman for the Nuclear Energy Institute. "There will be far more value in putting those resources toward other parts of the infrastructure that aren't nearly as well protected as nuclear power plants." He cited a 2002 computer modeling study that said a jetliner crash at a nuclear site would not lead to a radiation leak.

The Supreme Court this month decided not to hear an appeal of a 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruling that said the NRC had violated the National Environmental Policy Act when it failed to include a terrorist attack in an environmental impact report for an application to create dry-cask storage at the Diablo Canyon Power Plant near San Luis Obispo, Calif. Pacific Gas and Electric, which owns Diablo Canyon, was granted the license, but the NRC must now reconsider the application.

One NRC commissioner, Gregory B. Jaczko, dissented on the Diablo Canyon license. "I strongly believe . . . that any new nuclear power plants built in this country should be designed to withstand commercial aircraft crashes."

Baltimore-based Constellation Energy, which operates five nuclear units at three locations, is weighing a new plant. It has chosen a design by Areva that is supposed to protect against airplane crashes by doubling the thickness of the containment vessel and redesigning other facilities. One such plant is under construction in Finland; another is planned for France, said Areva spokesman Penny Phelps. A Constellation spokesman said the plant was appealing because it was designed for "a spectrum of events."

Panel Rejects Responsibility For Attacks (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission said nuclear power plant operators should not be expected to stop terrorists from crashing an airliner into a reactor, saying that responsibility lies elsewhere. Plant operators should instead focus on limiting radioactive releases and public exposure from any such airborne attack, the agency said in a revised defense plan for nuclear plants. “The active protection against airborne threats is addressed by other federal organizations, including the military,” the commission said.

DOJ_NMG_0124054

Idea To 'Cage' Atomic Plants Is Rejected (LAT)

By Dan Weikel

Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

A California group had asked that steel shields and other anti-terrorism measures be mandated.

Federal regulators on Monday rejected requests from a California nuclear policy group to bolster security at atomic power plants, including protections against the type of air attack that destroyed the World Trade Center on Sept. 11.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission turned down a formal petition from the Committee to Bridge the Gap, which contends that nuclear power stations remain vulnerable to terrorist air and ground assaults.

Commission officials said the precautions were unnecessary because research indicated reactors had "adequate protection" against airliners.

The nonprofit Committee to Bridge the Gap, based in Santa Cruz, proposed in 2004 that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission require atomic power plants to build giant steel cages around reactor buildings to deflect impacts from large commercial planes.

The group further asked the commission to increase to at least 19, from five, the number of attackers each nuclear power plant must be prepared to defend against. The request was based on the number of terrorists who hijacked airliners on Sept. 11.

The commission on Monday instead adopted regulations similar to security directives it imposed in April 2003, without public hearings, on operators of commercial reactors.

The directives deal with the size, training and composition of security forces; reactor security; barriers to protect against truck or car bombs; the dimensions of security perimeters; and the numbers of terrorists that plants must defend against. For national security, the specifics are confidential.

"We are taking a multifaceted approach to security enhancements in this post 9/11 threat environment and looking at how best to secure existing nuclear power plants," said Nuclear Regulatory Commission Chairman Dale Klein.

The nation has about 100 commercial nuclear reactors, including four in California: two each at San Onofre in northern San Diego County and Diablo Canyon near San Luis Obispo. Many reactors are near major population centers.

Ray Golden, a spokesman for the San Onofre Nuclear Generating Station, said the station's operator, Southern California Edison, had spent about $80 million on security improvements since Sept. 11, 2001.

He added that the plant was designed to withstand earthquakes and that thick concrete structures housed important systems.

Still, some fear that a terrorist attack could breach a reactor or a plant's nuclear waste storage facilities and release harmful radiation.

"Rather than upgrading protections, the proposed rule merely codifies the status quo, reaffirming the existing, woefully inadequate security measures already in place at the nation's reactors," said Dan Hirsch, president of Committee to Bridge the Gap.

His organization's call for fortifications was supported by attorneys general from eight states, including California, who said in letters to the commission that they were concerned that defenses were obsolete and might not be effective against large groups of heavily armed terrorists.

In November 2004, the commission agreed to consider the organization's request and folded it into a formal public process to develop security regulations for the nuclear power industry.

In addition, the federal Energy Policy Act of 2005 asked the commission to upgrade security regulations and consider air assaults, attacks by large groups, and attacks of the magnitude of Sept. 11.

In rejecting the Committee to Bridge the Gap's recommendations, the commission said that firefighting and evacuation procedures, strengthened after Sept. 11, were sufficient to deal with potential releases of radiation from fires and explosions.

DOJ_NMG_0124055

Commissioners noted that such protections against air attack as fighter planes and anti-aircraft weapons were primarily the responsibility of the military and other federal organizations.

Consulting with law enforcement and intelligence agencies, commissioners interpreted Sept. 11 as four separate attacks, each involving four to five terrorists, and declined to increase the number of attackers that plants must be prepared to defend against.

Representatives of the nuclear power industry had opposed reactor cages as costly and unnecessary.

They said studies by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Nuclear Energy Institute, a trade organization and lobbying arm for the industry, indicated that crashes of airliners into power plants were unlikely to cause significant harm to the public.

"We are comfortable that our nuclear power plants and spent fuel ponds are robust and can withstand significant impacts though they are not designed specifically for aircraft impacts," said Tony Pietrangelo, vice president of regulatory affairs for the Nuclear Energy Institute.

In a German government study, however, researchers used flight simulators and computer analysis to show that airliners were able to hit nuclear reactors roughly half the time, occasionally triggering large fires and radiation release into the atmosphere.

"Fire prevention is always better than firefighting," said Michele Boyd, an energy specialist with Public Citizen, a nonprofit Washington watchdog group. "Nuclear terrorism prevention is far more prudent than trying to reduce radiation exposures after the fact."

Documents Detail Puzzling Behavior Of Truck-driving Student (PROJO)

By Karen Lee Ziner, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 30, 2007

Mullawala

Shortly after Mohammed Mullawala's arrest in Rhode Island last month, investigators discovered he was a man on the move who ricocheted from state to state, city to city and apartment to apartment.

But a state police affidavit draws a more complicated picture of the man whose behavior at a Smithfield trucking school in November triggered a nationwide investigation that involves the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and multiple state police fusion centers tasked with homeland security concerns.

Mullawala, a 28-year-old Indian national, faces a deportation hearing today. He has been held since Dec. 5 at the Suffolk County House of Corrections in Boston, on a civil violation of his student visa. No criminal charges have been filed against him; however, the Rhode Island Department of the Attorney General has issued a criminal extradition warrant that alleges he submitted a false document to the Rhode Island Division of Motor Vehicles in order to obtain a Rhode Island driver's license.

It was Mullawala's lack of interest in learning how to back up a tractor-trailer; his request to buy software on hazardous materials and his queries on whether fingerprinting would be required for a commercial driver's license that raised concerns with an instructor at the Nationwide Tractor-Trailer Driving School, and soon thereafter, with federal Homeland Security.

The affidavit contains a complicated timeline of Mullawala's alleged whereabouts since he came to the United States from India in 2002 — zigzagging between Providence to three addresses in Connecticut, and several more in Queens, the Bronx and Long Island, N.Y., as well as Jersey City, N.J.

The timeline revolves around 11 addresses in four states that Mullawala says he lived at. Only 7 have checked out so far, some of which he apparently stayed at for only a month. It includes three universities he said he attended, but apparently did not. It shows he twice returned to India, in 2003 and 2004, once via Kuwait.

Among other new details:

Mullawala frequently switched cars.

In Rhode Island, he registered three different cars; a 1987 Honda on Dec. 3, 2002; a 1989 Nissan three weeks later. The Journal learned that Mullawala registered a 1989 Honda five months later, in May 2003. Four months after that, according to the affidavit, Mullawala registered a 1991 Honda in Connecticut.

DOJ_NMG_0124056

On a Connecticut identification card, he changed the spelling of his first name from Mohammed to Muhammed.

He held licenses and ID cards in four states, some of the licenses were suspended multiple times.

He worked for several limousine companies in violation of his visa. He never paid state or federal income tax.

The affidavit's overarching feature involves what investigators characterized as false information Mullawala gave about his movements, addresses, employment, and college enrollments.

A few examples:

He never lived at 181 Carpenter St. in Providence, as he said. His references and roomates' names there do not check out.

He enrolled in three different universities but took almost no classes. At Johnson & Wales University, he enrolled, dropped out, and re-enrolled. He enrolled at the University of Bridgeport and dropped out in the same month. He enrolled at the City University of New York, but took no classes at all.

Two companies where he said he worked have no record of Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala.

He said he had no traffic tickets or summonses, but apparently he had many.

Investigators say they are trying to answer numerous questions, including:

If, as the investigators say, his student identity was a guise for something else, what was it?

What is the significance of numerous "problematic" phone calls to or from his cell phone, that appear to connect with people "of national interest" with regard to "terrorist-type indicators?" as state police Maj. Steven O'Donnell said.

Why has he moved so frequently, and to multiple states?

Why was he so eager to obtain a license to haul hazardous materials, as he told his instructor at the tractor-trailer driving school?

His behavior at best, "is evasive," O'Donnell said last week. "If someone's being deceptive there's a reason they're being deceptive." So far, O'Donnell said, "we don't have any answers."

The affidavit, entered into evidence at federal immigration court in Boston last week, persuaded Judge Matthew D'Angelo that Mullawala poses a danger to the community and is "an extreme flight risk," despite defense lawyer June Beak's argument that Mullawala has no criminal charges against him.

D'Angelo called "troubling," Mullawala's behavior at the trucking school — where Mullawala attended for two days out of the required six to eight weeks; where he allegedly offered extra money to finish the course in a month; and where he said he only wanted to learn how to drive a rig forward and not learn other technical maneuvers.

D'Angelo deemed "far-fetched" and implausible Mullawala's explanation that he moved frequently to avoid areas where the police ticketed heavily for parking violations, as well as to enjoy the mobility his single status afforded.

All of that, plus the fact that Mullawala has no known family or other ties in this country led D'Angelo to order Mullawala's continued federal detention until today's deportation hearing.

The affidavit underscores how vigorously FBI agents and state police detectives attached to the FBI's Joint Anti-Terrorism Task Force have been pursuing leads tied to Mullawala, despite the lack of any criminal charges against him.

It notes that the joint investigation was launched Nov. 29, based on Homeland Security and FBI bulletins. That was six days before Mullawala came to state police headquarters in Scituate to file a complaint that he was being harassed by a detective who had called him on his cell phone. After questioning, he was taken into custody on a student visa violation.

It states that federal agents are still trying to determine if Mullawala lived where he said he lived, according to the affidavit. Off and on, he lived in the Bronx, one landlord told investigators. Most recently, he lived in Jamaica, Queens, said another.

The affidavit lays out three charts: one on Mullawala's overall timeline; a second on his licenses and registrations; and a third on his work history.

Investigators are continuing to plot his course and filling in the blanks for periods when Mullawala told them he could not remember where he lived. They're looking for connections with other people.

They are still studying his various licenses, registrations, and ID cards in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and New Jersey. Those include a Rhode Island driver's license and Rhode Island-issued Social Security card; a New Jersey driver's license, another by the New Jersey Taxi-Limousine Commission; a Connecticut driver's license and ID card; a City University of New York ID card, a passport issued in India, and more.

DOJ_NMG_0124057

(Because he ignored traffic tickets and court summonses, Mullawala's Rhode Island driver's license was suspended twice; his New York license was suspended four times).

The affidavit also gives a chronology of the days leading up to Mullawala's arrest and outlines the questions posed to him.

When a state police investigator called Mullawalla on his cell phone on Dec. 1, and asked him on a pretense to report to headquarters, Mullawalla said he couldn't because his parents were visiting from India. The affidavit says, "Mohammed Y. Mullawalla later admitted that he lied when making this statement."

On Dec. 5, Mullawala showed up at state police headquarters unannounced to make a complaint against one of the troopers in the case. A trooper at the front desk recognized Mullawala from a Homeland Security Bulletin and he was taken into custody.

In a recent phone interview from the Suffolk County House of Corrections, Mullawala rambled rapidly from topic to topic.

He said variously that he came to the United States to study computer engineering, and that he went to trucking school to learn how to drive a rig so he could start a marble import-export business, and that he moved often because he's not the kind of guy to stick to one thing very long.

To the question, "Are you a terrorist?" Mullawala replied, absolutely not.

"I'm not. One hundred percent, I am an innocent student, ma'am."Investigators say they are convinced that Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala is not a student.

But the pieces assembled in the past six weeks have yet to solve the puzzle.

"If someone's being deceptive, there's a reason they're being deceptive. [So far] we don't have any answers."

Maj. Steven O'Donnell

Rhode Island State Police

"If someone's being deceptive, there's a reason they're being deceptive. [So far] we don't have any answers."

Maj. Steven O'Donnell

Rhode Island State Police

Homeland Security's Inspector General Blasts Coast Guard Modernization Program (AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia

The AP, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON – A federal investigation concluded that the U.S. Coast Guard's multibillion-dollar fleet modernization program run by Lockheed Martin Corp. and Northrop Grumman Corp. has design flaws that have led to spiraling maintenance costs and, without a fix, could reduce the longevity of the spiffed-up ships.

Because of design deficiencies, the Coast Guard cutters might not be strong enough to withstand 230 days a year at sea over a period of 30 years, as required by the contract, the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general said in a report released Monday,

The so-called Deepwater contract was awarded in 2002 to Integrated Coast Guard Systems, a joint venture of defense contractors Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman.

Since then, the combined cost of the first two cutters has increased from $517 million to about $775 million primarily due to design changes needed to meet post-9/11 mission requirements and other government specifications not included in the original contract, the report found.

Deepwater, a $24 billion, 25-year program, is the largest acquisition project in Coast Guard history.

Representatives from Integrated Coast Guard Systems did not immediately return calls for comment Monday afternoon.

But in a written response to the IG's report, the Coast Guard said it had "serious concerns" with the investigators' approach to reviewing and analyzing the program.

"The report contains selective inclusion of documents that do not represent the most current, comprehensive, or technically accurate data," the Coast Guard said.

Shares of Bethesda, Md.-based Lockheed Martin slid 24 cents to $94.63 in afternoon trading, while Los Angeles-based Northrop Grumman added 29 cents to $70.78, both on the New York Stock Exchange.

Super Bowl Security A Massive Effort (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

AP, January 30, 2007

MIAMI - Gavin moved quickly around the spacious convention center, searching for a hidden bomb. Near a glass box containing a fire extinguisher, he sniffed the air and abruptly sat down. Inside was a pound of live high explosives, wrapped in black plastic.

For successfully finding the "bomb," Gavin got a treat from his handler, Special Agent L.A. Bykowsky of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. His training exercise over, the 7-year-old golden Labrador retriever is ready for duty conducting bomb-sniffing sweeps for the Super Bowl and its related events and hotels.

Gavin will be among 66 specialized canine bomb teams working as part of a massive local, state and federal security effort to protect one of the world's highest-profile public events from terrorists, foreign and domestic. The dog teams are one element of a 6-inch-thick security plan, which includes jet fighters and helicopters, tactical weapons teams, mobile bomb labs and robots, high-tech X-ray machines and sensors, intelligence databases and hundreds of uniformed police officers.

"We don't have any specific threat to this event," said Julie Torres, chief of the ATF's Miami office and the designated federal coordinator for Super Bowl security. "It is the biggest event in the nation as far as a sporting event. It is vulnerable as far as any terrorist activity. We have to plan excessively so we can provide proper security."

Those plans began to take shape two weeks after last year's Super Bowl in Detroit. This year's game is the sixth since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, which forever changed the security landscape for any major U.S. public event. The Super Bowl is a Level One national security event, right behind a presidential inauguration in importance.

The trick for planners is to keep the game an enjoyable sporting event while still projecting a secure atmosphere. That means fans will see a significant police presence, but much more will be going on behind the scenes.

"What you want to do is give the appearance of preparedness and security, and give the fans a safe environment, but you don't want to look oppressive," said Maj. Lou Battle, Super Bowl coordinator for the Miami-Dade Police Department. "You're not going to feel like you're in an armed camp."

More than two dozen federal, state and local agencies are involved in security along with the NFL's own personnel. Milt Ahlerich, the NFL's vice president for security, said Monday that the league has hired 3,000 of its own personnel - part of $6 million budgeted for Super Bowl security - to handle chores ranging from running the magnetometers to screening fans at Dolphin Stadium.

"We have a great deal of confidence that our fans will be safe, that the two teams will be safe," he said.

Fans are prohibited from bringing most items into the game, other than a small bag that is subject to search. Traditional tailgating with cooking fires, tents and the like is banned in the parking lots, Ahlerich said.

The law enforcement agencies will be housed together at a Joint Operations Center, which includes U.S. intelligence agencies, a "bomb management" group and an aviation team to monitor all air traffic. On game day, Federal Aviation Administration flight restrictions for 10 miles around the stadium go into effect two hours before game time and end just before midnight.

"If you've got to fly, you just can't go through that perimeter," Torres said. "And if you do, you're going to have folks who are going to contact you and try to get your attention."

U.S. military fighters would handle any jetliners or other high-flying aircraft that violate the order. Any "low and slow" planes that stray into the space would be intercepted by U.S. Customs and Border Protection aircraft, often Blackhawk helicopters or Citation jets, said CBP spokesman Zachary Mann.

The FBI plays a major role in coordinating the dissemination of intelligence and law enforcement databases - and investigating any suspected terrorism plots.

"Information dissemination is one of our highest priorities," said Stuart McArthur, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami field office and head of the South Florida Joint Terrorism Task Force. "Every threat that comes in will be checked out by the South Florida JTTF."

DOJ_NMG_0124059

The FBI also is doing background checks on stadium workers and other employees involved in various Super Bowl events. Action will be taken if any red flags are raised.

Bykowsky said Gavin and the other bomb-sniffing dogs are capable of identifying minute amounts of powder and explosives no matter what other competing smells are around - kind of like finding a specific ingredient in a big bowl of vegetable soup. And there are some 19,000 explosives available around the world.

"If there are tomatoes in the soup, he will find them," she said.

Many of the Defense Department and other aircraft will operate out of Homestead Air Reserve Base south of Miami. The ATF has explosives expertise and a mobile bomb lab coming from Atlanta. Large X-ray machines used by Customs at ports will scan shipping containers and truck trailers for suspicious material and high-tech sensors will check for radioactive and biological substances.

"Every square foot of the Super Bowl venue is under surveillance of some sort," Battle said.

One wild card in Miami is whether there might be celebrations, or even rioting, among the thousands of Cuban exiles in the city if Fidel Castro dies before the game. The Cuban president has been seriously ill since midsummer, with some reports indicating he might be near death.

NFL officials and government officials say there is no plan to postpone the game or any of the numerous related events if Castro dies, and dealing with any disruptions triggered by such an event won't take away personnel or assets from Super Bowl security.

"There is a plan, and it's not going to affect the game at all - game day and all the events leading up to game day," said Torres, who was born in Cuba and moved to Miami with her family at age 5. "We have planned for that."

PUC Sets Contempt Hearing For Verizon (AP)

By Francis X. Quinn, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 30, 2007

Maine Utilities Commission Sets Contempt Hearing for Verizon Over Domestic Surveillance

AUGUSTA, Maine (AP) -- The Maine Public Utilities Commission unanimously voted Monday to schedule a hearing next month to allow Verizon Communications Inc. to argue why it should not be held in contempt for its response to a commission order stemming from allegations about domestic surveillance by the federal government.

The case involves a multi-customer complaint filed last May effectively seeking to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant.

The complaint followed media reports about a National Security Agency eavesdropping program.

Verizon, in answer to the customer complaint, issued a response on May 19, 2006, in which it referred to points made in two press releases, including one that declared the company was not asked for records by the NSA and did not provide such records.

The PUC subsequently ordered Verizon, on Aug. 9, to affirm in writing that its representations to the commission were true.

On Aug. 21, the same day that the U.S. Justice Department filed suit against the PUC and Verizon asserting that the PUC was pre-empted by federal law from investigating the alleged spying program, Verizon said it would not submit an affirmation, citing legal action by the federal government.

Since then, the PUC has sought to have the federal suit dismissed and the complaint case has not moved forward.

On Monday, the PUC voted 3-0 to hold a contempt hearing by Feb. 13. Panelists suggested Verizon's response to date had been inadequate and noted that the ordinary period for resolving complaints was close to expiring.

"This isn't a national security issue," said PUC Chairman Kurt Adams.

Verizon had nothing immediate to say.

"Verizon is reserving comment," spokesman Peter Reilly said.

Complainant James Cowie expressed some satisfaction that the commission was "finally doing something" but maintained that the same action taken Monday could have been taken months ago.

"We're not happy with the commission at all," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0124060

The Bush administration has agreed to let a panel of federal judges oversee the government's domestic spying program.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will have final say in approving wiretaps on communications involving people with suspected terror links, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said earlier this month in a letter to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Senators At Louisiana Hearing Criticize Federal Recovery Aid (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 29 — Three United States senators sounded off on Monday about the slow pace of recovery from Hurricane Katrina at a hearing in the French Quarter, criticizing federal officials for perceived inequities in aid to Louisiana and for imposing rules that are halting government assistance.

With Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois and a presidential candidate, expected to speak at the hearing of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs committee, dozens of residents lined up outside the Louisiana Supreme Court building hoping to be admitted. But only a small fraction were allowed inside, where Mr. Obama jousted with Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator of Gulf Coast rebuilding, about where the money was, and why more of it was not in Louisiana.

Mr. Obama and Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, focused on why Louisiana, which had far more damage than Mississippi, did not receive a larger proportion of federal aid. Mr. Powell said Congress had put a cap on how much aid money any one state could get.

The senators complained about federal rules requiring a local match for aid after disasters; Mr. Powell said that in some cases, like the removal of the tons of debris that inundated the landscape here, the rules had been waived.

The senators, including the panel's chairman, Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut, voiced little criticism of Mayor C. Ray Nagin or other local officials, and Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana was not on the witness list. Ms. Blanco is responsible for the Road Home, a troubled housing assistance program that has made little progress in getting federal rebuilding aid to thousands of homeowners.

Fewer than 300 homeowners have received aid under the program, Mr. Lieberman said, though more than 100,000 have applied. (A program official said on Monday that 359 had received grants.) The program's failure is cited as a crucial reason for the faltering repopulation effort.

The senators used the occasion to echo local laments that President Bush did not mention New Orleans in his State of the Union address. They did not disagree when Mr. Nagin, evidently referring to officials outside the city, said, "The tragedy of Katrina has lingered for so long, I just don't see the will to really fix it."

While the senators scored the federal response, Mr. Powell gingerly noted the region's "significant" difficulties before the storm, and suggested the problems of the Road Home were now a state matter.

Undeterred, Mr. Obama warmed to the issue of the Bush administration's failures in the response to the disaster, now a fixture in the Democrats' arsenal.

"There's not a sense of urgency out of this White House to get this done," Mr. Obama said. He spoke of his hometown of Chicago's recovery from the great fire of 1871 as an effort of national will, and suggested it could be done again.

Mr. Obama wondered about "whether we're in danger of actually forgetting New Orleans," adding, "That's shameful."

Obama Blasts Bush Adminstration On Katrina Recovery (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, January 30, 2007

NEW ORLEANS -- Democratic presidential hopeful Barack Obama blasted the Bush administration Monday for the slow pace of Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts, saying reconstruction no longer seems to be a White House priority.

"There is not a sense of urgency in this administration to get this done," said the senator from Illinois. "You get a sense that will has been lacking in the last several months."

Obama, the Senate's only African-American member, was in New Orleans for a field hearing on Gulf Coast rebuilding conducted by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0124061

In the days after Katrina, the devastation of New Orleans and the botched federal response turned into a dramatic international emblem for charges of incompetence in the administration and of indifference to the plight of poor people, particularly blacks and other racial minorities. The flooding and tardy rescue efforts had the greatest impact on low-income black residents, many of whom did not have personal transportation or financial resources to evacuate easily on their own.

The broken homes and vacant streets of the city's flood-damaged neighborhoods remain a potent political symbol. Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards kicked off his campaign in December outside a damaged home in one hard-hit neighborhood.

After Monday's field hearing, the Senate committee took a bus tour of the city's Lower 9th Ward, a low-income black neighborhood where many ruined homes sit empty and bear the painted X-marks used in the chaotic weeks following the hurricane to show which buildings had been searched for survivors.

Testifying to the committee, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said he still doesn't see "the will to really fix" his city and suggested that race was a factor.

"I think it's more class than anything, but there's racial issues associated with it also," said Nagin, who is black.

Nagin complained that disputes with federal officials over the value of damaged buildings and cumbersome paperwork have slowed the money flow.

"And then I look at what we're doing in Iraq and how we spend money at an unprecedented level there, how we can set up temporary hospitals and designate money to rebuild their economy, and we have this dance going on in New Orleans," he said.

The hearing is one of the first that the Homeland Security Committee has scheduled since the Senate passed to Democratic control. No Republican members attended.

The session follows criticism of Bush for not including any mention of the New Orleans recovery effort in last week's State of the Union address. Obama echoed that criticism, noting that Bush had traveled to the city shortly after the disaster and promised to do "what it takes … as long as it takes" to rebuild New Orleans.

But "17 months later, we heard not a single word, not one word in President Bush's State of the Union address," Obama said. "Those of us who are concerned all across the country wonder if we're in danger of forgetting about New Orleans, and that's shameful."

Federal officials involved with rebuilding efforts defended their work in testimony before the committee. Donald Powell, federal coordinator for Gulf Coast reconstruction for the Department of Homeland Security, said he was confident that when the history of the recovery effort is written "it will also be a story of modern renaissance."

"President Bush is committed to rebuilding the Gulf Coast and rebuilding it better and stronger," Powell said.

Still, Gil Jamieson, the deputy director for Gulf Coast recovery for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said it might take as long as a decade to rebuild the region.

Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) and other members of the panel criticized the administration for failing to waive a legal requirement that local authorities pay 10 percent of the cost of recovery of a local disaster. They noted that the requirement had been waived after the Sept. 11 attacks in New York and also in 1992 after Hurricane Andrew hit Florida.

Powell responded that state officials could use federal disaster aid they had received for the recovery effort to pay the cost of the match.

As the hearing began, a protester stood and unfurled a banner urging "Probe the White House," a reference to calls for establishment of a commission to investigate the administration's response to Katrina modeled after the Sept. 11 commission.

Speaking later to reporters, committee Chairman Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut said he would rather focus on the rebuilding effort and was reluctant to mount a new investigation of the failures in the initial response.

"We don't want to play 'gotcha' anymore," Lieberman said. "We want to get the aid and assistance to the people of the region who need it."

Mary Quite Contrary (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124062

Nearly 18 months after Hurricane Katrina devastated Louisiana and Mississippi, HOH thought it likely everything that could be said about the tragedy already had been said.

Alas, HOH underestimated Pelican State Sen. Mary Landrieu (D), who had some highly original things to say Monday morning at a field hearing in New Orleans convened by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

"I often think we would have been better off if the terrorists had blown up our levees. Maybe we'd have gotten more attention," Landrieu said, according to a report from the New Orleans station WWL-TV.

The problem, Landrieu continued, is that Louisiana gets a bad rap in Washington, D.C., especially compared to its neighbor to the east.

"Mississippi is actually the most corrupt state in the union, but you never hear that, because there's some political undertones about having Mississippi look so good and having Louisiana look not so good at the national level," Landrieu said.

So, beginning from the top, does Landrieu really wish her home state had been attacked by terrorists? Not really, explained her communications director, Adam Sharp.

"She was just reflecting on the priorities of the [Bush] administration," Sharp said. "Look at the State of the Union — 5,600 words and not one mention of Hurricane Katrina or Rita or the recovery. You are left to wonder if [a terrorist attack] is what it takes to get on the radar screen."

As for that whole corruption thing, Landrieu makes no apologies for that one either. In fact, Sharp sent HOH a handy dandy report showing that Mississippi is indeed the most corrupt state in all the land.

The report — written in 2004 by the Corrupt Crime Reporter and based on public data — says Louisiana "is not the most corrupt state in the country, as its reputation might indicate. It comes in third."

Mississippi is a solid No. 1 on that list, while sleeper pick North Dakota slid in at the No. 2 slot.

In any case, Sharp said, Landrieu "was not denigrating Mississippi to make her point. We know that the actions of a few dishonest officials should not be representative of the entire state."

Not the Easiest Job. She's dealt with more than her fair share of negative press over the last several months, and now Melanie Roussell is leaving her post as communications director and senior policy adviser to embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.).

In an e-mail Monday, Roussell wrote that she is leaving Jefferson — who is under federal investigation for allegedly soliciting bribes — to take the post of press secretary at the House Judiciary Committee.

"And like a bird leaving the nest, the time has come for me to move on to new and exciting ventures — taking with me the strength of character, motivation, and expertise that I learned here on the Jefferson staff," Roussell said.

Today is her last day with Jefferson's office. Perhaps things will be a little quieter at the new gig.

Someone's Been Sitting in My Chair, Part II. HOH enjoys stories about chairs. Recently, he told you about the time House Transportation and Infrastructure ranking member John Mica (R-Fla.) stormed out of a panel meeting and took his GOP colleagues with him because there was not a properly positioned chair for him.

Now comes word of some more disgruntled House Republicans, this time of the press secretary variety.

House GOP flacks get together to compare notes every Monday at 1 p.m. While there had been some issues in the opening days of the 110th Congress with making sure they had a room in which to meet, those problems were supposedly settled and the Republican spinners should have a standing reservation in the Cannon Caucus Room.

And yet, on Monday the press secretaries showed up to find that a) the room was double-booked (though not occupied), and b) the chairs were all stacked in the back of the room rather than arrayed out like they were supposed to be, meaning the staffers had to move the chairs themselves.

To Republicans, the latest chapter of Chairgate was yet another example of the Democrats' inability to competently manage the House. "All they have to do is keep the trains running and they can't even do that," complained a GOP aide.

But according to a Democratic leadership aide, the whole affair was attributable to a computer error. The room reservation system is electronic, and apparently a group related to the Smithsonian Institution had applied to use the Cannon Caucus Room for the whole day and the computer granted the reservation without recognizing that the Republicans had a standing hold on the room at 1 p.m.

DOJ_NMG_0124063

The Democratic aide expressed relief that, despite the electronic mix-up, the Republicans, who “showed their perseverance and ability to adapt to hard times, were still able to have the meeting.”

The Post-Katrina Drawing Board (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

After Hurricane Katrina in 2005, many business leaders complained that despite contributions of $1.2 billion in relief or services, too many efforts to help the U.S. disaster response were thwarted by red tape.

Truckloads of goods were turned back on the roads by police or the National Guard. Donations of vital telecommunications gear were delayed, although they could have provided critical phone and computer links in the early hours. Big retailers offered bottled water at low cost but had to sell to the government through approved contractors that charged taxpayers more.

Yesterday, Business Executives for National Security, a nonprofit, nonpartisan advisory group representing disaster-related industries, released "Getting Down to Business," a plan for public-private disaster coordination.

Among its recommendations:

Â· Add businesses to emergency operations centers run by states and big cities nationwide and make their involvement a condition for federal homeland security grants.

Â· Include businesses in emergency planning, training and exercises, and in the National Response Plan, the main blueprint for U.S. disaster response.

Â· Create business equivalents to Emergency Management Assistance Compacts, in which states around the country agree to help one another in a disaster.

Â· Overhaul the government's emergency logistics, purchasing and donations management practices into faster, ready-to-use packages.

Â· Rewrite the nation's disaster laws and the National Response Plan to include the private sector; tackle issues such as liability, medical and regulatory waivers; and make businesses eligible for federal aid when carrying out disaster responsibilities, such as providing security for emergency repairs.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Warns Iran Against Action In Iraq (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, January 30, 2007

President Bush said Monday the United States "will respond firmly" if Iran escalates military action in Iraq and endangers American forces. But Bush emphasized he has no intention of invading Iran.

Bush also acknowledged skepticism concerning U.S. intelligence about Iran, because Washington was wrong in accusing Iraq of harboring weapons of mass destruction before the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. "I'm like a lot of Americans that say, 'Well, if it wasn't right in Iraq, how do you know it's right in Iran,'" the president said.

The president, in an interview with NPR, said the United States was "constantly evaluating and answering this legitimate question by always working to get as good intelligence as we can."

Sharply at odds over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program, Washington and Tehran increasingly are arguing about Iraq, where both countries are seeking influence. The White House said last week that American troops in Iraq have been authorized to kill or capture Iranian agents deemed to be a threat. Iran's ambassador followed up by telling The New York Times that Tehran plans to greatly expand its economic and military ties with Iraq and open an Iranian national bank branch in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0124064

The United States accuses Iran of supplying terrorists and insurgents in Iraq with improvised explosive devices that have become the most lethal threat to U.S. forces. The Bush administration says it decided to take a tougher line with Tehran after months of evidence showing Iran was assisting anti-U.S. forces.

"If Iran escalates its military action in Iraq to the detriment of our troops and/or innocent Iraqi people, we will respond firmly," the president said. "It makes common sense for the commander in chief to say to our troops and the Iraqi people and the Iraqi government that we will help you defend yourself from people that want to sow discord and harm. And so we will do what it takes to protect our troops."

Bush said it was important to distinguish the nuclear standoff with Iran from the quarrel over Tehran's involvement in Iraq. He said he believed the dispute over Iran's nuclear program could be resolved diplomatically.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., has said Bush does not have authority to launch military action in Iran without first seeking congressional authorization.

Bush told NPR he had no intention of going into Iran. "This is the kind of thing that happens in Washington," the president said. "People ascribe, you know, motives to me beyond a simple statement — 'Of course we'll protect our troops.' I don't know how anybody can then say, 'Well, protecting the troops means that we're going to invade Iran.'"

Bush Warns Iran About Aggression In Iraq (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Asserting the right of the U.S. military inside Iraq to defend itself and Iraqis against threats from Tehran, President Bush vowed Monday that Iranian aggression inside Iraq would be met with American force.

At the same time, Bush asserted his determination to resolve what the U.S. sees as Iran's ambitions for nuclear weaponry through diplomatic channels.

With a two-track message of stern military warnings and promises of peaceful diplomacy, Bush is confronting an increasingly complicated conflict with the Iranian government.

"If Iran escalates its military action in Iraq to the detriment of our troops and or innocent Iraqi people, we will respond firmly," Bush said in an interview with National Public Radio. "We will do what it takes to protect our troops. It makes common sense for the commander in chief to say to our troops and the Iraqi people—and the Iraqi government—that we will help you defend yourself from people that want to sow discord and harm."

And , during an interview conducted in the Roosevelt Room of the White House, the president suggested that it is "very important ... not to mix issues" involving Iran.

One issue is Iran's nuclear ambitions, Bush said, insisting that he is confident in the power of diplomacy to resolve it. "The message that we are working to send to the Iranian regime and the Iranian people is that you will become increasingly isolated, if you continue to pursue a nuclear weapon," Bush said.

The other issue is Iran's support of insurgents inside Iraq as well as in other countries in the region, with the U.S. committed to blocking Iranian interference in Iraq.

The president repeatedly has asserted the right of U.S. forces to intervene in the Iranian shipment of weaponry into Iraq, with Bush blaming Iran for supporting radical Shiite groups that have formed death squads in Iraq. And the White House has authorized U.S. forces to stop Iranian forces inside Iraq.

But Bush insists he has no plans to invade Iran, despite worries voiced in Congress.

"I have no intent upon incur—going into Iran," Bush said. "I mean, this is the kind of thing that happens in Washington. People ascribe, you know, motives to me beyond a simple statement—of course we'll protect our troops. I don't know how anybody can then say, well, protecting the troops means that we're going to invade Iran."

Iran has confirmed that the U.S. detained two of its security officials last month, but says those officials, later released, were engaged in legitimate talks and should not have been detained. Iran also has announced plans to open branch banks and other economic ties with Iraq, according to a New York Times interview with the Iranian ambassador to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0124065

Kurt Campbell, director of the international security program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, sees Iran attempting to establish ties with Shiite leaders in Iraq.

"Most of the problems that we are experiencing in Iraq have to do with our failures and mistakes as opposed to some larger grand Iranian strategy to undermine us," Campbell said. "In many respects Iranians have stepped into a vacuum of American leadership as a whole."

At the same time, he suggested, Bush draws power from challenging conventional wisdom—"such as a larger force for Iraq ... and a more confrontational policy with Iran." With an escalating debate over the war in Congress, tough talk for Iran could help bring Republicans in line, Campbell said, while appealing to Democrats who oppose the war in Iraq but support a tough stance toward Iran.

The U.S. has deployed an additional aircraft carrier to the region, with the Bush administration maintaining that not only Iran, but also Lebanon and Israel, are concerned about Iranian-backed terrorists operating within their borders.

"Most of the nations in that part of the world believe their security is supported, if you will, by the United States," Vice President Dick Cheney said in an interview with Newsweek magazine. "They want us to have a major presence there. When we—as the president did, for example, recently—deploy another aircraft carrier task force to the [Persian] Gulf, that sends a very strong signal to everybody in the region that the United States is here to stay."

Cheney also voiced a warning about U.S. resolve in averting nuclear weaponry in Iran, echoing a caution that the president issued two years ago.

"The fact is, we are doing what we can to try to resolve issues such as the nuclear question diplomatically through the United Nations," Cheney said in the interview, "but we've also made it clear that we haven't taken any options off the table."

That was reminiscent of Bush, at a news conference with European leaders in Belgium in February 2005: "This notion that the United States is getting ready to attack Iran is simply ridiculous. Having said that, all options are on the table."

Now, with the Iranian government announcing intentions to build new economic ties with Iraq, the White House is watching that move as well, warily, but without warnings.

"We'll wait and see whether it's a positive development or not," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Monday. "We would certainly welcome Iran to start playing a constructive role in the region."

Bush Vows To Confound Iranian Operations In Iraq (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

President Bush yesterday said he doesn't intend to attack Iran but will "respond firmly" if Iranian agents inside Iraq escalate their attacks or supply materials used to attack U.S. troops or Iraqis.

"We will protect our interests in Iraq. That's what the American people expect us to do," Mr. Bush said in an interview with National Public Radio. "That's definitely what our troops want to do, and that's what the families of our troops want us to do. And if we find the Iranians are moving weapons that will end up harming American troops, we'll deal with it."

Shi'ite-controlled Iran is arguably the major international problem for Mr. Bush right now -- sharing a border with Iraq, being home to the same religious sect as the majority of Iraqis, and at the same time pursuing a nuclear program in defiance of its international commitments.

The president yesterday also accused Iran of being part of an effort to bring down Lebanon's government as well, saying it is working with Syria and the terrorist group Hezbollah.

"Their goals are clear," Mr. Bush said. "They foment violence."

Iran announced during the weekend that it will offer Iraq military assistance in the form of training, and also offer reconstruction assistance -- a move the White House was reluctant to characterize.

That followed news earlier this month that the United States was stepping up its efforts to try to prevent Iran from supplying materials to insurgents -- a charge the White House has made before.

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill are wary of the White House's tone, fearing it is the first step toward military action against Iran. Top Democrats have said Mr. Bush will have to come seek congressional authority if he wants to expand the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0124066

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush is trying to shore up support for his new plan to secure Iraq, which includes sending 4,000 Marines to Anbar Province to fight al Qaeda and more than 17,000 soldiers to Baghdad to help Iraqi troops restore order in the middle of Sunni-Shi'ite sectarian fighting.

He told NPR that senators would be sending mixed messages if they vote for a resolution opposing the troop increase because those lawmakers voted just last week in favor of a new military commander who says the troops are needed.

"It is ironic that the Senate would vote 81 to nothing to send a general into Iraq who believes he needs more troops to do the job and then send a contradictory message," the president said, referring to Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who the Senate confirmed last week to become commander of Multinational Force Iraq.

Bush Warns Iran, Syria, Hezbollah On Lebanon (AFP)

AFP, January 30, 2007

US President George W. Bush deplored recent violence in Lebanon and warned that Iran, Syria and Hezbollah must be "called to account" for trying to destabilize that country.

"While Lebanon's friends seek to help the Lebanese government build a free, sovereign, and prosperous country, Syria, Iran and Hezbollah are working to destabilize Lebanese society," Bush said in a statement.

"All those who seek a peaceful, constitutional solution to the crisis in Lebanon deserve the support of the international community, but those responsible for creating chaos must be called to account," he said.

Four people were killed and 152 injured Thursday in clashes between Sunni and Shiite Muslims apparently triggered by a row in a cafeteria at Beirut's Arab University between government supporters and opponents.

"I am deeply disappointed by the recent violence and bloodshed on the streets of Lebanon. It is all the more troubling that the violence occurred while Lebanon's legitimate leaders and friends were gathered together in Paris to help secure a peaceful and prosperous future for the country," said Bush.

The United States has pledged 770 million dollars in new aid to Lebanon as part of a major international drive to rebuild the country and bolster the embattled pro-Western government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora.

"This is a strong symbol of the American people's support for and commitment to the future of Lebanon," said Bush, who had tough words for Damascus, Tehran, and the militant Shiite movement Hezbollah.

Bush said they sought to derail the creation of the international tribunal to try suspects in the murder of Lebanon's former premier Rafiq Hariri and stall Hezbollah's disarmament as called for by the UN Security Council.

"Their goals are clear. They foment violence in order to prevent the establishment of a Special Tribunal in response to former Prime Minister Hariri's assassination, to prevent full implementation of UN Security Council resolutions calling for Hezbollah's disarmament, and to bring down Lebanon's democratically elected government," said Bush.

How The 'Axis' Seeks The Killer Missile (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

North Korea and Iran are cooperating in developing long-range missiles, the deputy director of the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency said yesterday.

Army Brig. Gen. Patrick O'Reilly said during a speech that North Korea test fired a long-range Taepodong missile in July, and Iran is working on a space launcher that would help develop an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) that could hit the U.S.

"Not only North Korea, but Iran has shown some significant developments in their [own] missile systems," Gen. O'Reilly said in a speech to the George C. Marshall Institute.

"They are working in concert with the North Koreans," he said. "They have made a claim that they are working towards developing a space launch capability, which also would give them an ICBM capability."

The Pentagon believes Iran has a "new intermediate-range ballistic missile or space launch vehicle [SLV] in development," a Missile Defense Agency briefing slide stated.

DOJ_NMG_0124067

The Iranians are "likely to develop an ICBM/SLV [and] could have an ICBM capable of reaching the U.S. before 2015," according to the briefing chart.

One of the new missiles would be solid-fueled, making it capable of being launched rapidly, and have a range of 1,240 miles, enough to hit targets throughout Europe from Iran.

The speech marked the first time the Pentagon publicly disclosed the missile cooperation between Pyongyang and Tehran.

The North Koreans test fired a Taepodong-2 on July 4 but the missile failed 40 seconds after launch, Gen. O'Reilly said. The two-stage version has a range of 6,200 miles and the three-stage version can travel 9,300 miles.

"But the indications are clear that they are continuing to strive to expand their ballistic missile capability," he said.

The U.S. missile defense system was made operational before the North Korean tests and the forces involved "performed very well," Gen. O'Reilly said. Another briefing chart used during the speech stated that if the Taepodong-2 had threatened the United States, "we are confident the ballistic missile defense system would have operated as designed."

Another briefing chart revealed for the first time that North Korea is developing a new intermediate-range missile with a range of about 2,000 miles that was described as "a qualitative improvement in performance" from earlier missile systems. North Korea's July tests -- seven missiles were fired -- included two 806-mile range Nodong missiles, he said.

Gen. O'Reilly said the U.S. missile defense system, which includes a network of long-, medium- and short-range interceptors and sensors, is designed to counter missiles from "rogue states" targeted at the U.S., its allies and forces overseas.

The system can defend against short-range Iranian missile attacks against Saudi Arabia and North Korean strikes on Japan, as well as an Iranian missile strike on London or North Korean missile attacks on the United States, an MDA briefing slide stated.

North Korea uses its missiles as "geopolitical leverage" over the United States and its allies and also to raise money by selling them abroad, Gen. O'Reilly said. Iran is building missiles for "both asymmetric threats and conventional threats" to U.S. and allied forces, he noted.

Gen. O'Reilly also stated that Hezbollah's short-range rockets and missiles, used in last year's fighting in Lebanon, were a threat to Israeli forces and that more than 4,500 were fired.

"They had small ball bearings, about 300, in their warhead, and they were very effective at shutting down a lot of the maneuvering capability of the Israeli army and also shutting down over 70 percent of the commerce in northern Israel during that period of time," he said. "And that was significant from both non-state actors and other countries that have committed to using rockets as terror weapons."

Asked whether the Pentagon can counter China's anti-satellite weapon, which was tested recently, Gen. O'Reilly said countering space weapons currently is not a mission for the Missile Defense Agency but could be done.

"We have tremendous kinematic capability with our missiles; we have the sensors and the battle management, so that work would be straightforward if we were ... given that guidance and mandate to do," he said.

The Pentagon also is developing a "multiple kill vehicle" that will greatly boost the power of current interceptors by adding more non-explosive warheads that can hit 10 or more enemy warheads from a single booster, he said.

The current missile interceptors deployed at Fort Greely in Alaska and Vandenberg Air Force Base in California can protect the United States from North Korean missiles and afford "partial protection" from Middle Eastern missiles. Upgraded defenses will provide full defense from both North Korean and Middle Eastern missiles, Gen. O'Reilly said.

By 2011, the Pentagon plans to have up to 44 interceptors deployed in the United States and the first 10 interceptors in Europe; a large radar in Europe; 18 Aegis missile defense ships; 48 ground-based THAAD interceptors; two new surveillance and tracking satellites; and a battle management and integrated global fire system for the Middle East and Southwest Asian missile threats.

With Iran Ascendant, U.S. Is Seen At Fault (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124068

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates -- Kuwait rarely rebuffs its ally, the United States, partly out of gratitude for the 1991 Persian Gulf War. But in October it reneged on a pledge to send three military observers to an American-led naval exercise in the Gulf, according to U.S. officials and Kuwaiti analysts.

"We understood," a State Department official said. "The Kuwaitis were being careful not to antagonize the Iranians."

Four years after the United States invaded Iraq, in part to transform the Middle East, Iran is ascendant, many in the region view the Americans in retreat, and Arab countries, their own feelings of weakness accentuated, are awash in sharpening sectarian currents that many blame the United States for exacerbating.

Iran has deepened its relationship with Palestinian Islamic groups, assuming a financial role once filled by Gulf Arab states, in moves it sees as defensive and the United States views as aggressive. In Lebanon and Iraq, Iran is fighting proxy battles against the United States with funds, arms and ideology. And in the vacuum created by the U.S. overthrow of Iranian foes in Afghanistan and Iraq, it is exerting a power and prestige that recalls the heady days of the 1979 Islamic revolution, when Iranian clerics led the toppling of a U.S.-backed government.

"The United States is the first to be blamed for the rise of Iranian influence in the Middle East," said Khaled al-Dakhil, a Saudi writer and academic. "There is one thing important about the ascendance of Iran here. It does not reflect a real change in Iranian capabilities, economic or political. It's more a reflection of the failures on the part of the U.S. and its Arab allies in the region."

Added Eyal Zisser, head of the Middle Eastern and African Studies Department at Tel Aviv University in Israel: "After the whole investment in democracy in the region, the West is losing, and Iran is winning."

The United States has signaled a more aggressive posture toward Iran. President Bush on Friday defended a Pentagon program to kill or capture Iranian operatives in Iraq. Vice President Cheney, in a Newsweek interview published Sunday, said the deployment of a second U.S. aircraft carrier task force to the Persian Gulf was intended to signal to the region that the United States is "working with friends and allies as well as the international organizations to deal with the Iranian threat."

And John D. Negroponte, outgoing director of national intelligence, told Congress this month that Iran's influence is growing across the region "in ways that go beyond the menace of its nuclear program."Widespread Support

Iranian officials -- emboldened but uneasy over nuclear-armed neighbors in Israel and Pakistan and a U.S. military presence in the Gulf, Iraq and Afghanistan -- have warned that they would respond to an American attack on Iran's facilities.

"Iran's supporters are widespread -- they're in Iraq, they're in Afghanistan, they're everywhere. And you know, the American soldiers in the Middle East are hostages of Iran, in the situation where a war is imposed on it. They're literally in the hands of the Iranians," said Najaf Ali Mirzai, a former Iranian diplomat in Beirut who heads the Civilization Center for Iranian-Arab Studies. "The Iranians can target them wherever, and Patriot missiles aren't going to defend them and neither is anything else."

"Iran would suffer," he added, "but America would suffer more."

As that struggle deepens, many in the Arab world find themselves on the sidelines. They are increasingly anxious over worsening tension between Sunni and Shiite Muslims across the Middle East, even as some accuse the United States of stoking that tension as a way to counter predominantly Shiite Iran. Fear of Iranian dominance is coupled, sometimes in the same conversation, with suspicion of U.S. intentions in confronting Iran.

"It was necessary to create an enemy to justify the failure of the American occupation in Iraq," Talal Salman, the editor-in-chief of as-Safir, a Lebanese newspaper, wrote in a column this month. "So to protect ourselves against the coming of the wolf, we bring the foreign fleets that fill our lands, skies and seas."

Iranian rivalry with its Sunni Arab neighbors is centuries old, but as with most conflicts in the Middle East, its modern contours are shaped by politics and interests.

Iran has found itself strengthened almost by default, first with the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan to Iran's east, which ousted the Taliban rulers against whom it almost went to war in the 1990s, and then to its west, with the American ouster of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, against whom it fought an eight-year war in the 1980s.

Arab rulers allied with the United States issued stark warnings. Jordan's King Abdullah in 2005 spoke darkly of a Shiite crescent that would stretch from Iran, through Iraq's Shiite Arab majority, to Lebanon, where Shiites make up the largest single community. President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt suggested last year that Shiites in the Arab world were more loyal to Iran than to their own countries. And in a rare interview, published Saturday, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia suggested that Iran, although he did not name the country, was trying to convert Sunni Arabs to Shiism. "The majority of Sunni Muslims will never change their faith," he told al-Siyassah, a Kuwaiti newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0124069

Across the region, Iran has begun to exert influence on fronts as diverse as its allies: the formerly exiled Shiite parties in Iraq and their militias; Hezbollah, a Lebanese group formed with Iranian patronage after Israel's 1982 invasion; and the cash-strapped Sunni Muslim movement of Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

"I disagree with Iranian policy, but you have to give the Iranians credit," said Abdullah al-Shayji, a political science professor and head of Kuwait University's American Studies Unit. "You have to appreciate that they have an agenda, they're planning for it, they seize the opportunity, they see an American weakness and they are capitalizing on it."A Helping Hand

In Beirut's southern suburbs, a Hezbollah stronghold, a banner hangs near a bridge wrecked by Israeli strikes last summer: "The Zionist enemy destroys, the Islamic Republic of Iran builds." Even before the 33-day war ended, Iran had provided Hezbollah with $150 million to begin rebuilding, some of it going to victims in $10,000 bundles of crisp U.S. currency, according to a Shiite politician who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"You want me to give you my opinion? Honestly?" asked Hajj Hassan Sbeiti, a 44-year-old merchant, his face breaking into a wry smile. "If you say hello to me, you probably like me. If you say hello to me and ask what I need, you're a friend. If you say hello to me, ask what I need and put money in my hand, then you're going to be my brother."

In Iraq, U.S. officials say Iran is providing Shiite militias with sophisticated projectiles capable of penetrating U.S. armored vehicles and backing those forces in a gathering civil war against Sunni Arabs. One commander of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia that U.S. military officials now identify as the greatest security threat in Iraq, said that however much he might dislike Iran, he was eagerly anticipating the delivery of 50 rocket-propelled grenades to Basra.

But no less influential are the ties that Iran has deepened with the three main Shiite groups in Iraq, some of whose leaders spent years in exile in Iran and are now nominally allied with the United States, and the burgeoning economic relationship between the two countries.

The extent of Iran's engagement in the Arab world, and the rising sectarianism that has accompanied the Iranian ascendance, troubles Arabs who already worry about growing tension between the United States and Iran.

"If Iran is bombed, Iran's reaction is a sure thing. They cannot sit idle, and what kind of reaction they will take is a big question," said Abbas Bolurfrushan, the president of the Iranian Business Council in Dubai, a booming city-state on the Gulf that is part of the United Arab Emirates, where an estimated 400,000 Iranians live and work.

The result? "A disaster," he said. "Disaster."'Defensive' Alliance

Mirzai, the former Iranian diplomat, offered a similar scenario in more threatening terms. Wearing a white turban and the robes of a cleric, he sketched out potential Iranian responses: cutting the Strait of Hormuz in the Persian Gulf, through which 20 percent of the world's oil passes; retaliation in Iraq, Afghanistan or Lebanon; attacks on U.S. targets in the Gulf.

"There is a policy the Iranians have and they've repeated it often -- the Gulf is either safe for everyone or no one," he said.

In an attempt to contest Iran's influence, the United States has sought to form an axis among Sunni Arab states it considers moderate: Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and smaller countries in the Gulf. Israeli officials have spoken about a possible alignment of their country's interests with those states to arrest both Iran's influence and its nuclear program.

In November, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said he would try to deepen ties with those states, some of which have yet to recognize Israel, in what Israeli analysts saw as an opening bid to create an anti-Iranian bloc.

But Zisser, of Tel Aviv University, cautioned that "all of these countries are not very strong, and they have their own problems."

"Iran's threat could do something to bring them together, but I would say that any alliance that comes out of it would be defensive in nature," he said. "These countries are not going to be able to unite in any way that would meaningfully change the face of the Middle East."

Potentially more far-reaching is the sectarian tension that the struggle has ignited. In the Palestinian territories, Israeli officials say, Iran has been increasingly successful in influencing the chaotic political situation, particularly by funding the Hamas-led government.

DOJ_NMG_0124070

The connection has not gone unnoticed in the Palestinian street. At two rallies this month for Fatah, the movement led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, crowds directed chants at Hamas, a Sunni Arab group. "Shiites, Shiites," they shouted.

Across the Middle East, once antiquated words have sprung up in conversations about Shiites -- Safawis, for instance, drawn from the name of a Persian empire that brought Shiism to Iran. In Lebanon, posters have gone up in Sunni neighborhoods portraying leaders united by little other than their Sunni sectarian affiliation: Saddam Hussein, Yasser Arafat, Rafiq al-Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister killed in a 2005 car bombing, and Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the leader of Hamas who was assassinated by Israel in 2004.

"You are in heaven," the poster reads, "and those who killed you will go to hell."

Iranian officials have repeatedly warned against the phenomenon, fearing it will curb their leverage in an Arab street that remains majority Sunni. Many in the Arab world watch its gathering force with a sense of helplessness.

"It's very bleak and it's very dangerous," said Dakhil, the Saudi writer. "We have a sectarian civil war in Iraq now and this is drawing sectarian lines through the region. This is the most important, the most dangerous ramification of the American war in Iraq."

US Ally And Foe Are Trying To Avert War In Lebanon (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 29 — In an unusual collaboration that could complicate American policy in the region, Iran and Saudi Arabia have been mediating an agreement to end Lebanon's violent political crisis.

Leaders of Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed party trying to overthrow Lebanon's government, have recently visited the Saudi king in Riyadh, according to officials who attended the meeting. And Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi chief security adviser, has met with his Iranian counterpart, Ali Larijani, in Riyadh and Tehran to try to stop Lebanon's slide into civil war.

"The only hope is for the Iranians and Saudis to go further in easing the situation and bringing people back to the negotiating table," said Radwan Sayyed, an adviser to Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

The Saudi-Iranian efforts have put Washington in an awkward position, since it is trying to reduce Iran's regional influence. But since a stable Lebanon is also an American priority, American officials have watched the efforts without interfering.

There is a belief in Lebanon that if the Saudi-Iranian effort succeeds, the result will be short term. There remains fear that Syria, which retains influence with Hezbollah and within Lebanon's security services, will work to scuttle any deal.

But Iran seems to be working in earnest. Members of Lebanon's governing party say the dynamics inside Iran, where the firebrand president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, appears to be losing political strength, have led Tehran to lean on Hezbollah.

One question is whether Hezbollah will do what Iran wants or will bend to the Syrians. Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, said in a speech last week that an agreement "between two countries or two governments does not bind the Lebanese, because the Lebanese must seek their own interests and not the interests of Saudi Arabia and Iran."

It has been nearly three months since Hezbollah began leading street protests aimed at bringing down the American-backed government here, and Lebanese political leaders have failed to agree even on the framework for talks.

There have been no direct meetings between the main political leaders in months. Many say they fear even more bloodshed if a deal is not struck by Feb. 14, the second anniversary of the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

The governing coalition plans to mark the anniversary with large street rallies at Mr. Hariri's grave site in the center of town. Those demonstrators would be separated by a few feet from the hundreds of opposition supporters who have camped out for nearly three months in their effort to bring down the government.

Allies of Syria in the opposition have scolded the government for backing the creation of an international tribunal to hear evidence in the assassination of Mr. Hariri and other political killings. Syria has been implicated in the killing by a United Nations investigation, and one of its allies in the opposition says that if the government backs down on the tribunal, the crisis would ease.

DOJ_NMG_0124071

But the fight is also over who will be the next president, whether Hezbollah will be allowed to keep its weapons, how to rewrite the nation's electoral laws, whether United Nations troops will remain on the southern border with Israel and, more fundamentally, whether Lebanon will lean toward the United States and Europe or Iran and Syria.

There have been proposals that each side has presented as compromises only to be rejected by the other as insufficient.

"It is true, whoever governs will decide Lebanon's political direction," said Muhammad Fniesh, a senior member of Hezbollah who said he recently attended a meeting with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia.

Iran and Saudi Arabia have been involved in Lebanese affairs for decades. Saudi Arabia has close ties with the Hariri family and has invested large sums of money rebuilding Beirut. Recently, as Iranianbacked parties have taken over in Iraq and as Iran has tried to establish itself as the regional superpower, Saudi Arabia has begun, at American urging, to press back.

Seeking to fill the vacuum left by Egypt, whose regional influence has diminished, Saudi Arabia has tried to position itself as an Arab counterpoint to Iran.

But in Lebanon, political leaders and diplomats said, both see a common interest in calming sectarian tensions, at least for now. The fight has effectively divided the country between the predominantly Shiite Muslim opposition and the predominantly Sunni Muslim governing alliance. Lebanon's Christian community is divided between the two.

The eagerness to look beyond Beirut for a solution comes as Western diplomats here say they fear that local leaders have abrogated their responsibility to foreign powers. Even Lebanese leaders say internal talks are going nowhere.

"Nothing much is moving," said Ali Hamdan, an adviser to Nabih Berri, the speaker of Parliament and leader of Amal, a Shiite party in the opposition. "It is as if we are moving backwards."

Most agree that if there has been any major movement in resolving — or defusing — Lebanon's political crisis, it has more to do with the changing political dynamics elsewhere. "Saudi Arabia and Iran are near an agreement," said Toufic Sultan, a former leader in the main government-aligned Druse party who has maintained close ties to Saudi officials.

Already reeling from the chaos and sectarian strife in Iraq, governments around the region are worried that Lebanon, too, is on the brink of breaking apart along sectarian lines.

Embassy Row (WT)

By James Morrison

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

New Saudi envoy

Adel al-Jubeir, the urbane public face of the Saudi monarchy who is also well-connected in Washington, was yesterday named the new ambassador to the United States from the oil-rich desert kingdom.

King Abdullah issued a decree appointing Mr. al-Jubeir and accepting the surprise resignation of Prince Turki al-Faisal, who stepped down last month after about a year as ambassador here.

Mr. al-Jubeir, 44, is not a member of the Saudi royal family, but he has powerful relations with the monarchy, having served as King Abdullah's foreign policy adviser since 2000 when the king was crown prince and as a spokesman for Prince Bandar bin Sultan, who served 22 years as ambassador to the United States. Mr. al-Jubeir's brother, Nail, now holds the post of the embassy's chief spokesman.

The new ambassador was educated in the United States, earning a bachelor's degree from the University of North Texas and a master's degree in political science from Georgetown University.

Mr. al-Jubeir first appeared as a spokesman for the Saudi government during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, which forced Saddam Hussein to retreat from Kuwait, and in 2002 endured intense press scrutiny as he defended Saudi Arabia after the September 11 attacks in the United States. Fifteen of the 19 suicide hijackers were Saudi subjects.

While at the embassy, Mr. al-Jubeir was featured in gossip columns for dating NBC News anchor Campbell Brown.

Mr. al-Jubeir, who is expected to take up his position next month, displayed his skills as a communicator and a diplomat at a press conference in April 2005, after King Abdullah, then crown prince, met with President Bush at his ranch in Crawford, Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0124072

"Our two countries ... have seen the coming and breaking of many storms," Mr. al-Jubeir told reporters. "The relationship has been steadfast, and it's grown with every decade, irrespective of who the president of the United States is."

He assured the press of Saudi Arabia's commitment to the war on terrorism and cited the kingdom as a reliable source of oil for the United States.

"Our countries are facing many challenges, whether it is the war on terrorism where we face the common enemy of al Qaeda; whether it is trying to broaden and deepen economic ties," he said.

Tough talking

John R. Bolton, the straight-talking former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, dropped diplomatic niceties in an interview with a French newspaper, calling for the replacement of the Iranian government, criticizing some U.S. moves in Iraq and fretting about the U.S. troop surge.

He told Le Monde, in the interview published yesterday, that the U.N. Security Council passed a toothless resolution that gave Iran until Feb. 23 to respond to demands that it cease its nuclear weapons program. Mr. Bolton blamed Russia for gutting an earlier draft of the resolution to the point where it "does not have great effectiveness."

"The negotiations have failed," he said, adding that the only way to deal with the Iranian regime is to "isolate them on the international level."

"In the long run -- and I hope not the very long run -- the only true solution is regime change," Mr. Bolton said.

He criticized the Bush administration's early administrative control over Iraq through the Coalition Provisional Authority, which, he said, deprived the Iraqis of "political responsibilities."

"It gave the terrorists and the remainders of [Saddam Hussein's] Ba'ath Party a chance to gather," he said.

Mr. Bolton supported Mr. Bush's troop surge but called it "the best of a series of bad options." He warned that a premature withdrawal of U.S. troops would be seen as a sign of weakness in the Middle East.

"It is necessary to avoid another version of the Vietnam syndrome, " he said.

Europe Resists US On Curbing Ties With Iran (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — European governments are resisting Bush administration demands that they curtail support for exports to Iran and that they block transactions and freeze assets of some Iranian companies, officials on both sides say. The resistance threatens to open a new rift between Europe and the United States over Iran.

Administration officials say a new American drive to reduce exports to Iran and cut off its financial transactions is intended to further isolate Iran commercially amid the first signs that global pressure has hurt Iran's oil production and its economy. There are also reports of rising political dissent in Iran.

In December, Iran's refusal to give up its nuclear program led the United Nations Security Council to impose economic sanctions. Iran's rebuff is based on its contention that its nuclear program is civilian in nature, while the United States and other countries believe Iran plans to make weapons.

At issue now is how the resolution is to be carried out, with Europeans resisting American appeals for quick action, citing technical and political problems related to the heavy European economic ties to Iran and its oil industry.

"We are telling the Europeans that they need to go way beyond what they've done to maximize pressure on Iran," said a senior administration official. "The European response on the economic side has been pretty weak." The American demands and European responses were provided by 10 different officials, including both supporters and critics of the American approach.

One irony of the latest pressure, European and American officials say, is that on their own, many European banks have begun to cut back their transactions with Iran, partly because of a Treasury Department ban on using dollars in deals involving two leading Iranian banks.

American pressure on European governments, as opposed to banks, has been less successful, administration and European officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0124073

The main targets are Italy, Germany, France, Spain, Austria, the Netherlands, Sweden and Britain, all with extensive business dealings with Iran, particularly in energy. Administration officials say, however, that Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany, the current head of the European Union, has been responsive.

Europe has more commercial and economic ties with Iran than does the United States, which severed relations with Iran after the revolution and seizure of hostages in 1979.

The administration says that European governments provided $18 billion in government loan guarantees for Iran in 2005. The numbers have gone down in the last year, but not by much, American and European officials say.

American officials say that European governments may have facilitated illicit business and that European governments must do more to stop such transactions. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has said the United States has shared with Europeans the names of at least 30 front companies involved in terrorism or weapons programs.

"They've told us they don't have the tools," said a senior American official. "Our answer is: get them."

"We want to squeeze the Iranians," said a European official. "But there are varying degrees of political will in Europe about turning the thumbscrews. It's not straightforward for the European Union to do what the United States wants."

Another European official said: "We are going to be very cautious about what the Treasury Department wants us to do. We can see that banks are slowing their business with Iran. But because there are huge European business interests involved, we have to be very careful."

European officials argue that beyond the political and business interests in Europe are legal problems, because European governments lack the tools used by the Treasury Department under various American statutes to freeze assets or block transactions based on secret intelligence information.

A week ago, on Jan. 22, European foreign ministers met in Brussels and adopted a measure that might lead to laws similar to the economic sanctions, laws and presidential directives used in the United States, various officials say. But it is not clear how far those laws will reach once they are adopted.

The American effort to press Iran economically is of a piece with its other forms of pressure on Iran, including the arrest of Iranian operatives in Iraq and sending American naval vessels to the Persian Gulf.

American officials refuse to rule out military action. On Monday, President Bush said in an interview with National Public Radio that the United States would "respond firmly" if Iran engages in violence in Iraq, but that he did not mean "that we're going to invade Iran."

Several European officials said in interviews that they believe that the United States and Saudi Arabia have an unwritten deal to keep oil production up, and prices down, to further squeeze Iran, which is dependent on oil for its economic solvency. No official has confirmed that such a deal exists.

The Bush administration has called on Europe to do more economically as part of a two-year-old trans-Atlantic agreement in which the United States agreed to support European efforts to negotiate a resolution of the crisis over Iran's nuclear program.

Typically, American officials say, European companies that do business with Iran get loans from European banks and then get European government guarantees for the loans on the ground that such transactions are risky in nature.

According to a document used in the discussions between Europe and the United States, which cites the International Union of Credit and Investment Insurers, the largest providers of such credits in Europe in 2005 were Italy, at $6.2 billion; Germany, at $5.4 billion; France, at $1.4 billion; and Spain and Austria, at $1 billion each.

In addition to buying oil from Iran, European countries export machinery, industrial equipment and commodities, which they say have no military application. Europeans also say that courts have overturned past efforts to stop business dealings based on secret information.

At least five Iranian banks have branches in Europe that have engaged in transactions with European banks, American and European officials say.

The five include Bank Saderat, cited last year by the United States as being involved in financing terrorism by Hezbollah and others, and Bank Sepah, cited this month as involved in ballistic missile programs.

DOJ_NMG_0124074

A directory of the American Bankers Association lists Bank Sepah as having $10 billion in assets and equity of $1 billion in 2004. It has branches in Frankfurt, Paris, London and Rome. The United States Embassy in Rome has called it the preferred bank of Iran's ballistic missile program, with a record of transactions involving Italian and other banks.

Bank Saderat had assets of $18 billion and equity of $1 billion in 2004, according to the American Bankers directory. Three other Iranian banks — Bank Mellat, Bank Melli and Bank Tejarat — have not been cited as involved in any illicit activities, but many European officials say they expect the Treasury Department to move against them eventually.

European officials say that the European Commission will meet in mid-February and approve a measure paving the way for freezing assets and blocking bank transactions for the 10 Iranian companies and 12 individuals cited in an appendix of Security Council Resolution 1737, adopted in December.

Shell Iran Plan Will Come Under US Scrutiny (FT)

By Ed Crooks

Financial Times, January 30, 2007

The US authorities will "take a look at" a controversial agreement signed over the weekend by Royal Dutch Shell that could ultimately lead to a multi-billion dollar investment in Iran, a US State Department official said.

Shell and its partner Repsol of Spain have signed a service agreement, as reported in the Financial Times last week, with the Iranian government to continue work on developing blocks 13 and 14 of the giant South Pars gas field, in spite of mounting international pressure over the country's nuclear programme.

US legislation permits President George W. Bush to take action against non-US companies investing in Iran's energy sector. However, because of concerns over an extra-territorial trade dispute and the risk of further alienating allies, no foreign companies have been penalised to date under the Iran Libya Sanctions Act and the subsequent Iran Freedom Support Act.

The US, however, is tightening sanctions on Iranian institutions, and encouraging European governments to do the same.

Sean McCormack, a state department spokesman, said on Monday that US government lawyers and policymakers would take a look at the Shell deal, to see whether to take any action. "If there's an investment greater than a certain amount, as specified in US law, then our lawyers take a look at it and the policymakers take a look at it, and see if there's any further steps that we, as a government, take," he said.

Mr McCormack refused to speculate on what sanctions Repsol and Shell would face if they go through with the South Pars investment.

If the project goes ahead, it would involve a plant to produce liquefied natural gas to be sold in Europe and Asia. A final decision on whether to proceed is expected in the first quarter of next year.

The agreement does not put a figure on the value of the project. Shell and its partners are still working on cost estimates. But it was suggested in Iran at the weekend that it could be worth $10bn (£5bn).

Shell and Repsol would each have 25 per cent of the project, with the National Iranian Oil Company holding 50 per cent.

Iran holds the world's second largest gas reserves, after Russia. Phases 13 and 14 of South Pars are estimated to hold 27,700bn cu ft – enough to meet the world's demand for more than three months.

Shell on Monday also announced the sale of one of its US refineries and 250 petrol stations for $1.63bn, bringing to almost $10bn the amount it has raised from selling downstream assets in the past four years.

It has sold the refinery, south of Los Angeles, and petrol stations in the area to Tesoro, a Texas-based company that becomes the second-biggest refiner on the US west coast as a result of the deal.

Senator Targets Surplus Sales To Iran (AP)

By Sharon Theimer

AP, January 30, 2007

A Democratic senator wants to cut off all Pentagon sales of surplus F-14 parts, saying the military's marketing of the spares "defies common sense" in light of their importance to Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0124075

Sen. Ron Wyden's bill came in response to an investigation by The Associated Press that found weaknesses in surplus-sale security that allowed buyers for countries including Iran and China to surreptitiously obtain sensitive U.S. military equipment including Tomcat parts.

The Oregon Democrat's legislation would ban the Defense Department from selling surplus F-14 parts and prohibit buyers who have already acquired surplus Tomcat parts from exporting them. Wyden's bill, the Stop Arming Iran Act, is co-sponsored by the Senate's No. 2 lawmaker, Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois.

The surplus sales are one of the first national security issues to be addressed by the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

"It just defies common sense to be making this kind of equipment available to the Iranians with all that they have done that is against our interests," Wyden said Monday in an interview, adding that constituents brought up the surplus-sale security problems at his town-hall meetings over the past few days. "I just want to legislate this and cut it off permanently, once and for all."

The Tomcat is the fighter jet made famous in the 1986 Tom Cruise blockbuster movie, "Top Gun." The U.S. military retired its F-14s last fall. That leaves only Iran — which bought the fighter jet in the 1970s when it was a U.S. ally — flying the planes.

U.S. law enforcement officials believe Iran can produce only about 15 percent of the parts it needs for its Tomcats, making the Pentagon's surplus sales a valuable avenue for spares.

The Pentagon already plans to sell about 60 percent of the roughly 76,000 parts for the F-14, viewing them as general nuts-and-bolts-type aircraft hardware that can be sold safely to the public without restrictions.

Some of those spares from the newly retired fleet likely have already been sold, Jack Hooper, a Defense Logistics Agency spokesman, said Monday. The Defense Department plans to destroy about 10,000 other components it considers unique to the F-14.

The agency is reviewing 23,000 other parts it believes it can sell under existing law. But it said it will consider their potential value to Iran.

Those parts, of both military and commercial value, are of particular concern to Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials and the investigative arm of Congress, the Government Accountability Office. The GAO has conducted its own inquiry into surplus security and found loopholes. It wants assurances the parts won't be sold.

Wyden said his bill would cut off the sale of all surplus F-14 parts. The legislation includes all parts to cut off all opportunities for Iranian "fishing expeditions," spokeswoman Jennifer Hoelzer said, adding that GAO investigations have found valuable surplus accidentally getting included in boxes of what are supposed to be nuts-and-bolts-type hardware.

Wyden is confident he can get the bill through the Senate in the next few months. Wyden, a senior member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, also pledged greater Senate oversight of the surplus program.

Hooper declined to comment on the legislation.

"We're certainly not going to attempt to interfere whatsoever in the legislative process," Hooper said. The Defense Department maintains it has followed all procedures in selling its surplus.

The AP reported the Pentagon's F-14 part sales plans earlier this month. Its investigation found that in several cases, buyers for countries that included Iran and China took advantage of security flaws to buy sensitive surplus, including aircraft parts and missile components.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., has asked the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to investigate the surplus security weaknesses.

Iranian President's Setbacks Embolden His Domestic Critics (WSJ)

By Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

TEHRAN, Iran -- With another confrontational moment in Iran's nuclear standoff approaching next month, criticism of the country's president at home is increasing.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whose landslide victory in elections 18 months ago set the Iranian establishment reeling, suddenly faces a concerted effort by political foes to constrain both his populist economic policies and his public defiance of the West.

DOJ_NMG_0124076

Many of Tehran's elite politicians and even clerics have long harbored concerns about Mr. Ahmadinejad, who ascended to the country's top political post from outside the traditional ruling circles. But the immense popularity he generated among Iran's poor and working-class voters kept many of his critics from speaking out or openly moving against his policies.

He also appeared to have the backing of the most important figure in Iran's power structure, Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. But a round of elections late last year -- for local municipal and village leaders as well as an important national consultative body -- has undermined Mr. Ahmadinejad's political momentum and unleashed a flood of public criticism and moves to clip his wings. Candidates whom Mr. Ahmadinejad supported fared poorly in the elections, while key adversaries re-established themselves as fixtures of the political scene.

In Tehran's city council, from which Mr. Ahmadinejad launched his campaign for president two years ago, his supporters went from a majority to a handful of seats. Meanwhile, Hashemi Rafsanjani, whom Mr. Ahmadinejad defeated in the presidential election two years ago, dominated the voting for seats on the Assembly of Experts, the body charged with choosing a new Supreme Leader when the 67-year-old Mr. Khamenei steps down or dies.

Since those public votes, a drumbeat of criticism against Mr. Ahmadinejad's administration has emerged from within Iran's Parliament and among some senior regime officials. The president even found himself confronted by a crowd of jeering students during an appearance at a Tehran university campus, with a video of the incident distributed on the Internet3.

"The elections opened a space and legitimized criticism of him," said Nasser Hadian, a political-science professor at the University of Tehran. "There are going to be more attempts to contain him."

The poor showing by candidates associated with Mr. Ahmadinejad in local elections -- and the relatively better performance of reform candidates opposed to him -- resulted from the sort of strong turnout that generally favors reformers. The country's conservatives also failed to rally behind a single slate of candidates, as they did during the earlier presidential election. But high on many voters' minds is Iran's increasingly muddled economy.

The president won the election with vows to improve the living standards of Iranians. He has pursued a populist agenda, while traversing the nation to announce development initiatives. Rising spending, however, has sparked a bout of inflation, which officially is 15% but private economists say likely is far higher. After a speech introducing his annual budget -- which will push spending another 20% higher for the fiscal year beginning in March -- Mr. Ahmadinejad argued with several parliamentarians over the rising price of tomatoes.

While Mr. Ahmadinejad's appeal persists among his core supporters, they are among the hardest-hit by rising inflation, and some privately express doubts about his leadership.

"He looked like a decent person, one of us," says one 57-year-old man who works part time washing dishes in a restaurant in southern Tehran. "I voted for him, but I wouldn't again."

Meanwhile, Mr. Rafsanjani, a longtime regime power broker and president of the country during much of the early 1990s, is spearheading a tentative movement to rein in Mr. Ahmadinejad, particularly his proclamations about Iran's nuclear program and denunciations of Israel. A large group of parliamentarians, including many who once supported Mr. Ahmadinejad, recently met with Mr. Rafsanjani. The gathering was seen as an important indication that support for Mr. Ahmadinejad is eroding.

A key question is whether Mr. Khamenei will continue backing Mr. Ahmadinejad. While the Supreme Leader has vocally defended the president and largely embraced his confrontational approach toward the United Nations Security Council on the nuclear issue in, Mr. Khamenei has done little to stem criticism of Mr. Ahmadinejad. He also has held several meetings with Mr. Rafsanjani.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's standing with Mr. Khamenei, and the broader attempts to rein him in, could be important in the run-up to a Feb. 20 deadline for the Security Council resolution passed in December ordering Iran to stop its uranium-enrichment program. The U.S. and European countries say the program has violated international rules and is aimed at creating a nuclear weapon. Iran says the program is peaceful and hasn't violated international rules.

The resolution included a limited set of sanctions targeting officials and organizations accused of involvement in the nuclear program. European governments have joined with the U.S. to broaden and toughen those punishments. The U.S. is expected to push for harsher sanctions if Iran doesn't stop its enrichment program.

DOJ_NMG_0124077

Mr. Khamenei reiterated publicly recently that Iran wouldn't halt enrichment, but Mr. Ahmadinejad has been relatively quiet on the issue in public. Some European diplomats and Iranian analysts say Iran might agree to a temporary pause in the program after the country completes a research-level enrichment project in coming weeks, in an effort to keep the crisis from escalating further.

Missteps By Iraqi Forces In Battle Raise Questions (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 29 —Iraqi forces were surprised and nearly overwhelmed by the ferocity of an obscure renegade militia in a weekend battle near the holy city of Najaf and needed far more help from American forces than previously disclosed, American and Iraqi officials said Monday.

They said American ground troops — and not just air support as reported Sunday — were mobilized to help the Iraqi soldiers, who appeared to have dangerously underestimated the strength of the militia, which calls itself the Soldiers of Heaven and had amassed hundreds of heavily armed fighters.

Iraqi government officials said the group apparently was preparing to storm Najaf, a holy city dear to Shiite Islam, occupy the sacred Imam Ali mosque and assassinate the religious hierarchy there, including the revered leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, during a Shiite holiday when many pilgrims visit.

"This group had more capabilities than the government," said Abdul Hussein Abtan, the deputy governor of Najaf Province, at a news conference.

Only a month ago, in an elaborate handover ceremony, the American command transferred security authority over Najaf to the Iraqis. The Americans said at the time that they would remain available to assist the Iraqis in the event of a crisis.

The Iraqis and Americans eventually prevailed in the battle. But the Iraqi security forces' miscalculations about the group's strength and intentions raised troubling questions about their ability to recognize and deal with a threat.

The battle also brought into focus the reality that some of the power struggles in Iraq are among Shiites, not just between Shiites and Sunnis. The Soldiers of Heaven is considered to be at least partly or wholly run by Shiites.

Among the troubling questions raised is how hundreds of armed men were able to set up such an elaborate encampment, which Iraqi officials said included tunnels, trenches and a series of blockades, only 10 miles northeast of Najaf. After the fight was over, Iraqi officials said they discovered at least two antiaircraft weapons as well as 40 heavy machine guns.

The government knew that the Soldiers of Heaven had set up camp in the area, but officials said they thought they were there to worship together.

Mr. Abtan said the Iraqi forces later decided to move on the group because an informer said Sunday was "zero hour" and the government noticed more men streaming into the area.

"If this operation had succeeded, it would have been a chance of a lifetime for them," he said.

The Iraqis initially sent a battalion from their Eighth Army Division, along with police forces, but they were quickly overwhelmed, according to an Iraqi commander at the scene. The battalion began to retreat but was soon surrounded and pinned down, and had to call in American air support to keep the enemy from overrunning its position.

American Apache attack helicopters and F-16s, as well as British fighter jets, flew low over the farms where the enemy had set up its encampments and attacked, dropping 500-pound bombs on the encampments. The Iraqi forces were still unable to advance, and they called in support from both an elite Iraqi unit known as the Scorpion Brigade, which is based to the north in Hilla, and from American ground troops.

Around noon, elements of the American Fourth Brigade Combat Team, 25th Infantry Division were dispatched from near Baghdad.

After an American helicopter was shot down at 1:30 p.m., some of those soldiers helped secure the crash site and recover the bodies of the two American soldiers killed in the crash, according to a statement by the American military. Others joined in the effort to combat the renegade militia, the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0124078

A commander in the Scorpion Brigade said the combined American and Iraqi forces killed 470 people. He also said some of the dead Soldiers of Heaven fighters were found bound together at the ankles and suggested that the chains had probably been used to keep people from fleeing and to keep them moving as one unified group.

Government estimates of the number of fighters killed ranged from 120 to 400.

An Iraqi military official said at least 25 security force members were killed in the battle.

Iraqi officials said Monday that they had killed the leader of the militia in the weekend fighting, identifying him as a man who went by the name Ahmed Hassan al-Yamani, but whose real name was Diyah Abdul Zahraa Khadom.

However, a Shiite cleric who has had contact with the group said the real leader was Ahmad bin al-Hassan al-Basri. The cleric said he believed that Mr. Basri was alive and probably hiding near Karbala.

Mr. Basri, while unknown to the average Iraqi, is relatively well known among the clerical hierarchy in Najaf, according to several clerics interviewed for this article.

The clerics who were interviewed said that Mr. Basri was a student of Moktada al-Sadr's father, a revered cleric, and that Mr. Basri and the senior Mr. Sadr had a split in the early 1990s.

The governor of Najaf, Asad Abu Ghalal, in an interview on national television, said government intelligence officials told him that the Soldiers of Heaven have had ties with the government of Saddam Hussein as far back as 1993. He also said that the farmland where the militia had set up camp had been bought by a former Hussein loyalist, although he said that did not initially raise concerns about the group's intentions.

Government officials were quick to point the finger at Al Qaeda, alleging that it provided financing for the group. But numerous Shiite clerics, seeking anonymity for fear of contradicting the government, said it was highly unlikely that Al Qaeda, a Sunni group, would link up with a Shiite messianic group.

Officials in the Shiite-dominated government are loath to detail internal rivalries in their community, but in the past three years there have been several clashes between rival factions, and the deaths of two senior Shiite ayatollahs have been linked to internal struggles for dominance.

The often bloody internal rivalries have been overshadowed by the more overt Sunni-Shiite war being fought daily in Baghdad and in other mixed cities.

Iraq: Shiite Cult Behind Najaf Battle (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 30, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraq's military announced Monday that it killed the leader of a heavily armed cult of messianic Shiites called "Soldiers of Heaven" during a 24-hour gunbattle near Najaf.

The group planned to ambush Shiite clerics and worshipers at a religious festival in Najaf, about 100 miles south of Baghdad, said Maj. Gen. Othman al-Ghanemi, the Iraqi commander in charge of the region. Provincial councilmember Ahmed al-Fatlawi said the gunmen were allied with Sunni extremists and Saddam Hussein loyalists.

The U.S. military said Iraqi forces acted on a tip Sunday that gunmen were joining pilgrims headed to the Ashoura festival. It said U.S. air power was called in after the Iraqis faced fierce resistance. U.S. ground forces went in after a U.S. helicopter went down, killing two soldiers.

U.S. and British jets played a major role in the fighting, dropping 500-pound bombs on militant positions, but President Bush said the battle was an indication that Iraqi forces were starting to take control.

"My first reaction on this report … is that the Iraqis are beginning to show me something," Bush told National Public Radio on Monday.

The president also said the United States "will respond firmly" if Iran escalates military action in Iraq and endangers U.S. forces. On Sunday, Iran's ambassador to Iraq told The New York Times that Iran plans to expand its economic and military ties with Iraq.

Leader Of Shiite Religious Cult Killed By U.S., Iraqi Forces (LAT)

By Louise Roug And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124079

BAGHDAD — American and Iraqi forces killed the leader of a Shiite religious cult, known as the Heaven's Army, along with several hundred armed members who had planned to launch an attack in the holy city of Najaf, including against the country's most known religious leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraqi officials said today.

The gunmen planned to attack during ceremonies marking one of the holiest Shiite holidays, in the Islamic month of Muharram.

At least 600 cult members, hiding on the city's outskirts in palm date orchids, had been digging trenches and were planning to disguise themselves as pilgrims, Maj. Gen. Othman Ghanemi, the Iraqi commander who heads the Najaf region, told the Associated Press.

He said the gunmen planned to kill as many senior clerics as they could, including Sistani, apparently because they believed the violence would cause the Imam Mahdi, the last in the line of Shiite saints who disappeared more than 1,000 years ago, to reappear.

Iraqi authorities identified the leader of the fringe group as Dyaa Abdul Zahra, also known as Thamir Abu Gumar, who was said to be armed with two pistols when he was killed. At least 60 cult members were wounded and 120 were captured. The death toll ranged from 150 to 400, officials said.

In addition, about 500 automatics rifles were recovered during the raid, along with mortars, heavy machine guns and rockets, Ghanemi told the A.P.

The militant group's members included Shiite and Sunni extremists and foreign fighters, Najaf government officials said. They pitched a daylong battle against Iraqi and American troops, in which a U.S. helicopter crashed, killing two U.S. troops. In a separate attack, five teenage girls also were killed in a mortar attack at a Baghdad school, authorities said.

The cause of the helicopter crash near Najaf was unclear, but U.S. and Iraqi officials said there was ground fire before the craft went down, and witnesses said they saw it shot out of the sky. It was the third U.S. helicopter to go down in Iraq in eight days.

Three additional U.S. troops were reported killed Sunday.

Sunday's fighting near Najaf and elsewhere was extraordinary, even by Iraq's bloody standards, highlighting the challenge faced by U.S. and Iraqi forces, which are fighting a complex patchwork of elusive enemies, including Shiite militias and Sunni-led insurgents. The deaths outside Najaf would constitute the highest daily casualty toll inflicted by U.S. and Iraqi forces since U.S. troops arrived in Baghdad shortly after the March 2003 invasion.

Iraqi security forces took authority over Najaf's security about a month ago. Witnesses and security officials said Sunday that Iraqi forces were being defeated by the enigmatic, well-organized fighters until U.S. air support and U.S.-Iraqi ground troops arrived.

Shaky footage recorded by mobile telephone, broadcast on Iraqi television, showed Iraqi soldiers hunkered behind a berm as intense gunfire erupted and smoke rose in the distance.

Ali Nomas, an Iraqi security official in Najaf, said the leader of the hitherto unknown Heaven's Army had told followers that he was a missing son of the Imam Ali, the cousin and son-in-law of the prophet Muhammad. Ali's remains are entombed in Najaf.

"They believe that the Mahdi has called them to fight in Najaf," Nomas said, adding that fighters had converged on the Najaf area from other predominantly Shiite cities in Iraq.

He lamented that Iraq's death and destruction had convinced some Shiites that the end of days was coming.

"There's nothing bizarre left in Iraq anymore," Nomas said in a telephone interview. "We've seen the most incredible things."

Najaf Gov. Asad Abu Gulal said some of the fighters were members of Hussein's Baath Party.

Although they disagreed on the attackers' identity, Iraqi officials and witnesses offered similar accounts of events on the battlefield. Most of the fighting took place in farmland outside the city, which is home to Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, Sistani. Security forces cordoned off the ancient, labyrinthine city to prevent attacks on pilgrims, clergy and holy sites, the governor said.

The gunmen apparently planned to launch their attack today, but Iraqi security forces were tipped off Sunday night about their presence on nearby farms, Gulal said.

Iraqi security forces struck at dawn but were overwhelmed by the militants, who had dug trenches on farms. At least two Iraqi soldiers were killed in the initial fighting, a security official in Baghdad said.

DOJ_NMG_0124080

Iraqi forces then called in U.S. air support as well as the Scorpion Brigades, an Iraqi quick-reaction force based in a neighboring province.

Helicopters arrived, but after one was downed about 1:30 p.m., they were replaced by higher-flying jets, as American Humvees and armored vehicles rolled into the area.

Three more Iraqi soldiers were killed, as were at least 250 of the militants, according to several Iraqi officials. Those numbers could not be independently confirmed. By 4 p.m., the tide of the battle had shifted, but U.S. forces continued bombing into the night in an attempt to stamp out remnants of the militants, Iraqi officials and witnesses said.

Two U.S. soldiers and a Marine were killed in three separate attacks around Iraq on Saturday, the U.S. military said Sunday. The deaths brought the number of U.S. military personnel killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion to 3,080, according to icasualties.org.

Violence began early Sunday and continued throughout the day, including in the northern city of Kirkuk, where bombings killed 14 people, and Babil province, south of the capital, where mortar rounds killed 10 and five bodies were found in the Tigris River. A suspected Baath Party loyalist was assassinated in the southern city of Kut, and in the western city of Fallouja, a car bomb killed two and injured four.

Assailants in Baghdad targeted both Sunnis and Shiites. In a Sunni neighborhood in west Baghdad, mortar rounds hit a girls' secondary school, killing five students and wounding 21 others. In another western neighborhood, explosives hidden in a wooden cart killed four and injured 18, and an Industry Ministry advisor and his daughter were shot to death in a nearby area.

In a Shiite neighborhood on the east side of the Tigris, a bomb exploded on a bus, killing one and injuring five. Two other bombings killed seven and injured 35 people in Shiite neighborhoods.

Gunmen elsewhere in the capital killed a bank clerk in a car lot near her house. At least 54 bodies were found in various Baghdad neighborhoods, including a woman kidnapped two days ago, her family said.

Meanwhile, Iraqi officials in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad sacked 1,500 policemen, charging them with absenteeism and fleeing fighting. They also dismissed Baqubah Mayor Khalid Sanjary on suspicion of having ties to Sunni Arab rebels. The province is riddled with Al Qaeda in Iraq members as well as militiamen affiliated with Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Iraqis Describe Plot To Kill Shiite Clerics (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 29 -- A Shiite cult leader, who claimed to be a revered Muslim figure who vanished in the 10th century, was killed Sunday along with scores of fighters who were poised to attack a holy city in southern Iraq and assassinate the country's Shiite religious leadership, Iraqi officials said Monday.

Information about the scope of the fighters' encampment and their aspirations emerged as Iraqi and U.S. troops inspected the rural battleground and hauled out those captured and killed during the day-long siege that began Sunday.

The discovery of a heavily armed Shiite-led cult, intent on attacking venerated Shiite symbols and leaders, startled Iraqi security officials who were already contending with rival religious factions battling for supremacy in the country.

"This is a new step in the annals of terrorism," Iraq's minister of national security, Shirwan al-Wahli, said in an interview. Wahli said the fighters were led by a man known as the Judge of Heaven, who claimed to be a direct descendant of the prophet Muhammad's son-in-law, Ali. Wahli said the man also declared himself the Mahdi, the reappearance of the 12th imam, or leader of the faithful, who many Shiites believe vanished in the 10th century and whose return will mark an era of redemption and peace.

The cult leader killed Sunday probably sought to assassinate conservative Shiite religious leaders because they likely would have disputed his claim to be the Mahdi, said John O. Voll, a professor of Islamic studies at Georgetown University, in a telephone interview.

The most recent comparable event occurred in 1979 in Saudi Arabia, Voll said, when a man claiming to be the Mahdi took over the holy sanctuary in Mecca. He and his followers were killed.

DOJ_NMG_0124081

Wahli said the cult leader came from southern Iraq and had written a book laying out his "supernatural, unbelievable" ideas. Over a matter of months, he recruited the estimated 700 people, known as the Soldiers of Heaven, who lived in tents and huts on farmland near Zarqaa, about eight miles northeast of Najaf, Wahli said.

Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said the man's name was Samer Abu Kamar, but other Iraqi officials assigned him different names.

Iraqi officials said Monday that they had not finished removing explosives or counting casualties from the siege, and their estimates of the number of fighters killed ranged from 200 to more than 400. The U.S. military, which provided backup ground troops along with helicopter and fixed-wing aircraft support, said more than 100 fighters were captured. Two U.S. soldiers died when their helicopter crashed during the operation.

Wahli said the structure of the group was Shiite, but it involved Sunni fighters and "based on the level of training, support and financing, it obviously has received support from outside Iraq."

About 10 Iraqi soldiers and police officers also died in the battle, [a] news service cited Wahli as saying.

A Washington Post special correspondent who approached the farm where the fighters had hidden witnessed 10 ambulances travel into the encampment and saw Iraqi soldiers drive out corpses and lead away women and children among the captured.

Ayad Abu Gilel, the brother of the governor of Najaf, showed the correspondent a 53-minute videotape recorded inside the compound.

The footage showed a wide trench ringing the encampment and a series of tunnels or bunkers dug into earthen mounds to offer protection. The video showed at least eight vehicles mounted with antiaircraft machine guns. Dozens of dead bodies, some burned, could be seen lying amid mortars, AK-47 assault rifles, rocket-propelled grenades and other weaponry.

Iraqi and U.S. military officials characterized the attack as a positive signal that the Iraqi security forces were able to lead a major battle and were willing to target extremists from the same Muslim sect that runs the central government. The U.S. military handed over primary control of Najaf province to Iraqi security forces last month.

"This is a very clear message from the government that no one except the government carrying arms is acceptable, whether Shia or Sunni," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "It reveals the firm commitment of the prime minister that any outlaw will be dealt with very strongly."

According to a statement issued by the U.S. military, Iraqi army and police forces deployed to the area of the encampment following a tip that gunmen were moving toward Najaf among Shiite pilgrims traveling to observe the religious holiday of Ashura, which culminates Tuesday. More than 200 gunmen attacked the joint patrol using small arms, rocket-propelled grenades and hand grenades, the military said. U.S. ground troops and aircraft were called in for support.

"The aggressive manner in which the Iraqi soldiers performed north of [Najaf] going after the anti-Iraqi forces was impressive," said Col. Michael Garrett, commander of the 4th Brigade Combat Team (Airborne), 25th Infantry Division, in the statement.

During a news conference in Najaf, the deputy provincial governor, Abdul Hussein Abtan, said the fighters were able to amass the vehicles and weaponry under the pretext that they were moving building materials destined for the Najaf airport, which is under construction. He said the group surged in numbers over the past 10 days in preparation for attacks on pilgrims, shrines in Najaf and clerics on the last day of Ashura. Among the fighters captured or killed were two Egyptians, a Lebanese and a Sudanese, he said.

"There were extensive preparations, they were highly trained, and they fought in an orderly way," said Wahli. "Their leader kept insisting through a loudspeaker that they keep fighting, despite repeated attempts by the Iraqi security forces to get them to stop."

Elsewhere in Iraq, national police patrols found 47 bodies over the past day, including 43 from around Baghdad, said Maj. Gen. Sami Mahmoud of the Interior Ministry, who said all of the unidentified people were shot to death.

Also, an insurgent threw a hand grenade at an Iraqi police patrol in the Dora neighborhood of southern Baghdad, killing two policemen and wounding four others, Mahmoud said.

DOJ_NMG_0124082

A car bomb exploded in the northern city of Kirkuk targeting a Kurdish militia commander, killing one person and injuring seven others, said Brig. Gen. Turhan Yousif, the Kirkuk police chief.

Iraqis Thwart Plot To Kill Shi'ite Clergy (WT/AP)

By Kim Gamel

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's army announced yesterday that it had foiled a plot to kill leading Shi'ite clerics and killed the leader of a heavily armed band of messianic Shi'ites called "Soldiers of Heaven" during a fierce gunbattle near the southern city of Najaf.

Senior Iraqi security officers said that as part of the plot, three gunmen were captured in Najaf after they rented a hotel room in front of the office of Iraq's most senior Shi'ite spiritual leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, with plans to attack it.

The fierce 24-hour battle, which began Sunday, was ultimately won by Iraqi troops supported by U.S. and British jets and American ground forces, but the ability of a splinter group little known in Iraq to rally hundreds of heavily armed fighters was a reminder of the potential for chaos and havoc emerging seemingly out of nowhere.

Members of the group, which included women and children, planned to disguise themselves as pilgrims and kill as many leading clerics as possible, said Maj. Gen. Othman al-Ghanemi, the Iraqi commander in charge of the Najaf region.

The U.S. military said Iraqi security forces were sent to the area Sunday after receiving a tip that gunmen were joining pilgrims headed to Najaf for Ashoura, a commemoration of the seventh-century death of Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad. The major religious festival culminates today.

The gunmen had put up tents in fields lined with date palm groves surrounding Najaf, 100 miles south of the capital. They planned to begin their attack yesterday, when Ashoura celebrations would get under way, the Iraqi security officers told the Associated Press on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to disclose the information.

In the battle to foil the attack on the pilgrims, Iraqi and U.S. forces faced off against more than 200 gunmen with small-arms fire, rocket-propelled grenades and hand grenades, the U.S. military said. The battle occurred about 12 miles northeast of Najaf.

The American military said U.S. air power was called in after the Iraqis faced fierce resistance. American ground forces also were deployed after small-arms fire downed a U.S. helicopter, killing two soldiers.

U.S. and British jets played a major role in the fighting, dropping 500-pound bombs on the militants' positions, but President Bush said the battle was an indication that Iraqis were beginning to take control.

"My first reaction on this report from the battlefield is that the Iraqis are beginning to show me something," Mr. Bush told NPR yesterday.

The U.S. military said more than 100 gunmen were captured, but it did not say how many were killed. Iraqi defense officials said 200 militants were killed, 60 wounded and at least 120 captured.

"It seems most likely that this was Shi'ite-on-Shi'ite violence, with millenarian cultists making an attempt to march on Najaf during the chaos of the ritual season of Muharram," Juan Cole, an Islamic scholar at the University of Michigan, said on his Web site. "The dangers of Shi'ite-on-Shi'ite violence in Iraq are substantial, as this episode demonstrated."

But Iraqi officials said Sunni extremists and Saddam Hussein loyalists also helped the cult in their bid to ambush Shi'ite worshippers.

"We have information from our intelligence sources that indicated the leader of this group had links with the former regime elements since 1993," said Ahmed al-Fatlawi, a member of the Najaf provincial council.

Mr. al-Fatlawi said that in addition to Iraqi Shi'ites, the gunmen included Sunnis and foreigners. Other Najaf government officials said Afghans, Saudis and even a Sudanese were among the dead.

Gen. al-Ghanemi said the area where the men were staying was once run by Saddam's Al-Quds army, a military organization the dictator established in the 1990s. The ousted leader was executed last month.

Abdul Hussein Abtan, deputy governor of Najaf, told Iraqi state television that the group had developed a military structure, acquiring heavy arms and digging trenches.

DOJ_NMG_0124083

"What we want to know is where they bought all these weapons?" Gen. al-Ghanemi said, adding that the army seized about 500 automatic rifles in addition to mortars, heavy machine guns and Russian-made Katyusha rockets in what amounted to a major test for Iraq's new military as it works toward taking over responsibility for security from U.S.-led forces.

Gen. al-Ghanemi said the group is considered heretical by mainstream Shi'ite clerics and had been planning for months to attack Najaf during the Ashoura ceremonies.

Battle Suggests New Sectarian Divides In Iraq (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, January 30, 2007

CAIRO

What precisely happened near the Shiite shrine city of Najaf Sunday is still being sorted out, but it seems likely that at its root was an unusual new wrinkle in Iraqi violence: a Shiite plan to attack Shiites.

A battle that lasted for more than 12 hours in the nearby village of Zarqa ended with a US helicopter being shot down and a claim by local authorities that more than 200 militants were slain in the fighting. But who were the militants?

Though the majority Shiite province has a problem with assassinations and gangster-style extortion, Sunni Arab insurgents are rarely active there, and fighting on this scale had not been witnessed in the area for more than a year.

The incident is a reminder of the swirling agendas now at play in Iraq and the turbulent political waters US troops are wading into as more soldiers arrive and President Bush has vowed to stand by Shiite Islamist Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Religious ideologies and classic power plays are now converging in Iraq, leading to what at times seem to be multiple, parallel conflicts: Sunni Arab insurgents who want to establish an Islamic state fight US Marines in Anbar Province; death squads associated with militant Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr stalk the streets of Baghdad, targeting both Sunni and Shiite political rivals; mostly Sunni Arab nationalists with ties to Saddam Hussein's Baath party seek to oust US forces from the country.

Following Sunday's deadly battle, Najaf Governor Asaad Abu Khalil originally implied that the fighters were foreign Arabs of the sort usually associated with Al Qaeda and that their intention was to disrupt the religious festival of Ashura with plans to attack both pilgrims and senior ayatollahs in southern Iraqi city of Najaf, the principal seat of Shiite religious learning in Iraq.

But his office has since backed off from those claims, and it now appears the gunmen – who killed or wounded dozens of Iraqi soldiers in the fighting as well as killing the two pilots of the downed US helicopter – were Shiites motivated by extreme religious ideology.

The central Iraqi government says the fighters are members of a millenarian Shiite group called the Jund al-Sama, or Army of Heaven, and that they were plotting to kill the senior ayatollahs in Najaf, chief among them Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, to prepare the way for the Mahdi, a messiah figure for many Shiites.

They believe the Mahdi ascended to heaven in the 9th century and will return to earth to usher in a final confrontation between good and evil that will end with a 1,000-year reign of peace, which will be followed by the end of the world.

According to Iraqi Army Maj. Gen. Othman al-Ghanami, quoted by the Associated Press, the group was heavily armed. He said 500 rifles were confiscated along with mortars, heavy calibre machine guns, and Katyusha rockets. That such a little known group should be so well armed is a sign of the myriad threats to the country's eventual pacification.

Ashura commemorates Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad and the most revered of Shiite saints, and is the occasion of public flagellation and high emotion.

Local authorities said the gunmen were planning the attack because they believed the Mahdi was due to return Sunday, and were seeking to remove potential rivals.

"In Shiite Islam there is this very strong millenarian trend, similar to Christian movements that think Christ is about to return," says Juan Cole, a professor of Middle East history at the University of Michigan. "So just like some millenarian evangelicals think that the pope is the antichrist, they would see the ayatollahs as ... usurpers of his rightful role."

While Professor Cole is skeptical of the view that such millenarian movements are always triggered by social or economic upheaval, he says, "I'm comfortable in saying that in this particular case this movement that's fighting outside of Najaf is certainly enabled by the chaos in Iraq for the past decade and a half."

DOJ_NMG_0124084

Such movements have ebbed and flowed throughout Shiite history and Shiite religious politics have been marked by violent power grabs for centuries. Cole points to the Babi Movement in the 1840s and 1850s in Iran and Iraq as a good example. The movement attracted vast numbers of followers, mostly from the urban lower and lower-middle classes, who believed that the Mahdi was about to return and rid them of their unjust rulers. The group's followers targeted the Shiite religious hierarchy of the time, and sought to assassinate the Shah of Iran in 1852.

General Ghanami said the leader of the group was killed in the fighting, and identified him as Abu Qamar al-Yamani. The London-based Arabic daily Al Hayat reported that the Army of Heaven is loyal to Mahmoud al-Hassani al-Sarkhi, a cultish Shiite leader whose followers have clashed with both foreign troops and supporters of mainline Shiite leaders in Iraq numerous times since the US invasion.

His supporters have fought with those of other militant Shiite clerics, most notably those of Ayatollah Muhammad Yaqubi, whose men dominate the politics of the southern city of Najaf, and also sought to take control of the main shrine in Karbala last summer from supporters of Ayatollah Sistani, the most revered cleric in Iraq.

Baker Agrees Reluctantly To Testify On Iraq (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 30, 2007

James A. Baker III, the co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, has ended weeks of resistance and today will testify before Congress on the war, avoiding a split with his fellow co-chairman, former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.).

Sources familiar with the efforts to persuade Baker to testify said he did not want to appear to be lobbying against President Bush at the height of his push for 21,500 additional troops in Iraq.

Baker will answer senators' questions today during a hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which includes three Democratic presidential hopefuls and Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), the chamber's most forceful Republican critic of the war, who also is mulling a White House bid.

Opponents of Bush's plan to send more troops are likely to ask Baker about the study group's conclusion that "[s]ustained increases in U.S. troop levels would not solve the fundamental cause of violence in Iraq, which is the absence of national reconciliation."

To support the president's proposal, Baker may note that the study group also agreed that it could support a short-term surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad or speed the training of Iraqi government forces. However, given the broader conclusion that more troops will not end the violence, Baker may have to admit that adding more troops will not be as effective as the Bush administration and its congressional allies argue.

Baker also may be asked about the study group's conclusions that the "situation in Baghdad and several provinces is dire," the "level of violence is high and growing," and "there is great suffering, and the daily lives of many Iraqis show little or no improvement."

Those assessments contradict the positive picture that Vice President Dick Cheney painted during a nationally televised interview last week.

"There's problems — ongoing problems — but we have in fact accomplished our objectives of getting rid of the old regime, and there is a new regime in place that's been here for less than a year, far too soon for you guys to write them off," Cheney told CNN's Wolf Blitzer. "Bottom line is that we've had enormous successes and we will continue to have enormous successes."

Baker has had a long history with Bush, his father and Cheney. Both Baker and Cheney worked for President Gerald Ford. Baker managed George H.W. Bush's 1980 presidential campaign, and later served as secretary of state during his administration, when Cheney held the post of secretary of defense.

More recently, Baker oversaw the vote recount effort in Florida that swung the 2000 presidential election to the Bush-Cheney ticket.

While the decision on whether to appear before Congress has been a delicate dance for Baker, it has also been a sensitive subject for congressional Democrats who do not want to scare off prominent Republicans from testifying at their hearings. A sign of the deference Democrats are willing to show, they are not expected to put Baker under oath tomorrow.

DOJ_NMG_0124085

Baker originally declined to testify before the Democrat-controlled Senate Foreign Relations and House Foreign Affairs panels. Hamilton testified on his own before the House committee on Jan. 19 and was scheduled also to make a solo appearance around that time before the Senate.

Upon learning that Hamilton would go to the Senate alone, Baker changed his mind and agreed to testify as long as the hearing date was postponed until a week after Bush's State of the Union address, almost three weeks after the president unveiled his new plan for the war, according to sources knowledgeable of what led to today's scheduled appearance.

While Baker wavered on whether to appear before the Senate, he did not reveal any second thoughts about skipping a request to testify in the House, where lawmakers are younger and have a reputation for being less decorous than their Senate counterparts.

"Baker really didn't want to testify and felt like the report spoke for itself," a policy assistant to Baker, John Williams, said. "But Hamilton wanted to testify before Congress.

"In an effort to keep a bipartisan approach he [Baker] worked with Biden's office to find a time when he thought the two of them could meet," Williams added, referring to the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.).

Williams also said that Baker only wanted to make one appearance before Congress.

"The fact is that he wanted to do one," Williams said. "He didn't want to come back and forth and back and forth, and the Senate worked with his schedule."

If Baker had agreed to the Senate's first proposed hearing date of Jan. 18, however, he could have testified before both chambers on successive days, presumably requiring only one roundtrip flight from Houston.

Williams disputed that Baker's testimony necessarily would undercut Bush's proposed troop surge, noting that the study group said it could support a short-term surge.

"That's not inconsistent with what the president is doing right now," Williams said. He also argued that it did not make sense that Baker would seek to postpone his congressional appearance because Bush unveiled his plan for more troops eight days before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's original hearing date.

Williams said the Jan. 18 and 19 hearing dates simply did not fit into Baker's schedule, but he could not immediately say what Baker was doing on those days.

For now, at least, Democrats are accepting scheduling conflicts as reasons to appear before their committees.

"Originally Secretary Baker was not available on Jan. 18 (when Lee Hamilton was scheduled to testify), but his scheduled opened up on Jan. 30," Senate Foreign Relations Committee spokeswoman Elizabeth Alexander said. "To accommodate both Baker and Hamilton's schedules — so they could appear together — the SFRC postponed the hearing until Jan. 30."

Beyond Baghdad (WP)

By Richard G. Lugar

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Since President Bush announced that he would send more American troops to Iraq, the debate on Iraq policy has reached new levels of stridency. Opponents of the war have rallied against what they see as an unjustified escalation, while the administration has dismissed opposition as defeatism. Vice President Cheney went so far as to say a withdrawal would show that Americans "don't have the stomach for the fight."

Military action in Iraq, however, defies orthodox notions of victory and defeat. We are not in Iraq to defend territory or even to destroy an enemy. Rather, we are pursuing the amorphous task of coaxing out of the Iraqi people and government political decisions that will result in a democratic, pluralistic society that is conducive to regional stability.

While the emergence of such a government and society is still worth pursuing, we must recognize that it is an optimal goal. It should not be the focal point of our Middle East policy or the sole measure of success in Iraq.

We need to recast the geo-strategic reference points of our Iraq policy. Some commentators have compared the Bush plan to a "Hail Mary" pass in football -- a desperate heave deep down the field by a losing team at the end of the game. Actually, a far better analogy for the Bush plan is a draw play on third down with 20 yards to go in the first quarter. The play does have a chance of working if everything goes perfectly, but it is more likely to gain a few yards and set up a punt on the next down, after which the game can be continued under more favorable circumstances.

DOJ_NMG_0124086

The president's plan is an early episode in a much broader Middle East realignment that began with our invasion of Iraq and that may not end for years. Nations throughout the Middle East are scrambling to find their footing as regional power balances shift in unpredictable ways.

At the center of this realignment is Iran, which is perceived to have emerged from our Iraq intervention as the big winner. We paved the way for a Shiite government in Iraq that is much friendlier to Iran than was Saddam Hussein. Bolstered by high oil revenue, Iran has meddled in Iraq, rigidly pursued a nuclear capability, and funded Hezbollah and Hamas.

But the pendulum of Middle East politics may be swinging back against Iranian assertiveness. Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan, the Gulf states and others have become increasingly alarmed by Iran's behavior and by widening regional sectarian divisions. Because of this dynamic, U.S. bargaining power in the Middle East is growing. Moderate Arab states understand that the United States is an indispensable counterweight to Iran.

This opens up opportunities for solidifying our broader strategic objectives, and it offers a backup option in Iraq. Even as the president's Baghdad strategy goes forward, we need to plan for a potent redeployment of U.S. forces in the region to defend oil assets, target terrorist enclaves, deter adventurism by Iran and provide a buffer against regional sectarian conflict. In the best case, we could supplement bases in the Middle East with troops stationed outside urban areas in Iraq. Such a redeployment would allow us to continue training Iraqi troops and delivering economic assistance, but it would not require us to interpose ourselves between Iraqi sectarian factions.

The secretary of state's recent trip to the Middle East and the dispatch of an additional aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf showed that the administration understands the gravity of what is happening in the region. The United States should make clear to our Arab friends that they have a role in promoting reconciliation within Iraq, preventing oil price spikes, splitting Syria from Iran and demonstrating a more united front against terrorism.

The administration must avoid becoming so quixotic in its attempt to achieve the optimal outcome in Iraq that it fails to adjust to shifts in the region or political realities within Iraq. Although any administration would be reluctant to talk about a Plan B when its primary plan is still in motion, the president and Congress must reach a consensus on how to protect our broader strategic interests regardless of what happens in those Baghdad neighborhoods or on the floor of the Senate. Otherwise, the fatigue and frustration with our Iraq policy that is manifest in the resolutions of disapproval before the Senate could lead not just to the rejection of the Bush plan but also to the abandonment of the tools and relationships we need to defend our vital interests in the Middle East.

The writer, a Republican from Indiana, is the ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Fallon Says U.S. Miscalculated Iraq (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON - Adm. William Fallon, who is poised to become the top American commander in the Middle East, says the United States miscalculated the ability of Iraqi forces to take control and underestimated the enemy's persistence.

ADVERTISEMENT

"Securing the stability of the country has been more difficult than anticipated," Fallon said in a written statement to the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Our ability to correctly assess the political, economic and security situation in Iraq has been lacking."

Fallon's remarks were submitted in advance of a confirmation hearing Tuesday. Fallon, who commands troops in the Pacific region, has been tapped to replace Army Gen. John Abizaid as head of the U.S. Central Command.

In addition Tuesday, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was expected to consider the nomination of John Negroponte, the first director of national intelligence, to become deputy secretary of state.

Fallon and Negroponte's confirmations were not expected to rouse Senate protests, despite bitter opposition in Congress to Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Public sentiment has turned strongly against a war that has dragged on for nearly four years with more than 3,000 American dead and violence unabated by insurgents and sectarian militias.

In remarks prepared for a speech Tuesday, Sen. Bill Nelson (news, bio, voting record), D-Fla., a member of the Armed Services Committee who recently returned from a trip to the region, said only another 200,000 or 300,000 U.S. troops would make a substantial difference in Iraq.

"Based on everything I saw last month, and based on my conversations with Iraqi officials, our own military leaders and rank-and-file soldiers, I am convinced more troops won't end the sectarian violence," Nelson said.

Nelson also was expected to deliver a sharp rebuke of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Nelson said al-Maliki "either lacks the will, or the nerve, to take on the Shiite militias."

Last week the Senate approved, 81-0, Bush's nomination of Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to head the Iraq war. Petraeus would work alongside Fallon, who would oversee military operations throughout the region, including Afghanistan.

During Petraeus' Jan. 23 confirmation hearing, senators questioned him on how Bush's new strategy would work and whether Congress should weigh in with a resolution of disapproval. Petraeus said the situation in Iraq was "dire" but not hopeless.

In his written remarks, Fallon told the Senate panel that the U.S. has "relearned" the need to hold secure an area "until Iraqi security forces and local political and economic activity have provided essential confidence to the population."

Fallon also said he believes the Pakistan government should do more to prevent al-Qaida operatives from crossing its border into Afghanistan and that Iran remains a serious threat to the region.

However, Fallon said Tehran was unlikely to produce a nuclear weapon until "mid-next decade."

"I sense that our allies in the region are more concerned about the potential threat posed by Iran now than at any time since the Iran-Iraq War," he wrote.

Petraeus is to arrive in Baghdad to take over for Gen. George Casey as the top U.S. commander in Iraq next week, a defense official said Monday. Casey, tapped to become the next Army chief of staff, will face the Senate Armed Services Committee on Thursday.

War Of The Water Cooler (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Wars get odd names. My favorite is the War of Jenkins' Ear (1739 to 1741), but the one about the Roses is good and so is the Hundred Years' War and also the French and Indian War which, somehow, neglects to mention that the British were also involved. Usually, though, those names are wonderfully descriptive and more truthful than an Orwellian moniker such as Operation Just Cause, which was that silliness in Panama (1989), or Operation Iraqi Freedom, the present debacle in the desert. A better name for it would be the War of the Water Cooler. This, I'm sure, is where it all started.

You can scour the vast literature about the Iraq war and how it started and not find the single moment when George W. Bush decided he had to go to war -- and why. The minutes of all the pertinent meetings, all of them surely monitored by Bob Woodward, either have produced nothing or will produce nothing because nothing was produced in these meetings. This war, I am sure, was the product of what Dick Cheney said to Bush at the White House water cooler. No one was present to take any of this down on paper.

"God wants you to do this, Chief."

"Yes, I know."

It was an amazing thing and it was prodded, mind you, by one man who thought that the presidency had been critically weakened by post-Watergate reforms (Cheney) and another (Bush) who didn't think much at all about anything -- but knew his heart was pure and his soul even purer and his hearing so keen he could hear God himself. He said this, you will recall, on at least two occasions, once to Woodward himself and yet again when he met with leaders of the Palestinian Authority.

"God told me to strike at al-Qaeda, and I struck them, and then he instructed me to strike at Saddam, which I did," Mahmoud Abbas quoted Bush as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0124088

This is how the War of the Water Cooler started. I am sure of it, but no matter. In the intellectual style of Bush himself, it's immaterial that I can't prove my assertion; he cannot prove otherwise -- and that's what matters. In this case, it just so happens that the absence of a record is record enough to prove that the war started at the water cooler (if there is one, but no matter) and while it is true that Bush and Cheney cherry-picked the intelligence data and exaggerated it, what mattered above all is that they -- the two of them -- decided to go to war and the rest of the country just followed.

It's almost beside the point that Saddam Hussein lacked the weapons of mass destruction that were Bush's stated casus belli. By the time the war started, it was clear that Iraq had no nuclear weapons program to speak of -- Cheney lied about this -- and as for the rest, chemical and biological, why were they suddenly so menacing? After all, chemical weapons had first been used in World War I, and biological weapons, while plenty scary, were hardly practical. No one really knew how to make it work.

Two guys took us to war and now two guys keep us at war. The consensus of the country is that Bush/Cheney has failed. The president's approval ratings are lower than the average daily Washington temperature -- and it is winter, for crying out loud. Now Bush has authorized the so-called surge, which is meant to rectify the slide, the mess, the coming defeat. But to Cheney, there is no slide, no mess. "Bottom line is that we've had enormous successes and we will continue to have enormous successes," is the way he put it to CNN's Wolf Blitzer. This bizarre assessment, so at odds with truth, is a Rorschach of sorts and Cheney fails it stunningly.

But out in the hallway, at the water cooler that metaphorically exists, Cheney tells Bush he's winning and he's strong -- a regular Truman, another Lincoln and, not incidentally, another Nixon for his heroic reestablishment of the imperial presidency in aw-shucks garb. And out by the water cooler Bush nods. He is a strong president and a good president. He has fought evil and done what was asked of him -- and the fallen are heroes and the brave are in heaven and he will answer (as do Hebrew National salamis) to a higher authority. And if, by your own water cooler, you should think all this is absurd, consider this: The war goes on . . . and on . . . and on.

Our Options In Iraq (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

These are our options in Iraq: We can withdraw troops and equipment as fast as our Galaxys and Globemasters can carry them home (or to Okinawa). This is the Murtha Way. We can cap troop levels at 140,000 and withdraw them no later than Inauguration Day, 2009. This is Hillary's Way. We can redeploy our forces outside of Iraqi cities, conduct limited training and counterterrorism missions, urge reconciliation among the various political factions and seek diplomatic openings with Syria and Iran. This is the way of Sens. Chuck Hagel and Joe Biden. We can advocate and facilitate the partition of Iraq. This is the (Peter) Galbraith Way. Or we can surge troops into the toughest neighborhoods of Baghdad, Ramadi and Najaf and keep them there indefinitely.

That is the President's Way. It is going to mean many more American casualties -- perhaps as many in the months ahead as we've seen over the past four years. It may fail for lack of troops, or insufficient cooperation from the Iraqi government. It could be defeated in the field, or it could succeed -- only to be undermined in Washington, much as Gen. Creighton Abrams's 1972 battlefield victories in Vietnam were. It lacks an endgame. It's a political loser. But it is the only strategy on the table that aims at victory and has a chance of succeeding.

Consider the alternatives in their turn. The intelligent case for immediate withdrawal is that it means no more Americans need die in a war that is already lost. For Iraq, the consequences of American withdrawal will surely be grievous: ethnic cleansing on a massive scale; the collapse of the current government; the creation of an al Qaeda statelet in Anbar province; a rush by Iran, Saudi Arabia and perhaps Turkey to fill the vacuum; a regional war of Sunnis and Shiites and factions in between; a Mideast nuclear arms race.

Advocates of immediate withdrawal would counter that all this was foreordained by the invasion of Iraq (or at least by the bungled occupation) so it may as well happen sooner rather than later. But what are the consequences of immediate withdrawal for the U.S.? Well, see above, and ask yourself if it's a price the U.S. can afford to pay. Unless you agree with Boston Globe columnist James Carroll, who sees geopolitical catastrophe as a pathway to redeeming America's soul, the answer is probably not.

DOJ_NMG_0124089

What about Hillary's Way? Its political convenience is to prevent Iraq from being a millstone around the neck of the next administration, presumably hers. Its strategic virtue is that it offers a window to get things right in Iraq, finally, and the pressure to do so quickly.

But it fails to address the obvious objection, which is that once a date-certain for U.S. withdrawal is set, Sunni insurgents, Shiite Mahdists and outside powers like Iran need only bide their time before moving in. And because of Sen. Clinton's proposed troop cap, it prevents the U.S. from sufficiently altering facts on the ground to give the Iraqi government a chance to stand on its own. Given the choice between postponed and immediate withdrawal, at least the latter stands to save American lives. Otherwise, the results are the same.

Now take the Hagel-Biden Way, itself mostly a reprise of the recommendations of Jim Baker's Iraq Study Group. At a hearing last Wednesday of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Hagel waxed pontifical on the subject of "coherence of strategy," accusing the administration of having no coherent strategy either in the past or for the future. For his pains, and for standing on the right side of opinion polls, admiring pundits have praised the Nebraska Republican as a profile in political courage.

As for the merits of his own strategy, spelled out in a recent USA Today op-ed, that's another story. With Mr. Biden, the senator wants to redeploy U.S. forces outside of Iraqi cities. He seems to have missed the fact that, except for the politically critical Green Zone in Baghdad, that's where the troops have mainly been for two years, in keeping with the "light footprint" strategy that everyone now agrees failed. Next Mr. Hagel wants to "transfer responsibility for internal security and halting sectarian violence to Iraqi forces under an appropriately expedited timeline." Another interesting idea, given how much of the sectarian violence of the past few years has been instigated by elements within the Iraqi interior ministry.

And Mr. Hagel wants to "engage Iraq's neighbors and the international community to build a regional framework to help support and sustain a political solution and national reconciliation." Which neighbors would those be? Iran, which mass-produces IEDs and finances the most radical among Iraq's Shiite groups? Syria, which serves as sanctuary for Baathist holdouts and transfer point for Sunni insurgents? The "coherence" of the Hagel-Biden plan itself rests on the incoherent assumption that the regimes that so far have worked hardest to abort Iraq's rebirth as a federal and democratic state can now be enlisted to midwife the effort.

Finally there is partition. There is a seductive neatness to the idea that, by dividing Iraq into Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish states, one cuts the proverbial Gordian knot of the country's dysfunctional politics. But Iraq's population isn't so neatly divided, not least in Baghdad where one in four Iraqis live. How are they to be moved, resettled, compensated and so on?

Proponents of partition argue that such dilemmas are already in the process of resolving themselves, as Shiites and Sunnis abandon previously mixed neighborhoods. This is what logicians call the "Is-Ought" fallacy, and it would have the perverse effect of putting the U.S. behind the very forces of the sectarian aggression that so far we have sought to quell. Nor does it address the long-term question of just what kind of states Kurdistan, Basrastan and Fallujastan would become, whether they'd be viable, and whether they would be hostile or friendly to American interests.

Which leaves us with the Bush Way. It proposes to assume a responsibility -- the responsibility for everyday security -- the U.S. military relinquished when it first allowed Baghdad to be looted. And it takes as its premise the idea that "national reconciliation" in Iraq can only be accomplished in the absence of chaos. These are the fundamental responsibilities of an occupier. It's too bad we didn't do it sooner. That's no reason not to start now.

The American Iraq (WSJ)

By Fouad Ajami

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

So this government in Baghdad, fighting for its life, has not mastered even the grim science of the gallows, and has no knowledge of the "drop charts" used for hangings around the world. The Tikritis had been much better at this sort of thing. They had all the time in the world to perfect the skills and techniques of terror; they had done it against the background of relative indifference by outside powers. And they had the indulgence of the neighboring Arabs who gave their warrant to all that played out in Iraq under the Tikriti despotism.

DOJ_NMG_0124090

Pity those men now hunkered down in Baghdad as they walk a fine, thin line between the yearning for justice and retribution in their land, and the scrutiny of the outside world. In the annals of Arab history, the Shia have been strangers to power, rebels and dissidents and men on the run hunted down by official power. Now the ground has shifted in Baghdad, and an Arab world steeped in tyranny reproaches a Shia-led government sitting atop a volcano. America's "regional diplomacy" -- the name for our earnest but futile entreaties to the Arab rulers -- will not reconcile the Arab regimes to the rise of the Shia outcasts.

In the fullness of time, the Arab order of power will have to come to a grudging acceptance of the order sure to take hold in Baghdad. This is a region that respects the prerogatives of power. It had once resisted the coming to power of the Alawites in Syria and then learned to accommodate that "heretical" minority sect and its conquest of Damascus; the Shia path in Iraq will follow that trajectory, and its justice is infinitely greater for it is the ascendancy of a demographic majority, through the weight of numbers and the ballot box. Of all Arab lands, Iraq is the most checkered, a frontier country at the crossroads of Arabia, Turkey and Persia. The Sunni Arabs in Iraq and beyond have never accepted the diversity of that land. The "Arabism" of the place was synonymous with their own primacy. Now a binational state in all but name (Arab and Kurdish) has come into being in Iraq, and the Shia underclass have stepped forth and staked a claim commensurate with the weight of their numbers. The Sunni Arabs have recoiled from this change in their fortunes. They have all but "Persianized" the Shia of Iraq, branded them as a fifth column of the state next door. Contemporary Islamism has sharpened this feud, for to the Sunni Islamists the Shia are heretics at odds with the forbidding strictures of the Islamists' fanatical variant of the faith.

Baghdad, a city founded by the Abbasid Caliph al-Mansour in 762, was sacked by the Mongols in 1258: The invaders put it to the sword, and dumped its books and libraries in the Tigris. In the (Sunni) legend, a Shia minister by the name of Ibn Alqami had opened the gates of the city to the invaders. History never relents here. In a commentary that followed the execution of Saddam, a Palestinian commentator in the West Bank city of Jenin wrote in a pan-Arab daily in London that a descendant of Ibn Alqami (read Nouri al-Maliki) had put to death a descendant of al-Mansour.

These kinds of atavisms cannot be conciliated. The truth of Iraq will assert itself on the ground, but the age of Sunni monopoly on power has passed. One of Iraq's most respected scholar-diplomats, Hassan al-Alawi, has put the matter in stark terms. It is proper, he said, to speak of an "American Iraq" as one does of a Sumerian, a Babylonian, an Abbasid, an Ottoman, and then a British Iraq. Where Iraq in the age of the Pax Britannica rested on an "Anglo-Sunni" regime, this new Iraq, in the time of the Americans, is by the logic of things an American-Shia regime. The militant preachers railing against the fall of Baghdad to an alliance of the "American crusaders" and the "Shia heretics" are the bearers of a dark, but intensely felt conviction. We should not be apologetic, in Arab lands seething with bigotry and rage, about our expedition into Iraq. We shouldn't fall for Arab rulers who tell us that they would have had the ability to call off the furies had we had in place a "process" for resolving the claims of the Palestinians, and had we been able to "deliver" Israel. Those furies have a life of their own: In truth, they are aided and abetted by these same rulers in the hope of tranquilizing their own domains and buying off the embittered in their midst.

The Sunni Arab regimes, it has to be noted, are not of one mind on Iraq. Curiously, the Arab state most likely to make peace with the new reality of Iraq is Saudi Arabia; those most hostile are the Jordanians, the Egyptians and the Palestinians. The Saudi monarch, King Abdullah, has read the wind with accuracy; he has a Shia minority in his domain, in the oil-bearing lands of the Eastern Province, and he seems eager to cap the Wahhabi volcano in the Najdi heartland of his kingdom. There is pragmatism in that realm, and the place lives by its own coin. In contrast, Jordan and Egypt present the odd spectacle of countries heavily invested in an anti-Shia drive but with no Shia citizenry in their midst. The two regimes derive a good measure of their revenues from "strategic rent" -- the aid of foreign powers, the subsidies of Pax Americana to be exact. The threat of Shiism is a good, and lucrative, scarecrow for the rulers in Cairo and Amman. The promise of standing sentry in defense of the Sunni order is what these two regimes have to offer both America and the oil states.

The Palestinians, weaker in the scale of power and with troubles of their own, are in the end of little consequence to the strategic alignment in the region. But to the extent that their "street" and their pundits matter, they can be counted upon to view the rise of this new Iraq with reserve and outright hostility. For six decades, the Palestinians have had a virtual monopoly on pan-Arab sentiments, and the Arabic-speaking world indulged them. Iraq -- its wounds, and the promise of its power and resources -- has been a direct challenge to the Palestinians and to their conception of their place in the Arab scheme of things. A seam is stitched in Palestinian society between its Muslim majority and its minority Christian communities. Palestinians have little by way of exposure to the Shia. To the bitter end, the Palestinian street remained enamored of Saddam Hussein. Iraq's Shia majority has returned the favor, and has come to view the Palestinians and their cause with considerable suspicion.

DOJ_NMG_0124091

For our part, the Pax Americana has not been at peace with the Shia genie it had called forth. We did not know the Shia to begin with; we saw them through the prism of our experience with Iran. Moqtada al-Sadr in Baghdad and Hassan Nasrallah in Beirut: This was the face of the new Shiism and we were spooked by it. And we were susceptible as well to the representations made to us by Arab rulers about the dangers of radical Shiism.

This was odd: We had been in the midst of a searing battle with al Qaeda and the Taliban, zealous Sunni movements, but we were still giving credence to the Arab warnings about the threat of Shiism. Nor were the Shia who would finally claim power in Iraq possessed of an appreciable understanding of American ways. Nouri al-Maliki speaks not a word of English; with years of exile in Syria behind him, he was at considerable disadvantage in dealing with the American presence in his country. He and the political class around him lacked the traffic with American diplomacy that had seasoned their counterparts in Cairo, Amman and the Arabian Peninsula. Without that intimacy, they had been given to premonitions that America could yet strike a bargain, at their expense, with the Sunni order of power.

We held aloft the banner of democracy, but in recent months our faith in democracy's possibilities in Iraq has appeared to erode, and this unnerves the Shia political class. President Bush's setback in the congressional elections gave the Iraqis legitimate cause for concern: Prime Minister Maliki himself wondered aloud whether this was the beginning of a general American retreat in Iraq. And there was that brief moment when it seemed as though the "realists" of the James Baker variety were in the midst of a restoration. The Shia (and the Kurds) needed no deep literacy in strategic matters to read the mind of Mr. Baker. His brand of realism was anathema to people who tell their history in metaphors of justice and betrayal. He was a known entity in Iraq; he had been the steward of American foreign policy when America walked away, in 1991, from the Kurdish and Shia rebellions it had called for. The political class in Baghdad couldn't have known that the Baker-Hamilton recommendations would die on the vine, and that President Bush would pay these recommendations scant attention. The American position was not transparent, and there were in the air rumors of retrenchment, and thus legitimate Iraqi fears that the American presence in Baghdad could be bartered away in some accommodation with the powers in Iraq's neighborhood.

These fears were to be allayed, but not put to rest, by the military "surge" that President Bush announced in recent days. More than a military endeavor, the surge can be seen as a declaration by the president that deliverance would be sought in Baghdad, and not in deals with the rogues (Syria and Iran) or with the Sunni Arab states. Prime Minister Maliki and the coalition that sustains his government could not know for certain if this was the proverbial "extra mile" before casting them adrift, or the sure promise that this president would stay with them for the remainder of his time in office.

But there can be no denying that with the surge the landscape has altered in Baghdad, and that Mr. Bush is invested in the Maliki government as never before. Mr. Maliki's predecessor -- a man who belongs to the same political party and hails from the same traditional Shia political class -- was forced out of office by an American veto and Mr. Maliki could be forgiven his suspicion that the Americans might try this again. It was known that he had never taken to the American envoy, Zalmay Khalilzad, and that he fully understood that American officials would rather have other Shia contenders in his post -- our old standby Ayad Allawi, the current vice president Adel Abdul Mahdi, both more worldly men at ease with American ways. So if this is America's extra mile in Baghdad, it has to be traversed with a political leader whose abilities and intentions have been repeatedly called into question by American officials.

This marriage of convenience may be the best that can be hoped for. Mr. Maliki will not do America's bidding, and we should be grateful for his displays of independence. He straddles the fence between the things we want him to do -- disarming the militias, walking away from Moqtada al-Sadr -- and the requirements of political survival. We have been waiting for the Iraqis to assume responsibility for their own affairs and we should not be disconcerted when they take us at our word. The messages put out by American officials now and then, that Mr. Maliki is living on borrowed time, and the administered leaks of warnings he has been given by President Bush, serve only to undermine whatever goals we seek in Baghdad.

With Saddam's execution, this prime minister has made himself a power in the vast Shia mainstream. Having removed Ibrahim Jaafari from office last year, the American regency is doomed to live with Mr. Maliki, for a policy that attempts to unseat him is sure to strip Iraqis of any sense that they are sovereign in their own country. He cannot be granted a blank check, but no small measure of America's success in Iraq now depends on him. If he is to fall, the deed must be an affair of the Iraqis, and of the broad Shia coalition to be exact. He may now to able to strike at renegade elements of the Mahdi Army, for that movement that once answered to Moqtada al-Sadr and carried his banners has splintered into gangs led by bandit warlords. In our concern with Moqtada al-Sadr and the Mahdi Army, we ought to understand the reluctance of Mr. Maliki's ruling coalition to take on the Shia militias. The terror inflicted on the Shia -- an unrelenting affair of the last three years -- makes it extremely difficult for a Shia-led government to disarm men who pose as defenders of a community still under brutal siege.

DOJ_NMG_0124092

Boldness and despair may have come together to carry forward this new drive in Baghdad. Fear of failure often concentrates the mind, and President Bush's policy could yet find its target right as the skeptics have written off this whole project in Baghdad. Iraq has had its way of meting out disappointments at every turn, but the tide of events appears to be working in the president's favor.

There is a "balance of terror" today between the Sunni and Shia protagonists. More and more Sunni Arabs know that their old dominion is lost, and that they had better take the offer on the table -- a share of the oil revenues, the promise that the constitution could be amended and reviewed, access to political power and spoils in return for reining in the violence and banishing the Arab jihadists. The Shia, too, may have to come to a time of reckoning. Their old tormentor was sent to the gallows, and a kinsman of theirs did the deed with the seal of the state. From the poor Shia slums of Baghdad, young avengers answered the Sunni campaign of terror with brutal terror of their own. The old notion -- once dear to the Sunnis, and to the Shia a nagging source of fear and shame -- that the Sunnis of Iraq were a martial race while the Shia were marked for lamentations and political quiescence has been broken for good.

The country has been fought over, and a verdict can already be discerned -- rough balance between its erstwhile Sunni rulers and its Shia inheritors, and a special, autonomous life for the Kurds. Against all dire expectations, the all-important question of the distribution of oil wealth appears close to a resolution. The design for sharing the bounty is a "federal" one that strikes a balance between central government and regional claimants. The nightmare of the Sunni Arabs that they would be left stranded in regions of sand and gravel has been averted.

This is the country midwifed by American power. We were never meant to stay there long. Iraq will never approximate the expectations we projected onto it in more innocent times. But we should be able to grant it the gift of acceptance, and yet another dose of patience as it works its way out of its current torments. It is said that much of the war's nobility has drained out of it, and that we now fight not to lose, and to keep intact our larger position in the oil lands of the Arabian Peninsula and the Persian Gulf. This may not be the stuff of glory, but it has power and legitimacy all its own.

Mr. Ajami is a 2006 recipient of the Bradley Prize, teaches at Johns Hopkins and is author of "The Foreigner's Gift: The Americans, the Arabs, and the Iraqis in Iraq" (Free Press, 2006).

A League Of Their Own (NYT)

By Milton Viorst

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Washington

PRESIDENT BUSH seems not to have noticed, but what stands between hostile sectarian forces and the resumption of all-out civil war in Lebanon is the Arab League, whose diplomacy 17 years ago put an end to a conflict in which tens of thousands of Lebanese died. Is there not a lesson here, for the president and the Democratic Congress, that is applicable to Iraq?

The Beirut face-off is the follow-up to last summer's war, in which Hezbollah, the Shiite party supported by Syria and Iran, held off the more powerful Israelis long enough to achieve a United Nations cease-fire on favorable terms. Now Hezbollah challenges the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, which is supported by the bulk of Lebanon's Sunni, Christian and Druse population, as well as the United States.

Hezbollah seeks to upset the fragile balance to which Lebanon's sectarian forces agreed in 1989 under Arab League mediation. At that time, the Arab League's goal was to prevent the chaos in Lebanon from spreading to the wider Arab world. That remains the league's goal today, both in Lebanon and in Iraq. But it also has another concern: with Tehran's regional power rising, the Arab League has a deep interest in keeping both countries in the Arab sphere, free of Iranian domination.

DOJ_NMG_0124093

The United States finds itself increasingly unable to stem the violence in Iraq, and it seems unlikely that a surge of troops will strengthen American influence. American negotiators have not won the confidence of Sunnis or Shiites, the principal combatants, nor even of Kurds, the uneasy bystanders. Mr. Bush may still consider himself a liberator, but among Iraqis there is a widespread feeling that his invasion was just the latest crime of Western imperialism.

Curiously, the Iraq Study Group, in acknowledging Iraqi distrust of the United States, suggested a greater diplomatic role for Syria and Iran, the very countries that have an interest in Iraq's instability. Though better relations with these two countries might be in Washington's long-term interest, they are surely not going to help matters in Iraq.

That's where the Arab League comes in. Because it is Arab, it can count on a level of trust, even among suspicious Iraqis, not available to the United States or its Western allies.

Critics argue that the Arab League, being heavily Sunni, can have no influence on Iraq's Shiites. They forget that the bulk of the Iraqi Army that defeated Iran in the 1980-88 war was Shiite. This fact alone tells us that Iraqi Shiites, much as they want to be rid of the American occupation, are not ready to become Iranian. The Arab League can work from this premise to restore Iraq's stability. The United States cannot.

The Arab League's Baghdad offices are recognized by the Shiite government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, has strongly supported Iraq's involvement with the Arab League. Amr Moussa, the Arab League's secretary general, has had an open door not just to Iraqi officials but also to Moktada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite leader, and to Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the country's most powerful cleric, who has never received an American official. The Iraqi foreign minister, a Kurd, has participated regularly in Arab League meetings.

To be sure, the Arab League cannot offer miracles. The situation in Iraq has deteriorated much too far for that. But with an invitation from the American president, it could immediately get to work at mediating the conflict.

If the objective is political stability and national reconciliation in Iraq, neither President Bush nor the Democratic Congress has a more promising option.

Equipment For Added Troops Is Lacking (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Boosting U.S. troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 would create major logistical hurdles for the Army and Marine Corps, which are short thousands of vehicles, armor kits and other equipment needed to supply the extra forces, U.S. officials said.

The increase would also further degrade the readiness of U.S.-based ground forces, hampering their ability to respond quickly, fully trained and well equipped in the case of other military contingencies around the world and increasing the risk of U.S. casualties, according to Army and Marine Corps leaders.

"The response would be slower than we might like, we would not have all of the equipment sets that ordinarily would be the case, and there is certainly risk associated with that," the Marine Corps commandant, Gen. James Conway, told the House Armed Services Committee last week.

President Bush's plan to send five additional U.S. combat brigades into Iraq has left the Army and Marines scrambling to ensure that the troops could be supported with the necessary armored vehicles, jamming devices, radios and other gear, as well as lodging and other logistics.

Trucks are in particularly short supply. For example, the Army would need 1,500 specially outfitted -- known as "up-armored" -- 2 1/2 -ton and five-ton trucks in Iraq for the incoming units, said Lt. Gen. Stephen Speakes, the Army's deputy chief of staff for force development.

"We don't have the [armor] kits, and we don't have the trucks," Speakes said in an interview. He said it will take the Army months, probably until summer, to supply and outfit the additional trucks. As a result, he said, combat units flowing into Iraq would have to share the trucks assigned to units now there, leading to increased use and maintenance.

Speakes said that although another type of vehicle -- the up-armored Humvee -- continues to be in short supply Army-wide, there would be "adequate" numbers for incoming forces, and each brigade would receive 400 fully outfitted Humvees. But he said that to meet the need, the Army would have to draw down pre-positioned stocks that would then not be available for other contingencies.

DOJ_NMG_0124094

Still, U.S. commanders privately expressed doubts that Iraq-bound units would receive a full complement of Humvees. "It's inevitable that that has to happen, unless five brigades of up-armored Humvees fall out of the sky," one senior Army official said of the feared shortfall. He expects that some units would have to rely more heavily on Bradley Fighting Vehicles and tanks that, although highly protective, are intimidating and therefore less effective for many counterinsurgency missions.

Adding to the crunch, the U.S. government has agreed to sell 600 up-armored Humvees to Iraq this year for its security forces. Such sales "better not be at the expense of the American soldier or Marine," Speakes told defense reporters recently, saying U.S. military needs must take priority.

Living facilities in Iraq are another concern for the additional troops, who would be concentrated in Baghdad, Army officials said. The U.S. military has closed or handed over to Iraqi forces about half of the 110 bases established there after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Decisions are being made on where to base incoming units in Baghdad, but it is likely that, at least in the short term, they would be placed in existing facilities, officials said.

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new top U.S. commander in Iraq, has requested that additional combat brigades move into Iraq as quickly as possible. But accelerated deployments would mean less time for units to train and fill out their ranks. Brigades are required to have an aggregate number of soldiers before deploying but may still face shortages of specific ranks and job skills.

Meanwhile, the demand for thousands more U.S. forces in both Iraq and Afghanistan is worsening the readiness of units in the United States, depleting their equipment and time to train, Army officials said. "We can fulfill the national strategy, but it will take more time and it will also take us increased casualties to do the job," Speakes said.

Army Chief of Staff Peter J. Schoomaker testified last week before the House Armed Services Committee that, regarding readiness, "my concerns are increased over what they were in June."

"To meet combatant commanders' immediate wartime needs, we pooled equipment from across the force to equip soldiers deploying in harm's way," he said. "This practice, which we are continuing today, increases risk for our next-to-deploy units and limits our ability to respond to emerging strategic contingencies."

Schoomaker called for additional funding to fix "holes in the force" and "break the historical cycle of unpreparedness."

The equipment shortages are pronounced in Army National Guard units, which have, on average, 40 percent of their required equipment, according to Army data. Senior Pentagon and Army officials say they expect to have to involuntarily mobilize some National Guard combat brigades earlier than planned to relieve active-duty forces. But the Guard as a whole is not expected to return to minimum equipment levels until 2013, Army figures show.

The Army seeks to increase its permanent active-duty ranks by 65,000 soldiers by 2012, creating six new combat brigades at a total estimated cost of $70 billion.

Brakes Thrown On Iraq Fight (RC)

By John Stanton, Emily Pierce And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, January 30, 2007

With a vote on one or more nonbinding resolutions opposing President Bush's decision to boost troop levels in Iraq likely a week away, Senate Democratic leaders are expected to use the delay to push back against tough White House rhetoric and attempt to build a bipartisan coalition on the issue, aides said Monday.

A senior Democratic leadership aide said Monday that while no talks with Republicans who oppose Bush's Iraq strategy have been scheduled, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) likely will "extend some olive branches" later in the week as the chamber moves closer to next week's vote.

Republicans are expected to oppose any effort by Reid to bring the minimum-wage debate to a close before Thursday. Because of that, a plan to begin debate on a resolution sponsored by Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Joseph Biden (D-Del.) will be put off until sometime next week, Democratic aides said.

DOJ_NMG_0124095

Democrats are deeply skeptical of GOP indications that they would like to use all of the time allowed to them procedurally before wrapping up this week's debate on minimum wage.

"What is the White House up to?" asked Reid spokesman Jim Manley. "Are they stalling for time while they craft another resolution?"

If Republicans use all the time available to them under Senate rules on the minimum-wage bill, debate on the Iraq resolution likely would begin at the end of this week at the earliest.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has said repeatedly that he does not want to block a vote on an Iraq resolution, but that he will not allow a vote on the Democrats' Iraq resolution without an agreement to also have several other votes on GOP-sponsored resolutions less critical of the president.

"His main concern is that Members get a chance to vote on their resolutions and that it's not a one-shot deal," said McConnell spokesman Don Stewart.

Without separate votes on each resolution, Stewart noted that procedurally it is impossible to have a vote on a complete substitute resolution, or a resolution that would entirely replace the language of the Democrats' resolution. Senate rules are such that the section of the resolution that includes "findings" must be approved separately from the resolution's declarative statements.

"It makes it a lot more complicated. It muddles the message completely," said Stewart of the possibility of Republicans having to offer separate substitute amendments for each section of the resolution.

But Manley said the votes on the two sections could move in tandem and that Democrats are prepared to allow votes on several competing resolutions.

Further complicating Reid's efforts, however, is the fact that Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) — who, along with Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), is one of the leaders of a bipartisan group of lawmakers who have proposed an alternative resolution to the Levin-Hagel-Biden measure — has thus far refused calls for negotiations prior to the floor debate.

In a memo sent Thursday to Biden, Hagel, Levin and Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) — a second GOP sponsor — Warner and Nelson rejected a request for talks from Biden, arguing that they "believe that the issues set forth in [the resolution] should remain as filed and that any additions, deletions or changes should occur as a consequence of the will of the Senate, working in 'open' session, during floor debate and consideration."

An aide to Warner said Monday that the Virginia lawmaker's position had not changed as of yet and that he believed both measures should come before the entire chamber.

Reid and other members of leadership also will have to address the White House's efforts to paint the resolution as detrimental to troops serving in Iraq. Over the past several days administration officials including Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Robert Gates have argued that any opposition to Bush's plan would end up emboldening the insurgency in Iraq. And while rank-and-file Democrats said that approach —which in past years caused significant heartburn among some moderate and conservative members of the party — is falling flat, a leadership aide said Reid is expected to push back over the course of the week.

In a floor speech Monday Reid charged that administration attacks are "beneath any administration official or Member of Congress," calling them "dangerous rhetoric motivated more by politics at home than events in Iraq."

On the other side of the Capitol, Democratic leaders moved ahead with efforts to focus attention on Iraq, but nonetheless continued to maintain that the chamber will hold off on any action on a similar resolution until the Senate completes work on the issue.

"Our thinking on this is that we want a strong bipartisan vote in the Senate, which will help us achieve the same goal here in the House," said a Democratic leadership aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

But even as Democrats aim to utilize the potential momentum of the Senate resolution, House leaders, while suggesting the chamber will take up a similar resolution, have yet to specify whether that will mirror the Senate resolution exactly.

"Democrats have been incredibly clear about this," one Democratic operative, who asked not to be named, said of the decision to wait on the Senate's action. "How we get there is less important than what's actually said."

DOJ_NMG_0124096

Democratic leadership also pushed ahead in recent days with what the leadership aide called "a coordinated effort to step-up [our] message on Iraq."

Those efforts include a Congressional delegation led by Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to Iraq as well as a policy address Friday by House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), in which he criticized Bush's latest Iraq strategy while reiterating that Democrats intend to hold dozens of committee hearings before developing specific policies on the war.

Pelosi, who returned from her visit to Iraq, Pakistan and Afghanistan on Monday along with Reps. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas), John Murtha (D-Pa.), Nita Lowey (D-N.Y.) and David Hobson (R-Ohio), is scheduled to review the CODEL this afternoon, although specific details were not available.

In a statement issued Friday during her visit to Iraq, Pelosi reiterated Democratic calls to shift responsibility for security to Iraqis and to redeploy U.S. military personnel.

"In meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalizad [sic], and senior U.S. military officers, including multi-national commander General George Casey, we stressed our belief that it is well past time for the Iraqis to take primary responsibility for the security of their nation," Pelosi said. "The delegation's view is that American forces should quickly begin to transition from a combat role to one focused on training, counter-terrorism, force protection, and controlling Iraq's borders."

Iraq Debate Strains Bond Of Congress' Vietnam Vets (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON — When the Senate begins debating President Bush's Iraq policy, one focus will be on a group of lawmakers with special expertise: the ones who know what it's like to fight a war that has lost the support of the American public.

The Senate's tiny caucus of Vietnam combat veterans provided some of the most riveting exchanges last week as the Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved a resolution that declared the president's planned troop increase in Baghdad "not in the national interest." All three Vietnam War veterans on the panel — two Democrats and a Republican — voted for the resolution.

"Maybe I have no political future, but I don't want to look back in regret that I did not do something about this," said Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a committee member who served as an infantryman in 1968, the bloodiest year of the Vietnam War.

The Iraq debate, which could begin as early as this week, has complicated relationships and stirred painful memories among a group of men who have a bond that transcends politics.

There are at least 18 Vietnam combat veterans serving in Congress, congressional records show. The shared experience of combat in an unpopular war has helped many to forge an unusual bipartisan fellowship. That was dramatically evident during the 2004 presidential campaign, when Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., rushed to the defense of John Kerry, the Democratic nominee, when some Republicans began questioning the Massachusetts senator's war record.

When it comes to President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, however, Congress' Vietnam veterans are divided.

In the Senate, four Vietnam combat veterans are playing key roles in the debate: Hagel authored the resolution opposing Bush's plan; his close friend, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a former prisoner of war in Hanoi, is a leading backer of the Bush plan.

"There's no one I admire more in this body than John McCain," Hagel said. But, he added, he disagrees with his friend on Iraq: "The deeper you get into this bog, the harder it is to get out."

Then there are Kerry and Sen. Jim Webb.

During the 2004 presidential campaign, Webb, D-Va., leveled withering criticisms of Kerry's anti-war activities in the 1970s. This time, Webb voted with Kerry for Hagel's resolution.

In the House, which will begin a debate on Iraq after the Senate votes, Vietnam vets are playing an equally prominent role. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who served in Korea and volunteered for Vietnam, is promising to use his chairmanship of the defense appropriations subcommittee to fence off funding for more troops.

Rep. Sam Johnson, a Texas Republican who spent nearly seven years as a North Vietnamese prisoner of war after his Air Force jet was shot down, is sponsoring a resolution that would prohibit Congress from cutting off funds.

DOJ_NMG_0124097

Johnson is sharply critical of fellow Vietnam vets who do not support the president's plan in Iraq. "They're off track. They've lost their course," the Texan said.

McCain is less eager to distance himself from veterans on the other side of the Iraq debate. He said he has more in common with his "close friend" Hagel and fellow vets Kerry and Webb than with some of the Iraq war planners, most of whom did not serve in Vietnam.

"We share the same frustration over the failed strategy, which all of us could see failing," McCain said. "Chuck and I were very alike. Where Chuck and I differ is, he thinks we may not be able to salvage it, and I think we can."

The Vietnam veterans are haunted and motivated by their war experiences. "It was the most defining experience of my life," Hagel said of his 12 months in Vietnam.

In 1971, Kerry famously asked members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee: "How do you ask a man to be the last to die for a mistake?" Last week, he told his colleagues: "I never thought I would be reliving the need to ask that question again."

Johnson sees different parallels: "When you look at Vietnam, we had it won, and Congress pulled the plug. I hope we don't repeat it."

Arguing against a Vietnam comparison is Webb, who continues to believe that war was justified, while Iraq is not. The senator, who taught himself Vietnamese after returning to the USA and has close ties to the Vietnamese-American community, said in an interview that he believes some of his fellow veterans have been "manipulated" into supporting the president's policy by those who have likened it to Vietnam.

"All the buzzwords you'd throw in over and over again, 'Ah, the media's against you; you know, you're going to go against the troops,' " Webb said. "So that in many ways they are emotionally reacting to Vietnam. Rather than seeing the reality of what we're facing today. "

The intensity of the Vietnam experience is evident in the political risks that veterans are taking in the Iraq debate, said former senator Bob Kerrey, a Nebraska Democrat who served as a Navy SEAL in Vietnam. In an interview with USA TODAY, Kerrey pointed to McCain and Hagel, who are considering running for the presidency in 2008.

"It will be harder for McCain to win a general election because of his support of the war; it will be harder for Hagel to win Republican primaries because of his opposition," said Kerrey, now president of the New School, a university in New York City.

Even if on opposite sides of the debate, combat veterans have credibility with each other, Kerrey said. Part of the reason, he said, are the memories that few of them like to discuss. "It's intense. It's unusually horrible," Kerrey said, trying to explain the camaraderie of those who have survived a battlefield. "It's like, 'I know what you're thinking about when the lights go out.' "

Vietnam vet lawmakers' positions

This is a list of known Vietnam War combat veterans in the House and Senate, and their positions on Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq.

Sources: U.S. House of Representatives Office of History and Preservation, U.S. Senate Historical Office and USA TODAY research by Kathy Kiely and William Risser

Soldier's Death Strengthens Senators' Antiwar Resolve (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Just before Christmas, an Army captain named Brian Freeman cornered Sens. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) at a Baghdad helicopter landing zone. The war was going badly, he told them. Troops were stretched so thin they were doing tasks they never dreamed of, let alone trained for.

Freeman, 31, took a short holiday leave to see his 14-month-old daughter and 2-year-old son, returned to his base in Karbala, Iraq, and less than two weeks ago died in a hail of bullets and grenades. Insurgents, dressed in U.S. military uniforms, speaking English and driving black American SUVs, got through a checkpoint and attacked, kidnapped four soldiers and later shot them. Freeman died in the assault, the fifth casualty of the brazen attack.

DOJ_NMG_0124098

The death of the West Point graduate -- a star athlete from Temecula, Calif., who ran bobsleds and skeletons with Winter Olympians -- has radicalized Dodd, energized Kerry and girded the ever-more confrontational stance of Democrats in the Senate. Freeman's death has reverberated on the Senate floor, in committee deliberations and on television talk shows.

"This was the kind of person you don't forget," Dodd said yesterday. "You mention the number dead, 3,000, the 22,000 wounded, and you almost see the eyes glaze over. But you talk about an individual like this, who was doing his job, a hell of a job, but was also willing to talk about what was wrong, it's a way to really bring it to life, to connect."

"When I returned from war, almost 40 years ago now, I stood up and spoke from my heart and my gut about what I thought was wrong," Kerry said on the Senate floor last week as he recounted his meeting with Freeman. "I asked the question in 1971: How do you ask a man to be the last man to die for a mistake? . . . I never thought that I would be reliving the need to ask that question again."

On Thursday, Freeman will be memorialized at his home in California, just days before the Senate takes up a resolution formally stating Congress's opposition to the president's plan to add 21,500 troops to the U.S. force in Iraq. There is no way to know what Freeman would have thought of it, but he would not have been shy about offering his opinion, Dodd said.

Freeman had served out his five-year active-duty tour well before he was sent to Iraq. He graduated from West Point in 1999, then in 2002 was accepted into the Army World Class Athlete Program, training with the U.S. bobsled and skeleton teams in Lake Placid, N.Y.

"It's no exaggeration, he was definitely one of the nicest guys in the start house," said Steve Peters, a team official.

In 2004, eager to get on with his career and family life, Freeman moved into the Individual Ready Reserve (IRR), a pool of trained soldiers not assigned to any unit, to serve out the rest of his eight-year mandatory obligation.

He was in California with a civilian job, a 1-year-old son named Gunnar and another baby on the way in the fall of 2005 when a shortage of officers prompted a large call-up by the IRR of West Point graduates from the classes of 1998 and later -- many of whom had only a few months of service left.

"He was an augmentee, who happened to be called up to fill a slot," said Sgt. 1st Class Joseph Edmond, a full-time staff member at the 412th Civil Affairs Battalion in Whitehall, Ohio, which Freeman was called to join. "It's almost to fill a void," he said, commenting on the Army's deepening manpower shortage, especially in the reserve, which requires it to cobble together units with people from across the country.

Charlotte Freeman, Freeman's wife, recalled her husband's shock upon receiving an Army telegram ordering him back to active duty. "He walked into the house and was totally white," she said yesterday. "He had moved on" from the Army.

"For my sake, he tried to get out" of the deployment, she said. But she knew he felt torn. "A part of him felt very guilty, because he had never gone to Iraq. He had dodged that bullet," she said.

Concerned about leaving his wife while she was pregnant, Freeman was able to obtain a three-month deferral and spend time with their newborn daughter, Ingrid. Just after Christmas in 2005, he grew so concerned about his pending deployment -- and his lack of qualifications to be a civil affairs officer -- that he anxiously contacted a reporter for The Washington Post.

Maj. Tony Nichols, who commanded a tank company that Freeman served in during his active duty, said Freeman "would have gone with a tank crew . . . in a heartbeat" but felt uneasy going with an unfamiliar civil affairs team.

Once in Iraq, Freeman was dismayed to find that his training "had no relation to what they were actually doing," Charlotte Freeman said. "He was appalled," enduring danger but seeing no clear mission, she said. Moreover, he believed that the Iraqis "didn't want us there."

Still, he did his best, working with the governor of Karbala to try to improve security and touching individual lives, such as helping an Iraqi boy who needed heart surgery and obtaining death benefits for an Iraqi interpreter's family. "He truly wanted to make a difference," Charlotte said.

Late last year, Freeman approached the senators at Landing Zone Washington, in Baghdad's Green Zone, "almost out of the shadows," Dodd recalled.

Even though he felt nervous, he told his wife later, he delivered his message with urgency. Soldiers were being deployed to do missions that they were utterly untrained to do; Freeman, for example, an armor officer, had been sent to help foster democracy and rebuild an Iraqi civil society. State Department personnel who could do those jobs were restricted in their travel off military bases by regional security officers who said it was unsafe for them to venture out.

DOJ_NMG_0124099

"Senator, it's nuts over here," Dodd quoted Freeman as saying.

Calling him "ridiculously" bright, Nichols said Freeman did not oppose the war but "wanted it to be done better and smarter."

After Dodd mentioned an unnamed Army captain's concerns on NBC's "Meet The Press," Freeman e-mailed him to bring up another concern: the mistreatment of Iraqi interpreters by military contractors.

The connection between Dodd and Freeman went beyond a chance encounter and an exchange of e-mails. On Jan. 20, the day of Freeman's death, his wife was visiting his mother in Utah when a neighbor called to say that a military vehicle had stopped by the Freeman home. Frantic for news, Charlotte Freeman contacted Dodd's staff. The senator's aides learned of Brian Freeman's fate from the Defense Department and helped get military officials dispatched to his wife.

Kerry took the news personally, aides said. In Freeman, he saw something of himself -- a promising young officer, articulate and politically minded. But Kerry made it back from Vietnam.

"All that loss, for what?" Dodd asked.

It was not just Freeman's death that deeply troubled and provoked the two senators, but the way he died, in an apparent betrayal by Iraqi allies. In the days after Freeman's death, Dodd drafted legislation to cap the number of troops in Iraq. Last week in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Kerry backed Dodd in a failed effort to attach the legislative cap to the nonbinding resolution of opposition.

And both men are demanding that the Senate push the confrontation with Bush further. Kerry has resurrected his call for legislation setting a date certain for the withdrawal of troops.

"The notion of sense-of-the-Senate resolutions, what the hell does that mean?" Dodd asked yesterday. "Is that all you got?"

Feingold Calls War Bluff (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, January 30, 2007

Senate Democrats oppose the war in Iraq, they just don't plan on stopping it.

They have discovered that standing up to the president is not quite as easy as vilifying him.

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., has decided, however, to challenge what he calls the "timidity" of Democratic leaders. He is going to introduce legislation cutting off funding for the Iraq war and he may do it, he told me, as early as this week.

I reached him by telephone Monday in Fond du Lac, Wis., where he was conducting one of his "Listening Sessions" with voters during a snowstorm.

I asked him whether Democratic voters were further to the left than their elected leaders, especially their presidential candidates, when it came to the war.

"That is not only true of Democrats," Feingold said, "it is true of the public as a whole. The mainstream view of the American people is to get out of Iraq."

Cutting off funds only for the planned 21,500 troop surge in Iraq and passing resolutions condemning the war has become the fallback position of Senate Democrats who are fearful of being portrayed as unpatriotic, cowardly, "Mommy Party" haters of the military.

Additional Resources

Fact sheet on Feingold's proposed legislation

Use the power of the purse: An opinion piece by Senator Russ Feingold

And they have reason to be afraid. The White House plays hardball. The White House is never reluctant to accuse those who oppose its policies in Iraq of being bashers of our troops and abettors of our enemies.

The Bush administration released a statement last weekend saying that even those who just want to prohibit the surge are sending "the wrong message to our troops, our enemies, and the Iraqi people."

DOJ_NMG_0124100

In Iowa Sunday, Hillary Clinton said: "At this point, I am not ready to cut off funding for American troops. I am not going to do that." She said that even if Congress passed such a bill, it would be pointless because we have "a president who will veto anything that impinges on his authority."

Feingold is not impressed with that argument. "It is not true this is a futile exercise," he said. "We can say no."

If, for instance, the Democrats attached an Iraq funding cutoff to an appropriations bill, the president would risk shutting down the government by vetoing it.

But some Democrats are worried. As Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid told my colleague John Bresnahan Thursday, Republicans "would like this debate to be as (to) whether or not we are going to be cutting off money for troops."

And others, including Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., who is running for president, says a funding cutoff probably is unconstitutional.

Which is why Feingold is chairing a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Tuesday to "help inform my colleagues and the public about Congress's power to end a war."

Feingold has gathered various legal and other experts to testify, but the result is a foregone conclusion. "I am going to lay out the reality that Congress does have this power," Feingold said. "The president does not have the unilateral power to (continue the war) without our consent."

Feingold said a cutoff of funding six months after the law is enacted "makes sense, it is constitutional, and our troops will not be left in the lurch."

Under Feingold's plan, the administration would have to safely redeploy troops from Iraq except for those needed to target counter-terrorism operations and provide security for U.S "infrastructure and civilian personnel" there, and a "limited number" to train Iraqi security services.

Feingold is going to put his fellow Democrats to the test: If you are really against this war, he is going to tell them, now is the time to show it.

"Those (Democrats) who are timid on this, who are they listening to?" he said. "The people don't want us to talk just about ending the escalation. They think this whole war is wrong."

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by TheRef on 01.29.2007 at 10:27 PM

If we end this war now and redeploy the troops out of the major combat areas, e.g. to the borders of Iraq and to receptive bordering states, Iraq will remain in a state of chaos. The civil war may well escalate. Many thousands of Iraqis will be killed or maimed. Iraq will remain in a state of anarchy well into the foreseeable future.

If we continue the US participation in this Iraqi civil war, Iraq will remain in a state of chaos. The civil war may well escalate. Many thousands of Iraqis will be killed or maimed. Iraq will remain in a state of anarchy well into the foreseeable future. Added to Iraq's losses, tens of thousands of Americans will be killed or maimed while serving in Iraq. Billions more dollars will be spent ...wasted.

Which is the lesser of evils?

1) Anarchy in Iraq with many thousands of Iraqi casualties. 2) Anarchy in Iraq with many thousands of Iraqi casualties and the tens of thousands of American casualties added.

Is America fighting in a misguided attempt to save face for George Bush? Bush has so besmearched America in the eyes of the world ...the saving of America's "face" will require a generation or more to accomplish.

George W. Bush has not proven worthy of expending another ounce of blood or another dollar of treasure to save. The only sane solution is to move the troops to the borders of Iraq and beyond. We should do it now.

by Phil Sexton on 01.29.2007 at 10:17 PM

callmark1 The news this evening gave just a hint of a possibility that attacking the perpetrators of terrorism in Iraq might stop them long enough for a strong government to form. If so, it might be an indicator that a surge would work and Iraq could be self-governing in a sort of democratic way. What if that is indeed the case, but the anti-war coalition succeeded in forcing the effort to stop, before it bore fruit? What then? Diplomacy will not succeed without a credible threat of ill consequences if the diplomatic target refuses to bend. If we give up, the credibility of any threat is nil.

by ATLMerlinAF on 01.29.2007 at 08:06 PM

If I hear the Constitutional argument against Congress? war powers again, I am going to puke. The power to take this country into and out of war rests with the people?s branch (Congress). Now, whether that be by an outright resolution to stop the war or a resolution to cut-off funding, it is well within the bounds of the Congress to decide. As it relates to a Presidential veto for cutting off war funds, yes the Executive can choose to do that but, consider the implications. Not only will a veto infuriate the American people but it will infuriate Congress commencing a full-blown Constitutional showdown that Congress WILL win. Considering that the President?s approval ratings are at the lowest that anyone can remember, rivaling Presidents Nixon and Carter, the President doesn?t have much currency with the people right now.

I am actually relieved that someone has taken the burden upon themselves to propose the inevitable. Whether we like or not, whether it be sooner or later, this Congress is going to have to take action because they feel that the American people have mandated them to do so. I am a firm believer in the old adage that ?politics stops at the water?s edge? but it appears that this political paradigm has subsided along with the Weinberger Doctrine (and the Powell Corollary).

by Butch on 01.29.2007 at 07:54 PM

Maybe the thing to do is repeal the bill that gave King George XLIII the authority to invade.

by citizen11 on 01.29.2007 at 07:11 PM

The pragmatic thing to do is let Bush's war run it's course and hope the electorate will be angrier at the neo cons that started it than at the democrats they elected to end it. But that pragmatism comes at a very high cost, the continued loss of our young men and women. I for one think we should do whatever it takes to neuter this fool and his mentor. When you are going down the wrong road, things don't start getting better until you turn around. To continue upon a path that you know is wrong is beyond stupid, it is insane. I for one doubt that things could get any worst over there, and if they do then at least our soldiers will be somewhere else.

by callmark1 on 01.29.2007 at 06:55 PM

Phil Sexton:

Fair enough! It is not that there have been no alternative suggestions. It is that none of them have been given any focus by this administration. Furthermore, diplomacy has been practically non-existent. In addition, we as americans do not seem to want to make any sacrifices ... it seems we would rather place the burden of this conflict solely on the military than make some lifestyle changes. Here's a radical one: Talk to the Iranians, Syrians and others. Do this instead of surrounding them with three "western-occupied" countries (Israel, Afghanistan & Iraq) and then admonishing & threatening them for not doing their part to support our efforts. what hubris!!

As I recall, GW's father was at least able to get support from Syria in '91. But after the last 6 years of cowboy BS, re-establishing dialogue will take skill, humility and much effort, 2 out of three of which this administration seems to lack. So the first step would be to take control away from those who have a vested interest in further military action and refuse to consider any other route.

Here's another radical one: Re-focus on the underlying problems of the mid-east such as Israel vs. Palestine, massive displacement & poverty. Get tough with repressive regimes instead of aiding them (remember that it is Sunni-dominated, Saudi Arabia that funded the madrasas in Afghanistan from which sprang the taliban, and that most of the hijackers of 911 were Saudi. And what exactly has Israel done for us exept to promote prejudice, intolerance and its own expansionist agenda?).

Here are some more: immediate steps to curb dependence on foreign oil including a sharp increase in gas taxes here to be used for massive investment in alternative fuels, a govt. communication campaign to encourage conservation & a billion $ prize to the first person or entity to come up with a cost-effective hydrogen car instead of subsidies to the oil companies (gee, I wonder what THEIR solution would

by Paradise on 01.29.2007 at 05:46 PM

Russ Feingold has lost touch with reality. I really don't know what he stands for, but cutting off the funds for our troops is not the way to send a message to Bush. but it sure will send one to the terrorists. Senator Feingold think America!!!

by RollinG on 01.29.2007 at 05:34 PM

Even though my heart is with Russ I do not think this is a good idea. Going into Iraq was a bad idea from the start and the longer we stay the more our solders will continue to die. That being said, if the Democratic controlled congress cuts of funds then they will get the blame for ?loosing the war?. As much as I hate the idea we have to let this run its course that is the only way I see now so that ones that are responsible get the blame.

We should not forget that this is not just Bush?s war. There is a whole group of neocon hawks that convinced Bush that this was a good idea in the first place. As this catastrophe continues they are looking for some place to shift the blame. They can never admit they were wrong. You know, mistakes have been made but it is never their mistakes. I can hear it now, ?if those Democrats had not pulled the plug we would have turned it around in another 6 months?. In case any has not been paying attention, it is always another 6 months and things will be better.

Bush is out in two years but the neocons that put him in power in the first place are still out there pushing their misguided policies. They must be held accountable for the death and destruction they have wrought.

by Captain Div on 01.29.2007 at 05:31 PM

This is impossible for a lot of reasons, but the long and short of it is that there is a presidential election in 2008. The Dems want to get the presidency back. If the democratic majority in congress pulls the plug on Iraq, and the region subsequently descends into further violence and chaos (which pretty much all of the credible middle east scholars predict will happen), the dems will be seen as responsible. People will not care if it was a Republican who started the war. They will care that the mess got bigger under the eyes of Congressional democrats who will then be running for the presidency. None of them want to have to answer to the public for that.

This measure will not just die, it will go down in flames with a handful of symbolic votes. Feingold knows this. He's pushing it in order to present himself as anti-war, and consolidate public support from the anti-war segment of the population.

Do you really think that the people on either side of the aisle have the conviction to do something because they think it's right? This is about the consolidation of power and the projection of a public image.

by jeremy on 01.29.2007 at 05:05 PM

Headline: Feingold Calls War Bluff

Frontpage Teaser: Senate Democrats oppose the war in Iraq, they just don't plan on stopping it. They have discovered that standing up to the president is not quite as easy as vilifying him.

And those are connected how?

Has Politico already fallen prey to mainstream hackerism?

by Phil Sexton on 01.29.2007 at 04:49 PM

I have no idea what the consequences of leaving Iraq would be. Neither does anyone else. And consequences are the important things. Real life is not similar to scientific laboratory experiments in which you can try different alternatives and see what happens. Once we leave Iraq, if horrible things happen (even more horrible than what is now happening) we cannot just say 'woops' and start over. I feel that I have no choice but to allow the President to do whatever he thinks best. If you believe differently, then please say what your full solution is and tell us how you can guarantee the consequences.

by Joshua on 01.29.2007 at 04:42 PM

Feingold has the right idea. I am tired of hearing how much congress is against the troop surge and many against the war. The toothless resolutions proposed last week are meaningless when you have Dick Cheney telling Wolf Blitzer no one at the White House cares. The Bush Administration is playing hardball and it is about time the United States Congress does as well.

Feingold however, has proposed a resolution with loopholes. Congress should propose a bill that leaves nothing to question. Feingold's plan should not include language such as a "limited number to train Iraqi security services." There should be a specific number of troops funded and not any more. The Iraq War is not helping the United States and is making life worse for people living in that territory.

by Mystere on 01.29.2007 at 04:40 PM

This is a W. war and he and only he has to deal with that. This war will be ended by the next democrat president.

by Benadork on 01.29.2007 at 04:37 PM

"To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces" Article I Section 8 does allow Congress to say where troops are and are not allowed, so if he can get the votes for it, I so go wild Russ.

by Mystere on 01.29.2007 at 04:37 PM

Cutting of the fund now is the worst thing to do for the democrats. every body knows that this is an unwinnable situation. So let the deccider in chief deal with the problem he created. The word will be ended by the next president if and only if he or she is a democrat. So democrat concentrate on 2008.

by citizen11 on 01.29.2007 at 04:36 PM

I believe that if we could wave a wand and get all of out troops out of there tomorrow, the american people would support it. This has devolved into a civil war that has simmered for hundreds of years. We should have NEVER gone in there! Now there are no good choices left.

by Hotspur on 01.29.2007 at 04:35 PM

Once again, go Rusty! And shame on you, Politico, for the crappy Photoshopping job on that picture. Whatsamatter, couldn't find any actual shots of Obama looking concerned about Feingold's standing up for the wishes of seventy percent of the electorate? (Oh, what am I saying - of course you couldn't. 'Cause they don't exist. Man, don'tcha hate it when there's no real-life photo to support the biased subtext you're trying to convey to the casual reader?)

by The Decider on 01.29.2007 at 04:07 PM

There is little doubt that the current administration will be etched into history with the shameful label as the ?most incompetent? ever in America during wartime. From the ridiculous lack of planning for postwar Iraq to the shameless unwillingness to admit that Iraq was swirling into a Civil War. Even most of the neoconservatives who are the architects of this war have admitted that it has become a debacle. In their own description, this war was supposed to be a ?cakewalk,? but it quickly became a quagmire. These, though expressed in the words of opinion, are truly facts.

But Feingold?s attempt to cut off funding is potentially as disastrous. To have been antiwar before the war, such as Senator Jim Webb, does not mean that one has to be willing to cut off funding, even if it is just for the ?surge,? today. Without a coherent plan to stabilize at least the borders of Iraq, a power of the purse measure will only prove disastrous for the Middle East. When Democrats take rhetorical stands on the genocidal practices of foreign governments, such as the current predicament in Darfur, they must take into consideration what will happen in Iraq after our soldiers leave. There?s a good chance that genocide will take place, a Shiite-led Sunni Genocide. Let us not forget that.

by JSteele on 01.29.2007 at 03:59 PM

At last, we have a Democrat with backbone! Two thumbs up for Sen. Feingold! Cutting the funds for Viet-Raq is the best solution to end an ongoing quagmire. No more death and destruction on our troops, the Iraqi people, and on the people here at home.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

Congress Tests Bounds Of Its War Power (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, January 30, 2007

The new Democratic-led Congress is on a collision course with the White House over how far lawmakers can or should go to stop the war in Iraq, a dispute that could test the bounds of the Constitution.

President Bush has insisted he won't back down on a decision to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq and will ignore any resolutions passed by Congress that state opposition to his plan. The Senate is expected to consider such a measure in coming days.

Some Democrats say Congress must consider tougher alternatives to force the president's hand, including cutting funding, capping the number of troops allowed in Iraq and setting an end date for the war.

"This Congress was never meant to be a rubber stamp," Sen. Barbara Boxer told her colleagues last week. "Read the Constitution. The Congress has the power to declare war. And on multiple occasions, we used our power to end conflicts."

DOJ_NMG_0124104

Boxer has proposed a bill that would call for troops to come home in 180 days, allowing a minimum number to say behind to hunt down terrorists and train Iraqi security forces.

But many legal scholars and congressional Republicans say such legislation is not within Congress' power. The president has control of military forces, they say.

"Once Congress raises an army, it's his to command," said Robert Turner, a law professor at the University of Virginia who plans to testify Tuesday before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

But whether a president needs congressional approval to wage war is up for debate among many scholars. In recent decades, presidents have routinely bypassed Congress when deploying troops to fight. Not since World War II has Congress issued an official declaration of war, despite lengthy wars fought in Vietnam and Korea.

"People think Congress has to say OK to everything," said John Yoo, a former Justice Department official who helped Bush write the 2002 resolution authorizing the Iraq invasion. But if that were true "that means every war we've fought since World War II is illegal."

Yoo, now a law professor at the University of California in Berkeley, said Bush's request that Congress pass a resolution authorizing force in Iraq was purely a political one. The resolution passed by a 296-133 vote in the GOP-run House and 77-23 in the Democratic-led Senate, but was not considered a declaration of war.

According to Yoo, the resolution was seen solely as a way of bringing Democrats onboard.

Sen. John Warner, the former chairman of the Armed Services Committee and former Navy secretary, said he agrees Congress has no right to manage a war.

"In an ongoing operation, you've got to defer to the commander in chief," said Warner, R-Va.

But the veteran senator said he understands the debate that surrounds constitutional war powers and lawmakers' ability to check the executive branch.

"There's always going to be this gray area between the powers of Congress and the powers of the executive branch," Warner said. "Never has been resolved, never will. We all want to leave it in a gray area."

Sen. Russ Feingold, who will chair Tuesday's hearing on war powers, says Congress shouldn't flounder on the issue when it has the ability to end the war by cutting funding for it.

In coming months, the Bush administration is expected to request Congress approve at least $700 billion in military funding, giving lawmakers the clearest opportunity to pull the plug on the war. The bill is expected to include 2007 and 2008 supplemental war spending, as well as 2008 annual military spending.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who chairs the House panel that oversees defense spending, says he wants to place such stringent conditions on the funding that Bush will have no choice but to scale back U.S. involvement in Iraq.

Feingold, D-Wis., proposes eliminating the war budget after six months, an approach he says will give Bush time to bring troops home without adversely affecting their well being.

"Americans are not looking to Congress to pass symbolic measures, they are looking to us to stop the president's failed Iraq policy," Feingold said. "That is why we must finally break this taboo that somehow Congress can't talk about using its power of the purse to end the war in Iraq."

Democrats Must Not Fold: Hold Bush Accountable At Retreat (RC)

By Donna Brazile

Roll Call, January 30, 2007

January is all but over, and what an active month it has been. For many, especially the newly empowered Democrats, this has been a month of celebrations and getting down to the people's business by passing important pieces of legislation. We've also heard President Bush give his second-to-last State of the Union address and, more importantly, we are monitoring those who would like to have his job in the future.

Bush, who visited House Republicans last week on Maryland's Eastern Shore, also is planning to drop by the House Democratic retreat this weekend in Williamsburg, Va. The president, while continuing his appeal to critics and supporters alike to give his new policy in Iraq a chance to succeed, is expected to take just five questions. Let's hope the Democrats, unlike the Republicans, who had a chance to field 15 questions, will not be afraid to discuss the one issue on everyone's mind these days: Iraq and the plan to add more troops.

Last week, Defense Secretary Robert Gates made the charge that critics of the administration's plan for a troop surge will aid the enemy. A similar charge has been made by others, including Vice President Cheney and Lt. Gen. David Petraeus. Once again, this is an old and tired, but not unexpected, argument by those who wish to simply stay the course and not come up with a strategy that would transition our mission, as most Americans believe, from combat to helping train the Iraqi forces and assisting with border security.

The choice between quiet acquiescence to a policy most Americans now believe is fundamentally wrong and calling on Members of Congress to resist that policy with all their might could just be a no-brainer. As inconvenient and messy as it might be, we should count our blessings that it's a choice we are allowed to make, and the administration should welcome and encourage this debate. To call on Congress to curtail this debate with a filibuster or to suggest that those offering various resolutions are somehow "aiding and abetting the enemy" is totally absurd and offensive.

This democracy stuff sure is messy sometimes, huh? Here's what I would ask the president:

Mr. President, could you please clarify which enemy would we embolden? Is it the Sunnis who are angry about losing power and fear being subjugated by the Shia majority? Is it the Shia militias who want revenge for Saddam Hussein's (Sunni) tyrannical oppression? Is it foreign fighters (including al-Qaida) who have entered Iraq to foment aggression and kill Americans in the process? I would argue the enemy is the latter; the others seem more interested in killing each other while our courageous troops are just getting in the way.

The premise that the nonbinding, bipartisan resolutions currently being considered in Congress give comfort to and embolden these enemies is predicated on an assumption that the enemies are not aware of the debate that has been occurring here about the war. To honestly think these enemies, with access to the Internet, satellite TV and newspapers, are unaware of our national mood and growing unease with the administration's strategy is either pretty naive or pretty foolish.

So what are our options? The first is to execute the administration's war strategy and quietly hope for the best. The original premise would preclude any discussion or concern about the progress of the war, as this would show uncertainty on our part and encourage our enemy. The second option is to convince the administration to change course. This option tends to be noisy and showy and exposes the soft underbelly of our republic. It's this soft underbelly that, in my opinion, is one of the great things about our country: our freedom to have a no-holds-barred debate on our country's course and direction.

Does that debate embolden our enemy? Perhaps it could. Is that justification to stifle our discussion and debate and to prevent open questioning of the conduct and course our nation takes? Never. Not to me. Any enemy who takes away our ability to internally debate our strategies has beaten us; it doesn't matter what the battle scorecard says.

Those arguing the premise that there should be no debate obviously have a vested interest in a specific course and are, no doubt, embarrassed by the spectacle of our disarray. It would be a lot easier to implement their policy without putting up much resistance. Well, I would argue: "been there and done that" for the past four years.

The bottom line, as Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) recently stated upon return from the region, is to help the Iraqi government find a political solution and to continue to help the government rid its country of these unwanted elements such as al-Qaida.

The current U.S. occupation (along with a dwindling number of coalition forces) of Iraq is just a drop in the bucket when you have 1,300 years to avenge; they, clearly, have a lot of patience. But for many Americans, our patience with the incompetent mismanagement of the war has grown thin. It's time we have this debate and discussion in Congress. I hope the House Democrats tell the president to stay tuned.

Donna Brazile, the campaign manager for Democratic presidential nominee Al Gore in 2000, runs her own grass-roots political consulting firm.

Former Coalition Official Sentenced In Fraud Case (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124106

A former official of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority was sentenced yesterday to nine years in prison and ordered to forfeit $3.6 million for his role in one of the largest fraud schemes to emerge from the reconstruction of Iraq, the Justice Department said yesterday.

Robert J. Stein, 52, of North Carolina was arrested in November 2005 and pleaded guilty in February 2006 to charges that included bribery, money laundering and conspiracy. He was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Washington.

In his role as comptroller and funding officer for the Coalition Provisional Authority in south-central Iraq, Stein worked with other Defense Department officials to rig the bids on reconstruction contracts so that all the work went to American businessman Philip H. Bloom, according to prosecutors. In exchange, Bloom gave the officials more than $1 million in cash, plus such luxury gifts as SUVs, a motorcycle, jewelry, computers, airline tickets, liquor and promises of future employment.

Prosecutors also say Stein and other members of the scheme stole $2 million in reconstruction funds, and that Bloom laundered the money before giving it back to Stein and his co-conspirators. Bloom, who has pleaded guilty and is scheduled to be sentenced in February, received more than $8.6 million in what prosecutors said were rigged contracts. Another official, Army Reserve Lt. Col. Bruce D. Hopfengardner, has also pleaded guilty in connection with the scheme.

The Justice Department said yesterday that Stein has cooperated with the government's investigation.

"The Department of Justice will protect the integrity of the federal contracting process by aggressively prosecuting fraud, bribery and other crimes that taint missions as critical as the reconstruction of Iraq," Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said in a statement.

As Iraqi Refugees Flee, Let's Not Forget Vietnam (USAT)

By Adam Goodheart And John R. Bohrer

USA Today, January 30, 2007

At a hearing on Capitol Hill two weeks ago, a young Iraqi gave gripping testimony of the price paid by his countrymen who have risked their lives serving the U.S. occupation. The 27-year-old former military translator, whose name was withheld for his safety, told senators of receiving death threats and surviving a car bombing after he was identified as a friend of the Americans.

It was a story eerily reminiscent of tales from Southeast Asia more than three decades ago, when hundreds of thousands of our loyal allies faced imprisonment and death as the Vietnam War drew to a close. The world still remembers the agonizing photo of crowds swarming the last U.S. helicopter that took off from Saigon in 1975.

Although Iraq, as yet, offers no image to match that one, its refugee crisis is almost as dire. According to the United Nations, as many as 3.4 million people have fled (including many who left before the U.S. invasion), a number that continues to escalate. Yet since the 2003 invasion, only 466 Iraqi refugees have been allowed into the USA.

As our leaders face a worsening situation and as calls for a U.S. withdrawal from Iraq grow louder, we should remember the lessons of 1975. President Gerald Ford put his political capital on the line to rescue some 130,000 Vietnamese. (Nearly a million more would be admitted through other channels in the years that followed.)

The refugees were airlifted out to relocation camps in the United States. Then, after undergoing security checks, they were matched by the State Department with U.S. churches, families and civic groups. "To do less," President Ford later recalled of his effort, "would have added moral shame to humiliation."

At the recent hearings, Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey said that her department wishes it could allow as many as 20,000 Iraqis to seek asylum here. Yet she admitted that the difficulty of setting up asylum application centers in Iraq might make it impossible.

Baghdad in January 2007 has still not reached the point of Saigon in April 1975. If the Ford administration could quickly save 130,000 people amid the tidal wave of a full-scale military defeat, surely the Bush administration can save 20,000, or more, from Iraq.

Compared with occupation costs of about $300 million per day, the money Sauerbrey spoke of allotting to the refugee crisis seems laughable. She boasted that in 2006, the U.S. provided $400,000 to support U.N. refugee resettlement efforts, a figure it proposes to increase to $500,000 this year. (If you divide $500,000 by the 3.4 million Iraqi refugees, you get a commitment of about 14 cents per refugee.)

DOJ_NMG_0124107

Efforts for increasing the flow of Iraqi immigrants also have been stymied by post-9/11 counterterrorism laws that make it difficult for anyone from the Middle East to enter the USA. That's an especially cruel irony, since the refugees in greatest peril are those who have put their lives on the line for what President Bush has declared is a war against terrorism.

In late 1975, less than eight months after the first refugee landed in the USA, the State Department declared the resettlement effort successfully completed (at a total cost of $405 million).

"The refugees have proven themselves to be hard-working and industrious people with a thirst for education," Ford told the nation. "The warmth and generosity that have characterized the welcome that Americans have given to the refugees serve as a reaffirmation of American awareness of the roots and the ideals of our society."

If the Bush administration is prepared to reaffirm those ideals Ford so eloquently invoked, it should extend a similar welcome in 2007.

Adam Goodheart is Hodson Trust-Griswold Director of the Starr Center for the Study of the American Experience at Washington College in Chestertown, Md. John R. Bohrer is a political writer and blogger.

Reconstruction Aid Falling Into The Wrong Hands (WT)

By Gethin Chamberlain

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

LONDON -- Corrupt Afghan police and tribal leaders are stealing vast quantities of reconstruction aid intended to improve the lives of people and turn them away from the Taliban, U.S. and British officials said.

In some cases, all the aid earmarked for an area has ended up in the wrong hands, officials said. NATO forces in the south of the country fear corrupt police will steal aid if handed out through them. A Pentagon official said thousands of cars and trucks intended for use by the Afghan police had been sold instead.

Charles Heyman, a defense analyst and former British army major, said millions of dollars earmarked for reconstruction were being siphoned off.

"It almost comes with the program," he said. "You have to build in an element of that into any program because you know it will leak into people's pockets."

Liam Fox, the defense spokesman for the opposition Conservative Party in Britain, said he heard firsthand of corruption affecting reconstruction programs when he visited Afghanistan last summer.

"There is increasing corruption from top government officials down, which is making efforts to get reconstruction off the ground much more difficult," he said.

Last week, the United States and European Union announced plans to spend an additional $13.7 billion on assistance to Afghanistan, of which almost $3 billion will be earmarked for reconstruction.

NATO commanders in southern Afghanistan are concerned at the level of corruption but have resolved to press ahead with reconstruction projects in the hope of winning over the local population and improving security.

In one recent example in Kandahar province, aid distribution went ahead despite fears that it would be stolen.

Sgt. Maj. Denis Tondreau, in charge of delivering Canadian army aid to the Pashmul area, said the Afghan police unit in one village was known for corruption and extortion.

"I have been told that if I bring aid to Pasab, the police will steal it," he said. "They are just a bad, bad unit ... [known for] extortion, corruption and use of drugs."

But people in the area said tribal and mosque elders were also guilty of stealing aid. In the nearby town of Panjwaii, workers said aid distributed by NATO's provincial reconstruction teams had not reached the ordinary people.

"When the soldiers came here, they gave things to the rich people. The elders took things for themselves, and we received nothing," said a local resident, Abdul Ghany, 20.

A police intelligence officer in the neighboring Zharey district said tribal leaders had to be convinced that the aid was not intended for them alone.

At a heated meeting he warned them: "The equipment is not to rebuild your own homes; it is for the mosques and the whole village. It is not for individuals; it is for the community. It is not for you to take it to your houses and sell it."

DOJ_NMG_0124108

A joint report by the Pentagon and the State Department, circulated to congressional committees last month, concluded that the Afghan police force was corrupt to the point of ineffectiveness. One Pentagon official said police officers had stolen and sold at least half of the equipment supplied by the United States, including thousands of cars and trucks.

The U.S. Agency for International Development, however, said progress has been made in reconstruction projects.

"We work closely with local people, the governor and representatives of the national government in drawing up projects, to make sure that what we do meets the needs of local people," a spokesman said.

Among the projects funded by the agency are the purchase of uniforms and winter coats for the Afghan police, a hospital generator and a mortuary. But it confirmed that some of the nearly $4 million allocated to projects intended to help internal refugees had been diverted to build vehicle checkpoints.

A committee of British lawmakers plans to investigate the corruption, which has dogged operations in Afghanistan since the Taliban were driven from power in 2001.

"Corruption is something we will be examining in the future," said James Arbuthnot, chairman of the House of Commons defense select committee.

Discarding An Afghan Opportunity (WP)

By Selig S. Harrison

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

The British Raj learned the hard way a century ago that the Pashtuns, Afghanistan's largest and historically dominant ethnic group, will unite to fight a foreign occupation force simply because it is foreign. Applying this lesson to the Afghan crisis today, British generals have been attempting in vain to change a high-profile U.S.-NATO military strategy that is helping the Taliban consolidate Pashtun support in southern Afghanistan.

Bombing and strafing attacks on suspected Taliban hideouts killed at least 4,643 Afghan civilian noncombatants from October 2001 to Oct. 1, 2006, according to an exhaustive study by University of New Hampshire economist Marc W. Herold. The result has been the steady growth of anti-American sentiment focused on the U.S.-backed regime of President Hamid Karzai.

"The cruelty is too much," Karzai declared last month. In tears, Karzai said that the coalition forces are "killing our children. We can't prevent the terrorists from coming from Pakistan, we can't stop the coalition from bombing the terrorists, and our children are dying because of this."

The British model for a new approach to defusing the Taliban insurgency has unfolded recently in the Musa Qala district of Helmand province. Following bitter clashes last summer between British and Taliban forces, the Musa Qala tribal council, acting with British approval and backed by Helmand's governor, Mohammed Daud, negotiated a cease-fire in early September that led to a 15-point peace agreement. The accord provided for an end to the Taliban offensive, the withdrawal of British forces and the creation of a local militia that would replace the ineffectual central government police and army units in the district. After peace prevailed for 35 days, the British pulled out on Oct. 17.

Peace still prevails. Nevertheless, Karzai, under intense U.S. pressure, fired Daud and appointed a new governor who disowned the accord as a sellout to the Taliban.

The British commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan stands by the agreement, but U.S. spokesmen say that his American successor will order British forces to resume fighting in Musa Qala when he takes over shortly.

Attacking the peace deal, U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann declared that "if you have an area that is under the Afghan government flag but is not under the actual authority of the Afghan government, then you are losing in a very big way." Other critics emphasize that Taliban fighters were not disarmed under the agreement.

But the accord has given tribal elders the whip hand over the Taliban in the area and is so popular that many neighboring districts want to emulate it. Why criticize the agreement before the elders' ability to contain Taliban influence could be tested? Is it really "losing in a very big way" if Pashtun leaders make local peace deals that work? Only if "victory" is defined in terms of an unrealistic goal of rapid centralization in a still-feudal society that has never been centralized.

For three centuries the Afghan state has been just barely a state, and ethnic and tribal communities paid obeisance to Kabul only if it accorded them autonomy. The communist regime installed by Moscow in 1978 aroused bitter opposition by attempting to centralize overnight. Now the U.S.-backed Karzai government is making a similar mistake by rushing to create a centralized regime instead of keying the process to the gradual development of a national economic infrastructure.

DOJ_NMG_0124109

The central government has a critical role to play in combating the Taliban, but primarily through more effective economic assistance, with less accompanying corruption, not through military intervention that bypasses the tribal structure. The fledgling national police and army have a role in areas where tribal leaders want their help. But they are tainted in the eyes of many Pashtuns by their identification with a Kabul regime dominated by non-Pashtun ethnic rivals.

In 2001 the United States lined up with the Tajik ethnic minority, whose small military force, the Northern Alliance, helped dislodge the Pashtun-based Taliban and has subsequently dominated the Karzai government. Tajik generals and their proxies still control the army as well as key secret police and intelligence agencies hated by the Pashtuns. Karzai, a Pashtun, has attempted to soften Tajik domination with Pashtun appointments to top security jobs, but the real power remains in the hands of a U.S.-backed Tajik clique.

The Taliban is effectively exploiting Pashtun dissatisfaction with Kabul, recruiting many of its fighters from disaffected tribes in the Ghilzai branch of the Pashtuns, who resent the favoritism Karzai has shown to higher-status tribes such as his own Durranis. Mullah Omar, the key Taliban leader, is a Ghilzai.

But there are two other important reasons for the Taliban's growing strength: the support it is getting from Pakistan and Pashtun anger over the civilian casualties resulting from the indiscriminate use of U.S. air power.

To prevent a continued Taliban upsurge, the United States should condition future economic and military aid to Islamabad on meaningful measures to shut down Taliban camps and staging areas on the Pakistani side of the border. At the same time, the Pentagon should shift to a low-profile military strategy in which air attacks are the rare exception and peace initiatives like those of the Musa Qala elders are welcomed.

The writer covered Afghanistan as South Asia bureau chief of The Post and is the author of "Out of Afghanistan: The Inside Story of the Soviet Withdrawal." He is director of the Asia program at the Center for International Policy.

Iraqis Get Ideas From S.C. Prisons (AP)

By Meg Kinnard, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 30, 2007

Iraqi prison officials looking to rebuild their nation's jail system toured a state prison Monday, gathering ideas — including electronic door locks and an onsite license plate plant — to take back to their country.

A delegation that included U.S. Justice Department officials and their Iraqi counterparts visited the maximum security Broad River Correctional Institution, where the Iraqis watched inmates make South Carolina license plates and traffic signs.

Iraqi prisoners don't have a place to work, one visitor said through an interpreter.

The plant enables an inmate "to help himself and his family. We can have productive inmates, not just consumer inmates," said the warden of a Nasiriyah prison, whose name was withheld by the Justice Department for his own safety.

The group also was interested in the prison's security system, which includes electronically locking doors and video monitoring.

"My first impression is that the prisons here are totally different from ours," the warden said. "For example, the security system, the electric doors — we don't have this technology."

The delegation visited South Carolina because the state prison system was similar in size and organization to the existing Iraqi system, said Georgette Thornton, who works in Baghdad with the department's International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program.

The two-week visit to South Carolina will include trips to other state prisons as well as a federal prison.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

KLA-Tencor Books Options Charge, Found 'intentional' Mispricing (DOW)

Dow Jones, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124110

SAN FRANCISCO (Dow Jones) -- KLA-Tencor Corp., one of the nation's largest chip-equipment makers, booked a $370 million non-cash charge related to stock options it intentionally backdated.

It also may face a lawsuit from its former chief executive officer, who in a role as an adviser to the company was fired in connection with its option- accounting investigation.

In a Securities and Exchange Commission filing Monday, KLA-Tencor said it took a charge of $348 million for stock options it granted from July 1994 through June 2005 and a $22 million charge for the year ended June 30, 2006, due to erroneous accounting methods.

The San Jose, Calif., chip-equipment maker was forced to record the charges after a special board committee found that the company had granted stock options to executive officers and other employees at advantageous prices.

In essence, KLA-Tencor awarded stock options at prices that were lower than those on the option-grant dates it recorded on its books.

The company began its internal investigation in May. The Justice Department and the SEC also are investigating KLA-Tencor.

KLA-Tencor (KLAC) said in the filing that it stopped misdating stock options after June 2002, with a few "immaterial exceptions." It found no wrongdoing by its current management team, now led by CEO

Rick Wallace.

By filing restated financial statements, the company also said it expects to comply with Nasdaq reporting requirements, meaning its stock shouldn't face delisting.

KLA-Tencor said its internal investigation concluded that the "retroactive pricing was intentional, not inadvertent, or through administrative error" and that it involved the "falsification of company records."

The former CEO,

Kenneth Schroeder, was dismissed in October 2006 in his role as a senior adviser. He had formally stepped down as CEO in December 2005 after serving in executive roles with the company since 1991.

This past November, Schroeder's counsel informed KLA-Tencor that the former CEO "contests the company's right" to terminate his employment relationship and agreement to cancel his stock options, the SEC filing said.

KLA-Tencor said it plans to "vigorously defend" against any claims that may be brought by Schroeder, which could involve a material amount of money. The company has formed a special litigation panel to handle lawsuits resulting from its erroneous accounting.

The company has canceled $20 million of options that Schroeder had held. His attorney could not be immediately reached for comment. Schroeder was a longtime member of the company's stock-option committee and a director for six years.

In midday trading Monday, KLA-Tencor shares rose nearly 0.4% to $49.13. The company makes machines that produce chips for computers and other consumer electronics.

`NatWest Three' Again Seek Dismissal Of Enron Charges (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Laurel Brubaker Calkins

Bloomberg, January 30, 2007

Jan. 29 (Bloomberg) -- Three former British bankers accused in an Enron Corp.-related fraud scheme have again asked a federal judge in Houston to dismiss charges they cheated their onetime employer, Greenwich NatWest Ltd.

David Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew argued that the indictment, which accuses them of skimming $7.35 million from the sale of an Enron-related partnership, improperly applied U.S. criminal law to British citizens acting in the U.K. In December, U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein revised the charges without dropping any counts.

``The wire fraud statute does not extend to the foreign scheme alleged,'' the bankers said in court papers filed Jan. 22. They claim the U.S. Congress didn't intend to criminalize the activity of ``a foreign national who allegedly defrauded his foreign employer in a foreign country."

Bermingham, 44, Darby 44, and Mulgrew, 45, were extradited to the U.S. in July and are charged with seven counts each of wire fraud. If convicted, they face as much as 35 years in prison. Prosecutors said the three skimmed millions in 2000 by misleading Greenwich NatWest about the value of an Enron partnership. They are free on $1 million bond each and scheduled to go on trial in September.

The original 2002 indictment relied on the legal theory that the bankers had deprived Greenwich NatWest, which has since been acquired by Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc, of their honest services. To bolster their latest request to drop the charges, the bankers cited a December decision by Werlein to remove references to honest services from the indictment.

Honest Services

The honest-services argument was struck down in August by an appeals court in another criminal case stemming from a transaction at Houston-based Enron. The appeals court said an employee didn't deprive his company of honest services if he acted in the company's best interests and in line with management goals.

``The invalid honest services theory so permeates the entire indictment that there is no way to determine whether the grand jury would have indicted the defendants if only the property theory had been presented to it," the bankers said in their Jan. 22 filing.

When prosecutors asked Werlein last year to strike the honest-services allegations, they said it was to streamline the case and avoid appellate issues.

`Money and Property'

``The United States will proceed at trial against defendants solely on the grounds that they deprived NatWest of money and property," Steven Tyrrell, acting U.S. attorney in the Justice Department's Fraud Section, wrote in December. Removing the honest-services allegations ``does not deny the defendants their grand jury rights," he said.

Jaclyn Lesch, a Justice Department spokeswoman, declined to comment on the bankers' request, saying the government will respond in court at the proper time. Lawyers for the bankers didn't return calls seeking comment.

Enron, once the world's largest energy trading firm, had more than $68 billion in market value before its December 2001 bankruptcy filing. The company's top executives were convicted of misleading investors by hiding billions in losses and debts in off-the-books partnerships.

The case is U.S. v. Bermingham, 4:02-cr-00597, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Former Executives Spared Prison Time In Cendant Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Christoffersen, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 30, 2007

(AP) - BRIDGEPORT, Connecticut-Two former executives were spared prison time Monday for their roles in a massive accounting scandal at Cendant Corp. that cost the company and its investors more than $3 billion.

Anne Pember, 47, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy in 2000, was sentenced to two years of probation and 200 hours of community service.

Casper Sabatino, 54, a former accountant at CUC who pleaded guilty to wire fraud charges and cooperated with federal prosecutors, was also sentenced to two years of probation.

Pember asked to be spared prison time, citing her extensive cooperation with federal investigators. Prosecutors agreed.

"I think your cooperation and your testimony was quite extraordinary," said Senior U.S. District Judge Alan H. Nevas.

Pember, who faced five years in prison under sentencing guidelines, apologized for her conduct.

Pember was controller at CUC International of Stamford, which merged with HFS Inc. of Parsippany, New Jersey, to create Cendant in December 1997. Pember became Cendant's senior vice president for accounting.

Nevas noted that Sabatino was one of the whistleblowers and was the first person to voluntarily cooperate with prosecutors.

"I think that's an important factor strongly in your favor," Nevas said. "You were the person who was the catalyst for initiating the investigation of this fraud."

Nevas also noted that others cooperated as a result of Sabatino's cooperation.

"Literally the house of cards began to collapse," Nevas said. "Your conduct should be emulated."

Sabatino also apologized in court for his actions.

The defendants have said their crimes were committed at the behest of their superiors.

DOJ_NMG_0124112

Prosecutors say the scheme inflated the stock of CUC International, Cendant's predecessor, by $500 million.

The fraud cost the travel and real estate company and its investors more than $3 billion. The fraud was reported in 1998, causing Cendant's market value to drop by $14 billion in one day.

Pember and other defendants have said CUC's quarterly earnings were inflated in the two years leading up to the merger through improper accounting methods, including underfunding a reserve, accelerating recognition of revenues, deferring expenses, and drawing money from a merger account to boost revenues.

Cosmo Corigliano, CUC's former chief financial officer, is scheduled to be sentenced Tuesday. He also has asked to be spared prison time, citing his extensive cooperation in the investigation.

Former Cendant Corp. Chairman Walter Forbes was sentenced to 12 years and seven months, while Vice Chairman E. Kirk Shelton received a 10-year sentence. Both men were ordered to pay $3.275 billion in restitution.

The Cendant case was among the first in a series of corporate accounting scandals that sparked outrage from investors in recent years.

Cendant's brands included Ramada, Howard Johnson, Avis, Coldwell Banker and Century 21.

In September, Cendant stockholders changed the company's name to Avis Budget Group to reflect its Avis and Budget vehicle rental brands. Its real estate and hotel businesses were spun off as stand-alone companies and the company sold its travel distribution operations.

SEC Clears Market-Based Way To Value Staff Stock Options (WSJ)

By David Reilly And Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission for the first time has blessed a method for valuing employee stock options that relies on market forces rather than academic models.

The change potentially paves the way for companies to use techniques that lessen the hit to profit they take from this type of compensation.

In a Jan. 25 letter, SEC Chief Accountant Conrad Hewitt said an auction system designed by Zions Bancorp of Salt Lake City could be used to derive "market" values for employee stock options. The SEC had rejected earlier attempts at market-based methods, including a plan pitched by computer-networking company Cisco Systems Inc. in 2005.

Ever since accounting rule makers decreed that starting in 2006 companies would have to book an expense for issuing stock options, a number of companies and financial institutions have tried to develop new ways to value the instruments.

The 'Real' World

Both the SEC and accounting rule makers have said they believe market-based approaches are best for valuing options. Mr. Hewitt said yesterday that the problem is that the models currently in use produce "hypothetical numbers." Market-based approaches produce what "may be a real number," he added.

So far, though, no one had devised a market-based method that passed regulatory muster.

The problem: Regular stock options traded on financial exchanges and employee stock options differ in some main attributes. Both give holders the right, but not the obligation, to purchase stock at a preset price at a future date. But stock options traded on financial exchanges typically come due in at most two years, and there isn't any vesting requirement.

Employee options, on the other hand, typically vest over a number of years, and they can be exercised in some cases over a 10-year period. In addition, employees who leave a company usually have to exercise already-vested options or forfeit them.

The differences have left many companies, particularly heavy options issuers such as tech companies, grousing that existing option-valuation methods such as the widely used Black-Scholes model produce too high a value for employee stock options. That, in turn, results in a too-high charge against profit. At the same time, investors are often befuddled because companies can use different models to calculate options values, which are further influenced by assumptions regarding factors such as the expected future volatility of a company's stock price.

DOJ_NMG_0124113

Zions last year tried to tackle the problem by creating securities that mimic the stock options granted to its employees. It then sold the securities to sophisticated investors in a public auction last June, deriving a market value for the options from the bidding. That value turned out to be roughly half the value of its options as calculated by academic models.

Accounting Tweaks

The bank then submitted its results to a months-long review by the SEC. Despite the green light, the agency signed off "on the process subject to several tweaks," said Evan Hill, a Zions vice president. Because of some technical issues, Zions can't use last year's auction to derive its stock-option expense for 2006.

Mr. Hill said the bank will conduct another auction when it grants its next batch of options, in May, and expects to use that to compute its option expense this year.

The main question related to Zions's and other market-based approaches is whether the values created are really "market" values. Mr. Hewitt's letter touched on that concern, cautioning that each auction based on the Zions approach would have to be individually analyzed to determine whether it actually generated a market value.

Among other issues, companies must consider the quantity of securities offered relative to market demand and the number and type of bidders.

6-Month Home Detention For Executive (NYT/AP)

By Dow Jones/ap

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

A former executive at Computer Associates was sentenced to six months of home detention yesterday after pleading guilty to conspiracy charges in connection with a scheme to bolster the company's quarterly revenue artificially through backdated sales contracts.

Judge I. Leo Glasser of Federal District Court sentenced David Kaplan, former senior vice president for finance, at a hearing in Brooklyn. Mr. Kaplan was also ordered to serve three years of supervised release.

Mr. Kaplan was one of several executives at the company, now known as CA Inc., to plead guilty to criminal charges in 2004 and to cooperate with the government.

Fannie Mae Chief Got 25% Raise Last Year (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Fannie Mae chief executive Daniel H. Mudd received salary, stock and bonuses of more than $14.4 million in 2006, an increase of about 25 percent from the year before, the government-chartered mortgage funding company disclosed.

Mudd's pay included a bonus of $3.5 million, restricted shares worth nearly $10 million and a salary of $950,000.

That was up from a bonus of $2.6 million, restricted shares worth $8 million and a salary of $908,121 in 2005.

For 2007, Mudd's salary was increased to $990,000.

Mudd was promoted to interim chief executive from chief operating officer in 2004 after an accounting scandal drove out his predecessor, former federal budget director Franklin D. Raines. Mudd's appointment was later made permanent. One of his top responsibilities is restoring the company's financial systems.

More than two years after the accounting problems came to light, Fannie Mae remains unable to file timely financial statements, and its shares continue trading on the New York Stock Exchange by special dispensation.

The company recently completed its correction of past results, revealing that it had overstated profits by $6.3 billion.

"The management team led by Dan Mudd made significant strides in 2006 in getting the company back on track by completing its restatement, focusing on its business and addressing its important affordable housing mission," Fannie Mae Chairman Stephen B. Ashley said in a statement. "The compensation decisions are reflective of the progress the company has made."

The update on executive compensation was contained in a report Fannie Mae filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission late Friday. The report did not contain all the information that publicly traded corporations are required to disclose annually about executive pay -- for example, it did not include any disclosures about the value of executive perquisites -- so the total value of Mudd's pay package could be larger.

DOJ_NMG_0124114

Fannie Mae spokesman Brian Faith said the comprehensive pay disclosure will be included in Fannie Mae's annual report for 2006. The company isn't predicting when that will be issued.

Based in the District, Fannie Mae plays a major role in the nation's housing finance system, buying mortgages and funneling capital from other investors to mortgage lenders.

The biggest chunk of Mudd's pay package consisted of 176,506 restricted stock units, which vest in four annual installments beginning January 2008. Mudd is required to hold a fifth of the shares until his employment at Fannie Mae ends.

In addition to the $8 million in restricted shares included in his compensation in 2005, Mudd was given a special restricted stock award in late 2005, worth about $1.5 million, when he signed a contract to become the permanent chief executive.

Officers' bonuses and stock awards must be approved by Fannie Mae's regulator, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, under an agreement Fannie Mae and the agency reached at the height of the scandal. Beyond confirming that the regulator had granted such approval, spokesmen for the agency declined to comment.

In setting compensation for last year, the compensation committee of Fannie Mae's board assessed the company's performance against several goals, such as "instilling operational discipline," "renewing the company's culture," fulfilling Fannie Mae's mission of promoting affordable housing and stabilizing the company -- for example, by building relationships with regulators and restating past financial results, the company said in the SEC filing.

Under Fannie Mae's federal charter, the board is required to ensure that executive pay is reasonable and comparable with that of executives in similar businesses, Fannie Mae said in the filing. For senior executives, the board aimed for the midpoint of pay levels at a group of diversified financial services companies, Fannie Mae reported.

Mudd's pay remained below the pre-scandal compensation awarded to his predecessor. In 2003, Raines's pay package included a $4.2 million bonus, $11.6 million in payouts under a long-term incentive plan, a salary of $992,250 and stock options the company valued at $3 million.

In addition to Mudd, four top executives listed in the SEC filing received bonuses of more than $1 million. Several executives received restricted stock awards worth more than $1 million.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Under Oath, Fleischer Stays On Message (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Former presidential spokesman Ari Fleischer reminded Washington on Monday why he was considered one of the city's most unshakable spinmasters.

As calm on the witness stand as he ever was at the White House briefing lectern, Fleischer deftly deflected questions from defense attorneys. It was almost like he was back at the White House 2- 1/2 years ago, parrying questions from reporters.

Fleischer's testimony was the most damaging yet in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby. He looked every bit the man who knows what it's like to have each word dissected, fact-checked and pushed back for clarification.

Fleischer, who once refused to acknowledge that different sections of Iraq face different challenges by saying, "Iraq is Iraq," seemed completely at ease as Libby's defense attorney quizzed him on details and challenged his facts.

He even offered defense attorney William Jeffress a primer on briefing the White House press.

"They challenge everything you say," Fleischer said. "They don't take it at face value."

When the Bush administration first said al-Qaida was to blame for the 2001 terrorist attacks, Fleischer recalled, one reporter called out, "Prove it."

Even under oath and without the cover of "no comment," Fleischer could not be rattled. The spokesman who stayed on message for a White House known for closely guarding its secrets came to court Monday to tell a story and never wavered from it.

DOJ_NMG_0124115

Fleischer testified Monday that Libby told him over lunch that the wife of a prominent war critic worked at the CIA. Fleischer said the conversation happened July 7, 2003, days before Libby told investigators he was surprised to learn about the CIA operative from a reporter.

That discrepancy is at the heart of Libby's perjury and obstruction trial and defense attorneys were eager to question Fleischer's credibility.

Fleischer rarely deviated from his script. When Jeffress pointed out apparent holes in his story, Fleischer calmly sewed them up.

Occasionally, he turned to jurors directly to explain himself. Once, he even sought to keep defense attorneys on one subject when they wanted to move on.

"Can I say something?" Fleischer politely asked the judge, who shook his head.

True to his reputation, Fleischer offered few behind-the-scenes glimpses of the Bush administration. On Friday and early Monday, Vice President Dick Cheney's former spokeswoman, Cathie Martin, described for jurors how the White House sought to manipulate the news media. Fleischer was circumspect.

He briefly described the hectic atmosphere of mid-2003, when the White House stood behind, then backed away from certain prewar intelligence on Iraq. "The worst place to stand as press secretary is where the ground is shifting," he said.

His acknowledgment that he discussed CIA operative Valerie Plame with reporters highlighted his often strained relationship with them.

"Like a lot of things I said to the press, it had no impact," he testified.

Fleischer got an immunity-from-prosecution deal in exchange for cooperating with investigators but expertly deflected questions about was promised in exchange for that deal.

"The only way I'd know about that is based on conversations I had with my lawyers," Fleischer said, casually invoking the attorney-client privilege, which allowed him, once again, to clam up.

Fleischer Tells Of Talk With Libby (USAT/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

USA Today, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON — Former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer testified Monday that he first heard that a prominent war critic's wife worked at the CIA from vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby. He said he thought the information might help deflect critical questions from reporters.

Fleischer said Libby told him about Valerie Plame's job at the CIA over a lunch in the White House mess July 7, 2003. Libby told investigators he thought he first learned about Plame on July 10 from NBC reporter Tim Russert.

Four other government witnesses also have said they discussed Plame with Libby before July 10, and the discrepancy between those accounts and what Libby told the FBI and a grand jury are a major component of the perjury and obstruction of justice charges against Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff.

Libby now says his memory failed him when he spoke to Russert. Russert said Monday that he did not tell Libby about Plame. "I was not and never have been the recipient of the leak," Russert told an audience in Oklahoma City.

Fleischer, President Bush's spokesman from 2001 until mid-2003, testified under an immunity agreement with prosecutors. He said he sought the deal after reading about the investigation and worrying, "Oh my God. Did I somehow play a role in outing a CIA operative?" He insisted he believed the information was not classified.

Fleischer said his lunch with Libby was their first ever and had been scheduled by Libby in anticipation of Fleischer's imminent departure to start his own company.

Fleischer said that after talk of career plans and the Miami Dolphins, the subject shifted to the controversy over criticism by Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson.

In his State of Union address in January 2003, Bush cited British intelligence that Iraq was trying to buy uranium in Africa for nuclear arms. That became part of the justification for war in Iraq. After the speech, Wilson said in print and on TV that he was sent to Niger to look into the report and had debunked it in 2002. Cheney's questions motivated the trip, Wilson said, so Cheney should have seen his report before Bush repeated the story.

DOJ_NMG_0124116

According to previous testimony, Cheney's office worked to get word out that Cheney didn't send Wilson to Niger and had never heard of Wilson, his trip or his conclusions until news reports in spring 2003.

Libby said Wilson was sent to Niger by his wife and she worked at the CIA, Fleischer testified. "I believe he mentioned her name and said something like, 'This is hush-hush … not very many people know this,' " Fleischer said.

Fleischer said he again heard about Plame four days later from White House communications director Dan Bartlett. Defense attorney William Jeffress suggested that Fleischer might have heard the Plame story first from Bartlett, but Fleischer insisted he learned about her from Libby first.

Former Press Secretary Says Libby Told Him Of Plame (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer testified yesterday that I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby divulged Valerie Plame's identity to him in July 2003, three days earlier than Libby has told investigators he first learned of the undercover CIA officer.

Fleischer's narrative of Libby's "hush-hush" disclosures over a lunch table in a White House dining room made President Bush's former spokesman the most important prosecution witness to date in the week-old perjury trial of Vice President Cheney's onetime chief of staff.

Though a series of government officials have told the jury that Libby eagerly sought information about a prominent critic of the Iraq war, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, Fleischer was the first witness to say Libby then passed on what he learned: that Wilson's wife was a CIA officer who had sent him on a trip to Africa. Wilson's mission there was to explore reports, ultimately proved false, that Iraq had tried to buy nuclear material in Niger.

Fleischer, testifying under an immunity agreement with the prosecution, also made it clear that Libby had told him Wilson's wife held a position in the CIA's counterproliferation division, where most employees work in a covert capacity.

Fleischer said he believes Libby mentioned Plame's name, although he told the jury he could not be sure. Libby "added that this was something hush-hush or on the QT, that not many people knew this information," Fleischer testified.

The unusual spectacle of a president's top spokesman testifying in open court widened the rare view the trial is providing the jury -- and the public -- of the inner workings of a White House that has proudly guarded its privacy.

Libby is charged with lying to FBI agents and a grand jury as well as obstructing justice in a federal investigation of who revealed Plame's name to journalists, including columnist Robert D. Novak, who first published it July 14, 2003. He is not charged with the leak itself, which administration critics have contended was designed to discredit Wilson's argument that the White House was twisting his findings as it justified the invasion of Iraq.

Libby has pleaded not guilty to all five felony counts. He told investigators he learned about Plame's identity during a telephone call on July 10, 2003, with NBC's Washington bureau chief, Tim Russert. He and his attorneys contend he did not remember the conversations he had with reporters about Plame amid the crush of his national security work.

Fleischer's testimony buttressed Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's case in at least two ways. Fleischer testified that his lunch with Libby -- the first he ever had with Cheney's top aide, a week before the press secretary was to leave his White House job -- took place on July 7, 2003, before Libby spoke with Russert.

Fleischer also reinforced the prosecution's central argument: that Libby had been so determined to learn and spread information about Wilson and Plame that he could not have forgotten his efforts.

Both sides have portrayed Libby and Cheney as especially eager to knock down news accounts that Cheney had asked for Wilson's trip.

Under cross-examination by defense attorney William Jeffress Jr., Fleischer said that his conversation with Libby about Wilson's wife had been short and that Fleischer had not relayed that information to reporters until he heard a similar account from another White House aide.

DOJ_NMG_0124117

Fleischer testified that, later on the day of his lunch with Libby, he and other top aides left with President Bush on a five-day trip to several African nations. He said that while he was on Air Force One between South Africa and Uganda, he overheard Dan Bartlett, at the time Bush's communications director and now counselor to the president, "vent" about news accounts that Cheney had requested Wilson's mission.

Fleischer said that he decided to tell two reporters, NBC's David Gregory and Time magazine's John Dickerson, as they were walking along a road in Uganda: "If you want to know who sent the ambassador to Niger, it was his wife; she works there" -- a reference to the CIA.

In an interview yesterday, Dickerson, who has left Time and is writing about the trial for Slate, an online magazine, said he recalls that Fleischer had merely urged Gregory and him to "check and see who sent Wilson" on the trip. Dickerson said he first learned about Plame's CIA role from then-colleague Matthew Cooper by telephone several hours after he spoke with Fleischer.

Fleischer testified that neither Libby nor Bartlett invoked a White House protocol under which colleagues warned him when they were providing classified information that could not be discussed with reporters. He said he "never in my wildest dreams thought this information would be classified."

In September 2003, about 2 1/2 months after his conversations with reporters about Plame, Fleischer testified that he saw a news account that the CIA had asked the Justice Department to investigate a possible illegal leak of a covert CIA officer's identity.

"I thought, 'Oh, my God. Did I play a role in somehow outing a CIA officer? . . . Did I just do something that I could be in big trouble for?' "

He said that, although he believed he had passed on classified information unwittingly, he hired lawyers who negotiated his immunity from prosecution, except for the possibility of perjury.

Late yesterday afternoon, Cheney's current chief of staff, David S. Addington, took the witness stand, testifying that Libby had, early in the summer of 2003, asked him whether the president had authority to declassify government secrets and whether the CIA kept paperwork documenting its work. Addington said he replied yes to both.

He testified that Libby did not tell him why he was asking. But Addington said he surmised that the reason might have been Wilson's criticism of the president and the war.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said that former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, the first of several prominent journalists who figure in the case, probably would testify today.

Fleischer Handles Questioning In The Usual Fashion (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

It's been almost four years since Ari Fleischer stepped down from the podium, but he has lost nothing off the old curveball.

Questioning the former White House press secretary in the Scooter Libby trial yesterday, defense lawyer William Jeffress Jr. asked if Fleischer had read a document Jeffress placed in front of him. "In a generic sense," Fleischer said.

Did President Bush visit Entebbe, Uganda? "I'm not sure of the spelling."

Did he work for White House communications director Dan Bartlett? "Nominally," Fleischer replied. "On paper, Mr. Bartlett had a box above me. . . . I wouldn't put it that way."

Thus did Libby's defense team learn what any reporter could have told them: The longer you question Fleischer, the less knowledge you take away from the experience. And Fleischer, protecting his own role in the outing of CIA operative Valerie Plame, was determined not to give even a kernel of fact to Libby's defense.

Jeffress asked when Fleischer's lawyers approached prosecutors seeking an immunity deal. "The only way I would know that is from any discussions I had with my lawyers," Fleischer answered.

Did the dispute over the outing of Plame cause tensions between the CIA and the White House? "In the context of the controversy of the week it was hard to tell what was attributable to one problem we had," Fleischer replied.

The responses evidently flustered Jeffress, who at one point stated that Iraq was "seeking Africa in Niger" when he apparently meant "uranium." The court reporter looked up quizzically. "What did I say?" Jeffress asked. Libby played with his pen.

DOJ_NMG_0124118

With Fleischer avoiding answers, Jeffress had to strike deals with the prosecution to get basic facts into the record. This led the judge to instruct the jury that "the parties have agreed July 6 was a Sunday." A similar deal led to the judge's announcement that "Uganda is seven hours ahead of Eastern daylight time."

In lieu of cooperation, Fleischer addressed the jury as if it were a civics class, offering long and extraneous accounts of what it's like "when you're the press secretary and you deal with the press." In one instance, Fleischer lamented: "I remember after September 11 and I said we were attacked by al-Qaeda, one reporter said, 'Prove it.'

After Jeffress finished questioning him about a briefing transcript from 2003, Fleischer piped up: "Are we still on this document? Can I say one thing about it?"

The judge smiled. "Not unless there's a question," he said.

Fleischer, trailed by superlawyer Bob Barnett, entered the courtroom at noon with a little less hair on top and a more expensive suit than he had when he departed the briefing room four years ago. In four hours on the stand, he talked his way out of several factual jams.

Jeffress seemed to have Fleischer cornered with grand jury testimony in which Fleischer appeared to say, falsely, that a confidential report on Joseph Wilson's trip to Niger for the CIA mentioned Wilson by name. But Fleischer rallied, providing the jury with not one but four explanations: (1) "I haven't read the entire document." (2) "If I read it and it doesn't include his name the context is clearly Ambassador Wilson's report." (3) "Unless it's in the blacked out area I cannot see." And (4) "It may not have his name verbatim."

Jeffress asked Fleischer if Bartlett had been talking to him when he said, aboard Air Force One, that Plame was the one who sent Wilson on the trip to Niger.

"He said it out loud," Fleischer answered.

"He was talking to you?"

"He said it out loud and I heard him," Fleischer repeated.

Why didn't Fleischer react to Bartlett's statement? "I was sitting in my chair trying to read a document."

When Jeffress expressed some skepticism on this point, Fleischer explained: "You can get interrupted by so many things at the White House."

Under the prosecutor's questioning, Fleischer delivered a damning account of Libby's actions, saying how the former aide to Vice President Cheney disclosed Plame's identity, along with an intimation that "this was kind of newsy." When Fleischer mentioned that Plame was "covert," Jeffress shouted an objection.

"Whatever her status was, that was totally irrelevant," the judge told the jury. A minute later, Fleischer repeated the allegation the judge had just disallowed.

Jeffress knew it would be a challenge to undo the damage Fleischer did to his client, particularly because, as he put it, Fleischer has "had a lot of practice" under hostile questioning.

Fleischer did not disappoint. Jeffress tried to get him to say which reporter questioned national security adviser Condoleezza Rice at a briefing. "I wouldn't know," Fleischer said. Jeffress asked why Rice was unaware of Wilson's trip even after it was reported in the press. "There was something in the air that spring," Fleischer explained.

Finally, Jeffress entered into the record a kind note Libby wrote to Fleischer on the press secretary's last day. Libby smiled as Fleischer read it. But Fleischer just stared straight ahead. "This is one of 20 to 40 letters I received on my last day in a big bound book," he said.

Ex-Bush Aide, In Testimony, Disputes Libby (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — Ari Fleischer, the former White House press secretary, recounted to a jury on Monday his experience at an unusual lunch on July 7, 2003, during which he said that I. Lewis Libby Jr. passed on detailed information about the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative.

DOJ_NMG_0124119

The lunch in the White House mess for senior staff took place three days before the date that Mr. Libby had sworn he first learned about the C.I.A. officer, Valerie Wilson, from reporters.

Mr. Fleischer was the fifth prosecution witness to provide damaging testimony in the form of an account that conflicted with the version Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, told a grand jury and investigators.

Mr. Fleischer's day on the stand provided a riveting moment because of the detailed description of the conversation, which he said occurred in his last week at the White House and was the only time Mr. Libby had ever asked him to lunch.

Mr. Fleischer said that after casual talk about his new career and the fact that he and Mr. Libby were both fans of the Miami Dolphins, the conversation turned to the controversy then swirling around whether President Bush had used false information in his State of the Union address about Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium in Africa.

The day before the lunch, Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador, had written an Op-Ed article in The New York Times that said he had taken a trip to Niger at the behest of Mr. Cheney's office and had determined there was no truth to the assertion in the State of the Union speech that Saddam Hussein had recently tried to buy uranium ore in Africa.

"Ambassador Wilson was sent by his wife," Mr. Fleischer testified that Mr. Libby told him, disputing the notion that he had been sent by Mr. Cheney. "His wife works for the C.I.A."

Mr. Fleischer also said that Mr. Libby used the woman's maiden name, Valerie Plame, and that she worked at the agency's bureau that dealt with efforts to curtail the proliferation of weapons.

"He said it was hush-hush, on the Q.T. and that most people didn't know it," Mr. Fleischer testified.

Mr. Libby, who is widely known by his nickname, Scooter, looked up occasionally at the witness and took notes.

Ms. Wilson's name was first disclosed publicly on July 14, 2003, in a column by Robert D. Novak.

That disclosure led to an investigation into the leak as administration critics charged that her identity was disclosed to discredit Mr. Wilson's charges. Neither Mr. Libby nor anyone else was charged in the end with violating the law in disclosing Ms. Wilson's identity. Mr. Novak's original source, Richard L. Armitage, a former deputy secretary of state, was not charged, as prosecutors said he did not have the needed intention to violate the law.

But Mr. Libby was charged with perjury and obstruction of justice after he swore he had not discussed Ms. Wilson with reporters. Judith Miller, a former reporter for The New York Times, and Matthew Cooper, a former reporter for Time Magazine, told the grand jury that Mr. Libby had indeed disclosed her identity to them. Mr. Libby's lawyers have argued that if he was incorrect in recounting his conversations with reporters, it was simply a case of bad memory.

Mr. Fleischer, who as the public face of the White House for nearly three years and thus widely recognizable, was followed to the stand by a prosecution witness regarded as perhaps the most secretive and publicity-averse employee in the White House, David S. Addington.

Mr. Addington was counsel to Mr. Cheney at the time Ms. Wilson's identity was disclosed and has since been promoted to replace Mr. Libby as the vice president's chief of staff. He is widely reported to be the theoretician behind Mr. Cheney's belief in a powerful executive branch, in which the president may exert wide authority unchecked by Congress or the courts.

While Mr. Fleischer, an experienced public spokesman, seemed at ease on the stand, Mr. Addington displayed gruff reticence.

His testimony concerned a meeting he had had with Mr. Libby in a small room in the vice president's suite between July 6 and July 12. He said Mr. Libby had quizzed him as to whether the C.I.A. would have records showing when someone sent a relative on a mission.

Mr. Addington said his advice was sought because had he worked at the C.I.A. for years as a lawyer. As he provided the far-from-simple answer, he said that Mr. Libby had held out both hands in front, palms down, as if to remind him the information was sensitive. "He said, 'Keep it down,' " Mr. Addington testified.

But it was Mr. Fleischer's testimony that seemed the most damaging to date. He said he had heard again about Ms. Wilson four days later from the White House communications director, Dan Bartlett, aboard Air Force One as it was heading to Uganda. He said Mr. Bartlett was reading documents and began "venting" that reporters kept repeating Mr. Wilson's claim that it was Mr. Cheney who had sent Mr. Wilson on his fact-finding trip.

"His wife sent him," Mr. Fleischer recalled Mr. Bartlett saying. "She works at the C.I.A."

DOJ_NMG_0124120

Mr. Fleischer said he relayed that information to reporters from Time and NBC, a fact that figured in his later demand that he would testify only after being given a grant of immunity from prosecution.

When the investigation began in the fall of 2003, he said he was suddenly afraid he had inadvertently violated the law.

He said that, upon reading that Ms. Wilson's identity was classified, he thought to himself, "Oh my God, did I somehow play a role in outing a C.I.A. operative?"

Mr. Fleischer freely cooperated with the government, he testified, while refusing to grant interviews to Mr. Libby's defense lawyers.

Aside from recounting that anxiety, Mr. Fleischer was unruffled on the stand, even under cross-examination by William H. Jeffress Jr., one of Mr. Libby's lawyers.

Mr. Jeffress noted that Mr. Fleischer had in earlier testimony shown he did not know how to pronounce the maiden name of Ms. Wilson, referring to her as Ms. Plame or Ms. Plah-MAY. He suggested to Mr. Fleischer that that meant "the first time you ever heard it was reading it and not hearing it," meaning his account of the conversation with Mr. Libby was incorrect. Mr. Fleischer replied, "No, when I heard it, it was not very important."

Over all, as he had for nearly three years at the White House, Mr. Fleischer "stayed on message."

Before he took the stand, the jury heard the second day of testimony from Cathie Martin, who had been Mr. Cheney's communications director. Ms. Martin testified for the prosecution that she told Mr. Libby she had learned about Ms. Wilson and her role at the C.I.A. also before the date Mr. Libby claims to have learned about her.

Mr. Addington is expected to finish his testimony on Tuesday. He will be followed on the witness stand by Ms. Miller, the former Times reporter, who is expected to testify that Mr. Libby told her about Ms. Wilson on three occasions.

Fleischer: Libby Discussed CIA Officer Over Lunch (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 30, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A principal witness in the perjury trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff gave testimony Monday at odds with what the Cheney aide told the FBI and the grand jury that indicted him.

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is accused of lying in 2003 to obstruct an investigation into the leaking of the name of Valerie Plame, a CIA operative whose husband was a major critic of the Iraq war.

Knowingly outing a CIA operative can be a felony. Nobody has been charged with illegally leaking the name.

In Monday's testimony, former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer said then-colleague Libby told him over lunch that the wife war critic Joseph Wilson worked at the CIA.

Fleischer testified under an immunity deal with prosecutors, which means he cannot be prosecuted for having revealed that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. He arrived in court with his attorneys.

Fleischer said he sought the deal after reading an article about the investigation. "I thought, `Oh my God. Did I somehow play a role in outing a CIA operative?'" Fleischer said.

Fleischer said the conversation happened July 7, 2003, three days before Libby told investigators he was surprised to learn about the CIA operative from a reporter. That discrepancy is at the heart of Libby's perjury and obstruction trial.

Fleischer, who was the chief White House spokesman for the first 2 1/2 years of President George W. Bush's first term, said Monday that Libby invited him to lunch to discuss Fleischer's planned departure from the White House. He said it was the first time he and Libby had eaten lunch together.

They talked about Fleischer's career plans and their shared interest in the Miami Dolphins football team, Fleischer testified. He can't remember who brought it up but he said the conversation then turned to a growing controversy over the anti-war writings of Wilson, a former U.S. ambassador, who accused the White House of ignoring prewar intelligence on Iraq.

"Ambassador Wilson was sent by his wife," Fleischer recalled Libby saying. "His wife works for the CIA."

Fleischer said Libby also used the woman's name, Valerie Plame, and told him it was "hush-hush."

"My sense is that Mr. Libby was telling me this was kind of newsy," Fleischer said.

Fleischer said he heard about Plame again four days later aboard Air Force One from the White House communications director, Dan Bartlett. Bartlett was reading documents and began "venting" that reporters kept repeating Wilson's claim that Vice President Dick Cheney sent Wilson on a fact-finding trip to Niger.

"His wife sent him," Fleischer recalled Bartlett saying. "She works at the CIA."

Fleischer said he relayed that information to reporters from Time magazine and NBC. A reporter from Newsweek magazine also was there but may have walked away, he said. The reporters paid no attention to the comment, he testified.

"I never in my wildest dreams thought this information was classified," Fleischer testified.

Libby's attorneys plan to argue during cross-examination that the immunity deal makes Fleischer's testimony less credible.

Prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg sought to head off that argument early in Fleischer's testimony by having him describe his deal.

"I cannot be prosecuted for what I did with the information I was provided," Fleischer said. "The immunity provides no protection for perjury."

Libby says he was surprised to learn from NBC News reporter Tim Russert that Plame worked at the CIA. Anything he later told reporters about Plame was simply a repetition of what he learned from Russert, Libby said.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's first witnesses were government employees who testified that they told Libby about Plame days before the Russert conversation. Fleischer is a key witness because, as Fitzgerald said in his opening statement: "You can't learn something on Thursday that you're giving out on Monday."

Nobody was ever charged with leaking Plame's identity. Libby is the only person charged in the case.

On the Net:

Documents for the Libby trial may be found at:

http://wid.ap.org/documents/libbytrial/index.html

Former Press Secretary Dispels Many Illusions (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — As White House press secretary, Ari Fleischer was the omnipresent television face of government power, the confident insider who spoke for President Bush and seemed to know everything but reveal only what he chose.

In fact, as Mr. Fleischer disclosed in court testimony on Monday, he only knew what the truly powerful chose to tell him, and sometimes that was not much. On occasion he would pronounce with great authority the administration's position on a topic only to find it had changed and nobody had bothered to let him know.

In July 2003, for example, after Mr. Fleischer had spent months defending a 16-word sentence in the president's State of the Union address asserting that Iraq had sought uranium for nuclear weapons in Africa, he was directed not to repeat his assurances that the information was correct. But his bosses had not yet decided on their revised view.

"The worst place to stand as press secretary is where the ground is shifting," Mr. Fleischer told the jury in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr., Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. "You can't say yes, and you can't say no."

When pressed by reporters on the issue, he said, "I basically punted."

Mr. Fleischer, 46, looking a little balder, a little plumper and a little less commanding than while he served in the White House from 2001 to 2003, often turned to the jury to explain White House ways. But he made a marked contrast with his once-familiar presence as master of administration spin.

In more than two years at the White House, he had deftly avoided saying "I don't know." Now, on the witness stand, it was clear that he often did not know. The job of spokesman placed him in a kind of no man's land between the news media and the policy makers. Sometimes, he suggested, he got no respect from either side.

Mr. Libby, for instance, generally would not tell him much.

DOJ_NMG_0124122

"Mr. Libby was not someone I used as a source in the White House," Mr. Fleischer tactfully put it. (The exception was at a farewell lunch with Mr. Libby for the departing Mr. Fleischer — their first and only one-on-one lunch, he said — that resulted in his being called as a prosecution witness.)

And reporters, for their part, either challenged what he said or ignored it entirely, Mr. Fleischer testified.

Mr. Fleischer recounted, for instance, how he pulled aside two White House reporters on a presidential trip to Uganda to tell them what he saw as a choice news morsel. Joseph C. Wilson IV, the former ambassador who was attacking the administration as twisting the prewar intelligence on Iraq, had been dispatched to Niger on a fact-finding trip not by Mr. Cheney, as Mr. Wilson had suggested, but by his own wife, Valerie Wilson, who worked at the Central Intelligence Agency, Mr. Fleischer told them.

The reporters, David Gregory of NBC News and John Dickerson, then of Time magazine, were unimpressed, Mr. Fleischer recounted.

"They didn't take out their notebooks," he said. "They didn't ask any follow-up questions. It was a great big 'so what.' "

This, Mr. Fleischer acknowledged, was not unusual.

"Like a lot of things I said to the press, it seemed to have no impact," he said, provoking loud guffaws from the score of reporters in the courtroom — including Mr. Dickerson, now with the online magazine Slate.

Mr. Fleischer's description of his experience as chief White House flack — the journalists' slang for a spokesman — echoed in some ways the testimony of the previous witness, Cathie Martin, who served as a spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney from 2001 to 2004.

Ms. Martin described how she and other "communicators" — that is, press officers and other members of the White House communications staff — had been excluded from high-level discussions about how George J. Tenet, then the C.I.A. director, would publicly take responsibility for the "16 words" on Iraq's quest for uranium. A Harvard Law School graduate, she seemed a bit miffed about the implied humiliation.

"Everybody was sort of in the dark," Ms. Martin testified. Mr. Libby, she added, "told me there had been a decision not to have communicators involved."

On another occasion, Ms. Martin told the court, she was "aggravated" that Mr. Cheney had directed Mr. Libby to talk to certain reporters and had not given the job to her.

But if the trial is exposing the diminished reality behind the job of White House spokesman, it is also offering an unaccustomed inside look at the news media. When Mr. Dickerson was named in testimony and his mug shot was projected for the jury, all eyes turned toward the man himself, taking notes in a back pew. A wave of whispers passed through the reporters present, and Mr. Dickerson shook his head, uneasy to become the focus of attention.

That moment is only the beginning of what is likely to be an extraordinary excursion by a criminal trial into the work habits and confidential contacts of the Washington press corps. Judith Miller, the former New York Times reporter who was jailed for three months for initially refusing to testify about her contacts with Mr. Libby, is expected to testify as early as Tuesday and to be the first of several high-profile reporters to be questioned on the stand about their work.

The Ba-Da-Boom Crew (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

If you've been following the Lewis "Scooter" Libby perjury trial, I can understand how you might confuse Dick Cheney with Tony Soprano. Cheney's office is beginning to sound a lot like the Bada Bing, minus the dancers.

Court has been in session for only a week, and already we've heard about characters being set up (Libby, allegedly, to save political wizard Karl Rove), strung along (media bigwigs, who were to be played like patsies), buried in mud (former ambassador Joseph Wilson, who questioned the raison d'etre of the Iraq war) and ratted out (the famously leak-averse Cheney, revealed to be willing to leak like a washerless faucet when it suits his purposes).

DOJ_NMG_0124123

Cheney's no Tony, though. For one thing, Tony would never let one of his top henchmen go by a preppy-sounding handle such as "Scooter." For another, this kind of all-in-the-family mess would send Tony moping to his long-suffering shrink, whereas Cheney shows no inclination to deal with uncomfortable issues or face harsh realities.

Increasingly, the vice president is sounding as if he lives in a la-la land of his own imagining, a place beyond truth.

In Cheney's world, the Iraq war is an enormous success. The idea that anyone would think otherwise is hogwash. The midterm election doesn't seem to have happened yet -- some sort of time warp may be involved. Polls that show overwhelming public opposition to the war do not even merit a nod of acknowledgment.

And it's "out of line," as Wolf Blitzer learned, to ask Cheney about a glaring personal contradiction -- the administration he serves wants to ban gay marriage, and meanwhile his lesbian daughter and her life partner are having a baby. Cheney acts as if he's willing to go to any lengths to keep people from learning that on the subject of homosexuality, he's probably pretty enlightened.

Let's hope that Cheney isn't really out to lunch, that he's just playing politics. A conservative friend reminded me the other day that all the White House has left, in terms of public support, is the hard-line Republican right. Let's hope Cheney is just tossing out red meat to keep these stalwarts on the team.

But, yes, he is coming across as a little crazy. I'm glad he's not the Decider -- excuse me, now it's the Decision Maker.

Cheney's weirdness is almost enough to summon nostalgia for the days being revisited in the Libby trial, a time when Cheney and his minions at least were rational in their machinations. Forget the byzantine, eye-glazing details of the case and look instead at how the vice president's office operated.

The primary stated reason for the war -- Saddam Hussein's supposed nuclear weapons program -- had already been discredited, and now this guy Wilson was claiming that the White House knew beforehand that some of the most damning evidence of a nuclear program was bogus. Cheney convened a war council, organized an effort to counter Wilson's claims and then sent Libby out to leak anything that would make Wilson look less credible. In other words, they went after the messenger rather than the message.

One problem was that Cheney's office had been so taciturn that reporters rarely bothered to call, knowing that all they were likely to get was a cold shoulder. Cheney's former press aide testified that at one point there was a frantic search for a phone number for someone, anyone, at Newsweek. That leak finally had to be attempted via voice mail.

Flash forward to the point when it became clear that someone in this supposedly tight-lipped administration had leaked the fact that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, was a CIA agent. Amid much finger-pointing, the White House issued a statement that categorically absolved Rove of this potentially criminal leak -- but that didn't mention Libby.

You get the sense of Cheney and his crew as a semi-independent power center, a family within the larger family. You see them hunkered down in their office suite, much like Tony and crew in the back room of the Bada Bing, plotting ways to cover their behinds and do in their rivals -- whether those rivals are found in Baghdad, Tehran or the West Wing.

Scooter worried he was being thrown to the wolves, according to his attorney. A note scribbled by Cheney, the lawyer says, revealed that he had smelled a plan to "sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder."

Now that really sounds like something you'd expect to happen in Tony's world.

Reporter To Take Stand In CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Journalists will take center stage at the CIA leak trial as Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald begins calling reporters as witnesses.

Fitzgerald said Judith Miller was to take the stand Tuesday, the first time the former New York Times reporter has testified publicly against the man she went to jail to protect as a source.

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the one-time chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is accused of perjury and obstruction for lying about conversations he had with journalists about outed CIA operative Valerie Plame.

DOJ_NMG_0124124

Miller spent 85 days in jail for refusing to cooperate with Fitzgerald's investigating and reveal her conversations with Libby. She retired from the Times in November 2005, declaring that she had to leave because she had "become the news."

Prosecutors say Libby discussed Plame -- the wife of prominent war critic Joseph Wilson -- with Miller three times. Two of those conversations occurred before Libby says he first remembered learning Plame's identity from another reporter, NBC newsman Tim Russert.

Libby now says his memory failed him when he spoke to Russert. Russert said Monday that he did not tell Libby about Plame. "I was not and never have been the recipient of the leak," Russert told an audience in Oklahoma City.

Such discrepancies are at the heart of Libby's trial. Previous witnesses, including former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, have testified they had conversations with Libby about Plame before his conversation with Russert.

After Miller ultimately decided to testify, saying Libby had given her permission to do so, the Times published an article describing Miller as a rogue reporter who battled with editors and colleagues.

Like so many other government witnesses in the case, Miller's credibility will be an issue under cross-examination. She made some inconsistent statements in her grand jury testimony, defense attorneys say.

Journalism groups have criticized Fitzgerald for calling reporters as witnesses and demanding they discuss conversations with sources. Miller's notes likely will be used as evidence, and Fitzgerald is expected to call two other reporters -- Russert and Matthew Cooper of Time magazine -- during the trial.

Miller shared in a Pulitzer Prize for reporting on terrorism, but her relationship with the Times was strained when it was discovered that her reporting on the existence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq -- the Bush administration's primary reason to go to war -- was built on faulty intelligence.

Russert: Not Source Of CIA Officer Leak (NSDY/AP)

By Murray Evans

Long Island Newsday, January 30, 2007

OKLAHOMA CITY -- NBC News reporter Tim Russert said Monday that he did not tell vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby that a prominent war critic's wife worked at the CIA, as Libby has claimed.

Russert, who spoke in Tulsa and Oklahoma City at functions sponsored by Oklahoma State University's Spears School of Business, said he expects to be called to testify in Libby's federal perjury and obstruction trial in Washington.

Libby's indictment grew out of conversations he had with Russert, Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper and former New York Times reporter Judith Miller in June and July 2003. Libby claimed any information he had about CIA operative Valerie Plame came from Russert and other reporters.

"I was not and never have been the recipient of the leak," Russert said. "Everyone acknowledges that. The question is, when Libby called me, what did he say? He called in protest to something he had seen on MSNBC 'Hardball,' and that was the extent of it."

"He didn't call me as a confidential source, as such," he said. "He was calling me as a viewer to complain."

Russert said that if he had known of Plame's connection to former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, a Bush war critic and Plame's husband, or that she worked for the CIA, "believe me, NBC would have been up front on the story and not reading about it in Robert Novak's column."

Novak, a conservative columnist, named Plame in a column on July 14, 2003. Eight days earlier, Wilson's opinion piece had appeared in the New York Times. Russert said that he didn't know the name of Wilson's wife or that she worked for the CIA until he read Novak's column, which was after Libby's complaint call.

Feds Plan $200M Grant Program Aimed At Curbing Violent Crime (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, January 30, 2007

The Bush administration is proposing a $200 million grant program to help law enforcement agencies respond to surging violent-crime rates in cities across the nation, Justice Department officials said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0124125

The program would help local and state police agencies pay for officers' overtime, equipment and other expenses stemming from new regional task forces aimed at curbing violent crime, Domingo Herraiz, director of the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Assistance, told USA TODAY.

The program has not been announced publicly; Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled to begin briefing law enforcement officials on it this week.

The task forces would be staffed with federal, state and local officers to deal with a range of growing crime problems, including recent increases in gang-related violence, gun-related crimes and illegal sales of methamphetamine.

The grant plan marks the administration's broadest recognition yet of the threat posed by rising violent-crime rates.

The FBI reports that violent crimes — homicides, rapes, robberies and aggravated assaults — increased 2.3% nationwide in 2005 compared with 2004, the first such rise since 1991. The trend has continued through the first half of 2006, the FBI reports.

If approved by Congress as part of President Bush's spending plan for the budget year that begins in October, the program also would symbolize a renewed interest in federal funding for local police initiatives, which often have taken a backseat to homeland security programs since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The grant program — known as the Violent Crime Reduction Partnership Initiative — would not, however, be designed to help police agencies hire new officers.

Instead, it would allow local and state agencies to apply for grants of $30,000-$200,000 to better deploy and equip officers who make up the anti-crime task forces, said Herraiz and Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, the Justice Department's director legal policy.

Herraiz said dozens of cities could be eligible for the grants. He said agencies applying for grants would have to outline specific strategies to attack violent crime, and show improvements in crime rates to be eligible for further funding.

Police chiefs' groups such as the Police Executive Research Forum have called repeatedly for the White House to reprise the Clinton administration's $8 billion police hiring program that added tens of thousands of officers to the nation's streets.

Chuck Wexler, executive director of the group, said the grant program falls well short of that, but "is a step in the right direction."

"It is encouraging that the Justice Department recognizes the significant change in violent crime across the country," he said.

Man In Internet Sex Sting Sentenced (NTHWSTT)

By Joe Carlson

Northwest (IN) Times, January 30, 2007

FEDERAL COURT: Man draws one of the first 10-year sentences for child sexual enticement

HAMMOND | A 21-year-old Indiana man became one of the first in the nation Monday to receive a 10-year prison term for attempting to sexually entice a child through an Internet chatroom.

Mark Gledhill, of Syracuse, was nabbed along with 25 other men last summer in a wide-ranging federal sting for child sexual predators who use chatrooms to lure their victims.

Gledhill was among the half-dozen men in the sting who earlier pleaded guilty. He became the first to receive his sentence in U.S. District Court in Hammond.

The Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, which was signed into law by President Bush on July 27, increased the penalty for child enticement and other sex crimes to a 10-year minimum.

Weeks later, Gledhill and two dozen others were indicted in the Northern District of Indiana for enticement as part of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' Project Safe Childhood.

Gledhill was caught after he allegedly had sexual chats over the Internet with a government agent posing as a 13-year-old girl. He was arrested after driving to Valparaiso to meet the "girl."

FBI Inquires About Miller Land Deals (SGVT)

By Fred Ortega And Gary Scott, Staff Writers

DOJ_NMG_0124126

San Gabriel Valley Tribune, January 30, 2007

MONROVIA -- FBI investigators have contacted current and former city officials in Monrovia and Fontana about Rep. Gary Miller's land sales in those cities.

Miller, R-Brea, came under public scrutiny in August when a government watchdog group filed a complaint with the Internal Revenue Service alleging that Miller failed to report or pay capital gains tax on a nearly $11.8 million sale of 165 hillside acres to the city of Monrovia for a wildland preserve.

A former Monrovia mayor confirmed FBI agents contacted her about Miller in December, and Monrovia city officials acknowledged Monday that federal agents had requested documents from them in the past three weeks. A Fontana redevelopment official said he was contacted by an FBI agent several months ago about the congressman.

Officials with the IRS and the FBI would not confirm that they are investigating Miller.

Miller, 58, represents the 42nd District, which stretches from Diamond Bar to Mission Viejo and includes Whittier, Rowland Heights, La Habra Heights, Chino Hills, Chino and La Habra.

Miller said Friday that he was unaware of any federal investigation into his land dealings and knew of no reason why there would be an inquiry.

"It surprises me," he said. "I have no idea why they would (be investigating). There has been no impropriety."

Reached Monday, Miller said that he asked the House ethics committee late last year to review his business transactions to put an end to what he called months of media speculation.

Former Monrovia Mayor Lara Larramendi said FBI agents contacted her by telephone last month about Miller after a series of news stories appeared detailing the congressman s various land deals.

"They are just following up on their research based on what they ve read about the goings on in Monrovia and in Rancho Cucamonga and in Fontana about his use of the tax code," Larramendi said.

Monrovia spokesman Dick Singer said federal agents have contacted city officials, but he refused to comment on any specifics or to name the agency that had contacted the city.

City Manager Scott Ochoa added that Monrovia is part of a "timeline of events" involving Miller. When asked whether his staff had been contacted about the congressman, Ochoa said only that federal agents had asked him to use the "utmost discretion" if asked about an inquiry.

Ray Bragg, the redevelopment special projects director for the city of Fontana, said FBI agents called his office "a couple of months ago" and asked him to confirm details about Miller's business dealings with the city that had appeared in a Los Angeles Times article.

Miller said he was forced to sell the Monrovia land in 2002 under threat of eminent domain. He then invoked Internal Revenue Code 1033, which gives taxpayers up to two years to reinvest any capital gains from a forced sale.

Miller, a real estate developer, used the same IRS clause to shelter capital gains from a $5 million sale of 10 parcels to the city of Fontana in 2005, land which he had bought with the proceeds from the Monrovia sale.

Fontana and Monrovia city officials have said that in both cases Miller was a willing seller and that eminent domain was never used to buy the land.

But officials with Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which filed the August complaint with the IRS, contend Miller may have engaged in tax evasion.

Miller's spokesman Scott Toussaint said that if the congressman is contacted by authorities, he will cooperate fully. Miller has in the past produced letters from both Monrovia and Fontana officials stating that eminent domain could have been used to acquire his properties.

"He has nothing to hide," Toussaint said.

Miller said months of rumor and speculation in the media about his business transactions led him to contact the House ethics committee.

"I gave them all the articles and all the documentation on my real estate transactions and asked them for their opinion, " said Miller, adding that he turned over three large folders of documents to the committee. "I am sick to death of these baseless charges being made against me in the newspapers."

Miller said he did not know what agency the committee uses to conduct its investigations. A call to the FBI late Monday asking whether its agents are assisting the congressional ethics panel was not returned.

Former Monrovia Councilman Victor Franco and current Councilman Tom Adams, both of whom were serving on the council at the time of the Miller land sale, said they had not been contacted by any federal agency.

Mayor Rob Hammond, who was also part of the council that approved the Miller deal, did not return multiple calls seeking comment.

Miller is attempting to develop a 381-acre property in the Rancho Cucamonga foothills, where he has proposed to build a 110-home, high-end housing tract. Neighboring residents are fighting the development.

Miller lives in Diamond Bar. He was first elected to Congress in 1998 and ran for re-election unopposed in 2006.

Staff Writer George Watson contributed to this story.

Former Coke Secretary Testifies In Conspiracy Trial (SDUT/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 30, 2007

ATLANTA – A former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the world's largest beverage maker in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi denied at her trial Monday that she committed a crime.

Asked by her lawyer if she took part in a conspiracy, a teary-eyed Joya Williams told jurors she did not.

"No. We never talked about anything like that whatsoever," Williams said, referring to her and two co-defendants.

Of co-defendant Edmund Duhaney, Williams said, "That was my family. I don't have any of them anymore. Nobody. And I wouldn't even jeopardize that."

She added, "I did not do this. I did not try to conspire."

Williams, 41, testified she took documents from her employer home to protect herself.

The government has alleged that Williams stole confidential documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to Ibrahim Dimson and Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million.

"Can you tell the jurors how those bottles ended up at your home?" defense lawyer Janice Singer asked Williams, referring to Coca-Cola product samples found in Williams' possession when she was arrested.

"Once again, it was me trying to protect myself," Williams told jurors.

Williams said her boss at the Atlanta-based company, Javier Sanchez Lamelas, had told her she needed to be more familiar with everything that he did so she could be more prepared as his administrative assistant.

"Javier told me that I was an extension of him," Williams told jurors. He said, "If you're going to read, read about this company," according to Williams.

Williams testified that Sanchez Lamelas, Coca-Cola's global brand director, was constantly on her back, so in a desperate attempt to hold onto her $46,000-a-year job she started copying every document she put her hands on and taking them home.

"I was just making so many mistakes, so I just started keeping everything with me, so if he called ... I would have everything with me," Williams said.

Williams said she needed to hold onto the job because the company health insurance paid for her medications for immune deficiency and pulmonary disorders she suffers from.

Williams also said she was having trouble communicating with her bilingual boss because of his Spanish accent.

"I was having a lot of problems with remembering," Williams said. "I just could not get a grip on it the way he felt I should."

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of conspiracy. Two co-defendants, Duhaney and Dimson, have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. They had been scheduled to be sentenced Monday, but that was expected to be delayed until sometime after Williams' trial is over.

Williams, who has pleaded not guilty, was fired from her job at Coke after the allegations came to light.

In other testimony Monday, Williams said she had left a key for one of the co-defendants to get into her home; her lawyer has alleged the two co-defendants stole the documents from Williams and that she never conspired with them.

DOJ_NMG_0124128

Williams also told jurors she routinely took home company documents from the places she worked.

Williams took the stand as the second and final witness in the defense case. Defense lawyer Singer said she would not call a third witness as originally planned.

The only other witness for the defense was a Coca-Cola human resources official who testified Williams was having trouble in her job but was excited to be working for the company.

Williams said when she worked for Nextel Communications Inc. in 1997 and Coca-Cola Enterprises, the largest bottler for The Coca-Cola Co., in 2001, she often took home documents from her jobs.

“I took them home because I didn't finish them at work and I was supposed to finish them, and I didn't want to get in trouble,” Williams told jurors.

The defense was trying to show that there was nothing nefarious about all the Coca-Cola Co. documents that were found in Williams' home when she was arrested on July 5. Williams said she even still had some of the documents from Nextel, now owned by Sprint, and CCE.

“I thought I had destroyed all of them when the FBI came, but I had so much stuff,” Williams said.

The government rested its case earlier Monday.

U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester then denied a defense request to dismiss the indictment.

The jury will begin deliberating after closing arguments, which could be made as early as Tuesday.

The government's final witness was FBI agent Jerry Reichard, who testified Monday about a $4,000 cash deposit that posted to Williams' bank account on June 19, 2006. That was three days after Reichard gave Dimson $30,000 in cash in exchange for a sample of a new Coca-Cola product that was part of so-called Project Lancelot.

The money exchange between Dimson and Reichard occurred at the Atlanta airport. Reichard, who Dimson thought was an intermediary for Pepsi, said he put the cash in a girl scout cookie box. Williams testified Monday she got the cash from a friend, not from Dimson or Duhaney, and that it wasn't payment for Coke documents.

Singer has described Dimson and Duhaney as seasoned liars and ex-cons who would say anything to lessen their guilt in the scheme. Duhaney, as part of a plea agreement with the government, testified that Williams spearheaded the scheme. Dimson was not called as a government witness.

Reichard also acknowledged Monday under cross-examination that three other people who were supposed to get money or gifts from Dimson from the proceeds of the scheme were never charged in the case, and at least one of them was never interviewed by the FBI.

Alleged Coke Spy Tearful At Trial Former Secretary Says Of Allegations She Conspired To Sell Company Secrets: 'I Did Not Do Any Of This.' (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 30, 2007

Joya Williams cried Monday as she told jurors she did not conspire to steal Coke trade secrets and sell them to Pepsi.

"I did not do any of this," the 41-year-old former Coca-Cola secretary said on day six of her trial.

During two hours of testimony, Williams tried to convince jurors she was a victim of two ex-cons who pleaded guilty to trying to sell secret Coke documents to an undercover FBI agent last year for $1.5 million.

Williams said one of those men, Edmund Duhaney, was a longtime family friend. Williams said she is the godmother of Duhaney's two children, but now the family considers her "the enemy."

Prosecutors say Williams and Duhaney conspired to sell confidential documents and experimental product samples.

"No," she said under questioning from her attorney, Janice Singer. "We never talked about anything like that whatsoever. ... That was my family, I don't have any of them anymore. Nobody."

Williams said when she was arrested on July 5, she struggled to understand why.

"It scared the crap out of me. I didn't know what was going on," she said. "They all had guns pointed at me."

Last week, Duhaney testified that he gave $4,000 in cash to Williams from money he got from the undercover FBI agent. Prosecutors on Monday provided bank statements showing Williams deposited $4,000 cash into her bank account just days after Duhaney met with the agent.

Williams said the cash came from a friend in Alpharetta who has not been called to testify in the case.

Williams told jurors she took documents home from four different companies, including Coke, since 1995. Williams stored the documents in an office in her Norcross apartment.

"Up until this happened I didn't think anything was wrong," she said.

Williams said she showed authorities the cache of documents after she was arrested.

"I was like, why are y'all tripping?" Williams said.

Williams said she took some of the corporate documents home from the various jobs because she got sick and couldn't keep up with her work.

"I didn't finish them at work and I was supposed to finish them," she said.

Williams said she was diagnosed with lupus several years ago while working at Coca-Cola Enterprises, Coke's chief bottler. She also said she has a chronic disease affecting her lungs. Williams said she takes "about 10 medications."

Williams took a job at Coke in early 2005. She was responsible for scheduling meetings and travel for her boss, Javier Sanchez Lamelas, who is in charge of marketing soft drinks with Coke in the name.

"Coke is like nothing you've ever experienced," Williams said. "It's like a whole city within that company. There's so much you have to know."

Williams said her boss often reprimanded her for not remembering executives' names that he worked with and for failing to fulfill her duties. She said Sanchez Lamelas gave her a book once about how to cultivate emotional intelligence.

Williams said Sanchez Lamelas was demanding but that she "loved him." She said Coke had provided him with a "behavior coach" to help him keep his anger in check.

"A lot of it maybe just has to do with the [Coke] culture and he's very in your face, not patient, no mistakes," she said.

Singer struggled to keep Williams on track several times during her testimony. Williams' answers often wandered and she had trouble remembering dates when discussing her various jobs.

Williams will face cross-examination by prosecutors today, and closing arguments in the case are expected Wednesday. Prosecutors wrapped up their case Monday.

Williams is charged with one count of conspiracy to steal trade secrets. She faces a possible 10 years in prison if convicted.

Two co-defendants in the case, Duhaney, of Decatur, and Ibrahim Dimson of New York, pleaded guilty in October to the single conspiracy charge. They are awaiting sentencing.

The government has alleged that Williams stole the materials from Coke and gave them to Dimson and Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to PepsiCo for at least $1.5 million.

Williams says she removed company materials for innocent reasons and was dragged into the scheme unwittingly.

PepsiCo alerted Coke to the offer of documents-for-sale, and the FBI was called in.

MS-13 Member In Jail, Accused Of Cutting Off Couple's Heads (KHOU)

By Jeff McShan

KHOU-TV, January 30, 2007

An MS-13 gang member accused of cutting off the heads of his girlfriend's parents is in custody in Houston.

In late September, FBI agents and Houston police were involved in a shootout with MS-13 gang members in a hotel parking lot on the city's southeast side. Our cameras were there that night.

That night an FBI agent was wounded, but when it was all said and done, four gang members were apprehended and taken to jail.

A fifth suspect, 26-year-old Albin Zelaya, somehow managed to get away.

The dangerous man fled Houston, crossed the border and eventually ended up in Honduras, where he was spotted just outside the tiny town of San Pedro Sula.

11 News discovered this because on a Honduran newspaper website called Tiempo, we found an article where local authorities claim Zeleya decapitated his former in-laws. They claim he beheaded them with an ax while their 10-year-old son watched.

The article said the gruesome murder happened on Christmas day.

Zeleya reportedly told grieving relatives as he fled the scene that he killed the couple because their daughter broke up with him.

Apparently, no one knew Zeleya's whereabouts until this past weekend.

HPD sources told 11 News the department's gang squad found him here and was able to arrest him over the weekend.

The department was assisted by HPD SWAT and, we were told, the FBI.

Zelaya, believed to be involved in numerous crimes here, is currently charged with burglary and is being held without bond in the Harris County jail.

Earlier Monday, he made an appearance in federal court because of his illegal re-entry into the U.S.

HPD's Gang Division, working with the FBI, ATF and ICE, has arrested numerous MS-13 gang members since it was reorganized under the direction of Capt. Michael Graham.

11 News cameras were there just after two MS-13 gang members were shot and killed by FBI agents in November of 2005. There were two others wounded.

The war on gangs continues.

Tuesday, HPD will say more about the arrest Zeleya and five other alleged MS-13 members.

4 Convicted Of Watching Cockfights (AP)

AP, January 30, 2007

LAWTON, Okla. - A federal jury has convicted four men of being spectators at a cockfight held on Indian land south of Carnegie, U.S. Attorney Sheldon Sperling said Monday.

The jury convicted Clay McHone, 47, of Harrah; Carl "Hank" Bardsher, 46, of Lawton; Donald Underwood, 71, of Foster; and Robert Langford, 54, of Wichita Falls, Texas.

The jury could not reach a unanimous decision on a second charge against McHone for transporting, delivering, sponsoring or exhibiting an animal in an animal fighting venture, Sperling said.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Shon Erwin presided over the jury trials.

Agents from the FBI and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, aided by Oklahoma Highway Patrol troopers, raided the T.F.C. Cockfighting Facility where the cockfights were being held on July 22, and federal authorities eventually charged 75 people with various cockfighting offenses, Sperling said.

Seventy of those have been prosecuted in federal court for attending the cockfight, and 11 of the 70 also were charged with transporting animals for participation in an animal fighting venture. Most of the 70 have entered guilty pleas and been assessed fines ranging from $300 to $600, Sperling said.

Two defendants still have trials pending, and another, Jason McHone, 25, of Harrah, did not appear for a jury trial this week. Sperling said a warrant has been issued for Jason McHone's arrest.

Two others are awaiting sentencing after entering guilty pleas.

Sperling said 15 illegal immigrants were taken into custody during the cockfighting raid and later deported and that all of the game fowl at the arena were euthanized at the scene.

"Federal law outlaws animal fighting, whether or not the fight is held on Indian Country," Sperling said. "Oklahoma's anti-cockfighting law is applicable in Indian Country and gamefowl enthusiasts should know that tribal lands off no 'safe haven' for animal fighting anywhere in the state of Oklahoma."

FBI Agents Arrest Man At Mall St. Matthews (LCJ)

By Charlie White, The Courier-Journal

Louisville Courier-Journal, January 30, 2007

Authorities said he was trying to meet a 14-year-old girl for sex

A Lyndon man was arrested by federal agents inside Mall St. Matthews Monday afternoon after authorities said he tried to meet a 14-year-old girl there for sex.

Kishor Patel, 39, of the 8200 block of Coppercreek Drive, was taken into custody and will be arraigned in federal court Tuesday, said David Beyer, a spokesman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation office in Louisville.

Beyer said Patel had a "look of surprise on his face" as FBI agents handcuffed him and walked him out of the mall about 2:30 p.m.

Otherwise, the arrest took place without incident, Beyer said.

Tracy Reinhold, special agent in charge of the FBI's Kentucky office, said Patel had been communicating online with an undercover agent whom Patel believed to be a 14-year-old girl.

In online discussions initiated by Patel, he made plans to meet his correspondent at the mall, then take her somewhere fox sex, authorities said.

Reporter Charlie White can be reached at (502) 582-4653.

Serial Child Molester Receives Maximum Term In California (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 29 — A man who the authorities said had sexually abused hundreds of young boys in several states was sentenced Monday in a California courtroom to 152 years to life in prison for molesting two 12-year-olds.

The man, Dean Arthur Schwartzmiller, 65, was convicted by a Santa Clara County jury last year for sexually abusing the two boys at his San Jose home from 2002 to 2005. On Monday in San Jose, he was given the maximum penalty for the 11 felony charges of child molestation and one misdemeanor charge of possessing child pornography.

The authorities have labeled Mr. Schwartzmiller, a former handyman, one of the "most prolific child molesters" in United States history.

At the time of his arrest in May 2005, a police search of his home led to the discovery of written accounts describing his sexual exploits with boys ranging in age from 8 to 18, some dating back decades. The manuscripts included at least seven spiral notebooks with 1,500 pages of log entries detailing the sexual acts he said he had performed on hundreds of boys.

"If anyone deserved the maximum sentence, it was Mr. Schwartzmiller," said a Santa Clara County prosecutor, Steven Fein, who tried the case.

Mr. Schwartzmiller, who represented himself during most of the three-week trial, has already filed an appeal in the Santa Clara County Superior Court, said a defense lawyer who handled the sentencing proceedings. The lawyer, Melinda Hall, a Santa Clara County public defender, said the sentence should have been no more than 30 years to life.

"The sentence wasn't unexpected," Ms. Hall said, "but I don't know if it will survive on appeal."

Ms. Hall said the United States Supreme Court on Jan. 22 ruled on a California case that might favor Mr. Schwartzmiller on appeal. The court ruled that California's sentencing laws, which allow judges to weigh aggravating factors in setting a sentence, were unconstitutional. The court said that if additional factors were considered, a jury must first review them.

Mr. Fein said he remained confident that Mr. Schwartzmiller, who was convicted in several other states but eventually freed, would spend the rest of his life in prison. Mr. Fein said both the police and legal investigators were able to confirm a large number of the sexual abuses described in Mr. Schwartzmiller's detailed logbooks, which had category headings like "blond boys" and "boys who just cried."

Mr. Schwartzmiller argued that the entries were fiction.

The final tally of victims, Mr. Fein said, included 250 boys molested in Idaho, Oregon and several other states over the last 35 years.

In addition to the two boys in this case, six other former victims, now in their late 20s to late 50s, traveled to California to face their abuser in court.

DOJ_NMG_0124132

Mr. Fein said it was difficult to listen to the testimony because Mr. Schwartzmiller went into “excruciating detail” during his cross-examination of the witnesses.

“It was almost hard to sit through,” Mr. Fein said. “It was clear they were being victimized all over again.”

Man Sentenced To Probation In Fake Hazmat Incident (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, January 30, 2007

HARTFORD, Conn. -- An Uncasville man was sentenced to two years of probation Monday for lying to federal authorities about being the victim of a chemical attack.

Robert Robishaw, 40, pleaded guilty in November to one count of making false statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, prosecutors said.

He was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Hartford nearly a year after telling Groton fire authorities that an unknown substance fell out of a newspaper that he purchased at a Waterford convenience store. He told authorities the off-white, powdery substance caused his skin to turn red and tingle.

The report prompted a massive hazardous materials response in Waterford and Groton and sent eight people to the hospital for decontamination. The substance turned out to be cigarette ash that prosecutors say Robishaw put in the newspaper.

He faced up to five years in prison.

U.S. District Judge Robert N. Chatigny ordered him to get mental health counseling and treatment while he is on probation.

Florida Man Gets Probation In Bomb Hoax Case At Airport (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, January 30, 2007

LOS ANGELES - A federal judge sentenced a Florida man to two years probation for calling in a fake bomb threat after arriving too late to board his flight at Long Beach Airport.

Yechezkel Wells, 22, of Miami Beach, also was ordered Monday to spend six months confined to his home, perform 200 hours of community service and pay a $1,000 fine.

Wells pleaded guilty in October, acknowledging he made the fake threat in an effort to keep his Jet Blue flight to Fort Lauderdale from leaving.

Court documents said Wells arrived 10 minutes before the Aug. 26 flight and was turned away at the check-in counter. Upset, he walked over to a pay phone and called 911.

The flight was delayed while bomb-sniffing dogs searched the plane, and FBI agents detained Wells for questioning.

U.S. District Judge Florence-Marie Cooper called Wells' hoax "incredibly stupid."

"The conduct is really quite astonishing and could have been dangerous to a lot of people," the judge said.

Defense attorney Donald Etra, who once described Wells' act as "unbelievably bad judgment," said his client learned his lesson.

"He's 22 years of age and he certainly has a lot yet to learn from the world," Etra said. "He's learned you don't mess with the airlines and you don't mess with airline safety."

Troutman Denies Possible Drug Possession (WBBM)

WBBM-TV, January 30, 2007

CHICAGO (WBBM) -- As she fights federal corruption charges, 20th Ward Alderman Arenda Troutman now says it was a dietary aid, not drugs that were found in her possession.

WBBM Political Editor Craig Dellimore has that story.

Arenda Troutman’s accused of taking bribes—and is fighting those charges—but federal agents reported finding a bagged, white powdery substance in an office desk that could be drugs.

Not true, Troutman tells reporters at City Hall, it couldn’t be.

Troutman says she doesn't do drugs, and she believes the powder fround was psyllium husk, a substance vegetarians like her use to clean out their digestive systems. And she says the FBI should have known that immediately.

FBI spokesman—Agent Ross Rice—says no field test was performed on the powder because such tests can be unreliable and results from the crime lab haven't been received yet.

The FBI denies Troutman's suggestion that the agency just trying to muddy up her character.

Judge: Convicted Ex-alderman Can Run (CHIT)

Tribune Staff Report

Chicago Tribune, January 30, 2007

Former Ald. Virgil Jones (15th), who was convicted on corruption charges in 1999, can run to regain a seat on the City Council in the Feb. 27 election, a Cook County judge decided Monday.

Circuit Judge Alfred Paul ruled that a state law that would ban Jones from the race is unconstitutional because it applies only to ex-felons running in local races and not statewide elections.

Paul's ruling affirmed the decision of the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners, which said earlier this month that Jones and other ex-felon candidates had the right to be on the ballot.

Jones was convicted of pocketing $7,000 in payoffs from an FBI informant and was sentenced to 41 months in prison.

Chicago resident Readonia Bryant, who sued to overturn the board's decision regarding Jones, plans to appeal, said his attorney, Clint Krislov of Chicago.

Election board spokesman Tom Leach said Monday that election officials welcome an appeal because it would help settle the issue and avoid future legal challenges.

On Friday, another Cook County judge ruled that former Ald. Ambrosio Medrano (25th) should remain on the ballot despite a 1996 corruption conviction.

Editorial: TIME FOR FEDS TO ACT IN CITY HALL PROBE (NIAGFR)

Niagara Falls Reporter, January 30, 2007

Thursday, May 3, will mark the two-year anniversary of the day agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation came to the offices of this paper and left with unimpeachable documentation attesting to the fact that Mayor Vincenzo V. Anello took $40,000 from downtown developer "Smokin' Joe" Anderson immediately before and just after being elected in 2003.

Shortly afterward -- at a highly publicized press conference -- the U.S. Department of Justice announced the formation of an official corruption task force to look into the matter, and a federal grand jury in Buffalo was impanelled to hear evidence in the case. Numerous City Hall employees and elected officials were subpoenaed, and FBI agents interviewed even more.

Even more evidence surfaced showing Anello wasn't averse to doing a little business on the side. It turned out he'd also taken an under-the-table payment from the sister of one of the principals of Greater Niagara Sports, the company involved in the supposed redevelopment of the city's Hyde Park Golf Course.

Both Anderson's companies and GNS received highly favorable deals "negotiated" by Anello as mayor.

The FBI agents involved believed they had developed an airtight case. But the Justice Department began dragging its heels on the matter after Michael Battle was replaced by Terrance Flynn as Buffalo's U.S. Attorney in 2006. Investigators are frustrated by the delay, and one longtime FBI man requested and received a transfer off the task force in protest.

By May 3, just 13 weeks away, the campaign season will be in full swing. Anello has shown every intention of seeking re-election, and confused Niagara Falls voters will be put in the unenviable position of having to decide for themselves whether Anello is a criminal suspect about to be indicted or an innocent man wrongly tarnished by an overzealous federal investigation.

It's time for Flynn to either press charges or drop them, with the same sort of ballyhoo that attended the announcement of the investigation's beginning. To do any less would make the Justice Department guilty of perpetrating a gross injustice indeed.

A Lively Market, Legal And Not, For Software Bugs (NYT)

By Brad Stone

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Microsoft says its new operating system, Windows Vista, is the most secure in the company's history. Now the bounty hunters will test just how secure it is.

When its predecessor, Windows XP, was released five years ago, software bugs were typically hunted by hackers for fame and glory, not financial reward. But now software vulnerabilities — as with stolen credit-card numbers and spammable e-mail addresses — carry real financial value. They are commonly bought, sold and traded online, both by legitimate security companies, which say they are providing a service, and by nefarious hackers and thieves.

Vista, which will be installed on millions of new PCs starting today, provides the latest target.

This month, iDefense Labs, a subsidiary of the technology company VeriSign, said it was offering $8,000 for the first six researchers to find holes in Vista, and $4,000 more for the so-called exploit, the program needed to take advantage of the weakness.

IDefense sells such information to corporations and government agencies, which have already begun using Vista, so they can protect their own systems.

Companies like Microsoft do not endorse such bounty programs, but they have even bigger problems: the willingness of Internet criminals to spend large sums for early knowledge of software flaws that could provide an opening for identity-theft schemes and spam attacks.

The Japanese security firm Trend Micro said in December that it had found a Vista flaw for sale on a Romanian Web forum for $50,000. Security experts say that the price is plausible, and that they regularly see hackers on public bulletin boards or private online chat rooms trying to sell the holes they have discovered, and the coding to exploit them.

Especially prized are so-called zero-day exploits, bits of disruption coding that spread immediately because there is no known defense.

Software vendors have traditionally asked security researchers to alert them first when they find bugs in their software, so that they could issue a fix, or patch, and protect the general public. But now researchers contend that their time and effort are worth much more.

"To find a vulnerability, you have to do a lot of hard work," said Evgeny Legerov, founder of a small security firm, Gleg Ltd., in Moscow. "If you follow what they call responsible disclosure, in most cases all you receive is an ordinary thank you or sometimes nothing at all."

Gleg sells vulnerability research to a dozen corporate customers around the world, with fees starting at $10,000 for periodic updates. Mr. Legerov says he regularly turns down the criminals who send e-mail messages offering big money for bugs they can use to spread malicious programs like spyware.

Misusing such information to attack computers or to aid others in such attacks is illegal, but there appears to be nothing illegal about the act of discovering and selling vulnerabilities. Prices for such software bugs range from a couple of hundred dollars to tens of thousands.

Microsoft is not the only target, of course. Legitimate security researchers and underground hackers look for weaknesses in all commonly used software, including Oracle databases and Apple's Macintosh operating system. The more popular a program, the higher the price for an attacking code.

The sales of Vista faults will therefore continue to trail the sale of flaws in more widely used programs, even Windows XP, for the foreseeable future.

"Of course it concerns us," Mark Miller, director of the Microsoft Security Response Center, said of the online bazaar in software flaws, which it has declined to enter. "With the underground trading of vulnerabilities, software makers are left playing catch-up to develop updates that will help protect customers."

Throughout the 1990s, software makers and bug-hunters battled over the way researchers disclosed software vulnerabilities. The software vendors argued that public disclosure gave attackers the blueprints to create exploitative programs and viruses. Security researchers charged that the vendors wanted to hide their mistakes, and that making them public allowed companies and individual computer users to protect their systems.

The two sides reached an uneasy compromise. Security researchers would inform vendors of vulnerabilities, and as long as the vendor was responsive, wait for the release of an official patch before publishing code that an attacker could use. Vendors would give public credit to the researcher. The détente worked when most researchers were motivated by acclaim and a desire to improve security.

DOJ_NMG_0124135

But "in the last five years the glory seekers have gone away," said David Perry, global education director at Trend Micro. "The people who are drawn to it to make a living are not the same people who were drawn to it out of passion."

In 2002, iDefense Labs became one of the first companies to pay for software flaws, offering just a few hundred dollars for a vulnerability. It administered the program quietly for a few years, then answered early critics by arguing that it was getting those bugs out into the open and informing software makers, at the same time as clients, before announcing them to the general public.

"We give vendors ample time to react, and then we try to responsibly release them," said Jim Melnick, the director of threat intelligence at iDefense.

In 2005, TippingPoint, a division of the networking giant 3Com, joined iDefense in the nascent marketplace with its "Zero-Day Initiative" program, which last year bought and sold 82 software vulnerabilities. IDefense said its freelance researchers discovered 305 holes in commonly used software during 2006 — up from 180 in 2005 — and paid $1,000 to $10,000 for each, depending on the severity.

Security researchers warmed to the idea that vulnerabilities were worth real dollars. In December 2005, a hacker calling himself "Fearwall" tried to sell on eBay a program to disrupt computers through Excel, Microsoft's spreadsheet program. Bidding reached a paltry $53 before the auction site pulled it.

Nevertheless, several Internet attacks in the following months exploited flaws in Excel, suggesting to security experts that its creator ultimately found other ways to sell it.

In January 2006, a Moscow-based security company, Kaspersky Labs, found more evidence of an emerging marketplace for software bugs. Russian hacking gangs, it disclosed at the time, had sold a "zero-day" program aimed at the Microsoft graphics file format, Windows Metafile or WMF. The price: $4,000.

The program was widely used that month and allowed criminals to plant spyware and other malicious programs on the computers of tens of thousands of unsuspecting Internet users. Microsoft rushed out a patch.

It had to distribute another patch in September, to counter one more malicious program, which involved a flaw in the vector graphics engine of Internet Explorer, that enabled further cyber mischief.

Marc Maiffret, co-founder of eEye Digital Security, a computer security company, said prices in the evolving black market quickly proved higher than what legitimate companies would pay. "You will always make more from bad guys than from a company like 3Com," he said.

Even ethical researchers feel that companies like iDefense and TippingPoint do not adequately compensate for the time and effort needed to discover flaws in complex, relatively secure software.

And some hackers have little ethical compunction about who buys their research, or what they use it for. In a phone interview last week arranged by an intermediary in the security field, a hacker calling himself "Segfault," who said he was a college-age student in New York City, led a reporter on an online tour of a public Web site, ryan1918.com, where one forum is provocatively titled "Buy-Sell-Trade-0day."

Segfault, who said he did not want to reveal his name because he engages in potentially illegal activity, said the black market for zero-days "just exploded" last year after the damaging Windows Metafile attack.

He claims he earned $20,000 last year from selling his own code — mostly on private chat channels, not public forums like Ryan1918 — making enough to pay his tuition.

Although he conceded that Microsoft had made significant strides with Vista's security, he said underground hacker circles now had a powerful financial incentive to find its weak links.

"Vista is going to get destroyed," he said.

That may be an exaggeration. Microsoft has taken precautions such as preventing unauthorized programs from running at the most central part of the system, called the kernel, and creating an extra level of protection between the operating system and the browser.

Microsoft appears to wish the open market for flaws in their products would simply disappear. "Our practice is to explicitly acknowledge and thank researchers when they find an issue in our software," said Mike Reavey, operations manager of the company's security response center. "While that's not a monetary reward, we think there is value in it."

DOJ_NMG_0124136

But independent security analysts say those days are over. Raimund Genes, the Trend Micro researcher who found the Vista bug for sale on a Romanian Web site, said, “The driving force behind all this now is cash.”

Virginia Men Face U.S. Trial In Peddling Of Phony Purses (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

They are known as "purse parties," modern-day Tupperware parties with a twist: hundreds of designer handbags selling for hundreds of dollars off. Women known as "the purse ladies" run the gatherings at private homes.

"They were all the rage," said Peggy Stypula, an Alexandria resident who attended parties in Arlington and Fairfax counties. "The purses were spread out all over the house, and you walked around and picked out what you wanted."

But one partygoer in Northern Virginia suspected counterfeit couture and called police. Federal agents soon seized 30,000 purses from a Fairfax warehouse, including some from a tractor-trailer that pulled up during the search.

Now, prosecutors are taking to federal court the men they say provided phony merchandise. A father and son are scheduled to go on trial tomorrow in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, accused of supplying thousands of counterfeit handbags for the purse parties and also selling them at kiosks in malls throughout the Washington region, including Tysons Corner Center, Montgomery Mall and the Old Post Office Pavilion.

The trial in one of the nation's largest counterfeiting prosecutions will feature testimony from representatives of Gucci, Kate Spade and other leading designer labels, according to court documents. Exhibit A will be a sampling of hundreds of purses, hauled into the courtroom one box at a time.

The case is bringing scrutiny to a widespread problem that has been publicly visible for years: trafficking in handbags and other counterfeit goods. Shoppers in Washington and other major cities can find fake fancy designer purses on street vendor carts, but purse parties -- though perhaps more underground with the heightened law enforcement attention -- are still held in the suburbs.

Lalit Kumar Ohri, 63, and his son Gaurav Ohri, 29, are charged with conspiracy and trafficking in counterfeit goods. Prosecutors say the pair sold purses bearing the trademarks of at least nine leading designer labels, including Louis Vuitton, Prada and Burberry. The pair allegedly had the purses embossed with trademark-infringing labels or gave the labels to purchasers. Some purchasers reportedly affixed the labels with glue.

The U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria would not comment. Nina Ginsburg, an attorney for the Ohris, would say only that they deny knowingly selling counterfeit handbags.

Experts say the problem of trafficking in counterfeit goods has mushroomed in recent years with globalization and the lowering of trade barriers. Everything from medicine to car parts is counterfeited, according to the International AntiCounterfeiting Coalition, a District-based industry group.

Among the leading fake items are designer handbags, known as knockoffs. "They're easy to counterfeit, they're small and they come in big containers from China," said Barbara Kolsun, senior vice president and general counsel of 7 For All Mankind and a former top official at Kate Spade.

She said selling the knockoffs "is stealing. You're stealing the name. It's no different than walking into a store and stealing a Kate Spade handbag off the shelves."

Even though it is a crime to sell such trademarked goods -- although not to purchase them -- enforcement is spotty, law enforcement officials said. Police have higher priorities, and federal prosecutors take only the biggest cases, so street vendors' booths and mall kiosks where knockoffs are sold often slip by.

Travis Johnson said he walks by sidewalk vendors selling counterfeit handbags every day on his way to work -- at the anti-counterfeiting coalition -- on K Street between Connecticut Avenue and 18th Street NW. "There's a perception that big, wealthy companies can put up with a few knockoffs," said Johnson, the coalition's general counsel. "It's not really seen as doing major harm."

DOJ_NMG_0124137

Purse parties began in New York City 10 to 15 years ago and gradually spread, experts say. Some are advertised in the suburbs through mass e-mailings. Many who attend them believe they are getting either a good fake or stolen property, according to experts on counterfeiting.

The parties that Stypula attended in 2005 were elaborate open houses, with free wine and tables of shrimp dip, casseroles and a variety of appetizers. The woman who ran the Arlington party had made a business out of it, and her husband had even quit a lucrative job to work with her, Stypula said.

Stypula said that competition for the best bags was fierce and that she clung to the two Prada knockoffs she wanted so no one would grab them away. She and several friends chatted at the party about whether something was amiss.

"I said why would her husband quit his job when this is such a phony business and people could theoretically go down for selling knockoffs," Stypula said. "I know you can't get a Prada bag for $40 or $45, so you know these are hot from somewhere."

In fact, handbags by Prada and some other designer labels, including Gucci, sell for anywhere from hundreds of dollars to more than $2,000 each.

The parties apparently have grown less frequent in Northern Virginia as word has spread about the Ohri case.

After an anonymous tip from a purse partygoer, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents raided one of the homes in 2003 and then found the trove of purses at the Ohris' warehouse in Lorton. It took more than 10 agents, working full time, a month to count and catalogue the merchandise.

Agents also found more than 100 phony Kate Spade labels in a desk drawer at the warehouse, court documents say.

The Ohris, of Fairfax, were indicted last year. They could face up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

Lalit Ohri is a retired lieutenant colonel in the army of India who started his business, now called Sonya Handbags, in the early 1990s by selling leather goods at Eastern Market in the District, Ginsburg said. As business grew, he expanded to malls, and by 2003, there were kiosks operating under the name Sonya Handbags in 13 malls in Virginia, Maryland and the District, including Fair Oaks Shopping Center in Fairfax and Columbia Mall.

Court documents say the Ohris were told by some malls to stop selling counterfeit goods but ignored the warnings. But Suzette Timme, general manager of the Fashion Centre at Pentagon City, where the family operated two kiosks, said mall security never noticed any problem.

"They were just selling generic bags with no labels," Timme said.

Five Deadly Hours In The District (WP)

By Allison Klein And Sue Anne Pressley Montes

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

In just five hours, one man was beaten to death with a baseball bat, another was slain during a dice game, a third was shot by an assailant after barricading himself in his bathroom, and the last was killed in a botched robbery.

It was a violent weekend in Washington, with four unrelated killings in three quadrants. Police have made one arrest -- in the baseball bat beating near the Shaw neighborhood. Detectives have not identified the victim.

"Any homicide in the city is one too many," said Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D), appearing beside acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier in the 800 block of Yuma Street SE, where Kevin Vincent Bradshaw, 41, was slain after four men took his money. "But four is unacceptable."

They pledged to redouble their efforts, forge stronger partnerships with federal agencies and work more closely with the community.

But the action does not come soon enough for the victims and their families. The three identified men left behind people who loved them, who depended on them. Each left a story to tell.

Trial Nearing, Alleged Call Girl Found Dead (WP)

By Darragh Johnson

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

She was a former college professor who had lost almost everything -- her stellar academic reputation, her financial well-being and her anonymity in the swanky suburban neighborhood where she was accused of working as a high-priced prostitute.

With Brandy Britton's trial planned to start next week, the former University of Maryland Baltimore County professor apparently took her own life over the weekend, hanging herself in her living room, Howard County police say. A family member found the body Saturday afternoon. Police say they do not suspect foul play.

It was a grievous end to a life that friends and colleagues say was once filled with remarkable promise and ambition.

Britton, 43, was the first in her family to go to college, double-majoring in biology and sociology. Her first sociology professor, Sheila Cordray, told The Washington Post last year that Britton was "one of the brightest students I've ever had."

The woman whose looks matched her intelligence may still have possessed the long, blond hair, the glossy pink lips and the glamorous figure of her youth. And she may have still projected the warm, friendly demeanor of a small-town girl from Oregon.

But she was facing the world's toughest truth: She had no idea who she was about to become.

Her trial date on four counts of prostitution -- which she had decided to fight in a jury trial instead of accepting a plea agreement -- was set for Monday. Police would get a chance to air their version of Brandy Britton: that in her $400,000 home at the end of a cul-de-sac where children ride Razor scooters and moms drive minivans with soccer decals, Britton had been selling herself as a call girl.

She called herself Alexis, police said and advertised on a Web site that described Alexis as a "quintessential 'brick house' " and "sophisticated, refined, educated and articulate. She has two Bachelor of Science degrees, one in biology and the other in sociology. She also holds a Ph.D. from an elite university." It continued: "An athlete, cheerleader and dancer in high school, Alexis . . . is extremely flexible in excellent shape."

In a sting, Howard police sent an undercover officer to her house last January and arrested her.

Britton heatedly denied the allegations, but when The Washington Post asked her last year how she had been supporting herself since leaving UMBC in late 1999 and a subsequent job with the Baltimore public schools, she started to answer, then suddenly recommended a book: "Sex Work: Writings by Women in the Sex Industry."Fighting on Several Fronts

Her attorney, Christopher Flohr, has been out of his office taking care of his ailing father and had hoped to postpone her trial date. Flohr's partner, William Paul Blackford, heard the news of her death yesterday morning when The Post called. He sat in silence for several moments, then spoke of her other recent court battle: foreclosure hearings on her home.

He talked about Britton's fears that she would lose the house where she had raised two children, now grown, as a single parent and where she had been living with her two potbellied pigs, dog and two cats.

"That is one of the most heart-wrenching processes for a person to go through," Blackford said, continuing to talk, then interrupting himself, as though the news about Britton's death had just sunk in. "This is horribly sad."

Blackford suggested that Britton's state of mind lately was comparable to a starkly clean and ultra-modern home -- as Britton had decorated her living room and den, complete with sleek black leather couches -- and then "there's a stack of magazines in the living room and then there's a hamper," and then the mess has crept across everything.

"Her house," he added, "I think it's fair to say, it wasn't impressive."

Britton was a scramble of complications: She lived in a landscaped home with leaded-glass front doors that disguised the scratched-up carpet and scuffed walls inside. She was a sharp researcher whose dissertation focused on abused and battered women who then found herself, a few years ago, filing domestic-violence charges against her second husband: "He . . . tied me up with strapping tape" and "stabbed me in the neck," she told police.

In a statement yesterday, Flohr said that Britton's death "underscores an important question: Was the public benefited at all by the resources spent on her arrest and prosecution? As we ponder the apparent senselessness of her passing, we must openly wonder about . . . a criminal justice system that seeks to punish a person rather than heal them."Confusion and Depression

"It's been a descent for Brandy," her mother, Victoria Britton, said last year from her home in Oregon. She did not return calls for comment yesterday.

Victoria Britton had cheered, she said, when her daughter earned a PhD in sociology and arrived in the mid-1990s at UMBC, where she received raises and raves from other professors, who called her work "really top-notch" and "invaluable."

But the raves subsided after Brandy Britton filed a $10 million sex discrimination suit against UMBC -- one mirroring the suit she had filed against her California employer just before joining UMBC. She left the university at the end of 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0124139

"I spent my whole life working for that," she told The Post last year, as she talked about her PhD and her identity as a college professor. "It wasn't just a job to me. It was my life."

And now, she continued, she had no idea what would happen next -- or whom she could next become. Her fight with UMBC would keep her from ever teaching again. Already, she believed, "they" were tapping her phones and bugging her home.

It was too much, she said, and she found herself thinking:

" 'I'm going to lay down and die. I'm so depressed.' "

Attorney Rejects Warden's Claim That US Inmate Showed No Signs Of Pain In Execution (FINDLAW/AP)

By Phil Davis, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 30, 2007

(AP) - TAMPA, Florida-A convicted killer whose execution was botched last year was never in any pain, and appeared to be straining to see a clock, not grimacing as some witnesses claimed, the warden told a panel reviewing Florida's lethal injection procedures Monday.

But the condemned man's lawyer said his client was clearly suffering from the incorrectly injected chemicals, and he mocked the notion that the inmate was looking at a clock.

"What, was he late for an appointment? Come on, that's ridiculous," said Angel Nieves Diaz's attorney, Neal Dupree, who also witnessed the execution and testified. "I certainly thought he knew something was wrong."

Questions about whether lethal injection is inhumane have put executions on hold in nine U.S. states - Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio and South Dakota.

Diaz' death took 34 minutes - twice as long as usual - and required a rare second dose of lethal chemicals because the needles were incorrectly inserted, a medical examiner reported. An autopsy found chemical burns in both his arms.

Death penalty opponents point to Diaz's execution to support their claims that Florida's lethal injection procedure violates the U.S. Constitution's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. Condemned inmates have also pursued that issue in court, but to no avail.

Dupree told the commission his client was clearly in pain.

"He almost appeared to be a fish out of water," Dupree said. "He was gasping. And that went on for a period of about 10 to 12 minutes. You could see body movement. You could see clutching and unclutching."

Several people on the prison's execution team have said Diaz said "What's happening?" twice during the process.

But Diaz appeared to be straining to see a clock, not grimacing, Florida State Prison Warden Randall Bryant told the commission.

"He had the opportunity to be able to scream, cry, yell and that sort of thing and that did not happen," said Bryant, who stood about 2 feet (0.6 meters) away during the Dec. 13 execution.

Officials testified Monday the prison medical team was satisfied with the insertion of the needles.

Commission members asked to hear from the executioners and medical team, whose identities are closely guarded by the Florida Department of Corrections. American Medical Association guidelines bar doctors from taking part, directly or indirectly, in executions.

Associated Press writer Ron Word in Jacksonville contributed to this report.

A Missed Warning (MH)

The Miami Herald, January 30, 2007

In refusing last summer to investigate the e-mails that former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley sent to a former congressional page, the FBI ignored its own child-safety guidelines, says a report from the Justice Department's inspector general. The Foley e-mails given to the FBI in July 2006 by a whistle-blower group didn't contain sexually explicit references, but their language indicated behavior that the FBI warns about in A Parent's Guide to Internet Safety on its website. The agency should review how it handles complaints about public officials.

DOJ_NMG_0124140

The inspector general took the FBI to task for not reacting quickly to the e-mails, which were given to the agency by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW). The report says the FBI also wrongly blamed CREW for not handing over additional information. Never happened, says the report.

While the agency clearly has more-pressing duties in the era of terrorism than tracking congressmen with a penchant for befriending House pages, the FBI dropped the ball. At the least, says the report, agents should have interviewed the former page or informed House of Representatives leaders. The FBI didn't decide to investigate until more sexually explicit e-mails sent by Foley surfaced in the fall, forcing him to resign his House seat.

More culpable than the FBI in the Foley affair, however, were leaders of the House over several years' time. A House Ethics Committee investigation last December found evidence that "concerns began to rise about Rep. Foley's interactions with pages or other young male staff members" not long after he took office in 1995.

In response to the investigation's findings, the House this month revised oversight of the page program. The FBI should take the Justice report's conclusions equally seriously.

CIVIL LAW:

Lawsuit Alleges Price Inflation By Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane (AP)

AP, January 30, 2007

BOSTON - Federal prosecutors filed a lawsuit Monday against Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane Inc. and related entities, alleging that the pharmaceutical company inflated prices for several of its drugs.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston said it has intervened in a whistleblower lawsuit originally filed by a Florida company, Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc., and its principals.

In its suit, the U.S. Attorney's Office alleges that Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane engaged in a scheme to report fraudulent and inflated prices for several products, knowing that federal health care programs established reimbursement rates based on those reported prices.

Roxane, based in Columbus, Ohio, sells generic drugs that are reimbursed by Medicare and Medicaid, two federal health care programs.

The difference between the government reimbursement rates and the actual price paid by healthcare providers for a drug is referred to as the "spread." The larger the spread on a drug, the larger the profit for the provider.

The government claims that Roxane used artificially inflated spreads to market, promote and sell the drugs to existing and potential customers. Because reimbursement from federal programs was based on the fraudulent prices, prosecutors claim that Roxane caused false claims to be submitted to federal healthcare programs.

"Roxane Laboratories maintains the highest ethical standards in sales and marketing practices and is committed to making generic medications available to Medicaid beneficiaries throughout the United States at prices that save the states and patients millions of dollars each year," the company said in a statement.

"The company has at all times complied with the tangle of laws and rules imposed by the federal government and the fifty states for the Medicaid program, and has paid millions of dollars in rebates to the states on drug purchases."

The company said it had not yet seen the government's lawsuit, "but we are disappointed in the government's apparent decision to join in a lawsuit filed almost ten years ago."

Feds Say Lab Owner Stole $17M (HTRIB)

By Todd Ruger

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), January 30, 2007

Joseph T. Degregorio is accused of changing bills and patient records

DOJ_NMG_0124141

SARASOTA -- The owner of a Sarasota-based medical laboratory company altered patients' medical histories and bilked Medicare for $17 million over six years, federal officials say.

Joseph T. Degregorio, 49, the owner of Acculab Laboratories Inc., is in the Sarasota County jail, charged with child sexual battery, which could carry a life prison term.

It was uncovered during the three-year fraud investigation.

The investigation began in 2003, after a phlebotomist at Acculab became suspicious of the way the company told her to fill out Medicare forms, court records state.

The woman said she didn't have patient medical records, or know whether the patients had cancer, yet was told to enter a cancer diagnosis so the government would pay for the blood tests.

She filed a whistle-blower lawsuit detailing her experiences. The government is now leading the lawsuit, seeking at least $2.7 million in damages and penalties, with testimony of at least eight unnamed former employees and Medicare billing audits that show 80 percent of claims were unsubstantiated.

Degregorio also altered patients' permanent medical histories to reflect a diagnosis that didn't exist, such as prostate, breast or ovarian cancer, investigators say. Acculab shut its doors last year after federal agents raided the main office and seized truckloads of evidence.

Since filing the initial lawsuit under seal from Charlotte County, the phlebotomist remains "Jane Doe" in the proceedings, her identity, location and office where she worked edited from files.

She is afraid that Degregorio, who surrounded himself with guns and has been charged with witness tampering from his cell in his sex case, might try to harm her and her child.

Employees detail fraud

Degregorio would come to the business late at night and download the company's Medicare billing data onto a computer, former staffers told federal investigators.

Degregorio's program would change the bills to reflect higher-paying tests, the government says in its lawsuit.

But several phlebotomists told investigators that the fraud went on at blood draw stations, too. They were told to provide lab work to patients who did not have a doctor's order, then put a random doctor's name on the forms.

One former staffer told investigators that a patient's blood sample would sit for so long it was no good for testing, and they would call the patient back and bill Medicare for both tests.

Federal officials reviewed Acculab's Medicare records and found errors in 87 percent of the claims submitted in 2003, and 80 percent of claims from 2004.

Acculab's attorney, Roy Howard, said in a letter to investigators that "an inadvertent computer programming error" led to the problem.

"It appears from the available billing records that this computer programming error was corrected sometime in May 2005," Howard wrote.

It was the same explanation Howard used for the company in January 2004, when a Medicare auditor found $298,324 in false claims on every one of 35 cases it looked at from Acculab, federal attorneys said in court records.

In June, the federal agents raided Acculab's office and Degregorio's home, seizing three trucks of evidence from the lab. He was arrested on the state charge of child sexual battery and hasn't been given the chance to post bail.

Legal battles

On the same November day the federal attorneys filed a complaint naming Degregorio as a defendant in the whistle-blower lawsuit, Acculab's attorneys filed for federal bankruptcy protection.

The government calls it a "sham bankruptcy proceeding" to keep Medicare from collecting in the lawsuit.

They obtained an order to keep Degregorio from selling six parcels of his property, including the former Acculab headquarters at 1734 Northgate Blvd.

Detectives reportedly overheard Degregorio's phone call from jail giving an officer of Acculab unlimited power to sell his personal property. The property the government listed is worth about $2.7 million.

Degregorio's attorney said in court records that the government is relying on uncorroborated, confidential witnesses for their case.

Degregorio is trying to have the case dismissed. It is scheduled to go to trial in April 2008.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Police Charged In Shootings Back At Work; NAACP Calls For Probe (AP)

By Mary Foster, The Associated Press

AP, January 30, 2007

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — Six of the seven police officers indicted in a deadly bridge shooting following Hurricane Katrina returned to work Monday, unarmed and in low-profile jobs, a development that an NAACP leader said erodes public confidence in the department.

"The assurance that the officers will be assigned to desk duties does not allay that crisis in confidence," Danatus King, president of the New Orleans branch of the NAACP, said at an afternoon news conference.

King said the NAACP has decided to ask the U.S. Attorney and the civil rights division of the Justice Department to investigate the shootings; and he said the decision to let the officers return to police jobs smacks of favoritism.

King said he worries that the officers will have access to police records and other information that might reveal the identities of witnesses that might testify against them.

"None of them have access to the public or to sensitive records," said Assistant Police Superintendent Marlon Defillo, who is in charge of the police Public Integrity Bureau.

Two of the officers have been assigned to work in the police department's horse stables, two are entering data on computers, and two are working in communications, Defillo said.

The officers are not allowed to wear uniforms, make arrests or carry weapons, Defillo said. They do not have arrest powers and are closely monitored, he said. They also continue to wear ankle bracelets that monitor their whereabouts, he said.

That the officers were freed on bail — highly unusual in first-degree murder cases — and that hundreds of people turned out to cheer them when they turned themselves in also undermines public confidence, King said. He said police had failed to properly investigate the incident until media pressure forced them to.

Homicide is the only crime not investigated by the police integrity department, Defillo said. It is investigated by homicide and the findings are turned over to the district attorney, he said.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten confirmed receiving the letter from the NAACP Monday afternoon. His office, the Justice Department and the FBI have been monitoring the investigation, Letten said. He described that as routine.

Sgts. Kenneth Bowen and Robert Gisevius Jr., officer Anthony Villavaso II and former officer Robert Faulcon Jr., face first-degree murder charges and attempted murder charges in the Sept. 4, 2005, shootings on the Danziger Bridge that killed two men and wounded four other people.

Officers Robert Barrios and Mike Hunter Jr. were charged with attempted first-degree murder, and Officer Ignatius Hills was charged with attempted second-degree murder.

In the chaos that followed Katrina, Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man, and James Brissette, 19, were shot and killed by police on the bridge.

Police said the officers were responding to a report of other officers being attacked when they came under fire. Police also claimed Madison was reaching for a gun.

Madison's brother, Lance, denies he or his brother was armed. He said they were running from a group of teens who had opened fire on the bridge when seven men jumped out of a rental truck and also shot at them without warning.

Judge Raymond Bigelow has given Orleans Parish District Attorney Eddie Jordan until Feb. 1 to decide if he will ask for the death penalty for the four facing first-degree murder.

The officers were suspended without pay when they were indicted in December. All of them eventually posted bail and the judge said he would allow them to return to work.

DOJ_NMG_0124143

Faulcon, who's no longer with the New Orleans Police Department, has relocated to Texas.

Defense Begins Arguments In Election Dispute (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, January 30, 2007

Poll workers testify they were not told to discriminate

No one shaped their decision on how to count absentee ballots, including county Democratic Executive Committee head Ike Brown, black poll managers testified Monday in a trial alleging discrimination against white voters.

The defense began putting on its case Monday in the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States where the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of attempting to discriminate against white voters.

The first defense witness, Robin Mason, a poll manager during the Aug. 5, 2003, Democratic primary, said she saw black voters and white voters being assisted at the polls in the same manner.

Asked whether Ike Brown told her how to rule on absentee ballots, Mason replied, "No."

The government alleges Brown and those acting in concert with him have rejected absentee ballots cast by white voters on the grounds they were defective under state law while counting similar ballots cast by black voters.

"No one instructed us how to go through the ballots," Mason testified Monday when asked whether Brown had told them what to do.

Attorneys for the Democratic Executive Committee, Brown and the Noxubee County Election Commission asked for the case to be dismissed after the government rested its case Monday.

U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee denied the request.

Before resting its case, the Justice Department recalled to the stand one of its witnesses who testified last week.

Nikki Nicole Halbert, who testified last week that she filed an absentee ballot but the signature on the envelope wasn't hers, said Monday she had been harassed and an attempt was made to get her to come back and change her earlier testimony.

Halbert said individuals came to her home and said "Us blacks should stick together."

Halbert said she refused to change her story because the signature on the absentee ballot wasn't hers.

A Justice Department attorney also told Lee another black witness refused to testify for the government because he had been intimidated.

Among the Justice Department's allegations:

Brown and others have used racial slurs to alienate black residents who support white candidates.

Brown has published the names of some white voters in an attempt to intimidate them.

Brown illegally has labeled white voters' absentee ballots so they would be rejected by election officials.

Brown has denied the accusations, saying the real issue is that white Republicans want to vote in and determine the outcome of Democratic Party elections.

The problems that happened in the 2003 elections were similar to problems that occur in most elections, Brown's attorney, Wil Colom, said.

Noxubee County Circuit Clerk Carl Mickens, who once was a defendant in the lawsuit, completed his testimony also Monday.

Mickens admitted he had made a statement that the 2003 elections "were the most screwed up in the history of Noxubee County."

Bond For Seale Denied (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, January 30, 2007

Defense lawyers may appeal decision

Reputed Klansman James Ford Seale walked away in chains Monday after a judge ruled he must remain behind bars until he goes on trial on kidnapping and conspiracy charges in the 1964 killings of two African-American teenagers.

DOJ_NMG_0124144

Defense lawyers say they may appeal the decision by U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda Anderson to jail the 71-year-old former crop duster. He pleaded not guilty last week to federal charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, abductions of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore. The two 19-year-olds were hitchhiking in Meadville when Klansmen grabbed them, beat them and threw them into the Mississippi River, where they drowned, according to FBI reports.

An appeal would result in a second bond hearing, this one in front of U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate, who is presiding over the trial, tentatively set for April 2.

"This is one of the most horrific crimes I've ever heard of," argued Paige Fitzgerald, who works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington. "The defendant assisted tying up one of these 19-year-olds, rowing the boat and pushing him overboard while the other 19-year-old watched."

Seale took part in drowning both teens, who would have been minors if they had been slightly younger, she said. If they had been, there would be a presumption Seale's bond should be denied, she said.

There's nothing tying Seale to Mississippi because he lives in a recreational vehicle parked in Roxie and owns no property here, she said. Because he faces a possible life sentence if convicted, "There's no incentive for him to stay," she said.

She sought to discredit Seale's word that he wouldn't flee by showing that when he was asked to name all of his siblings, Seale failed to mention a brother, Don, living in Louisiana.

She also told the judge some witnesses fear Seale because of his alleged Klan membership.

Assistant Federal Public Defender Kathy Nester responded that prosecutors have presented no proof Seale belonged to the Klan, adding he has never been convicted of a crime.

In a 2000 interview with The Clarion-Ledger, Seale denied belonging to the Klan; however, he was once served a federal subpoena at an Oct. 30, 1965, Klan rally at Liberty Park in Natchez.

He also denied knowing anyone in the Klan, although his brother Jack admitted his Klan membership to the House Un-American Activities Committee and there's a photograph of the brother in a Klan robe.

The committee questioned Seale, his brother, his father and their friend, Ernest Parker, about whether they took part in killing Dee and Moore. All of them took the Fifth Amendment.

Nester said just because Seale lives in an RV and has traveled to other states in recent years doesn't mean he shouldn't be eligible for bond: "There's just zero evidence of risk of flight."

Seale's wife, Jean, testified her husband has been treated for kidney and bladder cancer. The latest tests, she said, show he is cancer-free. She said he wears a pain patch and takes a "nerve pill," which she said is Xanax. Each night, he breathes in oxygen from a machine because of his emphysema, she said. "He can't walk very far, and a lot of days he can't get out of the motor home."

After a 10-minute discussion behind closed doors with deputy U.S. marshals at the James O. Eastland Federal Courthouse, Anderson concluded Seale's medical problems could be accommodated and that oxygen already was being provided for him at the Madison County Jail.

"The nature of the offense is not diminished by the passage of time," she said.

On Saturday night, the sign that memorializes the 1964 killings of Dee and Moore was stolen.

Moore's brother, Thomas, said he reported the sign missing.

He had placed it where the Klansmen are believed to have abducted the teens.

"The sign's been up for a year, and all of a sudden it's taken away," said former Bude Mayor Mack Littleton, who knew Moore. "The sheriff and I went down and took a look. Ain't nothing we could see, but we know what happened. It ain't jumped up and walked off on its own."

Franklin County Sheriff James Newman said he and his deputies had found no tracks or anything leading to where the sign was stolen but are continuing to investigate.

As marshals escorted Seale from the courthouse Monday in chains, he remained silent. The only sound that could be heard was the rhythm of the clanking.

Bail Denied In 1964 Race Killings (NSDY/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0124145

By Associated Press, January 29, 2007, 4:33 Pm Est

Long Island Newsday, January 30, 2007

James Ford Seale has been jailed since his arrest on kidnapping charges last week.

U.S. Magistrate Linda R. Anderson said Seale might flee if released on bail because he has no job or property, is a pilot and lives in a motor home.

Prosecutors say Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19, were seized and beaten by Klansmen and then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown. Their bodies were found about two months later.

Seale told the court he suffers from cancer and other ailments. His trial was tentatively set for April 2.

Editorial: It's Not Too Late For Justice To Be Served (KZGAZETTE)

Kalamazoo Gazette (MI), January 30, 2007

Some Americans may not be interested in stories about prosecuting aging suspects in murders that took place decades ago.

Fortunately, federal authorities don't share that view, especially in cases that have sprung from the civil rights movements of the 1960s.

Last week in Mississippi, the FBI arrested 71-year-old James F. Seale, a former sheriff's deputy and alleged ex-member of the Ku Klux Klan. Seale was indicted in Jackson, and will face kidnapping charges in connection with the brutal killing of two 19-year-old black men in 1964.

According to the indictment, members of the Klan abducted hitchhikers Henry H. Dee and Charles E. Moore. The two youths were weighted down with a Jeep engine block, iron weights and railroad rails. Still alive, they were thrown into an old Mississippi River channel, where they drowned.

Seale, who has denied ever having been a Klansman, has pleaded not guilty.

A federal judge was to decide today whether to permit Seale to be free on bond. His lawyer said that he has cancer.

Seale, the son of a chapter leader of the Klan, is a suspect along with Charles Marcus Edwards, in the slaying of Dee and Moore. But they were never prosecuted.

Edwards, who was described at the time of the killings as an admitted Klansman, hasn't been accused but is expected to be a witness for the prosecution.

Age should be no barrier in prosecuting, to the full extent of the law, people accused of such crimes.

Officials would not comment on why murder charges are not being leveled in this case.

Moore's brother, 65-year-old Thomas Moore, of Colorado Springs, Colo., has been trying since 1998 to convince authorities to prosecute.

``I've been crying," said the 63-year-old Moore after Seal's arrest. ``First time I've cried in about 50 years. It's not going to bring his life back. But some way or another, I think he would be satisfied."

Charges against Seale have drawn attention to other unsolved cases. A bill now in Congress would create a cold-cases unit in the Justice Department to track down unpunished civil rights-era killers.

Such legislation is appropriate.

Do We Have A Human Trafficking Problem? (LVS)

By Sam Skolnik, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, January 30, 2007

Justice Department names Las Vegas among 17 most likely destinations

The federal government believes Las Vegas is a top destination for "human trafficking" victims - from indentured servants to massage parlor workers and prostitutes held captive and forced to commit sex acts.

This belief has led the Justice Department to grant hundreds of thousands of dollars to Metro Police to tackle the problem.

But first, the Anti Trafficking League Against Slavery (ATLAS), an office within Metro that opened last month, needs to try to answer a basic question: Is there a human-trafficking problem here, and if so, how big is it?

DOJ_NMG_0124146

Terri Miller, ATLAS's civilian director and long one of the top Nevada activists against the sexual exploitation of women and children, and her boss, Metro Capt. Terry Lesney, say the need for the group is clear: There is a "huge" and growing sex-oriented trafficking problem in Las Vegas.

Yet they quickly add that no statistics have ever been gathered and law enforcers never before have made it a top priority - so the scope of the problem still needs to be determined.

Police in the past haven't paid sufficient attention to the signs that the prostitutes or others they're investigating may also be trafficking victims, they say - meaning the problem has gone underreported for years.

Miller says the problem has been made worse by Las Vegas' aggressive advertising promotions that encourage tourists to come here and sin all they like.

"We're basically giving a green light for people to come here and exploit women and children," Miller says.

ATLAS was formed as an extension of the ad hoc Nevada Human Trafficking Task Force, an interagency group set up by the U.S. attorney's office in Las Vegas in 2004.

The task force's first task was to determine whether, in fact, there was a human-trafficking problem, Lesney says. But because of the lack of hard data, she says, "we were struggling to quantify what we're dealing with."

Federal law defines trafficking as what happens when children, teens, men or women are subjected to "force, fraud or coercion" for the purpose of sexual exploitation or forced labor.

Human trafficking is different from smuggling in that people who are smuggled voluntarily pay the smuggler, and when the person arrives, he or she is free, or is required to work under a job arranged by the smuggler until the debt is paid.

Trafficking victims are enslaved, and if they are in debt to the trafficker, it's most often at rates too high to ever be able to pay. Victims are often lured by false promises, and are sometimes physically forced.

Sex trafficking victims can range from massage parlor workers brought in from overseas to prostitutes trafficked here from California or Arizona. Labor trafficking, including domestic servitude, agricultural or sweatshop labor, involves victims forced to work against their will, sometimes under the threat of violence.

Often, Miller and Lesney say, victims or their family members have been threatened by the traffickers and are afraid they will be deported if they come forward and cooperate with police.

Between 17,000 and 20,000 people are trafficked into the United States annually, according to State Department estimates. Of those, it is unknown how many are brought to Nevada.

Rarely have defendants in Las Vegas been prosecuted as human traffickers, Lesney says, though there is a tough federal law passed in 2000 and even newer state laws that target those crimes. Until this month, she said, Metro didn't even have a booking code for alleged human trafficking violators.

The largest human trafficking bust in the area in recent years was Operation Jade Blade. A national sting in 2000 netted five Las Vegas Valley residents, who were arrested for trafficking Asian prostitutes into the city. The women had been smuggled into the country for a fee, then were forced to pay back their debt by working as prostitutes.

In the last six years federal prosecutors have brought nine additional cases with strong trafficking elements into federal courts, according to the U.S. attorney's office in Las Vegas, including cases in which pimps brought girls or women into the region from other states to work as prostitutes.

Each of those cases was smaller in scope than the Jade Blade bust, Nevada U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden concedes. Although he wouldn't comment on any ongoing investigations, he says there has been little funding to pursue deep investigations into trafficking cases.

Bogden says he believes the work of the task force and Miller's office will change that.

"Any time you essentially enslave a human being and deprive a human being of their rights, that has to be a top priority," says Bogden, who will be stepping down from his post at the end of next month.

Locally, there have been even fewer human trafficking cases charged and prosecuted in the last few years. According to District Court records, only one trafficking case has been prosecuted locally since 2005, when the Legislature put two new anti-trafficking laws on the books.

DOJ_NMG_0124147

In that case, a woman was indicted by a Las Vegas grand jury on Dec. 12. Personna Coleman is alleged to have committed involuntary servitude - as well as kidnapping and several other crimes - when she restrained and threatened another woman, demanding that the woman earn her at least $1,000 by engaging in prostitution.

Clark County prosecutors confirm they are pursuing at least two other trafficking cases , but the details and status of those cases were not made available.

Identified by a Justice Department risk analysis study as one of 17 cities nationwide most likely to be the top destinations for trafficking victims, federal officials gave a $370,000 grant to Metro officials late last year - as well as a smaller one to the local Salvation Army office. With it, ATLAS was born, with Miller serving as director. She started early last month and has a three-year contract with Metro.

Miller, 48, worked with the Nevada Coalition Against Sexual Violence, and she has long been involved with a New York-based nonprofit group called SESAME, or Stop Educator Abuse, Misconduct and Exploitation.

Miller - a mother of four who describes herself as an "M.O.M., a Mom on a Mission" - began working against teacher abuse of students while living in Pahrump, including the investigation of a teacher who is serving a life sentence for sexual assault against a 17-year-old student. Miller said her efforts split the Pahrump community: "I was 50 percent vilified, and 50 percent hailed me as a heroine," she said. After 20 years in Pahrump, she and her family moved to the Las Vegas Valley in 2002.

Though a year younger than Miller, Lesney says she's finishing up her work after a 25-year career with Metro. She retires from the force in September, set to move back to her native Minnesota to be closer to family and to finish up her work on a doctorate in forensic psychology.

Lesney says she finds satisfaction working on trafficking cases for the same reason she likes handling sexual assault and domestic violence cases: "You're dealing with real victims," she says.

Miller and Lesney said they have three main goals for their new anti-trafficking office within Metro - to raise public awareness about the issue; to increase law enforcement's reporting of trafficking cases and then help coordinate investigations; and ultimately, to establish a service network for trafficking victims.

Earlier this month they instituted a mandatory, two-hour online training course on human trafficking for all Metro commissioned officers below the rank of deputy chief. More than 600 have taken the course so far, they said.

Miller and Lesney, joined by other local and federal officials and victims' advocates, will hold a press conference on Feb. 6 to highlight the work of the new office.

"I'm like a magnet right now," Miller says of her first eight hectic weeks on the job. "They're coming at me from all over to join the task force. I'm really in awe at how fast we're progressing." Sam Skolnik can be reached at 474-7406 or at sam.skolnik@lasvegassun.com.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Department Deadline Is Up For Mittal Steel (WVSJ)

By Jerry Echemann

West Virginia State Journal, January 30, 2007

WEIRTON -- The Department of Justice had given Mittal Steel only until Sunday to rid itself of a canadian tin producer.

But Monday, there's still no word on what the Justice Department intends to do.

A spokesman for the department said he did not expect an announcement for a few days. They are waiting on a district court to issue a final judgement in the case. They get five days after that.

As Mittal grew with buyouts, they ran into problems for having too much control over the tin market. The Justice Department doesn't like to see monopolies, and it told Mittal to get rid of one of three plants.

Now that list has been narrowed down to plant at Weirton and Sparrows Point near Baltimore.

Weirton has appeared to be the likely candidate since Independent Steelworkers Union has said it would welcome a sale.

The two interested buyers are Esmark -- the former Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Co. -- and a man named Mitch Hecht, a former executive for International Steel Group.

DOJ_NMG_0124148

ISU president Mark Glyptis said he wants the situation to be resolved as well. But he said the issue itself is very complex and has required a lot of research.

FTC Approves Bridgestone Acquisition (AP)

AP, January 30, 2007

Federal Trade Commission Approves Bridgestone Acquisition of Bandag

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Bridgestone Americas Holding Inc.'s $1 billion acquisition of Bandag Inc., a retread tire maker, on Monday received early approval from federal regulators.

The Federal Trade Commission ended a required 30-day waiting period for the acquisition ahead of schedule, Bandag said in a prepared statement. The 30-day period was not scheduled to end until Feb. 8, the company said.

Early terminations are not granted unless both the FTC and the Justice Department's antitrust division have completed their reviews and decided against taking any enforcement actions, the FTC says on its Web site.

Bridgestone Americas Holding, the U.S. subsidiary of Japan-based Bridgestone Corp., the largest tire and rubber company in the world, announced Dec. 5 that it would acquire Bandag for $50.75 per share in cash, or $1.05 billion.

Bandag said the acquisition remains subject to shareholder and other regulatory approvals. Bridgestone's American depository shares rose 50 cents to close at $42.90, while shares of Bandag increased 10 cents to close at $50.75 on the New York Stock Exchange.

First The Wait For Microsoft Vista; Now The Marketing Barrage (NYT)

By Steve Lohr

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Microsoft's power in the technology industry, some analysts insist, is waning. It faces a host of rivals from a reinvigorated Apple on the desktop to Web-based challengers like Google, delivering services and software online.

But yesterday, on the eve of the arrival of new models of Microsoft's flagship products, the Windows operating system and the Office programs, the skeptics were overshadowed and drowned out by the opening salvos in the software giant's marketing campaign.

Windows Vista and Office 2007 start appearing today, available in retail stores as a shrink-wrapped package and shipped on new machines sold by personal computer makers. The new Microsoft offerings were available to large corporate customers at the end of November.

Steven A. Ballmer, the company's chief executive, called today "the biggest product launch in Microsoft's history," and the rollout will be backed by a first-year marketing budget of hundreds of millions of dollars.

New versions of Windows and Office move across the technology industry like a powerful weather system, driving sales of personal computers and other hardware, software and services. The pace is typically gradual but steady, yet the impact on the rest of the industry is significant.

Over 5,000 software and hardware products are ready to run on Vista, and Microsoft has more than 500,000 industry partners worldwide, including resellers, retailers and consultants as well as hardware and software companies. Millions of developers write programs that run on Windows.

For every dollar Microsoft makes on Windows Vista, the rest of the industry will collect $18 of revenue, estimates IDC, a technology research firm. Indeed, those that build products and services on top of and around Microsoft's technology constitute an industry ecosystem that business professors have studied. And Microsoft's long investment in nurturing that network of mutual support, they say, is a major reason that Windows holds more than 90 percent of the market for PC operating systems.

In the United States, the IDC report concluded, "this ecosystem should sell about $70 billion in products and services revolving around Windows Vista" in 2007. The introduction of Windows Vista, IDC projected, is expected to generate 157,000 jobs in the United States. The IDC study was paid for by Microsoft, but the research firm said it used its own methodology.

Because the universe of Windows users has grown, Mr. Ballmer predicted that sales of Windows Vista in the first three months would be five times the early sales of Windows 95, introduced in 1995, and double the sales of Windows XP, shipped in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0124149

Mr. Ballmer spoke at a news conference in New York, along with executives from large computer manufacturers and chip makers. "I hope your forecasts are right," said Todd Bradley, executive vice president for personal computers at Hewlett-Packard. "We'd all be thrilled."

The industry has certainly been patient. Vista suffered repeated delays, coming five years after Windows XP. Microsoft has vowed that there will never again be so lengthy a gap between versions of its operating system. Industry analysts expect that Microsoft will more regularly update Windows with new features and bug fixes delivered over the Internet — and that the line between the desktop software and Internet software will increasingly blur.

"Today will go down in computing history as the last big operating system launch for Microsoft," said Gary Beach, publisher of CIO Magazine, a publication for professional technology managers.

For those upgrading from previous versions of Windows, there are three versions of Vista, from $100 to $260. The new operating system has striking three-dimensional graphics, an easier-to-use interface and improved security, and it handles games, music, video and pictures far better than previous generations of Windows, most product reviewers have agreed. But many reviewers have also pointed out that most of the new features in Vista are already in Apple's Macintosh computers.

Mr. Ballmer and Bill Gates, the chairman, presided over a gathering in a Times Square theater to celebrate Vista's arrival, along with industry partners, analysts, and early Vista users, or beta testers. One was Farage Yusupov, a lawyer at Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison. Some Vista features, he said, did not run on his two-year-old laptop.

But Mr. Yusupov said he planned to get a new computer with Vista soon. "In a year or two, every computer is going to have it," he said. "Since I'm going to get it sooner or later, I want it sooner."

Microsoft's industry partners described Vista as a watershed. Hector Ruiz, the chairman of Advanced Micro Devices, a microprocessor maker, said the new Microsoft operating system would usher in "the visualization age of computing" with rich 3-D graphics entering the mainstream. "And stunning visual experiences require outstanding hardware," Mr. Ruiz added.

Kevin B. Rollins, Dell's chief executive, said his company began taking orders online over the weekend for Vista-equipped machines. Traffic on the company's Web site increased 20 percent because of demand for PC's running Vista, and tens of thousands of them have been sold in the last couple of days, Mr. Rollins said.

Sean Maloney, executive vice president of Intel, said that Vista's abilities combined with rapidly advancing technology in microchips would lead to a "golden age for PCs," allowing them to serve as a central hub for storing, managing and sending digital media like movies and music to television sets and music players in the home.

In an interview, Mr. Bradley of Hewlett-Packard pointed to his company's TouchSmart PC, being released to coincide with Vista's debut, to show that manufacturers are increasingly able to use Microsoft's operating system as "a platform we can build around instead of just embed on our machines."

The $1,699 model, with a 20-inch touch screen and television tuner built in, has a user interface that has been tailored by Hewlett-Packard engineers so that it looks different from a standard Windows machine. Microsoft's antitrust settlement with the federal government required the software maker to give PC makers more freedom to modify Windows.

Most of Microsoft's vast marketing budget will be on print, television, radio and Web advertisements. But some will go for so-called viral marketing events like an online puzzle contest called Vanishing Point, sponsored by Microsoft and A.M.D. The winner will get a ride into space from a private space travel company.

The strategy, said Michael Sievert, vice president for Windows marketing, "is really about getting people to come in and have a look."

Delta Says Deal Is An Option, Just Not Now (WSJ)

By Corey Dade

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

Delta Air Lines Inc. has assured creditors that it won't rule out the possibility of merging with another airline after exiting from bankruptcy if it defeats a hostile takeover offer from US Airways Group Inc., according to people familiar with the situation.

To build support for its plan to remain independent, Delta appears close to agreeing with its official creditors committee on several provisions designed to clear a path toward an eventual tie-up. The parties are moving toward an accord to exclude from

Delta's new corporate charter and bylaws any so-called poison pill that could pose an insurmountable hurdle to future mergers, according to one person familiar with the discussions.

In addition, the committee would have a strong hand in selecting Delta's post-bankruptcy board, according to knowledgeable people. The creditors committee wants a board that favors consolidation as a strategic option, people close to the board have said.

Delta, based in Atlanta, had been reluctant to grant some of the concessions, but in recent weeks the committee made it clear that it required them as a condition for approving Delta's standalone plan over the US Airways merger.

Delta's apparent willingness to consider a future deal could breathe life back into widespread hopes for an industry consolidation wave, which airline observers thought could be dashed if the US Airways-Delta merger failed. Airlines are looking for partners in an effort to reduce the number of seats in the air, lower operating costs and gain greater pricing power.

Delta's efforts to appease the nine-member creditors committee come as the group considers a sweetened takeover offer1 from US Airways that emerged over the weekend. The Tempe, Ariz., carrier has expressed a willingness to increase its bid to $10.9 billion from $9.9 billion under certain conditions. Yesterday, committee members discussed the higher offer but reached no decision, say the people familiar with the matter.

Still, the prospect of receiving an extra $1 billion in cash, boosting the total cash payout to $6 billion, has drawn interest from some committee members, according to people familiar with the situation. The US Airways proposal expires Thursday.

Delta's overall restructuring plan needs approval by creditors holding two-thirds of claims, by value. An increased offer from US Airways has the backing of an ad hoc committee of creditors, which is working to gather other creditors to its side. The ad hoc committee, consisting of hedge funds and private investors, hold about 15% of all claims worth roughly $2.3 billion. So far, say people close to the group, they have lined up support from creditors holding $4 billion in claims -- approaching the one-third portion required to block the Delta plan, if need be.

Word of a sweetened deal has renewed investors' confidence and boosted US Airways stock. In 4 p.m. composite trading, US Airways' shares were up $2.30, or 4.4%, to $54.43 on the New York Stock Exchange. However, the extra $1 billion in cash alone might not be enough to sway the official creditors committee. The termination fee, which a person familiar with the situation says exceeds $500 million, falls below the $1 billion range that some creditors committee members want as compensation if the deal fails to gain antitrust approval.

--Melanie Trottman and Susan Carey contributed to this article.

Write to Corey Dade at corey.dade@wsj.com2

Airline Deals Could Be Grounded (CNN)

By Chris Isidore, CNNMoney.com senior writer

CNNMoney.com, January 30, 2007

US Air said to consider raising bid for Delta as it faces deadlines over next two weeks; talk of other deals could die if Delta avoids takeover.

NEW YORK (CNNMoney.com) -- Time could be running out on US Airways Group's hostile bid for Delta Air Lines and with it much of the talk about consolidation within the airline industry.

Industry experts say the recent retreat in airline stock prices, despite some strong financial results, is attributable at least partly to the growing belief among investors that the US Air (Charts) bid for Delta (Charts) isn't winning the necessary support of Delta creditors as it faces deadlines this week and next.

And just as it was US Air's hostile bid for Delta in November that sparked talk of a round of industry consolidation involving AMR (Charts) unit American Airlines, UAL (Charts) unit United Airlines, Continental Airlines (Charts) and Northwest Airlines (Charts), many experts now believe that the merger talk will again quiet down without a US Air-Delta deal shaking up the industry status quo.

"You only have two guys, United and US Air, who are advocating consolidation," said airline consultant Michael Boyd. "Everyone else thinks it's a dumb idea. It's different if they get forced into something. But I don't think anyone else wants to do a deal."

DOJ_NMG_0124151

The Amex airline index gained nearly 15 percent from the start of the year through its high Jan. 16 but has lost almost all of that gain since then.

Analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities said that, just as airline stocks climbed on merger speculation and lower fuel prices, the dimmer outlook for deals is now causing stocks to give up some of those gains.

But Neidl still has "buy" recommendations on US Air as well as AMR, UAL and Continental.

"The next rally we have in late February or early March will be based on fundamentals," he said.

Thursday deadline

US Air Group, which reports its fourth-quarter results Tuesday, has given a Thursday deadline for its current $9.9 billion bid for Delta, saying the offer will expire without Delta's creditors going on record in favor of the bid and asking for a postponement of a key Feb. 7 bankruptcy court hearing on the airline's reorganization plans.

Scoring a cheap airline ticket

So far Delta management has flatly rejected any takeover proposal, and while an ad hoc creditors' committee has backed the idea, the formal creditors' committee, which includes the full range of Delta creditors, has yet to get behind the bid.

The Wall Street Journal reported Monday that US Air is willing to increase its hostile takeover offer for Delta Air Lines Inc. by adding $1 billion in cash under certain conditions and giving creditors a termination fee in case regulators block the deal.

A Delta spokeswoman did not have a comment on that report, and US Air spokeswoman Kelly Sullivan would not directly address it, although she also wouldn't dismiss it.

"Our advisors are in regular contact with the ad hoc committee and the advisors to the creditors' committee," said Sullivan. "We expect this will continue as the Feb. 1 deadline on our offer to continue the process approaches."

Philip Baggaley, Standard & Poor's senior airlines credit analyst, says that he's not sure even a higher bid will win much in the way of additional support from creditors for the US Air bid for Delta. Some creditors, such as airports and the Air Line Pilots Association, have an interest in seeing competing airlines remain independent, he said.

And he said bondholders, who have a more purely financial interest in the debate, may still be swayed by the argument that a US Air deal for Delta would cause too many regulatory or labor problems and hurt the value of their claims against the bankrupt airline.

"Those arguments both raise uncertainty, which nobody likes," he said. "It's not clear that changing the numbers [of that offer] would change their views."

US Air's initial bid for Delta in November valued the nation's No. 3 airline at about $8 billion in cash and stock. It raised its bid Jan. 10 to cash and stock worth $10.2 billion at that time.

But decreases in the value of US Air shares since that time have trimmed more than $250 million from the value of the offer, although US Air shares gained $2.80, or 5.4 percent, to $54.93 in trading Monday on news of the higher offer.

Bid pessimism

Neidl said the recent declines in US Airways shares before the jump Monday are at least partly a result of growing pessimism by investors about it being able to win the necessary support for its Delta bid.

"People are really doubting this deal is going to happen," he said. "The creditors are leaning away it."

Neidl said his sense is that creditors would prefer to let Delta emerge from bankruptcy as an independent carrier, something that could take place as soon as April, giving them stock in the new carrier that they can cash out in the current strong environment for airline shares.

Neidl said Delta's emergence from bankruptcy would be pushed back a minimum of six months if creditors convinced the bankruptcy court and Delta management to take the US Air offer. And antitrust regulators could delay it even longer than that, if they approve it at all.

If the Feb. 7 bankruptcy hearing is held, it will be a victory for Delta management, which hopes to win approval of its reorganization plan from the court and the creditors as soon as possible.

But Joe Capobianco, a Long Island bankruptcy and merger and acquisition attorney with Reisman, Peirez and Reisman, said he believes creditors could push Delta management to delay the hearing as a way of keeping the US Air bid alive and gaining more leverage in negotiations with Delta management.

DOJ_NMG_0124152

"At the end of the day, it's up to the creditors," said Capobianco. "What's going on right now behind the scenes is all these parties are negotiating with creditors and committees to put their best foot forward and win support. If I'm representing Delta, I try to keep pedal to the metal and have the hearing as soon as possible."

As Airlines Surge, Pilots Want Share (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Now it's the pilots' turn.

The remarkable turnaround of the airline industry has rewarded investors with rising share prices, and the $9.87 billion price tag that US Airways Group is offering for Delta Air Lines in a hostile takeover bid is further proof that the industry is again in favor with investors and lenders.

With most of the industry returning to profitability — in part by extracting billions of dollars of pay cuts from workers — pilots are demanding that they should recoup some of the pay and other benefits they gave up in recent years and share in the improved fortunes. The pilots' agenda is playing an important role in the merger talks over Delta. The Delta pilots have backed management's stand-alone plan to exit bankruptcy, and are jointly fighting the US Airways bid.

In all, the Delta pilots have $2.1 billion in claims.

The pilots are motivated to support management in part by self-interest — they believe that they would have less job security under US Airways ownership. And that support could be persuasive when the pilots next want something from Delta management.

They, in fact, accepted a slightly lower price in selling several hundred million dollars in bankruptcy claims so that they could hang onto the voting rights those claims represented to provide maximum support to management's plan, according to people familiar with the pilots' dealings.

Delta pilots are counting on the unusual contract they negotiated in bankruptcy to help them recoup their most recent 13 percent pay cut over the next three years by helping the airline achieve certain performance improvements. They also could win profit-sharing bonuses on top of that.

Lee Moak, who heads the Delta chapter of the Air Line Pilots Association, said, "I am confident that the performance-based pay raises are going to pay off" and restore Delta pilots' pay.

US Airways was asked over the weekend by some Delta creditors to again raise its bid. The airline has been frustrated because the official creditors committee in Delta's bankruptcy, the only party that can force Delta to allow due diligence by US Airways and otherwise get the merger talks started, has been silent.

So, according to a person involved in the talks, US Airways management set the following conditions: if the official creditors committee would tell Delta by Thursday to allow due diligence, to also make a filing starting antitrust review of the proposed merger, and postpone a hearing on Delta's stand-alone plan to exit bankruptcy, then US Airways management would take to its board a proposal to increase its bid by another $1 billion. It did not officially raise its bid.

Yesterday, there were talks among creditors but no word from the official committee, this person said.

The grumbling among pilots about getting their due can be heard throughout the industry, not just at Delta.

US Airways pilots, for example, are negotiating a new contract and seek higher wages and improved work rules.

At the old US Airways, which merged in 2005 with America West Airlines, captains on planes comparable to the 737 were once paid $227 an hour, said Jack Stephan, a captain and head of the Air Line Pilots union local for the carrier. But now, after two bankruptcies, they are paid about $125 an hour.

"This is truly payback time," Mr. Stephan said.

Southwest Airlines pilots are also in negotiations and want to improve their industry-leading pay.

Because the industry is thinly capitalized, it remains highly vulnerable to the next economic downturn. So any substantial pay raises could alarm investors.

Airlines have tended to enter into generous pay deals in good times and then regret the higher costs of those contracts during downturns. That in part led to the recent series of bankruptcies.

DOJ_NMG_0124153

"These next years will be the pilots getting something back until they get too much back and then we'll do this all over again," said Roger King, an airline analyst at CreditSights.

At United Airlines, where the pilots' contract runs through 2009, the Air Line Pilots Association has started a "fix it now" contract campaign that includes an early strike preparedness committee and an effort to win concessions from management on some working conditions.

And at American Airlines, where a contract that runs through May 2008 has already been opened for early negotiation, pilots are protesting a lucrative management bonus plan. They also refused to make a minor concession to help American bid for a valuable route to Beijing, and want to reverse a 23 percent wage cut agreed to in 2003.

Under federal labor law, pilots have extraordinary leverage over airlines. Their work cannot effectively be outsourced, making a strike potentially ruinous for an airline. And in some cases, by inflexibly following the letter of a contract, they can slow an airline operation enough to cause havoc, as occurred at United in the summer of 2000.

Only in bankruptcy do managements clearly gain the upper hand on wages.

Executive compensation is a particular irritant to pilots. American pilots, represented by the Allied Pilots Association, said this month that they expected a stock bonus plan for the airline's 1,000 or so top managers to hand out more than $200 million this April. American would not comment on the expected payouts, said Susan Gordon, a spokeswoman.

"There's going to be a visceral, angry reaction, even though we know it's coming," said Denny Breslin, an American captain and union official. Pay scales were cut by 23 percent in 2003 and some pilots suffered far worse pay reductions as American shrunk its fleet and pushed captains into lesser-paying first-officer positions, or onto smaller planes, where they are paid less.

The goal now, Mr. Breslin said, "is getting our money back — recapturing our investment" in having helped save American from bankruptcy.

Merrill Lynch Acquires First Republic (FT)

By David Wighton In New York

Financial Times, January 30, 2007

Merrill Lynch on Monday underlined the lure of the rich for Wall Street banks by paying $1.8bn for First Republic, a California-based private bank and wealth management company.

In its biggest acquisition in 10 years, Merrill is paying a 44 per cent premium for First Republic, which will retain its name as a separate business within Merrill Lynch Bank & Trust.

The deal highlights the high prices big banks are prepared to offer to expand in the fast-growing business of serving the US's ultra-rich. In November, Bank of America paid Charles Schwab 30 times 2006 earnings for its US Trust private banking unit and other US and overseas banks are looking to buy in the sector.

Merrill is paying 24 times forecast 2007 earnings and 3.4 times current book value.

Bob McCann, head of Merrill's private client business, said the deal would accelerate the growth of its high net worth business.

"Our goal is to provide First Republic with the resources and support to replicate the firm's success in key markets across the country and to benefit from its deep banking expertise."

Founded in 1985, First Republic has 43 branches in 12 of the richest metropolitan areas in the US including New York. Merrill will retain the leadership of Jim Herbert, co-founder and chief executive, and Katherine August-deWilde, chief operating officer.

Mr McCann said that while First Republic would operate as a separate division and Merrill expected its private client business "to benefit from its outstanding history, excellent credit and lending capabilities and its experienced management team."

First Republic, which specialises in luxury-home lending, is at the opposite end of the spectrum from Merrill's most recent purchase – First Franklin, the sub-prime mortgage lender, for which it paid $1.3bn in September.

Stan O'Neal, chief executive, has been keen to see Merrill capture more of its private clients' banking business and is known to have looked at potential retail bank acquisitions.

DOJ_NMG_0124154

William Tanona, analyst at Goldman Sachs, said the deal made sense strategically but the key would be the retention of advisors and assets.

Mr O'Neal, is known to have looked at potential retail bank purchases but the move to go into branch banking, albeit with high net worth customers, under another brand surprised some analysts.

Richard Bove, analyst at Punk Ziegel, said the price looked high and that Merrill was able to buy it because branch banking was "peaking, just as the sub-prime mortgage sector is".

Merrill's shares fell 2.3 per cent to $92.39.

Merrill To Buy First Republic, Seeking To Add Wealthy Clients (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Merrill Lynch said yesterday it had agreed to buy the First Republic Bank for $1.8 billion in cash and stock to gain clients with an average net worth of $20 million.

The deal values First Republic at $55 a share, Merrill said, 44 percent more than the bank's closing price on Friday. Merrill will pay half the purchase price in cash and half in stock.

First Republic, which has 43 branches and specializes in mortgages on luxury homes, gives Merrill more wealthy customers who might buy brokerage services.

"Luxury lending and wealth management, those are higher-end customers," said Steve Roukis, managing director at Matrix Asset Advisors. of New York. "It's a continuation of their strategy to focus on their core business and either build or acquire whatever gives them a better return on their cost of capital."

Merrill, based in New York, said it expects the transaction to add modestly to earnings by the end of 2008.

First Republic, with about 1,100 employees, operates 37 bank branches in California and six others in cities like Boston and New York.

The bank will be run as a separate business within Merrill Lynch. James Herbert, a co-founder of First Republic, will remain as chief executive.

Stock in First Republic, which is based in San Francisco, rose $15.33, or 40 percent, to $53.63 a share.

Citi Will Buy Egg To Raise U.K. Presence (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Ian Mcdonald

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

Citigroup Inc.'s £575 million ($1.13 billion) purchase of Egg Banking PLC from Prudential PLC sets the stage for the U.S. financial-services company to step up its battle in the British credit-card market against entrenched banks such as Barclays PLC and Bank of America Corp.

For Prudential, one of Britain's largest insurers (unrelated to the U.S. Prudential), the transaction is part of a broad review of its United Kingdom business.

The cash transaction, which is expected to close by April pending regulatory approval, gives Citigroup access to online bank Egg's three million customers, 2.9 million of whom are Egg card customers. Before this deal, Citigroup had just 800,000 card customers in the U.K. Egg's share totals about 5.7% of U.K. credit-card outstanding balances.

Citigroup will be up against banks such as Bank of America, which has about a 15% share of U.K. credit-card outstanding balances, and Barclaycard, which has about a 13% share. They dominate the market along with Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC, which has about a 15% share, according to industry estimates.

Citigroup is paying a high price -- roughly two times Egg's book value, or its assets minus liabilities -- especially considering Egg's recent struggles.

Egg, based in London, is expected to post a pretax operating loss of £145 million for 2006, Prudential said.

Citigroup To Buy Online Bank In Britain To Expand Retail Presence (NYT)

By Eric Dash

DOJ_NMG_0124155

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Citigroup agreed yesterday to buy Egg Banking, a British online bank owned by Prudential P.L.C., for $1.13 billion, the latest in a series of small deals to expand its retail presence abroad.

With the acquisition, Citigroup will quadruple its number of credit card customers, to 2.9 million, and broaden its reach by the use of an Internet site to open savings accounts and mortgages in a country where it has five retail branches.

But at a time when the British banking sector has been hurt by a barrage of bad loans and bankruptcies, some analysts are questioning the deal.

The cash transaction, which appeared to be at little more than twice book value, follows a string of small deals by Citigroup to buy or acquire stakes in banks in China, Turkey and Central America as well as Quilter Holdings, the British wealth management arm of Morgan Stanley.

Under pressure from investors, the chairman and chief executive of Citigroup, Charles O. Prince III, has turned to acquisitions to accelerate the growth he promised from a longer-term strategy focused on internal and international expansion. He has significantly cut back on investment spending and has moved to rein in expenses.

The changes seem to indicate that Mr. Prince is listening to investors at a time when many outsiders have questioned how long he will hold onto the job. Amidst a management shake-up last week, the bank giant is now searching for a chief financial officer who might be seen as Mr. Prince's potential successor. They also highlight the tightrope that Mr. Prince walks. While an acquisition strategy will deliver earnings faster, one driven by internal growth could have a much bigger payoff.

Wall Street analysts, meanwhile, have asked whether a series of small acquisitions is enough to move the profit needle at a bank that generated more than $21 billion in net income last year.

Reports of a potential acquisition of Egg emerged last month, but yesterday's announcement caught some by surprise. At a year-end presentation in December, Mr. Prince said that on the consumer side, Western Europe was far less "an attractive acquisition territory for us in light of our opportunities in the emerging markets." Mr. Prince made similar comments over the weekend at the World Economic Forum. Executives said that Mr. Prince was referring to the prospects of a major European retail bank acquisition, not a smaller deal.

Egg is a pure online bank that could operate side-by-side with a branch network like CitiDirect, Citigroup's high-yield savings and loan Internet offering that it introduced last spring in the United States.

Citigroup is betting that its lending practices and broader set of products like checking accounts might spur Egg's turnaroud. Besides being a widely recognized brand, Egg will give Citigroup a stronger foothold for expansion. Citigroup is also planning more Citibank branches in Britain.

But Egg itself, which was among the first online banks when it was established in 1998, has struggled as of late. The bank tried to expand into France but was forced to abandon the effort. And along with other major British banks, it has suffered from a number of bad loans that caused substantial operating losses.

In late 2005, Prudential paid more than £211 million to buy its remaining 21 percent ownership stake and later vowed to restore Egg to profitability. That never happened, and Citigroup scooped the entire operation up for £575 million, or $1.13 billion, in yesterday's deal.

Still, questions about the quality of Egg's loans persist.

Ajay Banga, a co-head of global consumer business at Citigroup, suggested that Citigroup's lending practices could help engineer Egg's turnaround.

"They certainly have had an increase in losses over the past couple of years — it's mostly from a couple of years of customer booking," Mr. Banga said, suggesting that the bad loans were made in 2004 and 2005.

Lawmakers Push For Bank Ownership Limits (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, January 30, 2007

A group of House lawmakers on Monday renewed a push for legislation that would block commercial companies like Wal-Mart and Home Depot from owning a special sort of bank that has been proliferating in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0124156

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.'s six-month halt on new approvals of companies' applications to establish or acquire the banks known as industrial loan corporations ends Wednesday, and the agency's directors are meeting that day to consider whether to extend it, lift it or take other action. Extending the moratorium — at least for ownership by commercial, rather than financial, companies — would give the new Congress a chance to consider the legislation.

The House bill is sponsored by Reps. Barney Frank, D-Mass., chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, and Paul Gillmor, an Ohio Republican. Similar legislation passed the House overwhelmingly last year, but has stalled in the Senate.

This year, with Democrats in the controlling majority in the Senate as well as the House, proponents believe prospects for congressional passage are stronger for legislation to close what they see as a loophole in banking regulation. Current laws prohibit the mixing of banking and commerce, but an exception is made for the industrial loan corporations, or ILCs, allowing commercial companies to own a federally insured bank.

There are now 61 ILCs with a total of about $141 billion in assets and $98 billion in deposits. Thirty-three are based in Utah, one of only seven states that grant charters for such banks.

"What had once been a minor exception is threatening to foster an unequal, parallel banking system with hundreds of billions of dollars in ... deposits," Gillmor said in a statement Monday.

Last July, the FDIC imposed the six-month halt on new approvals after nearly 100 members of Congress from both parties asked the agency to give lawmakers a chance to debate the legislation. Under the moratorium, the FDIC has not made any final decisions on applications for ILCs or for changes in control of existing ones and has not accepted new applications — giving it time to consider whether changes in law or regulations are needed with respect to the banks.

Critics say the growth of ILCs dangerously blurs the line between banking and commerce, concentrating assets in the hands of a few big companies, stifling competition and hurting consumers.

Consumers don't see outward signs of the banks. They are allowed to issue credit cards, take deposits and make loans; they cannot offer standard checking accounts if their assets exceed $100 million.

The application of Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the world's largest retailer, to establish an ILC based in Utah spurred opposition from banks, unions, lawmakers, and consumer and community organizations. Last April, groups representing those interests argued against granting Wal-Mart's request at two public hearings, the first ever held by the FDIC on such an application.

Wal-Mart has pledged to the FDIC to stay out of branch banking and consumer lending. Rather, its newly chartered bank would be used to handle the 140 million credit card, debit card and electronic check payments it processes each year, the company says.

Some 300 banks currently operate branches in 1,150 Wal-Mart stores, and the company says it doesn't want to compete with them.

In addition to Wal-Mart and The Home Depot Inc., companies awaiting FDIC approval to establish ILCs or acquire existing ones include Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc., The Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, automakers Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG, and information services provider Ceridian Corp.

EU To Threaten Banks, Credit Card Firms, Draft Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman And John Rega

Bloomberg, January 30, 2007

Jan. 29 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators will threaten banks and credit card companies with potential fines for blocking competition, according to a draft of a report to be delivered this week.

The European Commission, the EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, may probe banks and payment card providers for colluding on prices and using practices aimed at keeping competitors out of their markets, the regulator said in a draft summary obtained by Bloomberg News. The report doesn't identify any companies.

The EU agency ``will not hesitate to exercise its powers of enforcement'' under antitrust rules ``to ensure that the competition rules are respected in retail banking,'' the 10-page summary said. The commission will release the report on Jan. 31.

Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0124157

The regulator, which can fine companies as much as 10 percent of worldwide sales for antitrust violations, already has challenged how transaction fees are set by Visa International Inc. and MasterCard Inc., the two biggest credit-card networks.

Disputes with Visa and MasterCard have centered on fees paid between banks that are known as interchange. When a consumer pays with a card, the retailer's bank pays the interchange to the consumer's bank. MasterCard and Visa don't collect the fee. Rather, they set guidelines on what banks should charge each other, unless the banks agree otherwise.

National Barriers

Agreements among banks on the fees may create barriers to entry for competitors in the U.K., Spain, Belgium, Austria and Portugal, the commission draft said.

``Enforcement action might also be appropriate in relation to high interchange fees and merchant fees in some payment card networks," the regulator said.

Fees vary between countries, a sign of limited cross-border competition, according to the report. The commission also said issuing credit cards would still be profitable for banks even without interchange in 20 of the EU's 27 nations.

Cutting credit card fees would be felt most sharply in the U.K., whose biggest issuers are Barclays Plc and Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc.

``Banks will look to generate revenue from sources other than transactional income," James Buckley, head of research at the Lafferty Group banking consultant, said in a telephone interview from London. He emphasized he hasn't seen the draft and EU action won't follow immediately from this week's report. ``I don't think anything's going to happen in the near term."

Promote Competition

MasterCard and Visa say their systems promote competition, since banks vie with each other to attract consumers and merchants. Visa Europe Chief Executive Officer Peter Ayliffe said Jan. 15 that denying banks those fees would deter business and hurt efforts to develop EU-wide payment systems. MasterCard said as much today.

``The European Commission's current considerations of the payment card industry's business practices could potentially set us back to the starting point where consumers revert to using costly, inefficient cash payments instead of cards," MasterCard said in a briefing document circulated in Europe today.

The commission also said cooperation between savings and cooperative banks may harm competition. A probe of their practices may cover Germany and France, where lenders agree to stay off each other's turf, the draft said.

In addition, retail banks may keep control over customers by linking different services, such as connecting current accounts with mortgages and personal loans, the report said.

``Some forms of product tying by some banks may be inconsistent with competition law," the draft said.

HEDGE-FUND HARDBALL Amid Amaranth's Crisis, Other Players Profited (WSJ)

By Ann Davis, Gregory Zuckerman And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

When Amaranth LLC collapsed in the fall, after swiftly losing more than $6 billion, it was the biggest hedge-fund failure ever. Now as investors slowly get back what's left of their money, it's becoming clear the debacle also had some big winners: other players in the high-stakes energy market who profited from a crippled rival's travails.

The final agonies of Amaranth, described by dozens of people close to the roller-coaster negotiations about its fate, began on Friday, Sept. 15. Bleeding cash and facing a Monday demand for money it didn't have, Amaranth scrambled through an intense weekend to find someone who would take over losing energy investments for a price.

HEDGE-FUND MILESTONES

See a timeline of key events1 in the history of hedge funds.

It did negotiate a rescue plan, requiring it to pay nearly $2 billion to Goldman Sachs Group to take toxic trades off its hands. Strapped for cash, Amaranth aimed to get the money to do the deal by using cash collateral on deposit with its middleman for natural-gas trades, J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.

But on Monday morning, just after Amaranth had told its investors a rescue was close, J.P. Morgan said it wouldn't release the collateral. The firm was effectively responsible for making sure parties to Amaranth's trades got paid, and it said the rescue plan didn't free it of this risk, according to people familiar with its stance. J.P. Morgan's refusal killed the plan. Amaranth's situation went from dire to desperate.

DOJ_NMG_0124158

Two days later, J.P. Morgan itself agreed to take over most Amaranth energy positions. With a partner, it cut a deal that turned out to be lucrative for J.P. Morgan -- earning it an estimated $725 million -- but more painful for its longtime client, Amaranth.

Hedge funds are among Wall Street's biggest customers, and the Street gives them red-carpet treatment as the fees roll in. But the Amaranth case shows how Wall Street dealt with a fund after it had traded its way into a deep hole. Information the fund revealed about its holdings as it grasped for a lifeline let other commodity-market players, Wall Street firms included, exploit its positions. As they drove prices relentlessly against Amaranth, its losses swelled, and instead of facing a big but possibly survivable setback, it collapsed.

Amaranth's case also reflects an incentive structure in the world of hedge funds that can tempt some to assume heavy risk. Typical of hedge funds -- private investment pools for the wealthy and institutions -- Amaranth took 1.5% of investors' assets as a management fee each year, plus 20% of investment gains. This 20% fee is calculated on gains recorded at year end, including gains not nailed down by closed trades. From this take, traders at many firms, such as Amaranth, are given bonuses that are largely theirs to keep, even if the paper gains later shrink or vanish.

"This results in a huge incentive for taking risk," says Luis Garicano, a University of Chicago business school professor. "When the bet goes well, the hedge-fund manager collects a lot, while when it goes badly the worst that can happen to the loser is he gets zero."

At Amaranth, star energy trader Brian Hunter won an estimated $75 million bonus after his team produced a $1.26 billion profit in 2005. Like many others at the fund, he had to keep about 30% of his pay in the fund. The fund's chief risk officer, Robert Jones, got a bonus of at least $5 million for 2005, say people familiar with the bonuses. Nicholas Maounis -- founder, majority owner and chief executive of the Amaranth management firm -- got an estimated $70 million cut of 2005 management fees, plus some of Amaranth's $200 million-plus in performance fees. He kept much of his compensation in the fund.

Asked to comment, a fund spokesman said, "It would be inadvisable for Amaranth to speak on the public record ... at this time. While no litigation has been threatened or commenced against Amaranth, regulatory inquiries continue and litigation remains possible." He said, "Mr. Maounis's No. 1 priority is the continued disposition of the Amaranth portfolio and distribution of capital to investors."

Volatile Market

The 32-year-old Mr. Hunter's specialty was natural-gas futures -- contracts for delivery on a future date -- and options. This is a highly volatile market, where the price can move swiftly on changes in gas available in storage and on shifts in the weather -- or a weather forecast.

If Mr. Hunter thought prices in, say, March would be higher than what other traders expected, he could buy contracts for March delivery cheaply. If his view of April prices was lower than the market's, he could go the other way. Or he could bet on the spread between a pair of months. For example, if there's a cold winter, gas can suddenly get scarce in March, sending prices skyrocketing. Things shift in April, as the heating season winds down. The March-April spread is one many gas traders bet on, but can be such a perilous bet that some call it "the widowmaker."

Mr. Hunter bet big. He sometimes held 30% of contracts for gas delivery in certain months, say people who saw the trading data. His team, operating largely out of Calgary, Alberta, made a stunning $1.5 billion in six weeks last spring, mostly on energy trades. But gains that big in a single market can portend swings just as fast the other way, and in May that's what happened. His bets on gas prices years into the future backfired and dealt the fund a sudden loss of about 10%.

That triggered demands for more collateral from J.P. Morgan. It was Amaranth's natural-gas clearing broker, a firm that executes a client's trades on an exchange and stands behind the client's obligations in case it can't pay. Clearing brokers give futures traders confidence they'll be paid if they are owed money when a contract expires.

For taking this risk, the firms demand collateral, known as "margin," in an amount of cash reflecting a portfolio's possible one-day price move. The margin demand fluctuates daily with how well or badly the positions did that day.

DOJ_NMG_0124159

Amaranth told its investors the May loss was "a humbling experience that has led us to recalibrate how we assess risk." To reduce its exposure, it paid investment bank Morgan Stanley to take over part of its energy portfolio. Yet officials at the New York Mercantile Exchange, where many energy contracts trade, were concerned enough that they discussed what a failure by a player as big as Amaranth might do to the market.

The regulators took comfort in the stability of J.P. Morgan. The bank at times advised Amaranth to reduce its natural-gas exposure, says someone familiar with the bank's operations. But the clearing operation focused chiefly on whether the fund met margin requirements, as Amaranth always did.

According to a person involved in the discussions, Amaranth's Mr. Maounis told his energy team to reduce its exposure, but warned them not to do so precipitously, lest the firm suffer another major loss. Amaranth's positions were so big they couldn't be unwound fast without moving the market.

But Amaranth allowed the portion of the fund invested in energy to grow, as the energy bets started to pay off again. By July, Amaranth was 56% in energy, up from 34% in April. In the last week of August, the value of the fund's assets reached $9.2 billion, up about 27% since Jan. 1.

One of Mr. Hunter's bets anticipated relatively cheap gas in September. But in the last half hour of trading Aug. 29, the price of the expiring contract for September delivery jumped. The surge wiped out hundreds of millions of dollars in Amaranth's gains. The fund told Nymex it suspected someone had manipulated prices. Regulators are looking at it.

Then in early September, widely watched weather-forecasting centers made two predictions: that the hurricane season would pass without major storms, and that the winter would be mild. The forecasts, too, slammed Mr. Hunter. He was betting on a gas shortage and price spike at some point after October. Worse, contracts for winter delivery fell by more than those for early-fall delivery, hitting him where his bets were concentrated. By the end of Friday, Sept. 15, Amaranth was down more than $2 billion from its August value.

Margin Calls

The losses automatically raised J.P. Morgan's margin demands. One of the ways Amaranth had met past demands was selling nonenergy investments to raise cash. But now it turned out some couldn't be liquidated instantly, say people involved. Amaranth suddenly faced a risk of not having enough cash for Monday's margin demand. If it didn't, creditors could foreclose on its assets and it might lose them.

Amaranth called Wall Street banks in search of solutions. It asked Goldman Sachs if the bank, a major player in both energy markets and hedge funds, would take over much of Amaranth's energy portfolio. The fund tried a different tack with others, trying to raise money by selling a piece of the fund-management firm, Amaranth Advisors LLC.

Firms prefer to do negotiations like these secretly and one at a time, to avoid revealing too much to too many rivals or signaling vulnerability. But Amaranth's Greenwich, Conn., office that weekend was a revolving door. Morgan Stanley representatives spotted someone from Merrill Lynch & Co. in the parking lot. Rumors flew.

On Saturday, Goldman offered to do a deal designed to eliminate most of Amaranth's energy risk -- in return for a $1.7 billion cash payment from the fund -- say people familiar with the negotiations. Amaranth managers were insulted. Mr. Hunter had figured the fund could get out of these problematic trades for about $800 million.

Amaranth kept shopping. It called John Arnold of Centaurus Energy, a Houston hedge fund that was Mr. Hunter's biggest rival. No deal.

With others they talked to, some Amaranth traders claimed Mr. Arnold was driving gas prices against Amaranth, according to someone who was approached. Their pitch was: We've got one guy in the market trading against us. If you take over our positions and hold onto them, you can make a billion dollars.

A Deal With Merrill

Later that Saturday, Amaranth managed to make a partial deal. It got Merrill Lynch to assume about a quarter of its natural-gas exposure, in return for a payment of approximately $250 million, say people familiar with the matter. Merrill won't comment.

Amaranth officials figured that Goldman Sachs now would reduce its price, since Merrill was taking some of the exposure. Instead, Goldman executives fumed, say people familiar with their reaction; Goldman had wanted to negotiate exclusively, not have competitors poring over Amaranth's books.

DOJ_NMG_0124160

Rather than reduce its price, Goldman upped it, to $1.85 billion. The deal it envisioned would use derivative contracts to assume most of the risk of Amaranth's main remaining energy investments. Goldman would do trades that partially offset energy trades on Amaranth's books, with the aim of neutralizing them. The deal would leave a lot of positions on Amaranth's accounts at J.P. Morgan, which remained responsible for their execution.

Some at J.P. Morgan, including Chief Executive James Dimon, had grown concerned about Amaranth. Late Sunday, J.P. Morgan called in its top energy trader, George "Beau" Taylor, to review Amaranth's positions. Informed that an Amaranth-Goldman deal was imminent, J.P. Morgan said it might make an offer itself, but then said it needed more time.

In Greenwich, Mr. Maounis was in turmoil, sometimes losing composure and in tears, according to people familiar with the matter. Late that night, he accepted the deal with Goldman.

On Monday morning, the sleep-deprived fund chief issued a letter to investors, telling them that half of the money the fund had at its peak 2½ weeks earlier was gone. Instead of being up 27% for the year, it might be down more than 35%. But his letter gave an assurance. It said a deal to get the fund out of natural gas was "near completion."

The letter didn't mention that a key player still needed to sign off: J.P. Morgan. The clearing broker held an estimated $1 billion to $2 billion of Amaranth's money in a margin account, cash that Amaranth intended to use to pay Goldman.

Amaranth held a conference call intended to close the Goldman deal. But as officials from Goldman and Nymex listened, J.P. Morgan refused to release Amaranth's collateral -- scotching the deal.

The bank said it believed the complex transaction wouldn't eliminate its risk. J.P. Morgan would still be the clearing broker for Amaranth's energy positions. And although Goldman and Amaranth claimed that the risk in those positions would be drastically reduced by Goldman's offsetting trades, J.P. Morgan would be the clearing broker for those new trades, too. The firm said it needed to analyze how the deal worked. It also argued that it had a right, and perhaps a duty, to hold onto the margin money until its obligations were resolved.

"We would have been absolutely willing to facilitate a deal that would have removed unwanted Amaranth credit exposure from our risk profile," a J.P. Morgan spokesman said.

In the energy market, it was now open season on Amaranth. All weekend, others had been dumping natural-gas positions on after-hours trading platforms, having either heard rumors about Amaranth or been invited to review its books. On Monday, with word of the fund's distress out in the open, traders sold certain gas investments even faster, in anticipation of a forced liquidation of Amaranth's portfolio.

For instance, Mr. Hunter had bet that the spread between March-delivery gas contracts and April contracts -- the "widowmaker" bet -- would widen. The burst of trading made it shrink, to 75 cents per million-BTU gas contract from $1.15 on Friday, according to NaturalGasAnalytics.net. On Monday alone, Amaranth's losses deepened by several hundred million dollars.

That morning, Amaranth got a call from Kenneth Griffin, founder of Citadel Investment Group. Mr. Griffin had built Citadel into a $13 billion hedge-fund behemoth estimated to be responsible for 3% of daily trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Even so, his group suffered some losses during Mr. Hunter's 2005 winning streak. Mr. Griffin proposed taking over most of Amaranth's energy portfolio.

That portfolio now was in worse shape because of Monday's losses. The more it deteriorated, the more cash an outsider would demand to take it off Amaranth's hands. The Citadel deal would have cost Amaranth more than $2 billion, say people familiar with the bid. And the fund couldn't pay, with its collateral hung up at J.P. Morgan.

Mr. Griffin considered giving the hedge fund time to pay by granting it a bridge loan, taking other Amaranth assets as collateral. He dropped the idea when lawyers warned that Citadel might have a hard time collecting if Amaranth ended up in bankruptcy.

With the Citadel plan shaky, J.P. Morgan got back in the game. In conjunction with Citadel, J.P. Morgan, which itself is a big hedge-fund player, began new talks with its now-very-vulnerable clearing client. The end result was a broader deal than the scuttled Goldman one: J.P. Morgan and Citadel would jointly assume Amaranth's entire remaining energy portfolio.

Amaranth would have to eat losses of about $800 million its portfolio had incurred from Friday night through Tuesday as others exploited its weakness. J.P. Morgan and Citadel wanted $1.6 billion to take over most remaining gas trading positions and some $300 million to assume options to buy or sell gas. As a topper, they asked for $250 million for taking over miscellaneous commodity investments. Mr. Hunter thought the price for taking over the miscellaneous positions should be no more than $50 million, says someone involved in the talks.

DOJ_NMG_0124161

Amaranth capitulated. After an all-night session, the deal was signed at 5:30 a.m. Wednesday. Amaranth's total payments to Merrill Lynch, J.P. Morgan and Citadel, plus the last few days' market losses, came to about $3.2 billion.

Now that J.P. Morgan was in on the deal, getting access to the Amaranth cash that J.P. Morgan held as collateral was no longer a problem.

His business in tatters, Amaranth's Mr. Maounis, 43, discussed selling what was left of his fund-management firm to Citigroup Inc. Dean Barr, an official of Citigroup's Alternative Investments group, was interested but wouldn't buy unless Mr. Maounis stepped down as the firm's chief, says someone familiar with the talks. Ultimately, negotiations foundered over other issues.

So Amaranth began liquidating its remaining holdings. Mr. Hunter flew back to Calgary and settled into a new house he had been building. He is now talking about launching a hedge fund of his own. Mr. Maounis also is exploring starting a new hedge-fund business.

'Very Nice Increment'

The three firms that were paid hundreds of millions of dollars to take over Amaranth trades -- Merrill Lynch, Citadel and J.P. Morgan -- soon reported significant profits on energy trading. J.P. Morgan made at least $725 million, partly by quickly selling many of its new positions to Citadel.

The Amaranth deal produced a "very nice increment to fixed-income trading," Mr. Dimon, J.P. Morgan's CEO, said in a speech in November. "But we did take a lot of risk."

Bill Winters, co-head of J.P. Morgan's investment bank, said at a November conference that through its hedge-fund relationships, such as trade clearing, "we have the insight into what's going on in these funds" and can "respond quickly to opportunities when they come up. Amaranth was one obvious example of that."

He added, "I imagine there will be others...where our ability to be both on the inside, but not compromised, is extremely powerful [as a way] to generate profits."

The huge, complex deal with Amaranth helped build J.P. Morgan's profile as a commodities player. This month, a magazine called Risk named the firm "Energy Derivatives House of the Year."

How much the investors in Amaranth will lose depends on when they got in. They've gotten back about $1.6 billion to date. For one investor that came in in mid-2005, money returned so far comes to 27% of what it put in and about 18% of what its stake was worth at the peak. Investors will receive somewhat more when Amaranth finishes liquidating.

Some investors have a keepsake. Amaranth once sent chess sets as year-end gifts, inscribed with a quotation from the late grandmaster Alexander Kotov: "It often happens that a player carries out a deep and complicated calculation, but fails to spot something elementary right at the first move."

Patent Backlog Spurs Demand For Examiners (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Got a degree in engineering, chemistry or physics and looking for work? The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office is hiring.

The patent office plans to hire 1,200 examiners for each of the next five years. The average starting salary is about $62,000, and electrical engineers and computer engineers may qualify for an $8,800 signing bonus because the PTO has a hard time recruiting in those fields.

The hiring binge is being driven by corporations around the world that pour money into research and development and seek patents in the United States to protect their intellectual property rights, said John J. Doll, the commissioner of patents.

In recent months, the PTO has been swamped with patent applications, for such things as computer software, cellphones and interactive videos, and could face a backlog of 800,000 cases before year's end, Doll said.

DOJ_NMG_0124162

Like many other parts of the government, PTO is in competition with the private sector to hire college graduates and others with degrees in engineering and science. Finding workers with specialized skills is especially important for many federal agencies because projections show that 40 percent of the current federal workforce will retire by 2015.

As part of its employment package, PTO pays retention bonuses to keep electrical and computer engineers from going to the private sector. It also picks up the cost of law school courses for examiners who want to improve their credentials with a law degree. Careers as examiners can lead to salaries of about $100,000 a year.

PTO also tries to be a family-friendly employer, giving some leeway to examiners on when they start their work each day -- as long as they meet certain productivity goals, based on their experience and the difficulty of their caseload.

"You have to work hard; it's a difficult job, but if you work hard, you can do the job in 40 hours a week," Doll said.

As part of its recruitment effort, PTO is holding a job fair at its Alexandria headquarters on Friday and Saturday. Agency employees will greet potential job applicants in the Madison Building Auditorium from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. More job fairs will be held later in the year.

People interested in this week's job fair are encouraged to register on the agency's Web site (http://www.usptocareers.gov/jobfair) because registration guarantees an interview with a patent examiner. People who attend without registering will be offered interviews on a first-come, first-served basis.

The deadline to register for an interview is Wednesday, Doll said.

"We have an examiner sit down and explain what the job is," he said. "We don't want someone coming in without knowing what the job is -- we make sure they understand at a grass-roots level what they are going to be doing, what it takes to get hired and get promoted."Calling All Managers

Give it a try:

The General Services Administration announced yesterday it will allow federal supervisors, managers and executives to work for free from one of GSA's telework centers in hopes that trial runs might build enthusiasm for telecommuting.

GSA operates 14 telework centers that provide workstations equipped with computers, telephones, printers, copiers and other equipment. The centers are outside the Beltway in Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia. Agencies pay $25 to $49 per day to reserve a workstation.

Federal data shows that only 19 percent of eligible federal workers can be considered telecommuters, and managerial resistance is seen as the reason for what some officials consider a relatively low participation rate.

A recent survey sponsored by the Telework Exchange and the Federal Managers Association showed that concern over employee productivity and lack of control over employee activities makes it difficult for federal managers to support telecommuting.

The GSA offer, which is a response to that survey, runs through Sept. 30 -- "a no-risk, no-cost offer to federal managers to try out teleworking," said Kevin Messner, an associate administrator at GSA.

Bush administration officials and members of Congress, including Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), have exhorted federal agencies to permit more employees to work from home or from a telework center at least one day a week as a way to cut down on traffic congestion and reduce air pollution in the Washington region.

Federal managers interested in trying out telework should contact a telework center director to make arrangements. A list of centers can be found on the GSA Web site (http://www.gsa.gov) or GSA's Interagency Telework Site (http://www.telework.gov).

ENVIRONMENT:

Global Warming Issue Gains 'Traction' With New Congress (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON — After years of being on Congress' back burner, global warming will be a focus of the new Democratic majority trying to follow cities and states that have tackled the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0124163

Today, the Senate holds its first global warming hearing of the year. Senators will present their views to the Environment and Public Works Committee. The panel is headed by Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., who has been named an environmental "champion" by groups such as the League of Conservation Voters. She takes over from Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., who once called global warming a "hoax."

"There is more … traction on this issue beginning with this Congress," said Jim Owens of the Edison Electric Institute, a coalition of electric companies that could be affected by legislation on global warming. "Clearly the momentum is shifting in the direction of possible action."

As the Earth's temperature has risen in recent years, there has been growing agreement among scientists that the trend is due in large part to rising levels of "greenhouse gases" in the atmosphere. These gases, coming from cars, factories and power plants, trap heat.

More than a half-dozen states have set targets for reducing their output of global warming gases. California has a law requiring the state to slash its global warming emissions to 1990 levels by 2020.

The Republican-led Congress held hearings on global warming but did not pass any bills aimed directly at curbing greenhouse gases. After the elections in November swept Democrats into power, they promised to make the issue a priority:

•House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., plans to form a special committee to study global warming and energy independence. She directed House committees to pass global warming bills by July 4. "It says to the American people, we are about the future," Pelosi said.

•Three bills aimed specifically at slowing emission of greenhouse gases have been introduced since Congress convened Jan. 4. Sponsors are circulating the text of a fourth bill, and at least three more measures are likely.

•Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., told his fellow Democrats this month that the United States should "lead the world" in fighting global warming.

"For the last 12 years … all we've been talking about (on the committee) is, 'Is there global warming?' " Boxer said. "I'm done with that, I'm over it. We need to move forward."

It is far from a given that Congress will pass strict legislation to address global warming. The elections "replaced moderate Republicans with moderate Democrats," said Eileen Claussen, head of the Pew Center on Global Climate Change, a group of companies pushing for action on global warming. "I'm not saying that we're going to get legislation this year … (or) even get it next year." She says legislation dealing with the issue is a near-certainty in the next four years.

Inhofe, the top Republican on the Senate environment committee, has vowed to block any bills calling for mandatory actions by industry to curb greenhouse gas emissions. Breaking that freeze would take the approval of 60 senators. The Democratic side has 51 votes.

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., said industry groups could make it impossible to get President Bush's signature on global warming bills. Bush favors voluntary measures for combating climate change.

In his State of the Union address, Bush proposed requiring vehicles to get better gas mileage, which would help cut gas emissions. Before the speech, Bush spokesman Tony Snow ruled out any caps on emissions that would apply to the whole economy.

"It may be that we can't get there this year or next," Waxman said.

UN Chief Seeks Climate Change Summit (FT)

By Fiona Harvey, Caroline Daniel And John Aglionby

Financial Times, January 30, 2007

Plans for an emergency summit of world leaders to break the international impasse on cutting greenhouse gases are being discussed by Ban Ki-moon, United Nations secretary-general.

At the summit, mooted for September, heads of state would discuss the possibility of a successor to the Kyoto protocol on climate change, the main provisions of which expire in 2012.

Mr Ban will fly to Nairobi on Tuesday to discuss plans for the summit, which are at an early stage, with officials from the UN Environment Programme, the body charged with tackling climate change.

DOJ_NMG_0124164

It would be among the first important commitments made by Mr Ban since he replaced Kofi Annan on January 1. He has chosen to stake some political capital on climate change, surprising US president George W. Bush by raising it at their meeting two weeks ago.

Calling a summit would be a high-risk strategy. Heads of state may refuse the invitation, or fail to reach agreement, and Mr Ban will want to be sure of a full attendance before committing.

Mr Bush is the leader most likely to decline, but any important agreement would be difficult without the US, the biggest emitter of greenhouse gases.

Mr Bush has shunned mandatory caps on emissions, and officials have dismissed hopes of the US engaging in discussions about a post-Kyoto accord.

One tactic would be to gather heads of state to focus on national security implications of climate change. Achim Steiner, executive director of the UN Environment Programme, said climate change risked escalating conflicts because of mass migration and competition for resources .

World Scientists Near Consensus On Warming (NYT)

By James Kanter And Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 29 — Scientists from across the world gathered Monday to hammer out the final details of an authoritative report on climate change that is expected to project centuries of rising temperatures and sea levels unless there are curbs in emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases that trap heat in the atmosphere.

Scientists involved in writing or reviewing the report say it is nearly certain to conclude that there is at least a 90 percent chance that human-caused emissions are the main factor in warming since 1950. The report is the fourth since 1990 from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, which is overseen by the United Nations.

The report, several of the authors said, will describe a growing body of evidence that warming is likely to cause a profound transformation of the planet.

Three large sections of the report will be forthcoming during the year. The first will be a summary for policy makers and information on basic climate science, which is expected to be issued on Friday.

Among the findings in recent drafts:

¶The Arctic Ocean could largely be devoid of sea ice during summer later in the century.

¶Europe's Mediterranean shores could become barely habitable in summers, while the Alps could shift from snowy winter destinations to summer havens from the heat.

¶Growing seasons in temperate regions will expand, while droughts are likely to ravage further the semiarid regions of Africa and southern Asia.

"Concerns about climate change and public awareness on the subject are at an all-time high," the chairman of the panel, Rajendra Pachauri, told delegates on Monday.

But scientists involved in the effort warned that squabbling among teams and government representatives from more than 100 countries — over how to portray the probable amount of sea-level rise during the 21st century — could distract from the basic finding that a warming world will be one in which shrinking coastlines are the new normal for centuries to come.

Jerry Mahlman, an emeritus researcher at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo., who was a reviewer of the report's single-spaced, 1,644-page summary of climate science, said most of the leaks to the news media so far were from people eager to find elements that were the most frightening or the most reassuring.

He added in an interview that such efforts distracted from the basic, undisputed findings, saying that those point to trends that are very disturbing.

He noted recent disclosures that there is still uncertainty about the pace at which seas will rise because of warming and the melting of terrestrial ice over the next 100 years. That span, he said, is just the start of a rise in sea levels that will almost certainly continue for 1,000 years or so.

DOJ_NMG_0124165

Many economists and energy experts long ago abandoned any expectation that it would be possible to avoid a doubling of preindustrial carbon dioxide concentrations, given the growth of human populations, use of fossil fuels, particularly coal, and destruction of forests in the tropics.

The report is likely to highlight the hazardous consequences of that shift by finding that reaching twice the preindustrial concentration of carbon dioxide will probably warm climate between 3.5 and 8 degrees Fahrenheit and by highlighting that there is a small but significant risk that such a buildup can produce even more warming.

One major point of debate in early drafts of the report is the projection of a smaller rise in sea level than the last report as scientists relying on computer models and field observations struggle to find a consensus. Some scientists say that the figures used in the coming report are not recent enough because they leave out recent observations of instability in some ice sheets in Antarctica and Greenland.

Another possible point of contention during the four days of closed sessions in Paris this week may be assertions in early drafts of the report that the recent warming rate was blunted by particle pollution and volcanic eruptions.

Some scientists say the final report should reflect the assumption that the rate of warming in coming years is likely to be more pronounced than that of previous decades.

Achim Steiner, the executive director of the United Nations Environment Program, said the findings presented Friday should lead decision makers to accelerate efforts to slash carbon emissions and to help people in vulnerable parts of the world prepare for climate change.

"These findings should strengthen the resolve of governments to act now to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and put in place the medium- to longer-term strategies necessary to avert dangerous climate change," Mr. Steiner said.

In a new report issued Monday, his agency said the most recent evidence from mountain glaciers showed that they were melting faster than before.

In the past year, international concern over what to do about global warming has grown along with concrete signs of climate change. Even so, political leaders are still groping for ways to tackle the phenomenon. Europe has adopted a program that caps the amount of emissions from industrial plants.

But the world's largest emitter, the United States, still is debating whether to adopt a similar policy, while developing countries like China are resisting caps on the ground that the industrialized countries contributed about 75 percent of the current volume of greenhouse gases and should make the deepest cuts.

Many experts involved in the intergovernmental panel's process said there was hope that with a prompt start on slowing emissions, the chances of seeing much greater warmth and widespread disruption of ecosystems and societies could be reduced.

Outside experts agreed.

"We basically have three choices: mitigation, adaptation and suffering," said John Holdren, the president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science and an energy and climate expert at Harvard. "We're going to do some of each. The question is what the mix is going to be. The more mitigation we do, the less adaptation will be required and the less suffering there will be."

BP Faces Growing Criminal Probe Over Texas Refinery (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Laurel Brubaker Calkins And Margaret Cronin Fisk

Bloomberg, January 30, 2007

Jan. 29 (Bloomberg) -- BP Plc is facing a growing federal investigation into possible criminal environmental and safety violations at its Texas refinery, where a 2005 explosion killed 15 workers, lawyers suing the company said.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has joined a federal investigation begun in October by the U.S. attorney in Houston, the lawyers said. Five Washington-based representatives of the Justice Department, the EPA and the Federal Bureau of Investigations went to Texas this month to meet attorneys for workers hurt in the blast, a victims' lawyer at the meeting said.

DOJ_NMG_0124166

``They were looking at anything and everything we had," said attorney Joseph Gourrier, whose firm represents 150 injured workers suing BP. ``They are looking for things that can be used to bring criminal charges against the upper management of BP, both at the refinery site and further up the company."

The multiagency investigation represents an expansion of the government's probe into London-based BP, Europe's second-largest oil company. The Texas City explosion, one of the worst industrial accidents in recent U.S. history, spurred more than 1,700 lawsuits, a record $21 million fine by the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration and a finding by the U.S. Chemical Safety Board that BP endangered workers by cutting costs.

BP, which has set aside $1.6 billion to resolve the lawsuits, has settled more than 1,200 claims, including all the death suits. BP acknowledged safety shortcomings at the plant.

$1.6 Billion Set Aside

BP spokesman Neil Chapman declined to comment on anything related to the Justice Department's investigation into company activities.

Nancy Herrera, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Houston, declined to comment on the BP investigation.

``We can't even confirm there is an investigation going on," she said.

``We do not confirm or deny the existence of an investigation," EPA spokesman Dave Ryan said in an e-mailed message.

The March 23, 2005, accident happened after workers started the refinery's octane-boosting unit and excess gasoline spilled into a vent system. The gas ignited, setting off an explosion that could be felt five miles away. Fifteen workers were killed and hundreds more were injured at the refinery, the company's largest.

`A Felony'

Gourrier, of Houston's Brent Coon & Associates, said federal investigators specifically asked about BP documents and depositions related to charges the company falsified its state air quality permit application to continue operating the octane-boosting unit.

``It is a felony to knowingly and negligently expose people to these hazardous substances," Gourrier said. In preparing for trial, he said, the Coon firm discovered evidence BP had ``a number of environmental releases over the years from that unit, and they didn't do anything about it."

After the initial day-long meeting, ten DOJ employees spent three days combing the extensive computer data base Coon's firm maintains of its blast-related investigations, Gourrier said.

Investigators asked about an informational letter BP mailed to more than 1,000 local community and business leaders in November, on the eve of jury selection in a case involving Eva Rowe, who lost both parents in the explosion, Gourrier said.

Rowe settled her claims for an unspecified amount, which included roughly $38 million for schools and hospitals that service the region's petrochemical complexes.

Jury Issue

State Judge Susan Criss in Galveston, Texas, is investigating potential jury tampering in connection with BP's informational flyer, which was seen by several potential jurors in the Rowe case.

Federal investigators also asked the victims' lawyers about a BP environmental employee who worked on the company's air quality permit application at the state regulatory agency before coming to work for BP on the same matter, Gourrier said.

Lawyer Kenneth Tekell, who is handling settlement negotiations for BP, said in an interview today the company has settled 1,250 blast-related damage claims, including all death claims and three of the five injury cases that were scheduled to go to trial Feb. 26 in Galveston.

``We're not just settling trial claims," Tekell told Criss, who presides over all blast-related cases, today at a hearing. ``We're settling others, too."

Art Gonzalez of Brent Coon told the judge the two sides are in settlement talks. ``We met last week, and we'll meet again this week to try to resolve additional cases," Gonzalez said at today's hearing.

Unsettled Claims

DOJ_NMG_0124167

Gonzalez said afterward that roughly 500 blast-related damage claims remain unsettled, about half involving injuries or property damage that occurred off the refinery's property. He said BP hasn't settled any property damage claims to date and has focused its attention on settling injury claims.

BP is also the subject of a criminal investigation by the Anchorage, Alaska, U.S. Attorney's Office, which is probing responsibility for numerous leaks and faulty maintenance at the company's pipeline network at Alaska's North Slope, the largest U.S. oilfield.

It isn't clear whether that investigation has also been rolled into the new multiagency probe. Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

The case is Arenazas v. BP Products North America, 05CV0337, 212th District Court, Galveston County, Texas.

Court Ruling On Salmon Hooks Pork (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 30, 2007

On paper, the debate deals with swimming salmon and spilling water.

But in Congress, the federal court decision that last week invalidated a rider written by Senate Appropriations Committee member Larry Craig (R-Idaho) threatens to upend the influential panel's authority.

The unanimous ruling allows a small group of salmon-watchers to stay on the job while reminding appropriators of a hard truth they rarely acknowledge: Earmarks included in report language, but not bill text, do not have the force of law.

Craig was so aggravated in 2005 at what he deemed biased reporting by the Portland-based Fish Passage Center that he moved to eliminate its $1.3 million budget through an Appropriations Committee report. Several local groups filed suit against Craig's effort, and the longtime appropriations cardinal said their victory last Wednesday would set a worrisome example for future challenges to appropriations decisions.

"It's very significant," Craig said in an interview. "We've always viewed report language as having the force of law."

Sen. Thad Cochran (Miss.), the senior Appropriations Republican, declined to judge the case definitively until the Justice Department decides whether to pursue an appeal to the Supreme Court. But he said "it may be that [the decision] is wrong.

"Report language explains the intent of Congress in appropriating money and limits on the use of funds," Cochran said. "[It has] been effective in explaining what Congress intended. We will stay tuned, because this story may not be over yet."

During the earmark-transparency debate that briefly imperiled the Senate's ethics bill this month, lawmakers acknowledged that federal agencies are not required to follow instructions made only in appropriations reports that have all the weight of "sending a note from your sister," as Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) put it. Yet agencies still remain loyal to the appropriators who fund them, making the court decision a triumph for fiscal watchdog groups.

"This is going to throw the appropriations process for a loop," said Steve Ellis, vice president at the nonpartisan Taxpayers for Common Sense. The new precedent being set, he added, "should make appropriators and other earmarkers look over their shoulder and wonder if they're going to stand any legal test."

Craig took aim at the fish center after its counts of endangered salmon on the Northwest's Snake River were employed in another federal lawsuit. That suit ended with an order that the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA), a hydroelectric-power agency, spill water from dams to help migrating salmon.

The hydroelectric industry, which has contributed heavily to Craig's campaigns, estimated a $60 million-plus power loss from the spillage order that put low electricity rates in the region at risk. Craig responded with an appropriations rider that traveled through the committee process unchallenged, telling the BPA to close the fish center and hire a private company to count Snake River salmon.

Richard Condit, general counsel at Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, was a member of the legal team challenging Craig. He invoked another congressional donnybrook, over allegations of Bush administration interference with impartial science, by describing Craig as seeking to silence government-funded scientists with whom he disagreed.

"Agencies have to make good decisions," Condit said of the BPA. "You can't just jump because Sen. Craig says jump."

DOJ_NMG_0124168

Appropriators, hardened from battle with conservatives over the growth of earmarks, will face another dose of reality this winter as Democrats draft a joint resolution to fund the government and keep special projects to the barest minimum. Spending gadflies such as Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), meanwhile, are encouraged by the Ninth Circuit decision.

"It was a matter of time," DeMint said. "If we do something in report language that makes them mad, the courts are obviously going to point out that it doesn't have the force of law."

DeMint said he had not considered the lawsuit's relevance to his quest to tamp down the rapid growth of earmarks until he read the first news reports on the decision. The door may be open for ordinary citizens to consider bringing suit against congressional mandates inserted outside of bill text without a vote, he added.

"It's a good precedent, because it shows there's going to be more scrutiny of [provisions] we hadn't voted on" that agencies give weight to, DeMint said.

Craig's quest to keep electricity rates low in the Northwest has touched off turf fights beyond the salmon center lawsuit. When the White House's 2006 budget proposed using extra revenue from BPA power sales to decrease the deficit, rather than hold down regional power rates, Craig inserted language in last summer's war supplemental, with Democratic support, blocking the move.

The Ninth Circuit is also a familiar foe for Republicans, who have employed some of the court's more contentious rulings in their campaign to rein in perceived judicial activism. Craig shook his head at the source of the anti-earmark decree, calling it "another misguided decision by the Ninth Circuit.

"Trying to be politically acute, they have caught themselves in a precedent that has a political impact on Congress," Craig said.

The Senate adopted a DeMint amendment subjecting report-language earmarks to the same disclosure standard as those in bill language, though not without partisan wrangling. Still, any uncertainty among appropriators about the legal standing of report-language earmarks could shift more member projects into bill text, allowing DeMint, Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and their allies to offer motions to strike.

"This adds lot of firepower to efforts to move earmarks into statute," Citizens Against Government Waste President Tom Schatz said. Referring to the Ninth Circuit's famous opinion that the Pledge of Allegiance's invocation of God is unconstitutional, Schatz added: "This is not the 'one nation under God' case. This is a pro-taxpayer decision."

Condit and others involved in the case cautioned, however, that lawyers advocating for the fish center were able to argue that Craig's report language openly contradicted an earlier law. That standard would be hard to meet in future court challenges to report earmarks, Condit said, and may limit the long-term precedent set by the ruling.

Documents from the salmon-science lawsuit offer a stark depiction of agencies' readiness to accommodate members of Congress. "It is an understatement to say that BPA gave great weight to [appropriations] reports," the three-judge panel wrote. "More accurate is the observation that BPA slavishly deferred to what it thought the reports commanded."

BPA Vice President Gregory Delwiche considered the committee report a direct order to his agency, according to court filings, e-mailing an official at the fish center that "my thinking … isn't really relevant, what's relevant is what the direction from Wash DC is."

The BPA did not respond by press time to a request for comment on whether internal policies regarding the impact of committee-report mandates would change in light of the ruling. Craig said he would consider using statute to cut off funds for the fish center, although the BPA could eventually privatize the center's duties by alternate means.

Yet any new attempt by Craig to eliminate the fish center would not sway his fellow Idaho senator, Mike Crapo (R), who instead called for improvements in the center's management. As for the precedent set by the case, Crapo said, "Report language didn't have the force of law anyway."

Yosemite Case May Affect Public Access (FINDLAW/AP)

By Garance Burke, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124169

(AP) - YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK, Calif.-The plunging waterfalls and soaring crags chiseled by the Merced River draw millions of visitors each year, but the crowds are precisely what threatens the waterway and the park.

Efforts to safeguard the Merced have spawned a court battle over the future of development in Yosemite National Park's most popular stretch. The case may come down to the challenge facing all of America's parks: Should they remain open to everyone, or should access be limited in the interest of protecting them?

In November, a federal judge barred crews from finishing $60 million in construction projects in Yosemite Valley, siding with a small group of environmentalists who sued the federal government, saying further commercial development would bring greater numbers of visitors, thus threatening the Merced's fragile ecosystem.

"The park's plans for commercialization could damage Yosemite for future generations," said Bridget Kerr, a member of Friends of Yosemite Valley, one of two local environmental groups that filed the suit.

The government is appealing, fearing the ruling could force the National Park Service to limit the number of people allowed into Yosemite each day, a precedent it doesn't want to see echoed in other parks.

"I don't think we've ever had a ruling with these kind of implications," said Kerri Cahill, a Denver-based planner for the park service. "It's going to have a direct influence on the public who care about these places."

The case has Yosemite's most loyal advocates sharply divided over how to balance preservation with access to public lands. Even environmentalists can't agree on how to minimize the human footprint - some believe cars should be kept out entirely; others say visitors should have to make reservations in advance.

Yosemite was the first land in the country set aside for its scenic beauty, declared a public trust in 1864 by Abraham Lincoln. Its 1,200 square miles of granite peaks and towering waterfalls became a national park in 1890, and with few exceptions its gates have been open to all ever since, though backcountry permits are limited to minimize the human impact on wilderness areas.

The Merced itself is protected under the federal Wild and Scenic Rivers Act.

The current fight began when the Merced flooded in 1997, wiping out campgrounds and parking lots and damaging rooms at the popular Yosemite Lodge. The park service drew up a $442 million remodeling plan that included moving campgrounds, rerouting a key access road, rebuilding employee housing and upgrading hotel rooms on the valley floor.

Kerr's group and Mariposans for the Environment and Responsible Government sued, claiming aspects of the park's plans - including blasting part of the river canyon - threatened the Merced.

The groups also fear the costs of park upgrades would be passed on to visitors in the form of price hikes for hotel rooms and campsites, turning Yosemite into a playground for the rich.

Park officials say no such rate increases are planned. Accommodations now range from about $20 per night for a campsite to nearly $1,000 for a suite in the deluxe Ahwahnee Hotel.

Park spokesman Scott Gediman called the plaintiffs a "fringe group" pushing a radical agenda.

"They want us to set a quota for the number of visitors coming into the park, which is something we just don't want to do," he said.

Well-known conservation groups like the Sierra Club and Nature Conservancy aren't directly involved in the fight, though the Sierra Club was among more than 60 organizations that signed a legal brief supporting an earlier version of the suit.

Gediman said the number of visitors is falling and crowding isn't a problem except at the height of summer, when there's bumper-to-bumper traffic near popular sites like El Capitan, the 3,000-foot granite monolith rising from the valley floor.

In 1996, when the park had a record 4 million visitors, rangers shut gates when all parking spaces were filled. But last year, the nation's third-most popular park hit a 16-year low with 3.36 million visitors.

"This is the United States' version of the crown jewels, so why wouldn't we protect it as best we can?" said Peter Newman, a natural resources management professor at Colorado State University who filed a legal brief supporting the park service. "I've just never heard of any other plan that has been so contested."

On the Net:

Yosemite: http://www.nps.gov/yose/

DOJ_NMG_0124170

Gray Wolves To Lose Some Protection (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll

USA Today, January 30, 2007

DENVER — The gray wolf, hunted to near-extinction in the last century, has rebounded so well in six states that it can now be taken off the endangered species list, federal wildlife officials said Monday.

Federal protection for about 4,000 gray wolves in three western Great Lakes states — northern parts of Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan — will end in about a month, the Fish and Wildlife Service announced.

Plans to do the same in Montana, Idaho and Wyoming probably will take the rest of this year, service director H. Dale Hall said. A formal proposal, with public hearings and a two-month comment period, will be published this week.

Two wildlife advocacy groups — the Defenders of Wildlife and Sinapu, a Colorado-based wolf advocacy group — warned they might sue to prevent taking wolves in the Rockies off the endangered list. Another group, the Center for Biological Diversity, claims the proposal will "end in the mass killing of wolves."

The groups contend that state management of wolves in the Rockies will do too little to maintain the animal's remarkable recovery since the mid-1990s, when 66 wild wolves from Canada were released in Yellowstone National Park and central Idaho. The population has mushroomed to more than 1,200 today.

Hunters say wolves compete for elk, deer and other game. Ranchers complain they kill too many livestock. An anti-wolf group, Friends of the Northern Yellowstone Elk Herd, says it plans to sue to remove endangered status immediately.

Dropping federal protection would make states responsible for managing the wolf population. They could allow hunting and lethal control as long as at least 10 wolf packs and 100 animals remain in each state.

Ed Bangs, the Fish and Wildlife recovery coordinator in the Rockies, says Wyoming wants all its wolves outside of Yellowstone and Grand Teton national parks classified as "predators" that can be shot on sight without restriction. He hopes that talks with the state will produce an acceptable plan.

If not, Fish and Wildlife will keep federal restrictions in Wyoming, Hall said.

Wyoming Gov. Dave Freudenthal said Monday that the agency's threat "raises the interesting question of whether any (wolf) packs outside Yellowstone in Wyoming are even necessary."

Idaho Gov. C.L. "Butch" Otter told the Associated Press that he supports public hunting to kill all but the minimum 100 wolves and 10 wolf packs in his state once federal protection is lifted. "I'm going to bid for the first ticket to shoot a wolf," he told a rally of hunters Jan. 11 at the state Capitol.

Idaho's Fish and Game Commission last week approved seeking legislative authority to charge $26.50 for Idaho residents to hunt wolves.

A Faith-Based Fuel Initiative (NYT)

New York Times, January 30, 2007

In 1975, after the oil embargo, Congress approved the most successful energy-saving measure this country has ever seen: the Corporate Average Fuel Economy system, known as CAFE, which set minimum mileage standards for cars. Within 10 years, automobile efficiency had virtually doubled, to 27.5 miles per gallon in 1985 from just over 14 miles per gallon in 1976.

The mileage standards are still 27.5 m.p.g. Except for minor tweaks, Congress has refused to raise fuel efficiency requirements or close a gaping loophole that lets S.U.V.'s and pickups be measured by a more lenient standard.

Americans who heard President Bush's State of the Union address, including his pledge to reduce America's gasoline consumption, can be forgiven for thinking he was finally ready to change that. But all Mr. Bush really asked for was the authority to set mileage standards in a different way. Rather than requiring companies to meet an average fuel-efficiency standard, balancing gas savers against gas guzzlers, he would assign targets model by model, based on factors like size and weight.

As for what those new targets might be, Mr. Bush would leave it to his secretary of transportation to decide. And he asked the country to take it on faith that this new measurement system, combined with technological advances, would lead to annual mileage improvements of 4 percent a year.

DOJ_NMG_0124171

Our fear is that this program will take far too long to get going, if it gets going at all. Like Congress, the Transportation Department has been notoriously solicitous of the automobile industry.

But there's a way Congress can get moving. Senator Barack Obama plans to reintroduce a bill that would set a 4 percent annual increase in efficiency as a target, just what Mr. Bush says he wants. The bill would also give both the Transportation Department and the manufacturers considerable flexibility. But the department could not deviate from the target unless it could demonstrate that the costs outweighed the benefits.

Even that is too much wiggle room for lawmakers like Senator Dianne Feinstein and Representative Edward Markey. While allowing for administrative flexibility, they would require a firm fleetwide standard of 35 m.p.g. with no escape hatches. But given the long Congressional stalemate, the Obama bill could be an important first step. It commands some bipartisan support, and unlike Mr. Bush's approach, it promises real as opposed to hypothetical results.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexican Drug Suspects Plead Not Guilty (AP)

By Allison Hoffman, The Associated Press

AP, January 30, 2007

SAN DIEGO -- Four Mexican drug traffickers who were extradited to the U.S. this month pleaded not guilty Monday to an array of federal drug charges.

They include brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, top figures in the Arellano Felix drug cartel, based in Tijuana, Mexico. A court-appointed defender entered not guilty pleas on their behalf to charges of racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges stemming from a sweeping 2003 indictment that named 11 people.

The four men, who arrived in San Diego from Texas over the weekend, appeared before U.S. Magistrate Judge Barbara Lynn Major. The judge ordered all four held without bail pending a detention hearing Thursday.

They were among 15 extradited to Houston on Jan. 20 by the government of Mexican President Felipe Calderon, who has pledged to crack down on drug smuggling and violence. All 15 were jailed in Mexico but had not been tried in the U.S.

Mexican officials have said the Calderon government was willing to extradite the alleged drug lords because they continued to run their drug operations from prison in Mexico, not because of U.S. pressure.

Mexico refuses to extradite anyone who would face the death penalty, which is illegal in Mexico.

Ismael Higuera Guerrero is suspected of being responsible for collecting payments and moving large shipments of Colombian cocaine and marijuana from Mexico into the U.S., as well as directing kidnapping, torture and murder of cartel enemies in Tijuana.

Gilberto Higuera Guerrero is suspected of having similar responsibilities in Mexicali, Mexico.

A third Arellano Felix cartel member, Jose Albert Marquez, also pleaded not guilty. He was charged in 2002 with participating in a conspiracy to import and distribute marijuana and cocaine.

Hector Palma Salazar, a suspected former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, pleaded not guilty to conspiring to distribute large quantities of cocaine stemming from a 1995 indictment.

Palma has denied any ties to drug trafficking, saying he works as a rancher.

The Sinaloa cartel, based in the Mexican state of Sinaloa, formed after the powerful narcotics trafficking organization of Miguel Angel Felix Gallardo, the so-called godfather of Mexican drug smuggling, split in two after his arrest in 1989. Felix Gallardo's nephews formed the rival Arellano Felix cartel.

Two suspected kingpins of the Arellano Felix cartel, Francisco Javier Arellano Felix and Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, have been in federal custody in San Diego since August, when they were captured in a U.S. raid aboard a sport-fishing boat off La Paz, Mexico.

They have pleaded not guilty to running a criminal enterprise, racketeering, and conspiracy to commit racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering. Both are eligible for the death penalty if they are found guilty of the crimes outlined in a December indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0124172

Suspected Mexican Drug Cartel Figures Arraigned In S.D. (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 29, 2007

SAN DIEGO – Four men suspected of occupying high-level positions within Mexican drug cartels pleaded not guilty to a variety of charges in federal court Monday afternoon.

The men were among 15 people extradited by Mexican authorities a week and a half ago.

They included two brothers, Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, accused of running day-to-day operations for the Arellano Felix cartel in Tijuana and Mexicali.

Prosecutors said they oversaw the importation of tons of cocaine and marijuana from Mexico into the United States and used kidnapping, torture and murder to further the cartel's interests.

Also in court was Jesus Hector Palma Salazar, who authorities say left the Arellano cartel and went on to lead the rival Sinaloa drug cartel. He was indicted in San Diego in 1995 on charges of conspiring to import and distribute a ton of cocaine.

The fourth man in court was Jose Albert Marquez, indicted in 2002 on drug charges, but also suspected of being the Arellano Felix cartel's link to the Mexican Mafia prison gang.

Authorities say he oversaw drug dealing and extortion by street gangs controlled by the prison gang.

Prosecutors said all four men might flee if allowed out on bail, which could pose a danger to the community. U.S. Magistrate Judge Barbara Major said she would consider bail on Thursday.

Alleged Juárez Drug Ring Members Extradited (EPT)

El Paso Times, January 29, 2007

A man identified as a "gatekeeper" for the Juárez cartel and two other alleged members of the drug ring are among the drug lords extradited last weekend by Mexico to face charges in the United States, U.S. officials said.

Mexico extradited 15 men, including Osiel Cardenas Guillen, the kingpin of the Gulf cartel, to Ellington Air Force Base in Houston on the night of Jan. 19 to Jan. 20. U.S. officials said Mexican authorities hoped the move would disturb drug smuggling operations that some of the men had continued to direct from behind bars in Mexico.

Drug Enforcement Administration head Karen Tandy said during a press conference this week that the group included Gracielo Gardea Carrasco, "a gatekeeper who was responsible for controlling drug smuggling across the border for the Juárez cartel."

The suspected drug offenders will be transferred to the states where charges against them were originally filed.

Gardea was indicted in Midland in 2000 on drug conspiracy charges for allegedly smuggling marijuana from Mexico to a Midland gang known as "Los Tres de la Sierra," or the three from the mountain.

The other men with Juárez connections are as follows.

-Miguel Angel Arriola Marquez, an alleged lieutenant for the Juárez cartel and the Federation, an alliance between Sinaloa cartels and the Juárez cartel. Arriola will face charges in Colorado of conspiracy to import cocaine and to launder millions of dollars in drug money.

-Saul Saucedo, an alleged mid-level lieutenant with the the Juárez cartel and the Federation, also wanted in Colorado for similar charges as Arriola.

Gardea operated from a small town across the border from Radford, Texas. His indictment said that he was "primarily responsible for organizing and managing the importation and distribution of marijuana from Ojinaga, Chihuahua, Mexico and Chihuahua City, Chihuahua, Mexico, to the Western District of Texas."

It also alleges that on May 14, 1998, Gardea called a man named Rigorberto Loera Carrillo on the phone to lure him to Mexico "so that (he) could be murdered." The most famous of the extradited bunch is Osiel Cardenas, famous for his trademark gold-plated .45 and for creating Los Zetas, a gang of enforcers that spread terror in Nuevo Laredo in recent years. Cardenas was allegedly heading the Gulf Cartel from a Mexican prison cell for the past four years, Tandy said.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said that won't happen in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0124173

"We have a long record of not having those kinds of problems occur within the Federal Bureau of Prisons, and it can include everything from monitoring all telephone calls and letter and visits and whatever is necessary in order to ensure that there is no criminal activity going on while they're confined," he said. v Mexico only extradites to the United States fugitives who would not face the death penalty, which is illegal in Mexico. A record 63 were sent to the United States in 2006 alone.

The Associated Press contributed to this story.

7 Puerto Rican Doctors Indicted In Alleged Internet Pharmacy Scheme (AP)

AP, January 30, 2007

Seven doctors have been indicted in this U.S. Caribbean territory in connection with an Internet scheme that allegedly dispensed controlled substances without a legitimate medical purpose, federal authorities said Monday.

The physicians were accused of working with Internet pharmacies that solicited customers seeking drugs such as the addictive painkiller hydrocodone and appetite suppressant phentermine, according to a statement from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Charges against them include conspiracy to distribute controlled substances, wire fraud and money laundering. The alleged scheme started in 2003.

If convicted, the accused doctors each face up to 20 years in prison and maximum fines of US$6.4 million (euro4.9 million), the DEA said.

Sentencing Set For 3-state Drug Ring (GCNG)

Grayson County News Gazette, January 29, 2007

OWENSBORO - Sentencing has been set for April in Owensboro federal court for members of a drug ring that delivered and sold marijuana and methamphetamine in Texas, Kentucky and Indiana totaling over $2.7 million.

David L. Huber, United States Attorney for the Western District of Kentucky, reports that Walter Willis, 56, of Evansville, Indiana, Willie Guillermo, Estrada, 52, of Mission, Tex., and Fidel Villasenor, 48, of Muskegon, Mich,, were found guilty on January 24, by a federal jury in United States District Court, Owensboro, of conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute marijuana.

Villasenor was also found guilty of conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute methamphetamine. Haralia Lofts, 49, of Palmview, Tex., pled guilty, after three days of trial, to conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute marijuana.

David Frederick, 47, of Robards, Ky., John Little, 60, of Owensboro, Kermit Shrull, 48, of Robards, and Jose Martin Perez-Espinoza, 43, of Houston, Tex., all co-defendants in this case, pled guilty before trial to the charges against them.

The jury's verdict of guilty was returned following a 6-day jury trial before Joseph H. McKinley, Jr., Judge, United States District Court.

The case was initiated when Louisville Drug Enforce-ment Administration (DEA) agents received information from the San Antonio, Tex. DEA office that drug traffickers in Texas were transporting loads of marijuana to an individual residing in Owensboro.

Recorded telephone conversations among and between the various conspirators obtained through a court approved wiretap confirmed the drug trafficking activity between South Texas and Western Kentucky.

Over 1,100 pounds of marijuana was transported from February 2003 through April 2005. The conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine involved over 3 pounds. The street value of the marijuana was approximately $2,6 million , and the street value of the methamphetamine was approximately $136,000

Evidence at trial showed that during the time period of February 3, 2003 through April 11, 2005, large quantities of marijuana were being transported from South Texas into Robards for distribution in both western Kentucky and southern Indiana.

Estrada was one of the sources of supply of the marijuana that was being transported to Robards.

The marijuana loads were transported up to Robards by women couriers.

Villasenor was also a source of supply of both marijuana and methamphetamine who had agreed to deliver 115 pounds of marijuana and 2 pounds of methamphetamine to Kentucky.

DOJ_NMG_0124174

However, Villasenor was unable to deliver the drugs, largely in part because the Kentucky co-conspirators had been detained by DEA Agents.

The evidence also showed that the loads of marijuana were delivered and stored at a residence located at 7313 Swann Lane, Robards for later distribution.

Upon the marijuana loads being received at the Robards residence, they would then be broken down into pound quantities by other co-conspirators who would then store them in a freezer.

These pound quantities of marijuana would then be picked up by another co-conspirator who would deliver them to local distributors.

One of the biggest distributors of the marijuana was Willis, who sold the marijuana in and around Evansville.

Willis also facilitated the payment of marijuana shipments by allowing vehicles to be traded for marijuana. Willis was able to do this because he owned a car lot, Mayhugh's Auto Sales, located in Evansville.

The maximum potential penalties for Willis and Estrada are 40 years imprisonment, a $2 million fine, and supervised release for a period of at least four years.

The maximum potential penalties for Villasenor are life imprisonment, an $8 million fine, and supervised release for a period of at least five years.

The case was prosecuted by Assistant United States Attorneys Daniel P. Kinnicutt and Laura Hall, and was investigated by the Drug Enforcement Administration.

All three defendants are scheduled to be sentenced before Judge Joseph H. McKinley, Jr. on April 19, 2007.

Large Tunnels On U.S.-Mexico Border Remain Unfilled (LAT)

By Richard Marosi

The Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

SAN DIEGO — Seven of the largest tunnels discovered under the U.S.-Mexico border in recent years have yet to be filled in, authorities said, raising concerns they could be reused for smuggling people or drugs.

Among them is the longest tunnel yet found — extending nearly half a mile from San Diego to Tijuana. Nearby, another sophisticated passage once known as the Taj Mahal of tunnels has been sitting unfilled for 13 years, authorities say.

Though concrete plugs usually close off the tunnels where they cross under the border and at main entrance and exit points, the areas in between remain largely intact. Filling the seven tunnels would cost about $2.7 million, according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials. Accessing tunnels that run under private property is also a problem, as is a lack of coordination with Mexican authorities.

Mexican authorities have told their U.S. counterparts that they've filled their end of the tunnels. But U.S. officials express doubt, citing the high costs and examples of tunnels being compromised. The Mexican attorney general's office, which handles organized crime, did not respond to numerous requests for interviews.

In recent years nearly 50 tunnels have been discovered running under the border from San Diego to Arizona. Most are small, crudely constructed passages — called gopher holes — that are easily destroyed.But filling the larger, more elaborate tunnels requires enormous amounts of material and expertise, especially because some were probably designed by mining engineers.

To prevent break-ins, authorities say they install motion sensors, which alert them to incursions.

But smugglers in some cases have been able to access existing tunnels by digging around the plugged entrance points, and then proceed undetected, according to the U.S. Border Patrol and Immigration and Customs Enforcement, which heads the San Diego-based U.S. Border Tunnel Task Force.

In Nogales, Ariz., traffickers have used one tunnel three times over a four-year span. Tijuana smugglers were suspected of reusing a tunnel in 2004, one year after its discovery inside a house in Mexico. U.S. authorities have had to reinspect several other tunnels in response to suspicious activity or tips.

Because of overlapping jurisdictions among federal border agencies, the responsibility for subterranean work was unclear for years. The Border Patrol and the Drug Enforcement Administration each had some responsibility.

DOJ_NMG_0124175

After the Department of Homeland Security was created in 2003, the responsibility for filling tunnels was assigned to one agency: Customs and Border Protection.

Authorities cite this streamlining as progress. But Customs and Border Protection has not filled any tunnels, and has capped only two since assuming control. Michael Friel, a spokesman, said the agency is trying to find money in its budget to complete the work. The 2007 budget for Customs and Border Protection is $7.8 billion.

Critics say the existence of so many unfilled tunnels poses a needless — and inexcusable — national security risk. "I was shocked to learn that these tunnels haven't been filled in. They should be," U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said in a statement. "The department should move, find money, and do it. This is a huge department with a huge budget. And if they don't have the money, they should tell us, and we will seek to get it in the emergency supplemental."

Among the unfilled passages:

The so-called Grande Tunnel connecting warehouses in San Diego and Tijuana. Nearly half a mile long, the tunnel was discovered in January 2006 and attracted global media attention as well as groups of local and national politicians, who were given tours of its cave-like depths. The tunnel prompted Feinstein to propose legislation outlawing the construction of tunnels under the border.

The 1,400-foot tunnel called the "Taj Mahal" because of its lighting system and reinforced concrete walls. The tunnel was discovered in 1993. Five years later, authorities suspected the passage had been reentered after 33 illegal immigrants were found covered in mud near the opening. A metal lid over the tunnel opening had been cut. Border Patrol agents say they never determined for sure if the passage was reused.

Two long tunnels leading from Mexicali, Mexico, to a quiet residential area in Calexico, Calif. One of them, discovered in 2005, was equipped with a ventilation system, phone line and video surveillance equipment.

It isn't cost alone that can keep tunnels unfilled. Owners of private property also can slow the process. In 2002, after a tunnel was discovered running under part of his property in eastern San Diego County, David Field, a San Diego building inspector, feuded with the DEA over how to fill the quarter-mile-long passage. The DEA wanted to use a concrete-soil mix. Field, for environmental reasons, said he wanted the portion under his land filled only with dirt.

The tunnel featured a battery-operated cart on rails and was used to ferry what may have been tons of drugs over a 10-year period, according to authorities.

In 2002, the DEA sent Field a letter saying that drug traffickers would probably reuse the tunnel if it wasn't completely closed off and threatened to seize Field's property if the tunnel was compromised. Field said the letter surprised him because he knew the agency had never filled the Taj Mahal tunnel found in 1993.

"I said that tunnel is still open.... So how could this be a national emergency?" Field said.

Authorities say they have had to check the tunnel twice to investigate tips that it had been reopened, but have found no evidence.

Smugglers can be determined about reclaiming their tunnels. Take the case of the little light-blue house in Nogales. The vacant building with barred windows is at 438 W. International St., right across the street from the border, where a 20-foot fence provides a formidable above-ground barrier.

Several years ago, smugglers, starting from a drainage canal in Mexico, dug under the border fence, under International Street, and under the yard, to a front room in the house. Wooden slats and carpeting covered the opening, said Agent Mario Cano, a U.S. Border Patrol spokesman.

In December 2001, U.S. authorities discovered the 85-foot tunnel — equipped with a rail and cart system — and plugged it. But the smugglers soon dug around the cap at the border and found their way back to the tunnel, Cano said.

Diggers used about 15 feet of that tunnel, then branched off and burrowed an additional 40 feet. They surfaced near the house's driveway and covered the new opening with trash cans. In March 2002, that opening was discovered and sealed, Cano said.

Smugglers went to work again, this time using portions of the first and second tunnel before branching off to surface in another area of the yard, where they covered their latest opening with a tarp. That branch and its opening were discovered in October 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0124176

This month, authorities returned to the house again. This time, two illegal aliens were digging a new route, starting inside the home, Cano said. They had progressed only 15 feet, Cano said, but may have intended to link up again with one of the existing tunnels under the property.

None of the passages have been filled, Cano said, although he believes portions may have collapsed because of heavy rains. Even if the tunnels were filled, he said, the problem might not go away.

That's because smugglers have used the concrete fill to make support walls and ceilings for new tunnels, he said. The filled-in passages also act as road maps, guiding crews to new areas where they want to go below ground.

The tunnel diggers' determination has bedeviled U.S. authorities, who have teamed with structural and civil engineers and geologists to devise the best ways to close tunnels. They've experimented with a type of concrete that will cave in if smugglers use it for support.

The cost to close the unfilled tunnels ranges from $200,000 to $700,000.

But addressing the problem here solves only part of the problem because some tunnels extend hundreds of feet into Mexico, where U.S. authorities have no control. Though Mexican authorities promise to fill tunnels, it's hard to know if they've followed through, said Assistant Special Agent in Charge Frank Marwood, who heads the U.S. Tunnel Task Force.

Mexican authorities have occasionally permitted their U.S. counterparts to inspect tunnels for suspicious activity, including one time when a corpse was discovered on the Mexican side. But it's not routine. In 2004, smugglers in Tijuana are believed to have reused a tunnel that Mexican authorities said they had filled. The smugglers broke into a tunnel discovered a year earlier and formed a new tunnel heading toward a parking lot near the San Ysidro Port of Entry, U.S. authorities said.

The tunnel has since been filled in on the U.S. side, but the status of the Mexican side is unknown.

Corruption in Mexican border agencies complicates matters. Last year, two Mexican customs officers were arrested on suspicion of being involved in the construction of a tunnel near the San Ysidro Port of Entry. U.S. authorities also believe Mexico can't afford to fill tunnels. If so, the U.S. should provide assistance, some say. "It's a binational security breach, and I think the way to handle it is by a binational effort," Marwood said.

"If they're not filled in, [smugglers] just branch out at one end or another."

Supporters Of Medical Marijuana Want Changes To The Law (AP)

AP, January 29, 2007

HELENA, Mont. (AP) — The state's 2004 medical marijuana law needs to be changed to let patients grow more plants and posses more marijuana, a key supporter says.

The current law was approved by voters and allows those registered with the state to have one ounce of marijuana at a time, but that should be increased to 12 ounces, said Rep. Ron Erickson, D-Missoula.

He also told a House committee on Monday that the law needs to be changed to allow those registered with the state to have six "mature" marijuana plants, rather than just six plants. More young plants are needed to replace old ones that die, he argued.

Erickson's measure was supported by those behind the 2004 initiative that voters approved with 62 percent of the vote.

Paul Befumo said the six-plant, one-ounce limit has turned out to be an impractical combination for keeping a sick person stocked with enough marijuana.

"It's like being told you can have six tomato plants, but only one tomato at any given time," he said.

One opponent showed up, an anti-drug activist from New York, to say medicinal marijuana is supported by special interests who hope to eventually legalize the drug for everyone.

"Their agenda is simple — legalizing marijuana and using the medicalization of it to get to the end game," said Steve Steiner. "Is it really a medicine?"

The state says about 280 people have registered for the program.

Other changes proposed by Erickson include expanding the law to allow a sick person to designate a "transporter" to legally pick up marijuana for them, and allowing nurse practitioners and physician assistants to prescribe medical marijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0124177

Currently, a patient must be being diagnosed by a physician as having a “debilitating medical condition,” such as cancer, glaucoma, AIDS, severe muscle spasms or chronic pain.

Erickson carried a bill in the 2003 Legislature to legalize medical marijuana, but it was killed. Supporters then successfully took the issue to the voters the following year.

The House Judiciary Committee did not take immediate action on the bill.

———

Erickson’s bill is House Bill 311.

U.S. Marshal In Seattle Steps Down (AP)

AP, January 30, 2007

SEATTLE (AP) - Seattle-based U.S. Marshal Eric Robertson, who oversaw security at the new federal courthouse downtown and led efforts to round up fugitives and sex offenders in Western Washington, is resigning to become the administrator of a fire district.

His deputies worked with local authorities to help track down and arrest more than 3,000 suspects in 36 states and eight foreign countries during his five-year tenure. He also created a new unit to deal with threats to judges after Seattle police shot and killed a man who brandished a defused grenade in the courthouse lobby in June 2005.

His resignation, announced in an interview with The Associated Press on Monday, takes effect in March. His chief deputy at the Seattle U.S. marshal's office, 22-year veteran David Miller, is expected to be named his acting replacement until a new marshal is confirmed by the Senate.

"Our focus has really been on crimes of violence, weapons, sex offenders - go out, work with the locals and to find out who are the bad actors in their community," Robertson said.

In his new position, Robertson, 43, will oversee the creation of a fire district covering 65,000 people in Auburn, Algona and Pacific, northeast of Tacoma. The joint fire authority was established by voters last November. Robertson lives in eastern Pierce County and represented the area in the Legislature for two terms in the 1990s.

Among the accomplishments of his office, Robertson cites the 2003 arrest of Jesus C. Mezquia, who was later convicted in the rape and strangulation of rising punk rock star Mia Zapata, whose body was found in Seattle's Central Area in 1993. Marshals Service deputies from Seattle located Mezquia in the Florida Keys after DNA evidence linked him to the crime.

Along with former U.S. Attorney John McKay, who resigned earlier this month and took a job teaching law at Seattle University, Robertson also helped boost the presence of federal law enforcement in rapidly growing southwest Washington, much to the relief of local authorities there. He opened an office in Clark County - where federal prosecutors have made a point of going after felons found with weapons - and stationed a deputy there permanently.

"Eric and John were like a 500 percent improvement," Cowlitz County Sheriff Bill Mahoney said. "Back when I was a young deputy, more years ago than I care to remember, I got involved with one of these joint fugitive task forces, and had a lot of fun with it. When I got to be sheriff, I got to pestering the Marshal's Service to do it again. It wasn't until Eric Robertson came along that I was able to get anyone in Seattle to pay any attention.

"It's a huge help to us. It gets bad guys off the street."

In June 2004, the Pacific Northwest Fugitive Apprehension Task Force, sponsored by the Marshals Service, arrested 63 fugitives in one week in Cowlitz and Clark Counties. Last summer, task force members rounded up 48 in three days in Cowlitz County.

But perhaps his office's most complicated - and sensitive - task was setting up security for the 23-story federal courthouse downtown, which opened in 2004. His staff of about 100 is based in the building, and several court security officers were tested when a man with an inert grenade attempted to bypass security in the courthouse lobby.

The man, Perry L. Manley, 52, of Seattle, was upset about his court-ordered child-support obligations. Marshals urged the man to put down the grenade and called police, who shot him when he made a sudden move during a standoff.

DOJ_NMG_0124178

The response wasn't perfect, Robertson conceded at the time: Elevators continued to function during the crisis and some communications systems didn't work as planned. Following the shooting, his office reorganized its judicial security efforts into one unit, which also investigates threats against judges.

A Day Without Guns ... (NYT)

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Twenty years ago, the Florida Legislature cravenly decided to allow "law abiding" citizens to carry concealed weapons merely by declaring their preference for self-defense. Then last July, at the prodding of the gun lobby, the current crop of state lawmakers proved they could be even more corrupt and cowardly than their predecessors by deciding to make the list of gun-toting Floridians a secret.

Fortunately, a local newspaper has given residents of the state a final look at their representatives' gruesome handiwork.

When the law was first enacted, there were fewer than 25,000 licensed gun holders. Since then, the state roll has boomed to 410,000 and counting. As the veil descends on this dangerously macho part of the public record, enterprising articles in The Florida Sun-Sentinel are laying bare the fact that more than 1,400 people easily got gun licenses despite pleading guilty or no contest to felonies that included manslaughter, burglary and child molestation. In Broward County alone, gun licenses grew in 20 years to more than 35,000 from 25.

Sampling records just before the law took effect, the newspaper uncovered hundreds of tales of mayhem, official indifference and glaring loopholes in criminal justice protection. One man got a license after pleading no contest to manslaughter in fatally shooting his girlfriend in the head while she cooked him breakfast. Another applicant was licensed despite guilty pleas to grand theft and assault charges for holding a handgun against his roommate's head in an argument.

Those permitted to pack concealed weapons include 216 people with outstanding criminal warrants, 128 under domestic violence injunctions and 6 registered sex offenders.

The gun lobby, predictably enough, is blaming "bleeding-heart, criminal-coddling judges and prosecutors" for this grim state of affairs. The truth is that the National Rifle Association has succeeded too well in herding legislators to do its dangerous bidding. Lawmakers in 38 states have approved bills allowing citizens to carry concealed weapons.

As in some of those states, Florida's legislators take the position that it's no fun to have a gun if you can't use it. So they loosened the laws on self-defense to allow a civilian to stand and use deadly force "if he or she reasonably believes it is necessary." If lawmakers had any sense of shame, they would undo these lethal threats to their constituents.

IMMIGRATION:

Farm Groups Are Optimistic On Overhaul Of Immigration (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, January 30, 2007

A coalition of groups representing farm workers and employers says those it represents have the best opportunity in years to win congressional approval of legislation overhauling immigration rules for migrant workers, either as a stand-alone bill or part of a wider immigration bill.

Supporters of the changes say their optimism springs from the combination of Democrats controlling Congress and rising pressure on lawmakers representing agricultural districts to alleviate a farm laborer shortage as increasing momentum for the Agriculture Jobs Opportunity and Benefits Act (AgJOBS).

"The flow of workers is being constrained; labor enforcement is making that worse, so labor shortages are just getting worse," said Craig Regelbrugge of the Agriculture Coalition for Immigration Reform, whose members include apple- and orange-growers, milk producers and nursery associations.

Groups representing apple-growers and wineries in New York, for example, expressed disappointment when several New York House GOP sponsors of AgJOBS voted for a 2005 enforcement-only bill authored by former House Judiciary Chairman

DOJ_NMG_0124179

James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) that included criminal penalties for those who help workers who enter the country illegally, but no temporary-worker program.

The president of the New York Apple Association, Jim Allen, said members of farm groups in his state were "shocked" when Rep. Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.), a longtime supporter of New York agriculture, signed a letter with Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) that called for tighter border-enforcement measures.

"It's accurate that they weren't happy with the vote," said an aide to Kuhl, who, after hearing criticism of his vote for the Sensenbrenner bill, pressed GOP House leaders in October to pass legislation creating a stand-alone temporary-worker program for agriculture. On Jan. 11, Kuhl made the same request of Democratic leaders.

One agriculture lobbyist credited Kuhl's successful reelection bid to support from farmers in favor of the temporary-worker program. AgJOBS sponsors and New York House Republicans James Walsh and Tom Reynolds also faced some criticism for voting for the 2005 bill. All three won bids for reelection in tight races last fall.

Regelbrugge sees two possible scenarios for AgJOBS this year. The bill could become part of a wider immigration overhaul, similar to what happened when Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) added the bill in an amendment to immigration legislation passed by the Senate last year. Besides Feinstein, sponsors included Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), Larry Craig (R-Idaho) and Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), and Reps. Howard Berman (D-Calif.) and Adam Putnam (R-Fla.).

If efforts to craft a wider immigration package fail, Regelbrugge said a scaled-down package for agriculture might still be able to move through Congress given support for the bill from farm employers and workers. While organized labor has been divided on the issue of temporary-worker programs, United Farm Workers has endorsed AgJOBS, giving the legislation crucial support from the farm labor group organized by César Chávez.

The key to passage, supporters said, is whether enough members are willing to approve legislation that does not require farm laborers who have entered the U.S. illegally to return to their home countries first. For example, House Agriculture Committee Ranking Member Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) supports creating a guest-worker program, but opposes AgJOBS, saying it grants amnesty to aliens who entered the U.S. illegally.

Farm groups counter that the path to legal status is conditional. AgJOBS would provide a "blue card" to undocumented farm laborers already in the U.S., but only if they pay a $500 fine and provide proof that they have worked in American agriculture for at least 150 workdays over the last two years. Blue-card holders could apply for a green card to get permanent legal status, but only if they continue to work in agriculture for several years. The bill would also change rules on the current program that allows farm workers to enter the country on an H-2A visa.

Supporters also argue it is increasingly difficult to find farm workers, which will increase pressure on members such as Goodlatte, who has apple-producers in his district, to approve a temporary-worker program. According to statistics from the U.S. Department of Agriculture released in October, the number of hired farm laborers fell 5 percent from the previous year while farm wages increased by 4 percent. The average farm laborer wage could rise above $10 an hour when final statistics for 2006 are calculated, according to an economist with the American Farm Bureau Federation, Stefphanie Gambrell.

Some lobbyists say Goodlatte perhaps could be convinced to support the bill, although a spokeswoman said the bill would have to be monumentally changed to earn Goodlatte's support. They are more optimistic about winning support from Blue Dog Democrats such as Reps. Lincoln Davis (D-Tenn.) and Marion Berry (D-Ark.), who both voted for the 2005 bill.

Farm groups themselves are divided on AgJOBS, as the American Farm Bureau Federation (AFBF) has not endorsed the legislation because of opposition to a provision intended to raise wages for farm laborers. AFBF supported an amendment sponsored by Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) to the immigration bill last year that would have nullified this provision, and AFBF Director of Congressional Affairs Austin Perez said the group would seek to amend the bill again this year.

AFBF is supportive of a guest-worker program, however, and AFBF President Bob Stallman at the group's annual meeting in January said the chances for agriculture reform have improved with Democrats in control of the House.

TAX:

U.S. To Pay S.A. Lawyers $1.34 Million (SAEN)

By Maro Robbins, Express-News

San Antonio Express-News, January 30, 2007

Already stung by its failure to convict a defense lawyer despite years of investigation, the federal government has agreed to pay the San Antonio attorney $1.34 million to settle claims that revenue agents maliciously targeted him.

The settlement finalized last week effectively ends more than six years of legal feuding, which began when Alan Brown's office manager fell for a cocaine smuggler and, in an effort to win her lover leniency, told federal agents that Brown routinely cheated on his taxes.

The government did not admit to any fault in its part of the compromise, but Brown counted the agreement among the multiple legal victories he and his lawyers won en route to his 2005 acquittal on tax-evasion charges.

The 63-year-old attorney said he considered himself lucky to squeeze any compensation from the government, but he described the sum as a small measure of justice compared with the financial and emotional costs of the prosecution.

"I had to mortgage my house. I had to go into deep debt," he said. "For what they did and how long it went on and how bad it was, it's not much."

According to the terms of the deal, Brown will split the money with his wife, lawyer Jean Brown, who also was indicted before the government dropped the charges, and his firm, including partner Jay Norton.

Claiming investigators distorted evidence and relentlessly targeted them, the lawyers' lawsuit had forced the government to disclose more than it typically reveals about prosecutions.

Brown's lawyers said agents this summer produced 150 boxes of documents that had been assembled during the case.

Especially striking was the time investigators from the Internal Revenue Service devoted to the case, said Jason Collins one of the lawyers from the Austin-based firm that represented the Browns.

The agents' records indicated they spent about 10,000 hours — more than a year — examining the Browns between 1999 and 2003 when the couple was indicted, he said.

"They talked to their hairdressers, they talked to their pharmacists, they talked to every family member, including I think Alan's parents," Collins said.

"They had an entire library of documents on this family that was put together over years and years of investigation, spending who knows how much of the federal government's money."

Of all those documents, a single report written by IRS Special Agent James Maxwell proved pivotal and damning in Brown's eyes.

Drafted after a federal judge decided agents lacked the probable cause to justify their search of Brown's law office, the report indicated Maxwell not only was unrepentant, he and others began investigating whether the judge, Orlando Garcia, had any links to Brown.

Maxwell said his office would defer any statements to the Justice Department, which in this case was represented by the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles.

Julie Zatz, assistant chief of the civil division there, declined to detail the reasons for settling the case but said they had nothing to do with allegations of investigative misconduct.

"Was this case settled because of anything the agents did during the investigation?" she said. "The answer is no."

Jean Brown said she and her husband had lost the energy to fight and agreed to abandon their lawsuit because they wanted to close an ugly chapter of their lives.

She said she hoped the settlement might help curb investigative overzealousness, even though it represented a tiny amount by the government's standards.

Compared with the family's debts, it wasn't much either, she added. Early retirement is not an option.

"Will I be in the office next week?" she said. "Yes, sir."

The 'Tax Gap' Myth (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124181

When something sounds too good to be true, it usually is. So now is an apt time to deconstruct the much-discussed "tax gap," that mythical golden goose that the Beltway political class is counting on to fund its spending agenda.

The "tax gap" is the difference between what the Internal Revenue Service thinks taxpayers should be paying and what it collects. The IRS currently estimates this at about $290 billion a year. Ask any Congressional chairman how he intends to close the deficit, expand the Medicare drug benefit, reform the Alternative Minimum Tax or subsidize college education, and the answer is invariably "close the tax gap."

Last year the Senate held some half-dozen hearings in search of this pot of gold. Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus has put out a monthly newsletter on the issue, and last year he blocked a Treasury nominee until the agency had developed a tax-gap fix. Mr. Baucus and his GOP sidekick, Charles Grassley, have ordered up a tax-gap report from the Joint Tax Committee, and they vow to make closing the gap a priority. We suppose politicians are allowed to dream. But it's worth recalling that Washington has searched for this revenue Atlantis for decades without success.

To put the tax gap in perspective, consider that the IRS took in tax receipts in fiscal 2005 of more than $2.2 trillion and that the overall U.S. tax compliance rate is about 85%. This isn't perfect, but it also isn't Italy. It's especially good considering the U.S. tax system is based on voluntary compliance. Nina Olson, the IRS's taxpayer advocate, told Congress last year that IRS auditors have found that an estimated 94% of noncompliance is the result of honest mistakes by tax filers who simply don't understand the 17,000-page beast of a tax code.

One obvious answer would be to simplify the code (more on that later). But this requires political will, so Congress naturally prefers the easier route of ratcheting up taxpayer regulation and enforcement. One popular solution is to increase dramatically the information taxpayers must report to the IRS.

Some potential illustrations: Brokers would have to report securities sales information to the IRS, the better to monitor capital gains. Individuals who participate in online auctions such as eBay would have to file a tax form about their transactions. Americans would be required to file expanded mortgage interest forms, while mortgage lenders would have to report loan information. State and local governments would have to provide their tax data to Washington, the better to double-check deductions.

Our personal favorite would require that Americans withhold taxes from any cash payments they make to such individual contractors as babysitters, gardeners or plumbers. They'll love that one in the suburbs. Implicit in all these new plans is a much bigger IRS staff to monitor and chase tax miscreants.

Here's another bad idea: Many doctors and lawyers who are incorporated under subchapter S will often pay themselves lower wages but higher dividends, in order to reduce self-employment taxes. The law is vague on the limits of this practice, and it is undoubtedly abused. But the Joint Tax Committee's preferred solution is to make all professional income -- even dividend payments -- subject to self-employment taxes; this is nothing more than a backdoor tax hike.

All voluntary tax compliance systems have their limits. Under today's tax code, the only way the feds can raise compliance is to place extraordinary burdens on taxpayers. Most of those financial and social costs also end up being borne by those who already dutifully pay their taxes, in the name of catching the few who evade the law. The tradeoff for higher tax collection is less liberty, as we learned only a decade ago when Congress held much-hyped hearings on abusive IRS tactics and audits.

There is a better way. The more complicated a tax system, the more likely taxpayers won't understand, or will try to dodge, the rules. Simple tax regimes, such as a single flat rate, encourage compliance and efficiency, not to mention economic growth. This has been the experience of many Eastern European countries after they imposed a flat tax, and the U.S. had similar jumps in reported tax income from "the rich" following the 1986 tax reform that cut rates and closed loopholes.

At least a few "tax-gap" critics in Washington are beginning to understand all this. Messrs. Baucus and Grassley have started pairing the "tax gap" problem with the need to eliminate or simplify the Alternative Minimum Tax -- which is hitting more and more Americans. House Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel has also said that fixing the AMT might require "a look at the whole tax code." Could it be that even Washington is beginning to understand that fixing the tax mess means starting over?

URL for this article:

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB117012575705491976.html

Copyright 2007 Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All Rights Reserved

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. Distribution and use of this material are governed by our Subscriber Agreement and by copyright law. For non-personal use or to order multiple copies, please contact Dow Jones Reprints at 1-800-843-0008 or visit www.djreprints.com.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

U.S. Exporters Feel Favorable Trade Winds (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman And Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

EDEN PRAIRIE, Minn. -- Inside the factory, engineers tinkered with machines that test how well tires hug slick roads while others trained customers on running additional gear.

Only a few years ago, MTS Systems sold its testing equipment mainly to American automakers. No longer. The tire-testing machine was bound for South Korea. A road simulator was headed to a Formula One auto-racing team in Europe. The customers were visiting from Shanghai.

"We have been growing by exporting things to China," said Chip Emery, chief executive of MTS, headquartered here in the suburbs of Minneapolis. "It would be wonderful if all I had to do to survive was sell to Americans, but the earth is round. We survive as a worldwide business."

On Capitol Hill, some lawmakers portray Chinese imports as a threat to national prosperity, and Democratic leaders argue that free-trade pacts have sold out American workers; a hearing is scheduled in the House for today. Last year's election reflected anxiety about the strength of American companies in a global economy. But the nation's shop floors present an alternate view: The United States is in the midst of an export boom, with foreign sales chipping away at the country's enormous trade deficit while providing a modest cushion against the declining housing market.

In the first 11 months of 2006, U.S. exports reached $1.31 trillion, a jump of 13.1 percent over the corresponding period in 2005, the Commerce Department said. That was an improvement over the 10.7 percent gain of the year before.

Exports to China -- whose dominance on American store shelves stokes worry -- increased by 33 percent in the first 11 months of 2006. Combined with Hong Kong, China now stands as the United States' third-largest export market, behind only Canada and Mexico.

President Bush is scheduled to travel today to Peoria, Ill., to visit Caterpillar, the giant maker of construction equipment, as he presses Congress to approve new trade agreements. Caterpillar is one of the companies having notable success selling American-made gear abroad.

To be sure, the export surge is nowhere close to balancing the nation's trade. For the first 11 months of 2006, Americans imported $2 trillion worth of goods and services, or about 50 percent more than they exported, resulting in a trade deficit of about $700 billion. Once statistics for all of 2006 are released next month, they're expected to show that the nation shattered the all-time-record trade deficit of $717 billion, set in 2005. The high price of American oil imports accounts for part of the imbalance.

Still, recent monthly figures show exports growing nearly three times as fast as imports. Economists say exports are being propelled by a falling dollar, which has lost nearly 10 percent of its value compared with other currencies since 2002, making U.S. goods cheaper on world markets. Sales have also been fueled by renewed growth in once-stagnant economies in Japan, Europe and parts of Latin America, increasing demand for U.S. products such as engines, heavy equipment and telecommunications gear.

For the Bush administration, fending off Democratic accusations that it has harmed American workers by allowing jobs to shift overseas, the strong export data have become a prime talking point in its campaign to persuade Congress to approve trade pacts with Peru and Colombia. Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez noted that the countries with which the United States has struck trade agreements make up only seven percent of the global economy outside the United States, yet they absorb 42 percent of American exports.

"We are opening up more markets," Gutierrez said. "Our businesses are taking advantage."

John Frisbie, president of the U.S.-China Business Council, said the success of American firms in selling to China is the result of that country's entry to the World Trade Organization six years ago. "It totally changed U.S. companies' ability to reach that market," he said.

China's industrialization has been so swift and its demand for products so intense that it has sparked sales of American-made goods all over the world. Caterpillar racked up exports of $9 billion in 2005, with particularly strong sales to China. American factories churn out oil-drilling gear bound for the Middle East, with much of the resulting crude landing in China. Mining equipment is shipped to India and Australia to extract iron ore bound for smelters in Japan and Korea, with the resulting steel headed to China to be turned into automobiles and skyscrapers.

But even as exports have improved profits for American companies, they have not meant more jobs for American factory workers. In 2006, the United States had 14.2 million manufacturing jobs, according to the Labor Department, roughly the same number as in 2004. American firms have managed to squeeze more goods out of their plants with the same number of workers.

"Growth in output has not been fast enough to require manufacturers to expand the workforce," said David Huether, chief economist at the National Association of Manufacturers in Washington.

Still, some areas of manufacturing have seen sharp job growth, among them computer and electronic products, whose factories added 128,000 production jobs from 2004 to 2006, according to the Labor Department. Fabricated metal products -- which includes everything from sheet metal to silverware -- added 72,000 production jobs over that period, and machinery added 69,000. The automobile industry shed more than 57,000 production jobs, and apparel lost 39,000.

Many economists say the export boom can be sustained because of the vibrancy of the world economy. The World Bank estimates that global output grew at a rapid 5.1 percent last year and that it will grow 4.5 percent this year. Several developing economies, including China's, are expected to grow twice as fast.

But these economists add that exports are not likely to dent the trade deficit significantly, because much of the gear being sold by U.S. firms is used to make products that are then shipped into the United States.

An MTS factory in Oak Ridge, Tenn., makes testing gear for tiny components used by U.S. semiconductor factories that sell products to Asia. In China, workers slot these U.S.-made chips into computers and cellphones that are exported to the United States. China buys about one-third of the U.S. cotton crop, folding it into the production of clothing that lands on shelves from Wal-Mart to Saks Fifth Avenue.

"The only way the trade deficit is going to go away is if Americans become penny-pinching savers," said Catherine L. Mann, a Brandeis University economist and a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington. "How likely do you think that is?"

Given that exports make up a much smaller portion of the U.S. economy than consumption of goods and services -- about 11 percent vs. about 70 percent -- foreign sales will not be big enough to take up the slack if Americans seriously curtail spending because of the housing downturn, said Brad Setser, an economist at Roubini Global Economics in New York.

Still, the slight improvement in the U.S. balance of trade helped the economy grow faster than 3 percent annually over the last three months of the year, up from a 2 percent pace in the previous quarter, according to many estimates.

"Foreigners buying our goods are keeping our factories humming," said Diane Swonk, chief economist at Mesirow Financial Holdings.

Eden Prairie, a grid of glass-fronted office parks spread across former cornfields west of Minneapolis, typifies the ways many American communities have been remade by the advent of a globalized economy. A quarter of a century ago, blue-collar laborers wielded wrenches and welding torches, fabricating pumps, hoses, and pipes. In the late 1980s, they still made computers and electronic parts here, along with the metal nameplates that adorned cars.

Nearly all of that is gone now, the lower-skilled, labor-intensive work having shifted mostly to Asia. The past two decades have seen the arrival of retail shops and chain restaurants to serve the residents of new condominium developments. Surviving manufacturers have gone high-tech, supplemented by dozens of new entrants: firms specializing in medical technology, electronic commerce, software and telecommunications equipment. The town of 60,000 people -- nearly 10 times its population in 1970 -- boasts 50,000 full-time jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0124184

"There's an international wage rate for turning a screwdriver, and we're never going to be able to compete in that market," said Scott H. Neal, the city manager. "But the high-technology, high-intellectual-capital, design-and-testing work is going to be done here."

Over the past two years, MTS, one of the world's largest makers of testing equipment, has added about 100 workers in Eden Prairie, bringing its local workforce to 900 and its worldwide force to 1,600. About half the new hires are engineers focused on researching and developing new products, work done entirely in Minnesota. Last year, MTS recorded sales of almost $400 million, up from $248 million a decade ago. Exports have climbed from 44 percent of all sales in 2000 to about 60 percent today. Without that jump, the company would have spiraled down with the U.S. auto industry: Twenty years ago, sales to the Big Three automakers made up 40 percent of MTS's revenue, and as recently as 2000, those accounts were worth $30 million a year, said Emery, the chief executive. By 2002, U.S. automakers' purchases of MTS gear had fallen to about $3 million.

"They have just disappeared as customers," Emery said.

Which explains why MTS is beefing up its sales force in China and why Jeffrey P. Nelson, who heads an MTS design team focused on automotive products, goes there about every six weeks.

As MTS increases its sales, it is expanding business for local firms that supply materials, such as Micro Dynamics, which makes circuit boards. It is leaning more heavily on freight companies, including the logistics firm C.H. Robinson Worldwide, whose global headquarters is less than a mile away.

It arranges shipping for exporters and importers from Beijing to Buenos Aires to Boston, employing 1,200 people in Eden Prairie and more than 6,700 worldwide -- better than double its workforce of five years ago.

The company has set up more than 70 offices overseas, and it envisions further expansion. But the 300 technicians who oversee the system that tracks its shipments are here.

"Minnesota is now part of a global economy like everybody else," said the company's chief executive, John P. Wiehoff. "As long as Robinson is headquartered in Minnesota, growth in other parts of the world will generate jobs here."

Henderson reported from Washington.

Bush Directive Increases Sway On Regulation (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — President Bush has signed a directive that gives the White House much greater control over the rules and policy statements that the government develops to protect public health, safety, the environment, civil rights and privacy.

In an executive order published last week in the Federal Register, Mr. Bush said that each agency must have a regulatory policy office run by a political appointee, to supervise the development of rules and documents providing guidance to regulated industries. The White House will thus have a gatekeeper in each agency to analyze the costs and the benefits of new rules and to make sure the agencies carry out the president's priorities.

This strengthens the hand of the White House in shaping rules that have, in the past, often been generated by civil servants and scientific experts. It suggests that the administration still has ways to exert its power after the takeover of Congress by the Democrats.

The White House said the executive order was not meant to rein in any one agency. But business executives and consumer advocates said the administration was particularly concerned about rules and guidance issued by the Environmental Protection Agency and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

In an interview on Monday, Jeffrey A. Rosen, general counsel at the White House Office of Management and Budget, said, "This is a classic good-government measure that will make federal agencies more open and accountable."

Business groups welcomed the executive order, saying it had the potential to reduce what they saw as the burden of federal regulations. This burden is of great concern to many groups, including small businesses, that have given strong political and financial backing to Mr. Bush.

Consumer, labor and environmental groups denounced the executive order, saying it gave too much control to the White House and would hinder agencies' efforts to protect the public.

DOJ_NMG_0124185

Typically, agencies issue regulations under authority granted to them in laws enacted by Congress. In many cases, the statute does not say precisely what agencies should do, giving them considerable latitude in interpreting the law and developing regulations.

The directive issued by Mr. Bush says that, in deciding whether to issue regulations, federal agencies must identify "the specific market failure" or problem that justifies government intervention.

Besides placing political appointees in charge of rule making, Mr. Bush said agencies must give the White House an opportunity to review "any significant guidance documents" before they are issued.

The Office of Management and Budget already has an elaborate process for the review of proposed rules. But in recent years, many agencies have circumvented this process by issuing guidance documents, which explain how they will enforce federal laws and contractual requirements.

Peter L. Strauss, a professor at Columbia Law School, said the executive order "achieves a major increase in White House control over domestic government."

"Having lost control of Congress," Mr. Strauss said, "the president is doing what he can to increase his control of the executive branch."

Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California and chairman of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, said: "The executive order allows the political staff at the White House to dictate decisions on health and safety issues, even if the government's own impartial experts disagree. This is a terrible way to govern, but great news for special interests."

Business groups hailed the initiative.

"This is the most serious attempt by any chief executive to get control over the regulatory process, which spews out thousands of regulations a year," said William L. Kovacs, a vice president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. "Because of the executive order, regulations will be less onerous and more reasonable. Federal officials will have to pay more attention to the costs imposed on business, state and local governments, and society."

Under the executive order, each federal agency must estimate "the combined aggregate costs and benefits of all its regulations" each year. Until now, agencies often tallied the costs and the benefits of major rules one by one, without measuring the cumulative effects.

Gary D. Bass, executive director of O.M.B. Watch, a liberal-leaning consumer group that monitors the Office of Management and Budget, criticized Mr. Bush's order, saying, "It will result in more delay and more White House control over the day-to-day work of federal agencies."

"By requiring agencies to show a 'market failure,' " Dr. Bass said, "President Bush has created another hurdle for agencies to clear before they can issue rules protecting public health and safety."

Wesley P. Warren, program director at the Natural Resources Defense Council, who worked at the White House for seven years under President Bill Clinton, said, "The executive order is a backdoor attempt to prevent E.P.A. from being able to enforce environmental safeguards that keep cancer-causing chemicals and other pollutants out of the air and water."

Business groups have complained about the proliferation of guidance documents. David W. Beier, a senior vice president of Amgen, the biotechnology company, said Medicare officials had issued such documents "with little or no public input."

Hugh M. O'Neill, a vice president of the pharmaceutical company Sanofi-Aventis, said guidance documents sometimes undermined or negated the effects of formal regulations.

In theory, guidance documents do not have the force of law. But the White House said the documents needed closer scrutiny because they "can have coercive effects" and "can impose significant costs" on the public. Many guidance documents are made available to regulated industries but not to the public.

Paul R. Noe, who worked on regulatory policy at the White House from 2001 to 2006, said such aberrations would soon end. "In the past, guidance documents were often issued in the dark," Mr. Noe said. "The executive order will ensure they are issued in the sunshine, with more opportunity for public comment."

Under the new White House policy, any guidance document expected to have an economic effect of $100 million a year or more must be posted on the Internet, and agencies must invite public comment, except in emergencies in which the White House grants an exemption.

DOJ_NMG_0124186

The White House told agencies that in writing guidance documents, they could not impose new legal obligations on anyone and could not use "mandatory language such as 'shall,' 'must,' 'required' or 'requirement.' "

The executive order was issued as White House aides were preparing for a battle over the nomination of Susan E. Dudley to be administrator of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs at the Office of Management and Budget.

President Bush first nominated Ms. Dudley last August. The nomination died in the Senate, under a barrage of criticism from environmental and consumer groups, which said she had been hostile to government regulation. Mr. Bush nominated her again on Jan. 9.

With Democrats in control, the Senate appears unlikely to confirm Ms. Dudley. But under the Constitution, the president could appoint her while the Senate is in recess, allowing her to serve through next year.

Some of Ms. Dudley's views are reflected in the executive order. In a primer on regulation written in 2005, while she was at the Mercatus Center of George Mason University in Northern Virginia, Ms. Dudley said that government regulation was generally not warranted "in the absence of a significant market failure."

She did not return calls seeking comment on Monday.

Unworthy Of Consideration (USAT)

By Pete Stark

USA Today, January 30, 2007

President Bush is to be commended for finally recognizing the needs of 47 million Americans denied health care for lack of insurance. His proposal would do little to help them. In a few years it would raise taxes for 160 million workers who receive group health insurance benefits.

The president's plan would limit the tax deduction to $7,500 for an individual's health insurance premium. The high rate of medical inflation would soon cause an income tax increase for most Americans.

Employers would cancel group plans. Workers could buy individual policies, which have higher costs and more limited access than group plans do. The suggestion that employers would pass on the group insurance savings in higher wages does not pass the smirk test.

Granted, the Bush plan would make the tax code more equitable. But so would eliminating the mortgage interest deduction. Who is to say home equity adds more to life quality than adequate health care?

There are many offsetting inequities in the Bush plan:

•Tax deductions are regressive and provide much greater benefit to the wealthy than to the poor. In Bush's plan, a high-income person who is currently uninsured would receive nearly $6,000, while a low-income individual would receive $1,200.

•The individual insurance market discriminates against those who are sick or at risk of becoming so. Currently, employers cover both healthy and sick, spreading risk to reduce costs. Individuals, however, would be at the mercy of insurance companies that use family history, genetic indicators, age, occupation and illness as reasons to jack up rates — or exclude coverage altogether. Millions of Americans would therefore see their premiums increase substantially.

Much like Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, "gold-plated" health insurance is a figment of the president's imagination. The problem with our health system is not that Americans can afford to use too much health care; it's that too many can't afford any.

Bush's proposal would destroy the very system through which the vast majority of people get their coverage today and fail to replace it with an alternative means of obtaining quality care. It doesn't deserve Congress' consideration.

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., is chairman of the health subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Our View On Health Care: People Without Health Plans Can't Catch A (tax) Break (USAT)

USA Today, January 30, 2007

Bush proposal worth looking at, but Democrats just say, no.

Say you work for a company that doesn't provide health insurance. You have to pay for coverage out of pocket or risk going without. You get no tax deduction for the premiums.

DOJ_NMG_0124187

Now say you work for a company with a health plan. Your employer picks up most of the insurance tab. You aren't taxed on the value of this fringe benefit (worth an average of $11,500 a year for family coverage), and neither is your employer.

In other words, the tax code subsidizes employer-based health insurance while keeping the cost out of reach for millions of workers whose employers don't offer coverage.

During his State of the Union address last week, President Bush proposed a change to make the system more equitable and make health coverage more affordable for the uninsured. He would give people who buy their own policies tax breaks equal to those who get coverage through their jobs.

The concept isn't new. It's been endorsed for years by some economists on each side of the political spectrum. Yet the words barely passed Bush's lips before top congressional Democrats declared his proposal to be dead on arrival, not even worthy of hearings. Bush's plan is no magic cure to all that ails America's health care system. In fact, it falls far short of what's happening in some states. Massachusetts requires everyone to have insurance, and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has proposed something similar.

But the Bush plan still has merits worth considering. Under the plan:

Health insurance offered through jobs would become taxable income. Taxpayers would get a deduction of $15,000 for family (and $7,500 for individual coverage) regardless of whether they bought policies on their own or got them through work. To pay for this, the plan would increase taxes for the 20% of workers with higher-priced plans.

Between 3 million and 5 million of the nation's 47 million uninsured would be able to afford policies now out of reach, the administration estimates. A family of four with annual income of $60,000 that bought private insurance would get a $4,545 tax break in 2009.

The Democrats argue that the plan wouldn't do enough, and they have a point. More than half of the uninsured pay no federal income taxes, so a deduction wouldn't help them. A refundable tax credit would do more.

Another potential concern is that the Bush plan would expand the market for policies bought by individuals. As reported Monday by USA TODAY's Julie Appleby, those people are extremely vulnerable. People with pre-existing conditions often can't find affordable insurance. Some policyholders even have their policies retroactively cancelled if their bills are too high or if there was a discrepancy in their initial applications. Rules to prevent such abuses must accompany any change of the sort Bush is proposing.

Although Bush's idea also fails to address the many problems faced by people who have insurance, it is nevertheless an opportunity to address some core issues and break the gridlock in Washington. It has potential to provide greater equality, give people more ability to leave jobs they don't like, control costs and encourage more competition among insurers. Rejecting it without serious debate might score political points, but does nothing to help those who suffer from the inequities of the status quo.

Capital Sources: A Father's Call For Health-Care Reform (NSWK)

By Web Exclusive By Eve Conant

Newsweek, January 30, 2007

Jan. 29, 2007 - President Bush's State of the Union address may not have done much to improve his popularity. But it did succeed in jump-starting debate over one of the leading—and most contentiously lobbied issues—on his domestic agenda: health-care reform. In his speech, the president proposed offering tax subsidies to encourage more people to buy their own health insurance. The goal: to provide equal treatment to those who buy insurance on their own, and those who get it through their employers. Under the Bush plan, the administration estimates that 80 percent of workers with employer-based health plans would pay lower taxes—while 20 percent of those with more costly workplace plans (branded "gold-plated" by Bush) would see a tax hike, unless they decreased their coverage.

Democrats on Capitol Hill, along with labor unions and consumer groups, pilloried the Bush plan, arguing his proposal would do little to help America's nearly 47 million uninsured—and could wind up hastening the demise of employer-provided healthcare. (In his weekly radio address, Bush called the criticism "reflexive" partisanship and called on Congress to cooperate with him to find a solution.)

DOJ_NMG_0124188

But it wasn't just folks in Washington who were upset. Nathan J. Wilkes of Greenwood Village, Colo., was so worried about the possible effects of Bush's proposal on his ability to provide coverage for his chronically ill son that he decided to travel to the capital to make some noise. A computer network security expert who earns over $100,000, Wilkes works for a private firm outside of Denver which fits into the large-group insurance category and is allowed to shop around for different providers each year. But when his son Thomas, born with severe hemophilia, developed a resistance to treatment at age 1, Wilkes's claims soared; his company's insurance provider, Wilkes says, soon began hiking premiums 40 to 55 percent each year, and introduced a lifetime cap of $1 million for all employees and their families—including Thomas. Soon, Wilkes says, no other insurance companies would offer to cover the company. Worried he would no longer be able to provide coverage for his son, Wilkes turned to state and local groups for help. Physicians for a National Health Program took up his cause, and brought him to Washington, where he hoped to persuade Congress to reject the Bush plan in favor of universal health-care legislation. Wilkes spoke to NEWSWEEK's Eve Conant about his trip. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: You have a good income and your employer gives you and your family comprehensive health insurance. So why are you so worried about coverage that you've come to D.C. to lobby for universal coverage?

Nathan Wilkes: Why am I worried? My son will no longer be insured in a month's time. His claims have increased health-care costs for everyone I work with. My company is very socially responsible, but because of our high claims, no other insurance company will touch us. We're trapped with the same provider, which keeps raising prices and last year introduced a $1 million lifetime cap on coverage. Even if my son has no injuries, we'll hit that cap in the next one to three months. With hemophilia, the problem is internal bleeding. We know it's happening if he complains of pain, or stops using one of his arms or legs. Even if we treat him at home the cost for medicine can run up to $3,600 every few hours. Because of insurance limits we're often advised to delay treatment—to see if his injuries will clear up on their own—simply to avoid getting closer to the million-dollar mark. The aim of private insurance is to weed out high-cost patients like my son.

And what happens when you delay treatment?

Sometimes it works out fine. Other times he gets worse. Even at our most frantic we have to worry about the cap. We're told he may have permanent nerve and joint damage because of the times we've had to delay treatment. We do everything we can, but he's a 3-year-old, he wants to walk around and try to jump off the couch.

Did you watch the State of the Union? What do you think of Bush's health proposals?

His strategy is to manipulate the tax code to make it appear as if you're insuring more people, when in fact, you're not addressing the real problems of the private insurance system: cost, access and the underinsured. Continuing with private insurance just feeds the monster. This won't bring down the cost of drugs or reduce the overhead and profits taken in by the insurance companies. It only serves to free up more money in the consumer market to feed back into a broken system.

What will you do when your son's insurance runs out?

The race has started; it's like an hourglass with a finite amount of sand. We have to think of something else, but all our options would give us only a year at most. I'm told I can quit my job and try to join a larger company so my son's chronic illness won't be noticeable to their insurance company. But that might only buy a little bit of time. My wife could try to get a job, but that would mean the cost of putting three children in day care, including one who is ill and needs intensive supervision. I can't get on Medicare or Medicaid because I make too much money. I've also been advised to divorce my wife, so that she and the kids might qualify. But that creates another set of bureaucratic problems. The best option is Colorado's high-risk pool insurance (individual insurance for the uninsurable), but that also has a $1 million cap. That could last us a year, or, if my son has any bleeding in his head, could last a few days. One of my last options is to lobby for universal health care; I think I'm a decent example of what is wrong with private insurance in the U.S.

You're one of those people with what Bush described as a "gold-plated" insurance policy, right?

I find that a pretty offensive term. Calling what I have gold-plated is just a way to shift attention away from real problems. My employer has done [its] best, so that we have minimum or no copay. But over the years, they've been forced to shift more of the burden on my co-workers and me. Gold-plated just means more attention on preventive care, which avoids the really costly problem of people only getting treatment in the emergency room. I've been insured my whole life, but we're going to lose it because private insurance is about making profits, not keeping people healthy.

DOJ_NMG_0124189

There's a lot of political momentum on health coverage right now, but in the past that momentum has fizzled out. Do you think there's a difference this time around?

My son has hemophilia and is immunosuppressed from his chemotherapy treatments [chemotherapy, in some extreme instances, is used to fight the immune system's resistance to hemophilia treatment]. He's the kind of person that is supposed to be first in line in the emergency room. Instead, we wait for hours in packed emergency rooms where the uninsured are piled in to get basic care. I think what we're seeing in Washington now is a different momentum. If you keep piling snow on a mountaintop, there will eventually be an avalanche. This issue has been pushed under the rug before, but every other industrialized nation has some form of national health care. The system now is nothing short of an abomination. I think there might be enough political will now for a radical change.

Schwarzenegger's Healthcare Reform Proposal Could Conflict With Bush's Aim To Balance Federal Budget (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger wants $3.7 billion a year in new federal funding to cover a big chunk of his healthcare plan for Californians, putting him on a collision course with budget hawks in the nation's capital and leaders in other states seeking assistance.

The sheer size of the federal allocation Schwarzenegger's plan would require is raising eyebrows.

"That's a big number on an annual basis," said Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, the ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee. "California hasn't yet passed a law [implementing the governor's plan], but when they do, I would think people are going to take a deep breath."

The cost of helping states fund their health plans has already attracted the attention of budget cutters because it is complicating President Bush's stated goal of balancing the federal budget in five years. In his new budget, scheduled to go to Congress on Monday, Bush is expected to call for a substantial slowdown in federal healthcare spending. Some of the cuts Bush proposes could affect programs Schwarzenegger is counting on to help pay for his plan, such as Medicaid.

Because California is the most populous state, its plan is by far the largest. But four other states are pursuing initiatives to provide health insurance for all their residents. More are expected to follow this year. That could set off a scramble for increasingly scarce federal dollars.

"When they do the math and figure out just exactly how much federal money will be flowing to California … some people will say, 'Why should California get it, and other states get nothing?' " said health economist Len Nichols of the nonpartisan New America Foundation.

Nichols and other experts say state attempts to reform healthcare are likely to require tens of billions in additional spending in two federal programs that operate as partnerships with the states — Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or S-CHIP. These programs are different in every state, and operate under a complex series of laws, rules and formulas for federal matching funds.

Medicaid is the nation's main healthcare program for the poor, paying for medical and long-term care for more than 55 million people, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation. S-CHIP covers as many as 6 million children a year, mostly in low-income working families that earn too much to qualify for Medicaid. In California, the programs are known as Medi-Cal and Healthy Families.

Washington may struggle to deal with demands for more money from California and other states, but some experts say federal policymakers in effect asked for it after years of little or no action to address the problems of the 47 million uninsured.

"The reason this is being discussed in a serious way in Sacramento is because it really isn't being confronted in Washington," said Marian Mulkey, a health insurance expert with the California HealthCare Foundation. "If [Washington] reacts negatively, it might just call the question of 'What do they want to do next?' What is Washington doing to address this, if this kind of state solution isn't workable?"

DOJ_NMG_0124190

Last week, Bush pledged in his State of the Union address to work with states to cover the uninsured. But that included no commitment for more federal money — only redirection of some existing accounts.

Overall, Schwarzenegger counts on federal coffers to provide about $5.5 billion of the $12-billion first-year cost of his plan. Of that federal money, state officials say, $3.7 billion would be new spending and the rest would be redirected from existing payments.

California officials say the state is entitled to nearly all of the $3.7 billion in new spending under current Medicaid and S-CHIP rules.

Medicaid is an entitlement program, meaning it is not subject to Congress' annual appropriations process. Instead, the federal government has committed by law to match state spending within given limits. The coverage expansions that Schwarzenegger is proposing for low-income children, pregnant women and some other adults are within those limits, state officials say, as are increases in payments to healthcare providers that the governor's plan calls for.

"Given the fact that most of these things fall within the existing laws and rules, we hope that we'll ultimately be successful in securing the funding," said Joe Munso, deputy director of the California Health and Human Services Agency. "The federal government is a key partner in any of these solutions. They are a key partner in our programs today."

However, Congress can change the underlying Medicaid law to cut spending on the program — and it might come under pressure to do so, given that demands from California and other states are likely to add to the federal deficit.

At the U.S. Health and Human Services Department, an official said it was not as simple as California sending the federal government a bill.

"Any change [Schwarzenegger] makes is essentially a change in a contract," said the official, who asked not to be identified because the review process had not yet begun and the issue was considered sensitive. "No change can be made to the original state plan without an agreement from us."

Washington has no dedicated funding to help pay for California's plan.

"It's not like we're holding money for states," said Joseph Antos, a health policy expert with the business-oriented American Enterprise Institute.

"If you have a lot of states taking advantage of what they see as ways to leverage federal money, then I think you would see a reaction that states are gaming the system and we need to shut this off," said Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a nonpartisan budget watchdog.

It would be different, Bixby said, if the spending came as part of a test of several state plans to help find a suitable model for national health reform. Sens. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) and George Voinovich (R-Ohio) on Jan. 17 introduced legislation to set up such a test.

Pressure from the states may ultimately force Washington to act on healthcare. "We're not going to get a national health plan until two or three big states get plans of their own," said Rep. Pete Stark, (D-Fremont), chairman of the House Ways and Means health subcommittee. "Then big companies are going to come to Congress and say, 'Look, let's start to standardize this.' "

Civilian Reserve Just Words In A Speech (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

President Bush's call last week for a Civilian Reserve Corps to help troubled countries is either a solid idea whose time has come or yet another throwaway applause line in a State of the Union speech and it's up to Mr. Bush to decide how it turns out.

For a proposal during the annual address to Congress arguably the biggest presidential stage this one is mostly bare-bones. There is no plan or legislation, just a pledge to work with Congress to try to create something.

"The big question right now is whether the White House is really going to seriously act on it," said Carlos Pascual, who worked on the idea when he was director of the State Department's Office of Reconstruction and Stabilization. "I think it's the right thing to do. I'm glad the president raised it. It's not going to happen unless the president, the national security advisor, the secretary of state pick up the phone" to Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0124191

"If the White House wants to make it not just a presidential throwaway line in a speech but into a reality that can actually be a useful tool they have to show a little bit of leadership on it," said Mr. Pascual, who is now director of foreign-policy studies at the Brookings Institution.

In his address last week, Mr. Bush coupled the idea to his proposal to increase the active-duty size of the U.S. military by 92,000 troops over five years.

"A second task we can take on together is to design and establish a volunteer Civilian Reserve Corps," the president said. "It would ease the burden on the armed forces by allowing us to hire civilians with critical skills to serve on missions abroad when America needs them. It would give people across America who do not wear the uniform a chance to serve in the defining struggle of our time."

Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman, said the president often hears from Americans who want to help out in some way. But she said it is just a proposed idea at this point.

"He wants to talk to Congress about this idea and how they can work together on a positive, bipartisan opportunity that would demonstrate the great skill and generosity of the American people," she said.

Melanie Anderton, a spokeswoman at the State Department, said the reserve corps would complement a surge of U.S. government employees that the State Department is already building.

Both the active-duty and civilian reserve concepts grew out of trying to meet the challenges of a post-September 11 world, in which failed states can become breeding grounds for dangers to the U.S.

It is not the first time that Mr. Bush has proposed expanding voluntary national service.

Five years ago, he created the USA Freedom Corps, a loose coalition of volunteers helping out in their communities, and called for all Americans to donate their time. He also called for doubling the size of the Peace Corps.

Mr. Pascual said he thinks that the White House is trying to show that the president has learned lessons from the problems with Iraq reconstruction and that this policy gives him something to point to as progress.

But he said the burden is on Mr. Bush to prove he is serious, and said the lack of specifics "is indicative of the lack of leadership around it, the lack of commitment." One test, he said, will be whether the White House funds it in next week's 2008 budget proposal.

Mr. Pascual said that during his time as director of the State Department's reconstruction office, he envisioned the civil reserve as a cadre of several thousand police officers, police trainers, economists and civil administrators ready to deploy in short order to world hot spots. The corps would train together for several weeks a year, just like the military reserve does, so they would have common procedures.

A reserve would fill the holes in the current system, which relies on military troops not trained for civilian tasks or on contractors who often cannot be deployed in less than 90 days even in the most urgent of circumstances.

The idea has been kicked around in government circles for a few years and been the subject of several feasibility studies.

A civilian reserve was even a feature of former Gen. Wesley Clark's 2004 failed campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination. He proposed a far broader reserve that could be mobilized for local, national or international needs.

Mr. Bush's proposal last week found a mixed audience among bloggers, with some saying the idea is overdue, but others saying the details will matter. One blogger said he "was reminded of Police Academy 4: Citizens on Patrol," a comedy about bumbling police officers assigned to train a civilian force to fight crime.

Mr. Pascual said the initial setup costs would be in the neighborhood of $150 million over a few years, and have a recurring cost of $50 million to $70 million. During a deployment, costs would go up, he said.

The White House did request $25 million in the 2007 budget to get the program started, but Congress did not appropriate the funds. The concept has congressional supporters, including top Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee. The Senate last year passed by unanimous consent a bill that would have authorized the program, but it did not receive a vote in the House.

Why Volunteerism Has Reached Historic High In US (CSM)

By Amy Green

DOJ_NMG_0124192

The Christian Science Monitor, January 30, 2007

.

ORLANDO, FLA.

To Linda Rogewitz and her husband, it can be a matter of life or death. When they get a call, they drop everything – birthday parties, other engagements – to rush to the side of an injured bird. They save dozens of birds a week, they estimate, as volunteers for the Audubon Society's Center for Birds of Prey in Orlando.

"You don't have to make a grand effort," says Ms. Rogewitz, a massage therapist in Kissimmee, Fla., seated in the center's courtyard surrounded by caged birds. Two owls the couple brought in recently are being treated in hopes they can be released eventually. "If you wait for that grand effort, you'll never get anything done," this volunteer advises. "Start small."

Those small donations of time are adding up: More Americans than ever before are volunteering. In 2005, 29 percent of adults were serving – a 30-year high, according to a December report by the Corporation for National and Community Service (CNCS).

It's partly because volunteerism is uniquely rooted in the American character, some experts say. Barn-raisings and harvest seasons bonded communities long ago. Today, as mentoring, drug rehabilitation, and other programs depend primarily on volunteers, and as religious groups reach far beyond their congregations to address social problems, the trend is poised to engender real change, says David Eisner, chief executive of the CNCS.

"There are no other countries that have the kind of deep-rooted volunteering ethic that we have," Mr. Eisner says. "If we're able to engage volunteers in our country to visit these issues ... volunteers won't just turn the tide and make a difference, but we can fundamentally solve some of our most intractable problems."

Three age groups – older teens, baby boomers, and seniors – are driving the upsurge. And as these teens grow and boomers retire, bucking the expectation they will slow down, together they could expand volunteerism even more, Eisner says. The CNCS, a federal agency that since 1993 has fostered civic engagement through community service, has launched a push to boost the number of US volunteers by 10 million to 75 million by 2010.

Education and youth service organizations such as schools and Boy Scouts, in particular, are seeing an increase in the number of volunteers. Older teens more than doubled their volunteering rate since 1989 from 13 percent to 28 percent, according to the CNCS report. AmeriCorps, a network of domestic service programs throughout the US, has grown, too, from some 25,000 participants to more than 70,000 since it was established in 1994.

The findings came as no surprise to Howard Rosing, executive director of the Steans Center for Community-based Service Learning at DePaul University in Chicago. The center promotes community service and tracks trends and statistics on volunteering. Today's students want to be involved and to have an impact on important social issues, he says.

One of them is Stephanie Treffert, who led 100 fellow college students to the Gulf Coast in December to help them rebuild after hurricane Katrina. Ms. Treffert, now a sophomore at Marquette University in her hometown of Milwaukee, was a freshman at Loyola University in New Orleans when Katrina hit in 2005.

Her affection for the Big Easy prompted her in 2006 to form MARDI GRAS – Making a Real Difference in the Gulf Region and Areas Surrounding. She obtained funding for her organization from Marquette's student government and organized two trips to the region. The students made the journey in minivans they rented and worked in New Orleans, Mississippi, and Alabama. She plans a third trip this spring.

Recent disasters such as Katrina, the tsunami in South Asia in 2004, and the terrorist attacks in 2001 showed many people that they are not far removed from poverty, Treffert says. "You see this, and it's America. It's not a third-world country," she says of her experience on the Gulf Coast. "These are people you could have [gone] to school with."

While the disasters contributed to the trend, it was under way before they occurred, Mr. Rosing says. Americans today are better educated and have longer life spans, leading to increased volunteerism, Eisner says.

Schools requiring service

High schools in Washington require community service as part of their curriculum, and course work at high schools in Maryland include a community service component. In 2005, Tulane University began to mandate community service for graduation as a response to hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0124193

At the same time, companies, including CVS, Best Buy, and The Home Depot, are giving employees time to volunteer and are rewarded with more productivity and higher retention rates, Eisner says.

"The hope is that, with more engagement with the community and diverse issues, students become more active at the political level. They become more politically or civically engaged in the political process and become more active in creating policies that address the systematic problems we're working on," Rosing says.

Beyond the 9-to-5 job

Americans want something more than a 9-to-5 job, says Annmarie Emmet of Washington, who joined the Peace Corps at age 71. A retired government banker who never married, Ms. Emmet began volunteering at the Vietnam Veterans' Memorial Wall 18 years ago. In 2002, she journeyed to the African nation of Lesotho, where she spent two years helping those affected by the AIDS crisis. Her reason for volunteering is simple: She enjoys helping people.

"So many people sit in front of a computer in an office, and I feel sorry for them," Emmet says. "I think so many people go to real 9-to-5-type jobs and don't find a lot of reward in it, and I think maybe being able to help someone or maybe being able to offer something that is not expected, that can make people feel good."

Bush Clarifies 'Democrat Majority' Gaffe (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 30, 2007

This one has gotten a little ic-ky for the White House. President Bush said Monday he wasn't trying to disparage the party now running Congress by referring to it as the "Democrat majority," as opposed to the "Democratic majority," in his State of the Union speech.

"That was an oversight," Bush said in an interview with National Public Radio. "I mean, I'm not trying to needle."

Bush's dropping of the "ic" at the end of the word prompted grumbling by Democrats that he purposely got their name wrong.

This is not a new charge. President Reagan used to refer to the "Democrat Party." Democratic leaders have long considered it demeaning when their suffix is omitted, and some of them figured it was no accident in a speech as highly choreographed and rehearsed as Bush's State of the Union.

Bush said he wasn't even aware that he had done it.

"I meant to be saying, why don't we show the American people we can actually work together?" Bush said.

The verbal shot came in the same breath as the president was congratulating Democrats for winning the House and Senate in the November election.

In the language the president was supposed to read, the reference was "Democratic," not "Democrat."

"We take him at his word that it was an oversight," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

Bush said the theme of his speech was about cooperating with Democrats on big issues such as Social Security.

Yet, after another bitter campaign season in 2006, that talk of bipartisanship comes with plenty of skepticism.

"There is distrust in Washington. I am surprised, frankly, at the amount of distrust that exists in this town," Bush said. "And I'm sorry it's the case, and I'll work hard to try to elevate it."

Then the president conceded: "I'm not that good at pronouncing words anyway."

Kate Bedingfield, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said the true test of Bush's commitment to bipartisanship is "not what he calls the Democratic Congress."

Rather, she said, it is his willingness to work with the Democratic majority on an agenda to help middle-class families.

The next chapter will come this weekend.

Bush plans to speak to the House Democratic Caucus at its conference this weekend in Virginia.

On the president's schedule, that event is referred to as the "House Democrat Conference."

Bush Says Missing '-ic' Was An Oversight (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

DOJ_NMG_0124194

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

President Bush says the missing "-ic" in the State of the Union address was nothing more than an oversight.

Near the beginning of the speech last week, Bush congratulated "the Democrat majority" for its electoral victory, using a long-standing Republican formulation seen by many Democrats as a calculated insult. Some liberal bloggers and party strategists saw the president's omission of the last two letters of the party's proper name, Democratic, as a sign of insincerity in preaching bipartisanship.

Nothing of the sort, Bush said in an interview yesterday with National Public Radio's Juan Williams.

"That was an oversight," said Bush, who frequently uses the formulation. "I mean, I'm not trying to needle. Look, I went into the hall saying we can work together, and I was very sincere about it. I didn't even know I did it."

Bush also said he "didn't mean to be putting fingernails on the board," while noting that the parties need to work together on addressing problems with the Social Security system. "I am surprised, frankly, at the amount of distrust that exists in this town," the president said. "And I'm sorry it's the case, and I'll work hard to try to elevate it. So the idea that somehow I was trying to needle the Democrats, it's just -- gosh, it's probably Texas. Who knows what it is? But I'm not that good at pronouncing words anyway."

White House press secretary Tony Snow seemed peeved with reporters asking about the Bush mispronunciation at his morning press "gaggle" yesterday, accusing the reporters of making "three mountains out of a molehill" and suggesting that the press was not much interested when Democrats bashed Bush with language calling him a "loser" or a "liar."

"This looks like an exercise of looking for a fence rather than looking for a way to work together," Snow said. "There was no intentional slight of anyone."

For now, Democrats are standing down.

Brendan Daly, spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said, "We certainly take the president at his word." The normally garrulous Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), said he had no comment.

The 'Democrat Majority' Is Still The Talk Of The Capital (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON — Will President Bush put the "-ic" back in "Democratic"?

That was the hot topic around Washington on Monday after the president was asked why, during his State of the Union address last week, he referred to Congress' new "Democrat majority."

"That was an oversight," Bush said in an interview Monday with National Public Radio. "I'm not trying to needle…. I didn't even know I did it."

The issue of whether it is a slur to refer to the Democratic Party without the "-ic" has become an irritant. It comes at a time when Democrats and Republicans are trying to figure out whether they can work together, after years of fierce partisanship in the nation's capital.

Some Democrats said the president's usage in the speech — even though his prepared text included the "-ic" — sent the wrong message.

"It's a long-standing intentional partisan political slight," said Daniel Weiss, chief of staff to Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez). "It's kind of like flashing colors in a gang. It's code. It says, 'I'm one of you, I'm a right-wing conservative.' "

And experts on political locution say it's a deliberate, if ungrammatical, linguistic strategy.

"The word 'democratic' has such positive emotional valence … so they politicize it to use it as a term to describe a group of political rivals," said Roderick P. Hart, a professor of communications and government at the University of Texas in Austin.

"Democrat Party" is not common usage in Texas, Hart said, noting that the only people he had heard use it were "sitting Republican legislators."

For the president's part, when told the term grates on Democrats, he pleaded ignorance. "I didn't mean to be putting fingernails on the board. I meant to be saying, Why don't we show the American people we can actually work together?" Bush told NPR.

DOJ_NMG_0124195

For her part, the government's most powerful Democrat, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, has brushed off the controversy. "She takes the president at his word that it was an oversight," said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly.

The use of the term "Democrat Party" goes back decades. One explanation sometimes offered is that Republicans began to use it to hint that corrupt Democrats were not terribly "democratic" and had no right to use that word to describe themselves. Others say it was adopted because it sounds annoying and echoes the word "bureaucrat," with its negative connotations.

Whatever the initial impulse or rationale, the term became controversial as far back as the 1950s. Sen. Joseph McCarthy (R-Wis.) famously used it to deride Democrats during his hearings investigating whether Communists had infiltrated the U.S. government. During the 1956 Republican convention, the usage was so common that it prompted the New York Times to report that dropping the "-ic" had become official party policy.

" 'Democratic' as an adjective is not descriptive of the party as it exists today," GOP spokesman L. Richard Guylay explained in that report, referring to allegations of vote-fixing by the Democratic Party's political machine in large cities. "I can't consider the party of the Pendergasts or Tammany Hall as a democratic party."

In 1957, writing about the phenomenon in American Speech, the quarterly journal of the American Dialect Society, scholar Ignace Feuerlicht wrote: "It will be interesting to see whether 'Democrat Party' will stay with us or go out of existence again or be revived and revitalized at intervals just before successive national elections."

Feuerlicht seems to have been prescient: A search of a database of presidential speeches and remarks shows that use of the term has increased during election seasons and has been aimed primarily at partisan audiences.

President Reagan used it more in 1984, the year of his reelection campaign, than at any other time in his presidency. In the case of President Bush, the term shows up in his remarks more in 2004 and 2006 — both election years — than during the rest of his time in office.

In fact, Bush's usage of the term increased dramatically last year; according to the American Presidency Project, based at UC Santa Barbara, the president was recorded using the term 22 times in 2006 — more than in the previous five years of his presidency combined.

The term also is commonly used by other Republican leaders. On Monday afternoon, the office of the top GOP leader in the House, Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, issued a news release asking, "What is the Democrat strategy in Iraq?"

"It sounds illiterate to me," said the University of Texas' Hart. "It's a noun used to modify a noun, and everyone knows you use an adjective to modify a noun."

Some Democrats doubt that the president is truly unaware of the pejorative tone of the term, but others acknowledged that it might have become such common parlance among Republican politicians that Bush used it without understanding its origin or undertones.

"It's like 'nuclear.' I just don't think he understands what he's saying," said one Democratic aide.

That was another defense Bush himself offered during the NPR interview.

"Gosh, it's probably Texas. Who knows what it is?" he said. "But I'm not that good at pronouncing words anyway."

No Offense, But ... (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

President Bush says he had no intention of offending members of the other party when he said in his State of the Union address, “I congratulate the Democrat majority.” In an interview yesterday, Juan Williams of NPR asked Mr. Bush about dropping the “ic,” something the president does regularly, to the intense annoyance of many Democrats.

“The idea that somehow I was trying to needle the Democrats, it’s just — gosh — it’s probably Texas,” he said. “Who knows what it is. But I’m not that good at pronouncing words anyway.”

Last weekend, Mr. Bush put his bipartisan spirit on display, right there on the schedule distributed by the White House: “The president makes remarks to the House Democrat Conference.”

But late yesterday a new version of the schedule was released. “Democratic conference,” it said.

Senate To Consider Minimum Wage Bill With Tax Breaks (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0124196

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — The Senate is expected to clear the way on Tuesday for an increase in the minimum wage that Democrats and some Republicans agree is overdue.

But the Senate's approval may not mean that workers will actually start receiving bigger paychecks in the immediate future.

The Senate bill differs from the one that cleared the House, and includes $8.3 billion in tax breaks for small businesses that Republicans and some Democrats say are necessary to offset the cost of the wage increase.

The House bill, which passed by a vote of 315 to 116, with 82 Republicans joining the Democrats, included none of those tax breaks. And Democratic leaders there have said they want to hold out for that kind of "clean" bill.

The question is how the leaders in both houses choose to reconcile the two approaches.

The first Senate vote will be on whether to limit debate on the measure, leading to a second vote — and expected approval — later this week.

Then, the Senate could hold on to the bill, leaving it to leaders from both chambers to work out the differences. Or, it could send the bill to the House, where the House could strip out the tax breaks and send it back to the Senate for a new vote.

Aides to some House leaders say they would be willing to allow some of the tax breaks. But others, including Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, are insisting that they will not concede any tax cuts.

House Democrats say that by forcing a vote on a clean bill they would force Senate Republicans to put themselves on record as opposing a wage increase, which was a popular campaign issue in the midterm elections.

"We are still operating on the assumption or hope that the Senate will pass a clean minimum wage bill," said Stacey F. Bernards, a spokeswoman for Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the Democratic leader. "If it doesn't happen, it's because a minority of Republicans held it up. It's their fault."

That simple approach to raising the minimum wage failed in the Senate last week. Sixty votes were required to cut off debate on the bill, sending it for a vote, but Democrats were able to enlist just five Republicans, for a vote of 54 to 43.

"The only way we're going to get a minimum wage increase through the Senate is if it is accompanied by tax breaks for small businesses," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader. "I haven't seen a diminution of the opposition."

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the No. 3 Democrat in the Senate, said he believed the Senate might go along if the House sent back a bill stripped of the tax breaks. "This is good cover for the Republicans," he said. "They're saying, 'I'm not against a minimum wage increase, I just want tax breaks for small businesses.'

"But when the choice is yes or no because the House did something out of our control," he added, "I think we'll get more of them on our side."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who has been the chief proponent of the measure, has hammered Republicans almost daily, accusing them of trying to stall the bill with amendments. "It's always baffling to me what do Republicans have against hard-working Americans?" he said Monday.

The bill would raise the federal minimum wage $2.10 an hour over two years, from $5.15 to $7.25, and would be the first increase since 1996.

Among the tax breaks would be a five-year extension of the credit provided to employers who hire people who have traditionally had trouble finding jobs, as well as a tax credit for hiring veterans disabled in Afghanistan and Iraq after the 9/11 attacks; an extension through March 31, 2008, of a provision that allows businesses to deduct the cost of improvements to leased properties more quickly; and a permanent change to the tax code allowing small businesses to use the cash method of accounting.

The Senate Committee on Finance, which approved the small business tax breaks in the package being voted on, said the cuts would be covered by closing tax loopholes for companies and executives.

Strike One For Executive Pay (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0124197

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

The Senate's likely passage this week of legislation raising taxes on executive pay is just the beginning of a tough look by the new Democratic Congress at big corporate compensation packages.

The provision is attached to a bill that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from the current $5.15. It would cap at $1 million a year the amount an employee could place in certain tax-deferred-compensation plans. Currently, there is no limit on how much compensation can be deferred into the plans, allowing executives to put off taxes for years on millions of dollars in pay.

The legislation also would limit the income-tax deductions companies can claim for high-paid executives who left the firm during the year. Combined, the two measures would raise about $900 million in new tax revenue over 10 years, according to congressional estimates.

And that may be just the beginning of the first extended assault on executive pay from Capitol Hill since the last time Democrats were in control, during the early 1990s. In addition to tax changes, the new chairmen of the House and Senate committees that oversee financial services say they want to give shareholders more control over executive compensation.

Two forces are driving Washington's new focus on executive pay. One is the Democratic Party's increasingly populist appeal. In delivering the party's official response last week to President Bush's State of the Union address, Virginia Sen. Jim Webb put economic inequality alongside Iraq as one of his broadsides against the White House. "When I graduated from college the average corporate CEO made 20 times what the average worker did," Mr. Webb said. "Today, it's nearly 400 times."

At the same time, Democrats have pledged to live within pay-as-you-go budget constraints that require new spending or tax breaks to be offset by budget cuts or revenue increases. Under those rules, executive pay makes a more tempting target than, perhaps, raising middle-class taxes, or cutting popular spending programs.

"We're in an environment where, because of pay-go rules, Congress is having to look to find revenue," says Bob Shepler, director of corporate finance and tax at the National Association of Manufacturers. "They haven't been shy about saying the highly compensated individuals are where they're going to look first. Executives are an easy but unfair target."

Despite that, it is unclear the tax changes for executive pay ultimately will go anywhere. Business groups are lobbying against the proposals, blitzing lawmakers with letters saying they will disrupt compensation arrangements that companies use to attract and retain top employees. "The tax code is neither an appropriate nor an effective means of regulating excessive compensation," wrote David A. Heywood, general tax counsel for Lockheed Martin Corp., on behalf of the taxation committee at Financial Executives International, which represents more than 15,000 financial executives.

Opponents of the new pay curbs say the Senate proposals would hit compensation in investment banking, where large bonuses often are deferred. They hope those arguments will hold sway with the House's chief tax writer, Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.).

Mr. Rangel has expressed reservations, saying in an interview: "I don't want to get involved in setting people's salaries."

Mr. Rangel's aversion to the Senate executive tax has as much to do with process as substance. The Senate measure is part of a complex tax package that the chamber attached to the minimum-wage increase. It includes $8 billion in tax breaks for small businesses, such as restaurants, that might be hurt by the mandated pay increase, and $8 billion in offsetting tax increases, including the executive-pay provisions and larger changes that would restrict certain corporate tax shelters.

The House passed a "clean" minimum-wage increase with no taxes attached, and the two chambers will have to work out their differences.

Even if the new compensation packages do become law, it is unclear if they will have the desired effect -- or if they will just push companies to come up with ways to get around the provisions.

The new plan to curb deferred compensation is aimed at reducing the escalating disparity between top executives and other employees. Advocates note that while there is no current limit on the amount of compensation that employees can place in certain deferred-compensation plans, most workers can add only $15,000 a year, tax-deferred, to their 401(k) plans.

One wrinkle in the proposal is that it actually sets two limits: $1 million, or the average of the employee's taxable pay for the previous five years -- whichever is lower. Business groups contend that even midlevel employees could find they exceed the limit for a given year and end up affected by the new tax. Senate Finance Committee spokeswoman Carol Guthrie said middle-income earners are in different types of savings plans than those impacted by the provision.

DOJ_NMG_0124198

The other executive-pay provision would close what Senate aides describe as a loophole. Current rules limit companies to no more than $1 million a year in income-tax deductions for certain types of compensation to their top-five officers -- but only if the officers still are working at the company at the end of the year. The Senate provision broadens the $1 million deduction limit to anyone who served as chief executive or one of the four highest-paid individuals, even if they have left the company.

Supporters of the changes say they are meant to reduce the use of huge exit packages, like the one likely to go to Pfizer Inc.'s former CEO Henry "Hank" McKinnell. Mr. McKinnell, who is slated to leave as chairman next month, could walk away with a deferred-compensation package valued at nearly $80 million.

Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.) says the Senate's executive-pay proposals are just the opening of a broader discussion of executive pay that is "always useful to have." Mr. Frank, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, plans to hold hearings on executive pay in coming months and introduce legislation giving shareholders more power over compensation. "CEOs ought to understand it's a further signal of how unhappy people are," said Mr. Frank of the Senate proposals.

Kennedy, GOP Engage In War Of Words On Tax Cuts (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

During an impassioned floor speech last week, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy lashed out at Republicans for insisting on tax cuts targeted for small businesses to offset the cost of raising the minimum wage.

"How many more billions of dollars do we have to give you, Mr. Republican?" the Massachusetts Democrat shouted. "How many more dollars do we have to give you to get an increase in the minimum wage? It is shocking. It is disgraceful."

So the Senate Finance Committee -- headed by Sen. Max Baucus, Montana Democrat -- added up the amount of tax cuts that it had included in the minimum-wage bill that the panel approved earlier this month. The $8.3 billion in tax cuts were aimed at the small businesses that hire most minimum-wage workers.

Senate Republicans were quick to note that the $8.3 billion in tax cuts for small businesses nationwide is less than the $8.5 billion federal funding cap placed on Boston's Big Dig highway project. Mr. Kennedy has been the principal sponsor of the project, which has been riddled with corruption, cost overruns, delays and safety woes.

"Senator Kennedy complains about $8.3 billion in tax relief out of one side of his mouth, while asking for $8.5 billion in pork-barrel spending out of the other," said Wesley Denton, spokesman for Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican.

"He wants to have it both ways, and that's exactly what this debate has been about. He says he wants to help people get out of poverty, but then proposes a one-size-fits all federal mandate that actually prevents people from getting their first job," Mr. Denton said.

One Republican leadership aide wondered whether minimum-wage workers would be "better served by an increase in the minimum wage with protections to ensure that employers do not cut back on jobs" or a "bailout of one of the most overpriced construction projects in history."

Republicans Block House Pay Raise (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, January 30, 2007

House Democratic leaders Monday abandoned attempts to revive an annual pay raise cherished by rank and file lawmakers, a decision prompted by lingering GOP anger over last year's campaign.

Lawmakers' pay will be frozen at $165,200 for this year in a dispute fueled by the Democrats' use of the issue in last year's campaign, violating a yearslong understanding that the competing parties would not attack each other over pay raises.

At issue is the annual congressional cost of living adjustment, or COLA, under which lawmakers automatically get a pay hike unless Congress votes to block it. Democratic and Republican leaders had worked cozily for years to make sure an annual pay-related vote went smoothly.

DOJ_NMG_0124199

Under the agreement, the annual vote came on an obscure procedural move — instead of a direct up-or-down vote — and the Democratic and GOP whips each delivered a roughly equal number of votes to shut off any move to block the pay hike.

That arrangement fell apart when Democrats announced last summer they would opt out of the pay raise until Congress acted to raise the minimum wage. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee ran ads attacking Republicans for taking pay raises while blocking numerous attempts to raise the minimum wage.

A top House GOP leader said Democrats broke the agreement last year after the pay raise-related vote had already taken place. In a 263-152 vote in June, the House blocked a bid by Rep. Jim Matheson, D-Utah, to force an up-or-down vote on the pay raise.

"The agreement always was that the parties would not use the COLA issue in the campaign," said House GOP Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri. "It was as formal as anything not signed is."

In December, a GOP-drafted bill delayed implementation of the pay raise until Feb. 16. Democratic leaders tried in recent days to craft language to delay the pay raise a few more weeks or months to provide more time for the minimum wage bill to advance into law.

Republicans said no.

"The DCCC ran their own ads attacking (GOP) members on this," Blunt said. "Because of that their members are going to suffer in terms of not being able to have a COLA."

Members were originally due to begin receiving a 1.7 percent, or $2,800, annual increase Jan. 1, but they already lost about $320 with the delay to Feb. 16.

Politics Could Scuttle Raising Pay For House Members (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — The annual raise for members of the House is on the verge of being eaten up in political payback.

Republicans, who were attacked by Democrats in the 2006 campaign for accepting annual raises while not increasing the federal minimum wage for 10 years, say they are inclined to oppose any increase for representatives. And Democrats say they are not likely to enact one on their own, which would open them to attack in the next campaign.

Republican leaders point a finger at the hard-hitting Democratic campaign operation of last year, saying Monday that making the raises a political issue violated a longtime unwritten agreement between the parties.

“It was absolutely understood and agreed to,” said Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, the second-ranking Republican.

Mr. Blunt and others said the raises were crucial for members of Congress who are not independently wealthy and must operate two households on the current $165,200 salary. The annual raise for this year was set at 1.7 percent, about $2,760.

Democrats seized on the raise last fall to emphasize the stagnant minimum wage. Both parties backed a provision in a stop-gap spending bill that prohibited any Congressional raises until the minimum wage was increased. That stop-gap measure is due to expire, and the House is set to extend it on Wednesday.

“We said all along there would be no pay raise until we pass the minimum wage,” said Brendan Daly, spokesman for the speaker, Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California.

But now that the minimum wage increase is making progress, some lawmakers are considering making their own raise effective June 1 to allow time for a minimum wage bill to be signed into law.

Republican objections appear intended to try to drive a wedge between the Democratic leadership and lawmakers who were hoping for the salary increase.

Democrats Craft Spending Bill As Deadline Looms (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democrats put the final touches on a $463.5 billion spending bill designed to keep the government operating for the rest of the fiscal year and bridge the gap left by the collapse of the budget process last fall.

DOJ_NMG_0124200

Never before in modern times has Congress attempted this type of streamlined funding resolution on such a large scale. The bill touches almost every corner of the government, down to securities transaction fees charged by federal regulators and even lawmakers' pay.

• The News: Democratic Congressional leaders put together a $463.5 billion spending bill after Republicans failed to act last year.

• What's at Stake: Without House and Senate approval by Feb. 15, operations at most domestic agencies could come to a halt.

• What's Next: Negotiations are likely with conservatives and administration officials for concessions to keep the process on track.

Reflecting the new Democratic majority, the largest funding increases would go to veterans' medical care, Pell Grants for low-income college students, law enforcement, and fighting AIDS and malaria overseas. The White House appeared receptive to much of the package, but it would have to accept an almost $3.6 billion cut from its fiscal 2007 request for military construction and base-closing funds.

"We know this is not going to be enough to sustain the government for the balance of the fiscal year," said Mississippi Sen. Thad Cochran, the ranking Republican on the Senate Appropriations Committee. "I don't know anybody who would pretend otherwise."

Faced with a Feb. 15 deadline, speed is essential and the House is scheduled to vote tomorrow without a formal committee markup. The Senate will be more of an obstacle, and Democrats hope that concessions to conservatives and weeks of negotiations with federal agencies will hasten action there as well.

Both parties have a stake in resolving the crisis now. Republicans complain of the rushed schedule, but are embarrassed for failing to complete spending bills last fall, leading to the current predicament.

The White House wants relief for agencies operating since Oct. 1 under a stopgap funding bill -- a situation that has become untenable for major Cabinet departments, such as Justice.

That stopgap measure expires Feb. 15, and rather than extend it again, the new House Appropriations Committee leadership will craft a long-term, streamlined funding resolution to carry the government through the end of the fiscal year, Sept. 30.

The basic funding formula calls for continuing agencies at 2006 spending levels, after first stripping out one-time emergency funds. Account-by-account, the legislation then cuts and adds by creating scores of exceptions to meet agency needs and fill a gap of $10 billion to $12 billion before reaching the $463.5 billion total.

That number was chosen to conform to President Bush's budget for this year and appeal to White House support.

In addition, a temporary moratorium is imposed on any spending earmarks for lawmakers, and the bill would freeze congressional pay at $165,200 and deny members a scheduled 1.7% adjustment next month.

Major additions include $4.4 billion for veterans' medical services and $2.3 billion for education and health programs. The National Institutes of Health budget would grow to $28.9 billion, a $619.5 million increase, and an additional $207 million is provided for community health centers.

Among education accounts, funding for Title I reading and math instruction for low-income public school students is increased by $125 million; an additional $615 million is provided for Pell Grants to low-income college students, money that will help raise the maximum annual grant by $260 to $4310.

Law enforcement is a third priority, with an estimated $1.7 billion increase, including an additional $309 million for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, once emergency funds in 2006 are excluded.

Within foreign-aid accounts, an estimated $248 million is provided to fight malaria, a $149 million increase. And the measure is expected to at least match the administration's total request to fight AIDS, though the Geneva-based Global Fund would receive a greater share: $724 million, a $180 million increase and twice what the administration had requested.

The military will get about $3 billion less than it wanted to help close military bases and relocate thousands of troops to the U.S. from posts in Europe and Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0124201

Across the board, many agencies will be effectively frozen at their 2006 appropriations with only a modest increase in personnel funds to cover half the cost of scheduled federal pay raises this year, about 2.2%.

The Securities and Exchange Commission will find itself still below the $905 million requested by the administration, but the bill allows the agency to go ahead with a promised reduction in transaction fees that has been delayed because of the budget breakdown.

Those fee reductions had been tied to passage of the agency's "regular" appropriations bill for fiscal 2007, but there has been nothing regular about the budget process of the past 12 months.

The legislation now spells out that for the SEC's purposes, this bill meets these requirements, meaning that upon enactment the agency could proceed with the delayed reductions.

The reductions include a proposed cut in fees for transactions on stock exchanges and over-the-counter markets -- to $15.30 per million dollars from the current rate of $30.70 per million dollars.

While the final text wasn't public last evening, the changes look to be applicable to future transactions only.

In Need Of Cash, Dems See Billions In Biotech (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 30, 2007

Senior Democratic lawmakers are close to introducing legislation to create a pathway for the approval of generic biological drugs in the hopes that the cheaper medicines will create billions of dollars in budget savings, which could be used to offset some of the cost of expanding federal health programs.

But the biotechnology companies that manufacture biologic pharmaceuticals caution that their products are not as easily reproduced as traditional, chemically based drugs, and are calling for legislators to include stricter safety and effectiveness testing requirements in the bill.

Democratic leaders and committee chairmen in both the House and Senate are considering a menu of costly healthcare items such as enhancing the Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit and expanding the State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP).

Lawmakers working on legislation to accomplish such goals, however, are under pressure to find ways to finance them. The Democratic leadership has promised to adhere to pay-as-you-go budget rules that demand all new spending or tax cuts be offset by reductions in spending or increases in taxes.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), the senior member of the Energy and Commerce Committee who is taking the lead on drafting the biologics bill, asserted that his legislation could have a big impact on healthcare spending.

"There's a great deal of savings that can be achieved," Waxman said. Although he would not name a specific amount or range of savings in dollars, he said, "There are some pretty dramatic figures." New York Democratic Sens. Charles Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton will introduce a companion to his bill, Waxman said.

Waxman said that he had no plans to link whatever budgetary savings would result from his bill to any specific new spending, a position seconded by Rep. Frank Pallone Jr. (D-N.J.), the chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee's Health Subcommittee.

Still, Pallone said, the Democratic leadership and the committee are serious about getting healthcare to more people and about finding ways to pay for it.

"Whenever we save money, it makes it possible to do more to expand coverage," Pallone said. "This isn't just generics. This is everything." As an example, Pallone cited the House's passage of a bill to require direct federal negotiation of drug prices under Part D as part of a larger strategy to expand that program.

The biotech and pharmaceutical industries could end up in a lobbying battle not only with Democrats such as Waxman but also with other powerful players in the healthcare industry.

Moreover, not all of the companies that make up the membership of the Biotechnology Industry Organization (BIO) and the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America necessarily will oppose the bill. Some of these companies are interested in competing with the firms that currently control the biologic-drugs market.

DOJ_NMG_0124202

Waxman predicted that the private-sector interests that bear the cost of prescription drugs would be supportive of his bill. "I think those who are payers for drugs … should want this legislation, and do want it," he said. Waxman's staff held two briefings for lobbyists on the legislation last week, he said.

Health insurers and the pharmacy benefit managers that negotiate bulk-price deals with drug makers for private insurers and Medicare, for example, are eager to see the cost of medicines come down. These industries are watching Waxman and his colleagues closely and are considering backing the bill, which would be introduced as soon as early February.

"Certainly, [the savings] would be tens of billions of dollars," Pharmaceutical Care Management Association (PCMA) President and CEO Mark Merritt said. "In the pay-go world, that means something."

Under a version of Waxman's bill introduced last year, Merritt said, Medicare would save $14 billion over 10 years just on the biologic medicines that are administered by doctors in their offices, which are paid for through Medicare Part B. The PCMA-sponsored analysis did not project savings for Medicare Part D or for other federal programs.

The Biotechnology Industry Organization (BIO) rejected PCMA's analysis, in part by arguing that PCMA underestimates the cost of manufacturing biologic drugs, especially for those companies that have never done it before.

The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) long has had a process in place to approve of generic versions of drugs made of chemical compounds, of which exact copies can be made.

Congress, however, has yet to create an FDA approval process for generic biologic drugs, which are based on organic protein molecules. As such, nearly all drugs developed in this manner remain available only in the higher-priced, name-brand version, regardless of how long they have been on the market.

The manufacturers say their drugs cannot be duplicated precisely in the same way as chemical compounds. "There really is no 'generic' biologic," BIO spokesman Paul Winters said. "You cannot exactly copy the biologic molecule."

The biotech industry rejects the label "generic," maintaining that the term is inaccurate because a new version of an existing biologic drug would not be identical to the original. BIO and others say that there should be an FDA approval process for these so-called follow-on biologic drugs but that they should not be labeled as generics.

Moreover, BIO argues that any company wishing to manufacture and sell follow-on biologic drugs should have to prove they are safe and effective. BIO is not opposed to the competition in principle, Winters said, "you just need to validate it by research."

The ranking member of the Health Subcommittee, Rep. Nathan Deal (R-Ga.), agreed. "We just need to see what the science says about that," Deal said. "You can't really make the analogy that generic biologics are the same as other generic drugs." Deal said he met with BIO's president and chief executive, former Rep. Jim Greenwood (R-Pa.), on the bill last week.

Waxman said that his bill would promote safe and effective drugs. "There is a difference [between chemical and biologic drugs] but that doesn't mean that it should prevent us" from granting the FDA the authority to approve non-brand-name biologic drugs, he said.

Pelosi Reaches Out To Blogging Community (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, January 30, 2007

Shortly after her swearing-in as the first female House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi took time to field questions from a few dozen Internet bloggers on a conference call that was off limits to mainstream media.

Last week, Pelosi's aides arranged for bloggers to question two Democratic House leaders on another conference call shortly before President Bush's State of the Union speech.

Pelosi also hired a full-time staff member this month dedicated to blogger outreach, and is making plans to launch a blog of her own. The day she was sworn in, bloggers were given special accommodations at the Capitol to cover the event, and fed lunch.

It's all evidence of the newfound attention bloggers from left-leaning Web sites are commanding on Democratic-run Capitol Hill, especially from the new speaker, a San Franciscan with an appreciation for the power of the Internet and grass-roots activism.

DOJ_NMG_0124203

Schooled by evidence of what Internet-driven politics can accomplish — from fueling Howard Dean's presidential campaign in 2004 to propelling Ned Lamont to victory over Joseph Lieberman in Connecticut's Democratic Senate primary last year — Pelosi and other politicians have realized bloggers are too important to ignore.

"They've gone from an initial writing blogs off, then moving to skepticism, then moving to, 'OK, maybe we can find a way of working with these guys,'" said John Aravosis, who runs Americablog.com.

"It's a power base and it's influential and it's an opportunity. And you know what? It exists," Aravosis added.

"It should only scare you if you're on their bad side."

Blogs also are a way for Pelosi and others to communicate directly with a politically engaged audience, without filtering by traditional media. She promoted the Democrats' agenda for their first 100 legislative hours in a posting on Huffingtonpost.com.

Democrats, in turn, credit bloggers with helping marshal successful opposition to President Bush's 2005 plan to overhaul Social Security by adding private accounts, a fight Pelosi led.

"It's a mistake to think that these people just sit behind their machines and don't do anything other than talk to each other and send money," said Joe Trippi, who managed Howard Dean's Internet-driven campaign. "These people are very active in their precincts, in their communities."

Friendly bloggers can help defuse attacks. Liberal bloggers rose to Pelosi's defense when she was criticized after the November election for employing nonunion workers at her vineyard. Thinkprogress.org trumpeted Pelosi's side of the story: Growers are prohibited by law from meddling in union contract issues before workers vote to organize.

Republicans are stepping up their involvement with blogs as well, and Pelosi's aides are planning new media training sessions for Democratic lawmakers and aides partly to expand use of blogs — one more sign that Congress' presence in the blogosphere will only grow.

"The speaker will be blogging," promised Karina Newton, Pelosi's director of new media.

"She understands the power that the netroots have."

White House Brings In New Pastry Chef (AP)

AP, January 30, 2007

There's a new name behind the decadent desserts at the White House: William Yosses.

Yosses has been named as the executive pastry chef for the White House, first lady Laura Bush announced Monday.

He will design and oversee the desserts for state dinners, social events, official luncheons and holiday parties. Yosses already has some on-the-job training — he served as the pastry chef for the 2006 White House holiday parties.

"Chef Yosses has impressed us from the start with his original and delicious creations," the first lady said. "He has a light touch with desserts, and the enthusiasm with which he approaches his profession makes him a real asset for all of us."

Yosses replaces Thaddeus DuBois, who left the job as top pastry chef in 2006.

In his most recent project, Yosses helped open Paul Newman's Dressing Room in Westport, Conn., a restaurant built around local, organic food. He has been an executive pastry chef at a series of top restaurants, including Tavern on the Green in New York City, and he is trained in classical French cooking.

Mad About Mary (NYT)

By Stacy Schiff

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Once upon a time, asking about someone's children was like talking about the weather. Then again, once upon a time talking about the weather was also like talking about the weather — not a portal into the political or the apocalyptic. But that's another story. The point is that children made for the kind of paltry social currency you could exchange with your in-flight neighbor, back when the only other option might have been: "As you're carrying that knife and wearing full camouflage, is it safe to conclude that the vegetarian meal is mine?" Then came children as designer accessories and politically charged pawns, appendages and admissions statistics.

DOJ_NMG_0124204

Suddenly, we are on treacherous ground. For starters, Angelina Jolie and Madonna can't even agree on where babies come from. I thrill as quickly as the next People subscriber to a good catfight, but do we really need Angelina — who appears to have taken No Child Left Behind as her personal mantra — trashing celebrities for "jumping on the adoption bandwagon?"

As her swearing-in made clear, even Nancy Pelosi feels the need to accessorize, not something I would have thought a woman with a gavel would ever need to do. Yes, by comparison the back of the House looked like a bouncer convention. But the dais looked like a Sunday school class. Which raises a parenthetical question: Do female politicians have to kiss babies? For that matter — this question is for someone other than Senator Boxer or Secretary Rice — do they need to have babies?

There are now officially only two people left in America who don't want to talk about their kids. When Jim Webb bowed out of that White House receiving line, President Bush tracked him down and asked after his son. Senator Webb is a former Navy secretary; he knows his protocol. He is also one of only a few members of the U.S. Senate with children serving in the military. "I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President," Mr. Webb replied. "That's not what I asked you," Mr. Bush snapped. Mr. Webb didn't really mean to answer, either. Evidently, he meant to slug the president.

Last week Wolf Blitzer asked Dick Cheney about his pregnant lesbian daughter. The vice president looked as if his arm had made contact with that meat grinder. Mr. Blitzer was, he growled, seriously out of line.

Neither Senator Webb nor Vice President Cheney wins points for his social graces. But what Letitia Baldrige said of the Webb encounter — "It was an uncivil reply to an uncivil remark" — does not apply equally to the vice president. Mr. Cheney has openly promoted an anti-gay agenda. His own base has called his daughter's pregnancy unconscionable. Family values have been his calling card. And our Prohibitionist vice president can't summon the courage to address the gin mill in the basement?

Mr. Webb was rude on principle; Mr. Cheney rude out of hypocrisy. One man took a stand. The other scurried away.

What the vice president's nonresponse did deliver was a very cogent message: the rules apply to you, but not to us. It's our privacy, your patriotism; our delusion, your sacrifice; our tax cuts, your kids. After all, as Mr. Cheney so tellingly said of his Republican critics, "I'm the vice president, and they're not." The part for which some of us have no stomach is the sense of entitlement.

An annoying thing about children is that they nudge you toward the high road and the long view. They demand pesky things like open-mindedness, self-denial, accountability, leadership and occasionally even integrity — qualities that appear to have packed up and gone home with Hans Blix. Once upon a time, you might have termed them family values.

So as to spare Mr. Cheney any further misadventures in this minefield, I did a little research for him. Several years ago, Ms. Baldrige foresaw his predicament. "A lesbian's parents may be the victims of probing, mean questions from their friends," she wrote. "Hopefully, they will answer unequivocally that they stand by their child and accept her decision."

As for gay and lesbian couples, they are families, too, in Ms. Baldrige's book. They are also increasingly common, "so people who feel shy and uptight with them are just going to have to get over it." Alternatively, they are welcome to talk about the weather.

Liberate Political Speech (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

THE U.S. SUPREME COURT astonished everyone in 2003 when it upheld the constitutionality of severe limits on political speech. The good news is that the court may be having some sober second thoughts about that dubious decision.

The speech-curtailing measure at issue is part of the broader McCain-Feingold campaign finance law. The centerpiece of that law banned "soft money" contributions to political parties that were used to circumvent limits on how much donors could contribute to candidates for federal office. What is glaringly offensive to the 1st Amendment is an accompanying ban on "electioneering communications" paid for out of the treasuries of independent organizations.

As defined by the law, electioneering communications are advertisements that mention a candidate for federal office and are broadcast within 30 days of a primary election or within 60 days of a general election. They need not (and usually do not) tell viewers to vote for or against a candidate.

In 2003, the Supreme Court ruled that McCain-Feingold's restrictions on these ads were not unconstitutional on their face. But an antiabortion group called Wisconsin Right to Life is arguing that the ban was applied in an unconstitutional way to prevent it from airing three TV advertisements in 2004. The ads asked viewers to tell the state's two senators — only one of whom was up for reelection — to allow a vote on President Bush's judicial nominations.

DOJ_NMG_0124205

Last month, a three-judge federal court in Washington ruled that the "issue ad" provision deprived Wisconsin Right to Life of its free-speech rights. If the Supreme Court agrees, as it should, political speech will be given more breathing room. And such a ruling needn't derail the soft-money provisions of the McCain-Feingold legislation.

There are a lot of phoney "issue ads" out there ("Tell Sen. Smith you disagree with him about Iraq" can sound a lot like an endorsement for challenger Jones), but the court has to err on the side of preserving political speech. When it comes to speaking out about a candidate, opponents (and news outlets like ours) should not have a monopoly in the closing days of a campaign, especially if the outside organization weighing in is genuinely acting on its own.

The particular facts of the Wisconsin Right to Life ads are a compelling indictment of the law's overreach and should prod the high court to reconsider whether the law could be constitutional under any set of facts. The addition of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. may dictate a different outcome — retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor cast the deciding vote upholding the limits in 2003.

But if the court isn't willing to go back to the drawing board, Congress should. An advertisement praising or criticizing a politician — even one seeking reelection — has more in common with the endorsement editorials that appear on this page than it does with the campaign contributions (in hard or soft dollars) that have received only minimal 1st Amendment protection from the courts.

The "bright line" that needs to be drawn is the one between financing someone else's message and articulating your own.

Voucher Comeback (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

The federal No Child Left Behind Act is set for renewal this year, and the big news so far is that President Bush is resurrecting the voucher proposal from his first term. "We can lift student achievement even higher by giving local leaders flexibility to turn around failing schools," Mr. Bush said in his State of the Union address, "and by giving families with children stuck in failing schools the right to choose something better."

The President campaigned on this concept in 2000, too, only to throw NCLB's choice provisions over the side to cut a bipartisan deal with Senator Ted Kennedy and Representative George Miller. Both Democrats carry water for the teachers unions, and so it's no surprise that both men quickly denounced the new Bush proposal last week. Let's hope Mr. Bush isn't merely using "choice" again as a negotiating ploy to be tossed out once talks on Capitol Hill get going.

NCLB's testing provisions have been useful in bringing more transparency to achievement gaps among schools, and among certain types of students within schools. But the most effective way to hold public schools accountable is by arming parents with more education choices. Nothing motivates teachers, principals and administrators like the threat of losing their charges (and the attendant funding) to "something better." Mr. Bush could pick worse fights than arguing that poor kids should be able to escape failing schools.

OTHER NEWS:

Bullish On Bernanke (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

The new chairman of the Federal Reserve got off to a rocky start last spring. Inflation was surging, the housing market was slumping, and Ben S. Bernanke's initial responses caused turmoil on Wall Street.

But a year into Bernanke's tenure, the picture has turned considerably brighter. Inflation is falling; unemployment is low; wages are rising; and the economy, despite continued problems in housing, is growing at a brisk clip. Bernanke is earning plaudits from Wall Street to Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0124206

"His stewardship in the first year has to be applauded by markets, investors and other policymakers," said Robert DiClemente, chief U.S. economist at Citigroup Global Markets. "He was able to arrest inflation without killing the expansion. That's really the ultimate victory."

Added Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), chairman of the Senate Budget Committee: "I think he's doing his level best to manage monetary policy in a way that will accommodate growth."

Certainly, the Bernanke Fed remains a work in progress. He promised greater openness, but despite months of discussion, the central bank's arcane methods of communicating with the public have not changed much. And the chairman's skills as a leader remain untested by a financial crisis or serious conflict among members of the policymaking Federal Open Market Committee.

Nonetheless, it's clear Bernanke is hitting his stride, according to observers in business, academia and finance.

"His judgment has been good and his luck has held up," said Allan H. Meltzer, author of a two-volume history of the Fed. "People are beginning to accept his leadership."

Bernanke's biggest challenge over the past year was deciding how high to raise borrowing costs to keep inflation under control. He stumbled in April when he told Congress the Fed might pause in its series of interest-rate increases. Coming at a time when financial markets were growing jittery about rising prices, his words prompted many investors to think the central bank had gone soft on inflation.

He compounded the confusion by telling a television reporter the markets had misread him, a comment he later described as "a lapse in judgment."

Bernanke calmed the markets by declaring his determination to squelch inflation and by leading the Fed to raise its benchmark short-term interest rates to 5.25 percent in June, the highest level in more than five years.

The harder decision was when to stop. The new Fed chief and his colleagues knew by the summer that the economy was cooling. And they wanted to avoid raising interest rates too high for fear the housing market might fall so far as to drag the economy into a recession.

So they stopped at their August meeting, leaving the benchmark rate unchanged for the first time after 17 consecutive increases over two years.

Some critics in the markets declared that borrowing costs were still too low to subdue inflation, while others said the Fed had already raised rates too far.

But Bernanke and his colleagues have held the rate steady since. They are likely to leave the rate unchanged at the end of their meeting today and tomorrow, and to indicate they might increase the rate again if inflation does not continue to fall. Many analysts now predict the Fed will remain on hold through this year.

Some observers said Bernanke's cautiousness marked a break with Greenspan's practice of raising rates aggressively to head off inflation, then easing them a bit a few months later when it was clear the danger had receded.

"We can never know what Greenspan would have done, but in the past he overshot," said Diane Swonk, chief economist of Mesirow Financial. The Bernanke Fed, by contrast, is "very worried about overshooting."

The August meeting also marked a shift in central bank communications under Bernanke. For the first time in three years, the Fed chairman did not signal to the markets the likely outcome of a policymaking meeting beforehand.

Instead, Bernanke sought to shift the markets' attention further into the future, using his congressional testimony in July to highlight the Fed policymakers' forecast for the economy over the next 18 months or more. This outlook represents how the economy should behave if the Fed adjusts interest rates correctly over time.

Bernanke has surprised observers by not pushing hard for the Fed to adopt an inflation target.

The Fed seeks to keep inflation low but does not specify a goal, as do many foreign central banks.

Bernanke had advocated the practice, known as "inflation targeting," during his years in academia and as a Fed Board member from 2002 to 2005 -- prompting expectations he would impose it as chairman.

But Bernanke took a gentler approach, asking his colleagues last year to consider inflation targeting among many options for improving communication with the public.

DOJ_NMG_0124207

After several months of discussion, it appears unlikely that they will adopt a formal target, such as 2 percent, but might agree to a softer goal -- perhaps a target range of, say, 1 to 2 percent. No decision is expected soon.

The decision to pause in August also resulted from a vigorous, collegial debate among the top policymakers at their meeting, as has become characteristic of the Bernanke Fed.

The Fed meetings are "more energized, more interactive, more spontaneous" than they were under Greenspan, said Laurence H. Meyer, a former Fed board member.

This reflects Bernanke's general effort to lead in a more low-key way than Greenspan, who had come to dominate and personify the Fed, as did his predecessor, Paul A. Volcker. Bernanke's aim is to strengthen the institution so it will succeed regardless of whether it has a great chairman.

The markets initially were nervous about whether Greenspan was up to the job when he succeeded Volcker in August 1987. But Greenspan quickly established his authority by calming the markets during the October 1987 stock crash, Meltzer said.

It is too soon to know how Bernanke's leadership style will work in a crisis or when there is disagreement within the Fed over policy, Meltzer said. "Let's see what happens if there is real conflict."

But, he added, "I think he's done a good job so far."

Fed Has Yet To Set Target On Inflation (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — When Ben S. Bernanke took over as chairman of the Federal Reserve Board one year ago this week, he brought with him a long-held conviction that the central bank should be more explicit about its goals and less personalized than it had been under Alan Greenspan.

Yet as Mr. Bernanke celebrates his first anniversary on the job, the Fed is still far away from acting on his major proposal of setting an explicit target for inflation.

Mr. Bernanke has long argued that publicly committing the central bank to an inflation target — probably 1 to 2 percent a year — would make its policy more transparent and open to the public. Its decisions would be easier for investors to anticipate, he argued, and the public might have greater confidence that inflation would indeed remain low.

It is an idea that Mr. Greenspan staunchly opposed, arguing that it would bind the Fed to rigid rules and deprive it of crucial flexibility in reacting to economic surprises.

But even though a majority of those on the Fed board agree with Mr. Bernanke in principle, officials have, if anything, become more cautious over the last year about making a change.

Fed officials caution that they have to wrestle with a thicket of intermediate issues before making a change. On Tuesday, policy makers gather for the start of a two-day meeting at which they will discuss one possible intermediate step: telling the public more about the Fed's economic forecasts.

But even that decision may be months away, and Fed officials appear even less urgent about committing themselves in public to a specific goal for inflation.

"There's just not a lot of enthusiasm for moving in any of these directions," said Laurence Meyer, a former Fed governor and a forecaster at Macroeconomic Advisers. "Nobody thought this was such an important issue."

Outside experts say the caution stems from deeper concerns: a reluctance to change a practice that appears to be working well already; a fear among some that the Fed may become trapped by its own promises; and perhaps a worry about opposition from Democratic lawmakers, who now control Congress and who have publicly fretted that the Fed will focus on inflation while ignoring unemployment.

As a practical matter, Mr. Bernanke will reach his first anniversary with the economy heading toward the Fed's goal of a "soft landing" — a modest slowdown in economic growth and a slight ebb in inflation, yet with strong wage increases and continued low unemployment.

DOJ_NMG_0124208

The Fed is all but certain to leave its benchmark overnight interest rate unchanged at 5.25 percent, and to signal once again that it remains slightly more worried about inflation than slower economic growth. In short, the Fed will continue its "pause" in raising rates and is unlikely to reduce rates later this year.

The outlook for Mr. Bernanke's goal of setting inflation targets is more uncertain. A majority of Fed governors and presidents of the Federal Reserve's district banks support the idea as an important move toward greater openness.

Indeed, the Federal Reserve Board now includes Frederic S. Mishkin, one of Mr. Bernanke's co-authors on a book in 1999 that championed inflation targeting. They are joined in the Fed's policy making by a raft of other influential officials who also support setting inflation targets: William Poole, president of the St. Louis Fed; Janet Yellen, president of the San Francisco Fed; and Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Richmond Fed.

The leading opponent of inflation targeting is Donald L. Kohn, the Fed's highly respected vice chairman. Timothy F. Geithner, president of the New York Fed, is also considered a skeptic.

Mr. Bernanke has taken pains to build a consensus before making any changes, and has gone so far as to put Mr. Kohn in charge of a special committee to review "communication issues," including the prospects for inflation targets.

But even many longtime supporters of the idea predict that the Fed is unlikely to change gears this year.

"The Fed has a somewhat odd problem in that things are going so well right now, and it's hard to push for change when things are going well," said Mark Gertler, an economics professor at New York University who has worked with Mr. Bernanke on many academic projects. "In the case of the United States, it's hard to argue that monetary policy would have performed better if we had had inflation targets."

Adam S. Posen, who was a co-author with Mr. Bernanke and Mr. Mishkin on their book about inflation targeting, said Mr. Bernanke would need at least a year to build consensus.

"Bernanke has to build three consensuses at once," said Mr. Posen, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics. In addition to persuading the Fed's other governors, Mr. Posen said, Mr. Bernanke must also build support from the central bank's influential staff and with Congress.

It remains unclear whether the Fed needs legislation from Congress to adopt explicit inflation targets. But many Democrats have been quick to criticize the central bank for not focusing enough attention on wages and job creation.

Indeed, the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee is Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts, who often challenged Mr. Greenspan about rising income inequality and stubbornly high unemployment.

Mr. Bernanke is set to testify about the economic outlook before Mr. Frank's committee on Feb. 15. In an indication that Mr. Bernanke will face a more combative political environment than he did last year, aides to Mr. Frank said he was planning a second hearing to get contrasting views from economists and people with "other real world experience."

But perhaps the biggest reason for the slow movement is that Mr. Bernanke's approach may not end up being much different from Mr. Greenspan's.

In recent years, Fed officials under Mr. Greenspan made it clear they had an informal target or "comfort zone" on inflation. For many, that zone was a "core" inflation rate — excluding volatile prices for food and energy — of 1 to 2 percent a year.

"If we asked 10 people who follow what the Fed does, we all know what the Fed's comfort zone is," said John Makin, an economist at the American Enterprise Institute.

Even if the Fed were to set a public target for inflation, Mr. Bernanke and other supporters have not said how quickly the Fed would need to meet the target.

Mr. Bernanke and others now stress that the Fed will not react mechanically if inflation climbs above the target, as it has over the last year. Mr. Bernanke has argued for defining an "optimal long-run inflation rate" and originally suggested the Fed should aim to hit that target within three years.

But some of Mr. Bernanke's allies now contend that there should be no specific time frame at all.

Bernanke Quietly Guides Economy (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124209

WASHINGTON — During a break at the Federal Reserve's annual economic conference last summer, the world's most powerful central banker sat quietly by himself in the expansive stone lobby of Wyoming's Jackson Lake Lodge, tapping away on a laptop computer as vacationers strolled by, unawares.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's relative anonymity was a major departure from the days of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, when people would spy the Fed meeting sign and hang around the conference room with cameras cocked for a photo of the financial superstar.

As he finishes his first year as chairman, the unassuming Bernanke, 53, doesn't have Greenspan's head-turning sway over the general public, at least not yet, but he does have firm control of the central bank and the growing confidence of financial markets.

The former Princeton professor, Fed governor and White House adviser has steered the central bank through a turning point in an economy that was confronting a tumbling housing market and uncomfortably high inflation. The Fed, which meets here today and Wednesday to review interest rate policy, has held the target for short-term interest rates steady since June after two years of raising it to combat inflation. Economic growth slowed in the second half of 2006, but the job market strengthened.

"I congratulate you and the Fed in keeping interest rates where the American people can stand and the economy can prosper," Jim Bunning, R-Ky., the sole senator to oppose Bernanke's nomination, told him this month.

Working with other regulators, the Bernanke Fed has also tightened guidelines for commercial real estate and mortgage lending and toughened standards for complex financial products misused by energy giant Enron.

The new year brings new challenges, including a Democrat-controlled Congress that could be less deferential to a Fed chairman and board of governors appointed entirely by President Bush. (It's the first time since Ronald Reagan that one president has had such sway over the makeup of the central bank.)

Greenspan's 2001 decision to endorse the Bush administration's tax cuts also frayed relations between the Fed and many Democrats, who blame current deficits partly on Bush's tax policy.

"He faces a significant challenge of restoring credibility," says Senate Budget Committee Chair Kent Conrad, D-N.D. "He's reached out."

Bernanke, who has made overtures to a number of Democrats, recently invited Conrad for lunch in his private dining room. The Fed chief testified before Conrad's committee this month, warning of a long-term budgetary "crisis." In a break from Greenspan, Bernanke declined to endorse precise tax or spending solutions, calling those political decisions for Congress.

"I enjoy him very much … he's not a backslapper, he's a thoughtful, serious man," Conrad says. "He's wise not to sink into the bog of specific policy recommendations. I don't think that's the job of the Federal Reserve chairman."

The Fed chairman's job is to guide the economy. Business leaders and economists have become more confident about Bernanke's approach, and the outlook for the economy, in recent weeks.

But it's early to declare that the Fed has achieved an economic "soft landing," in which growth slows enough that inflation fades, but the economy doesn't falter. The housing market remains in the doldrums, and Fed officials warn that inflation is too high.

Nearly all the 56 top economists surveyed by USA TODAY Jan. 18-24 expect the USA to avoid a recession. But they are split on whether slower growth or higher inflation poses a bigger threat ahead.

Bernanke's first year (he moved in on Feb. 1) took him from Europe to China and 11 of the 12 regional Fed banks. He settled into overseeing a staff of 2,000, parrying hours of congressional questioning and making a number of trips to New York for speeches and private meetings with financial leaders.

Bernanke's policy approach is evolving, though there are stylistic differences from Greenspan, who with his wife, NBC News chief foreign affairs correspondent Andrea Mitchell, remains prominent on the Washington social scene. Bernanke sightings at glitzy gatherings are limited: He's more likely to be with his wife, Anna, a teacher, at a play or in the stands at Washington Nationals baseball games.

That's not to say Bernanke isn't social. Even as chairman, he can be spotted eating lunch in the Fed cafeteria, plopping down at tables to talk with staff. He plays basketball in the Fed gym. He is a more natural mingler than Greenspan.

DOJ_NMG_0124210

Mark Pinsky, president of the Opportunity Finance Network, which encourages development in low-income areas, was appointed to the Fed's consumer advisory committee in 2002. Pinsky was a bit awestruck at his first Fed meeting, including a reception where everyone nervously awaited Greenspan.

"I look over, and there at this table is this guy who's just sitting there. He's calm and very friendly. … He looked like he could have been a senior economist," Pinsky recalls. "I said, 'Hi, I'm Mark,' and he said, 'Hi, I'm Ben.' "

After a quarter-hour of small talk Pinsky discovered who Bernanke was, but only because a staffer came looking for the then-Fed governor.

In November, Chairman Bernanke spoke at a conference on community development Pinsky organized, a notable event because he averages just about two public speeches a month.

Bernanke is less formal, but hardly laid-back, in private meetings.

"It was more Mr. Greenspan's style to sit and listen and then ask questions at the end. … It's more Mr. Bernanke's to carry on, in an almost conversational manner, give-and-take through the entire meeting," says Jerry Howard, executive vice president of the National Association of Home Builders, which warned against Fed rate increases.

"He clearly has certain things he wants to find out, and if it's not contained in the discussion as it's flowing, he brings it back," Howard says.

The American Bankers Association is another group that has differed with Fed policy, including the clampdown on real estate lending.

"When you meet with Bernanke, he is almost disarmingly frank. He gets to the point right away, and he gets the point you're making," says Wayne Abernathy, ABA executive director for financial institutions.

Abernathy calls Bernanke "almost judicial" in decision making, listening to a broad range of opinions and resisting snap judgments.

Internal Fed debates over interest rate policy have likewise become more open under Bernanke, though there was back-and-forth under Greenspan.

Richmond Fed President Jeffrey Lacker says Bernanke "encouraged open discussion, encouraged us to question and challenge each other's position" when he began running the Federal Open Market Committee, made up of Fed governors and regional bank presidents.

One example: When the FOMC discusses interest rate policy, Bernanke speaks last, unlike Greenspan, who went first, laying out where the central bank should go.

Bernanke's speeches and testimony are more direct than those of Greenspan, a master of deliberately tangled prose. After a few early missteps, Bernanke is becoming a more confident speaker.

Bernanke, like Greenspan, favors greater regulation of mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. He's stayed the course in such areas as international banking rules or oversight of hedge funds. The new chairman has devoted a fair amount of time to consumer issues and community development in public speeches and plans an address on rising income inequality — a major issue for the Democrats.

Scott Anderson, chief economist at Wells Fargo Bank, says Bernanke puts more emphasis on economic models and less on individual data points in setting interest rate policy. Still, Pinsky and others who have met with Bernanke say he is deeply immersed in data, though he may not use some of the more esoteric statistics Greenspan used to dig up.

Where there are differences from the Greenspan Fed, such as Bernanke's endorsement of inflation targeting — setting a specific range for allowable inflation — he is moving slowly to build consensus.

Early worries in the markets that Bernanke would be A) too tough or B) too soft on inflation have receded, as the Fed's decision to hold the target for short-term rates at 5.25% seems to be working to slow inflation without unduly harming the economy.

If anything, Fed officials in recent speeches say, the markets aren't concerned enough about inflation.

Though Bernanke has drawn a tighter line between economics and politics, it's too loose for some.

Kenneth Thomas, a professor at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School, says records of Bernanke's meetings with White House and other political officials in his first four months in office show he was basically non-political.

DOJ_NMG_0124211

But saying that a main duty of the chairman is guarding the independence of the Fed, Thomas faults Bernanke for visiting China in December with a delegation led by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson on currency and trade issues.

"For him to … spend all that time traveling around the world with the administration and Cabinet when he used to work at the White House is totally inappropriate," Thomas says.

Bernanke did travel to China on a separate, commercial flight.

Wake Forest professor James Wood, a central bank historian, says big changes in Fed policy usually result from political pressures. Since the late 1970s when then-chairman Paul Volcker tackled inflation, the Fed has had a consistent emphasis on stable prices. But large budget deficits, the escalating cost of the Iraq war and other fiscal issues could cause economic problems and prompt political calls for the Fed to once again allow higher inflation or take other steps to ease the fallout.

Bernanke has made it clear that the Fed is independent and committed to low inflation. In the past year, he's shown personal and policy skills, and signs that he has an ability to connect with the public that could come in handy.

Bernanke's efforts to build bridges with Democrats are helped by the fact that House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt represents his tiny hometown of Dillon, S.C.

Bernanke returned to Dillon last summer, after receiving the "Order of the Palmetto," the highest civilian honor bestowed by the state, recognizing lifetime achievement and service. In remarks, Bernanke described growing up, helping in his family's drugstore, waiting tables at the kitschy tourist attraction South of the Border and working construction.

"Now I am an economic policymaker, and I sit in a nice office in Washington looking at reports and tables of data and following the fluctuations of the financial markets," Bernanke said.

"I try not to forget what underlies all those data: millions of Americans working hard, trying to better themselves economically, struggling to manage their family finances and worrying about the price of gas and college tuition."

Good News, Bad News: US Economy Too Strong For Interest Rate Cuts (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, January 30, 2007

The US economy was expected to cool a bit along with temperatures this winter, but that slow patch is looking more like business as usual.

The housing slump is still serious. Detroit carmakers are still in trouble. But with oil prices dropping since last summer, overall economic activity keeps chugging along even as inflation looks to be easing.

The momentum has spoiled hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates anytime soon. The Fed is expected to note signs of strength in the economy, and continued vigilance against inflation, when it releases its latest policy statement Wednesday.

Otherwise, however, this is good news that eases worries about a possible recession – and suggests a year of economic growth that is closer to normal.

"It's a combination of very savvy monetary policy" by the Fed plus lower oil prices and a dip in mortgage rates, says Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight, an economic forecasting firm in Waltham, Mass. "You add all that up, it's a pretty good story."

Good enough that some forecasters have been ratcheting up their projections for US growth during 2007 and for the end of last year.

"We are revising our estimate for fourth-quarter growth to 3.3 percent (annual rate) from 2 percent previously," economists at Goldman Sachs, the New York investment firm, wrote after a solid report two weeks ago on sales by America's retailers.

Numbers on gross domestic product (GDP) for the fourth quarter of 2006, which includes holiday spending, are scheduled to be released Wednesday.

Many economists credit the Federal Reserve with having a steady hand on the monetary tiller. But they generally cite energy as been the biggest factor behind the recent economic strengthening.

Even though oil prices have edged up a bit in recent days, prices are well under last year's highs of close to $80 a barrel.

That has put more money in consumer pockets to spend on other things.

DOJ_NMG_0124212

"It's a dollar-a-gallon tax cut," says Michael Cosgrove, who publishes the Econoclast, a market newsletter in Dallas.

Gasoline prices have fallen from $3 a gallon at the beginning of August to $2.17 last week, according to the Energy Information Administration. Those prices could reverse, of course. That, and the path of the housing market, remain important uncertainties for 2007.

But Mr. Cosgrove sees a benign outlook for energy. Two years of rising oil prices resulted in a response by corporations, consumers, and governments around the world. Many are moving toward substitute fuels – from coal to ethanol. And conservation slowed the growth of oil demand.

"Oil prices will settle out at about $40 a barrel" in today's dollars, Cosgrove predicts. Over the next two or three years, he explains, "market forces will tend to eventually push prices down to their long-term average."

Not everyone expects prices to fall that far. And analysts including Cosgrove say a geopolitical crisis in the Middle East could always push oil back up to $80 a barrel.

But for now, even at this week's price around $55 a barrel, falling fuel prices have played another important role. They have eased concerns that the Fed may not have done enough to control inflation. In turn, that has helped to keep long-term interest rates in check, a boon for people buying houses or refinancing mortgages.

The average interest on a 30-year fixed-rate loan has fallen from 6.76 percent to 6.25 percent since last July, as tracked by Freddie Mac, a government-chartered home finance agency.

That dip has helped ease the strain of the worst housing downturn since the early 1990s. The volume of home sales has plunged and foreclosures have surged. But the trends would be worse if it cost more to take out a loan, or if it were harder for homeowners to refinance adjustable-rate mortgages at a decent price.

This has happened even as the Fed has been holding short-term rates steady for half a year now.

The central bank had raised short-term interest rates from mid-2004 through mid-2006, in an effort to bring monetary policy to a neutral zone, allowing the economy to grow without fueling inflationary pressures through easy credit.

Some analysts say that if the US economy stays on a smooth track, the Fed could continue to hold steady, with a target short-term interest rate of 5.25 percent, for much of this year.

"The Fed will probably be on hold for an extended period of time," says Cosgrove. That kind of low profile is "probably the way the Fed Reserve under ... [Chairman Ben] Bernanke would like to operate."

Some economists still see some recession risk, especially if the housing troubles persist.

And on the inflation front, others remain concerned that the Fed may need to tighten rates further if the economy gets hotter still. Inflation worries could push up long-term interest rates that, despite edging up recently, remain below 5 percent for Treasury bonds.

But for now, the growth scenario is on track. Mr. Bethune of Global Insight says his firm will probably bump up its GDP forecast for this year to about 2.7 percent growth – "very positive news."

A U.S. Law Firm Takes A New Route Into China (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel And Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

For brand-name law firms bent on global expansion, China poses a conundrum. Economic activity is generating plenty of legal work, but opening an office on the mainland is fraught with hurdles, from a shortage of legal talent to regulations that limit the work foreign lawyers can do.

Now, a U.S. firm thinks it has found a way to build business in China while avoiding some of the burdens. McDermott Will & Emery, a 1,000-lawyer firm founded in Chicago, has entered into a strategic alliance with Yuan Da Law Offices of Shanghai, which has around 25 lawyers. It's the first formal tie-up between a Western and a mainland China firm, and a bold move, given that regulations bar international firms from fully merging with Chinese counterparts.

"The scale ... is far more than that of a start-up," says Harvey Freishtat, chairman of McDermott, which is making its first foray into the country. Under the alliance, the Yuan Da firm will now be known for marketing purposes as MWE China Law Offices inside and outside China. The firms will share clients -- for instance, each providing legal assistance in their areas of expertise.

DOJ_NMG_0124213

But, to comply with Chinese law, McDermott and MWE can't share the profit. The U.S. firm must account separately for its work and the revenue it brings in.

The strategic alliance is structured so that McDermott stands to reduce its costs if MWE increases the amount of work it does for clients.

Mr. Freishtat says he's particularly pleased to avoid the headache of building a mainland operation from scratch.

Many other big law firms have flocked to mainland China to advise multinational clients and snag new ones in the country's burgeoning corporate sector. Last year, 14 foreign firms opened offices in mainland China, about the same as in each of the two previous years, according to legal consultant Hildebrandt International Inc. When firms enter the market, they mostly send partners to China and hire local Chinese lawyers. Peter Zeughauser, who advised McDermott and Yuan Da on their alliance, says firms generally expect to invest $3 million to $4 million over three-to-five years to build a mainland office before they can hope to be in the black.

The problem isn't a lack of business. Last year saw $69.5 billion in foreign direct investment into China -- fueling demand for cross-border legal services in such areas as securities offerings, deals and trade disputes. Chinese companies themselves are becoming increasingly attractive clients as they pursue public offerings and overseas acquisitions. Last year, for example, Chinese companies raised $37.5 billion in IPOs on the Hong Kong stock exchange -- deals that, because of Hong Kong's common-law tradition and Western-style securities regulation, create demand for international legal expertise.

Many law firms have long served the China market from Hong Kong, where it is easier for foreign firms to set up. But firms are increasingly turning to the mainland to get better access to Chinese corporate and government clients.

But mainland China poses particular challenges for these outside lawyers. Besides unfriendly regulations, there's a shortage of top legal talent and there are clients who recoil at Western billing rates for lawyers' advice. "You have a situation where people can appreciate makeup or Starbucks, and won't hesitate to pay for that, but they are just starting to understand what it means to have a good lawyer," says Carmen Chang, the Palo Alto-based head of the China practice at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, which has six lawyers in Shanghai.

McDermott's entry into the market stands out. It is licensing its name to Yuan Da, for a fee. McDermott is also investing in telephones and computers, among other expenses, for MWE China to fully integrate the new entity into its global network. (McDermott has 14 offices around the world.) McDermott will send its lawyers to Shanghai on a periodic basis, and it will co-host business seminars and share clients with its new business partner. MWE China plans to represent multinationals, as well as public and emerging Chinese companies.

The McDermott alliance took about 18 months to ink, in large part because of China's vague rules governing foreign law firms. Enacted in 2001, the regulations bar foreign firms from practicing Chinese law but allow them to advise on China's "legal environment." Foreign lawyers cannot issue formal opinions interpreting Chinese law nor represent clients in a Chinese court. But some firms take the position that they can, for example, counsel a client about how they expect China's environmental laws will evolve.

Since MWE China will practice Chinese law, McDermott cannot share in the entity's profits. What it can do is boast to existing clients that it has on-the-ground legal expertise in China, and thus hopefully ensure its clients don't turn to another Western firm with an office on the mainland when they do business in China. McDermott will also gain access to MWE's Chinese clients, and can team up with MWE in providing legal work to them, though it can't advise on Chinese law.

Other foreign firms also routinely team up with Chinese firms on matters requiring Chinese-law expertise, but the firms enter these ventures on a more informal, one-time basis. John Huang, a partner at MWE China, says that before allying with McDermott on an exclusive basis, he worked with several brand-name U.S. firms. Mr. Huang, who previously founded AllBright Law Offices of Shanghai, widely considered a top firm in the city, left to form Yuan Da.

Other firms may be slow to follow McDermott's lead, in part because they may prefer to have the flexibility to partner with any Chinese firm of their choosing on a deal, says Xiaoming Li, a partner in the Beijing office of White & Case LLP. The McDermott alliance requires the firm to use MWE China lawyers.

Though the deal has been officially finalized, some lawyers in China say this new kind of alliance could nevertheless rattle Chinese regulators. "It might be a hefty step into gray areas," says Guy Himsworth, a London-based consultant with Hildebrandt.

DOJ_NMG_0124214

Last year, the Shanghai Lawyers Association issued a memo claiming that foreign firms had drafted contracts, performed due diligence on Chinese companies and offered other services that "far exceeded what is allowed" by law. The memo caused widespread anxiety, but it hasn't been followed by official government action.

"People scrutinize everything these days," says Mr. Freishtat of the alliance. "We go into this with a confidence that this is very much in keeping with the intent and direction of Chinese law."

One problem McDermott avoids is recruiting. Despite its population of about 1.3 billion, China has only about 115,000 full-time lawyers, according to the latest count. The country, long run by Communist Party fiat, is still developing many of the basic foundations of a legal system.

Western lawyers describe their ideal candidate to work in a China office as someone with a Chinese law degree, an international law degree from the U.S. or U.K., and a few years of practice experience with an international firm. But such people are hard to find and much in demand. "Getting the talent is a constant struggle," says Nick Seddon, managing director of DLA Piper LLP's Asian practice. The firm has more than 40 lawyers in mainland China, a mix of local hires and expatriates.

Fees can also bring sticker shock. Lester Ross, a partner in the five-lawyer Beijing office of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP, says last year he quoted a fee to a Chinese manufacturer in the low hundreds of thousands of dollars for a trade matter. The company countered with $15,000. "We immediately declined," says Mr. Ross.

Lawyers Split On Fitness For Office (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Linda Singer was not looking for a new job, she said. She was not even looking to practice law anymore.

She was running a nonprofit group in the District, and for years, she had told the state of New York -- where she had been admitted to the bar -- that she was retired from the law, with no intention of practicing again.

So, Singer said, she was surprised when D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D) came calling and offered her the job as attorney general over breakfast at Four Seasons.

The 40-year-old Harvard Law School graduate was not a member of the D.C. Bar until this month, despite having lived and worked in Washington for more than a decade. For 13 years, she had led a Washington-based network of nonprofit organizations called Appleseed, which harnesses pro bono work by law firms to study problems in such areas as education, health care and immigration.

Singer's work at Appleseed focused on policy -- stimulating ideas, advocating change and raising money. It was very little like the job as the city's top lawyer that she assumed this month. And in law offices around town, that has people wondering whether she is the right fit for her new post, which she holds in an acting capacity as she awaits confirmation by the D.C. Council.

She takes charge of a staff of several hundred people with a variety of responsibilities, which include reviewing the city's bond deals on Wall Street, defending municipal agencies in court, prosecuting juvenile offenders, and cracking down on deadbeat parents and usurious lenders.

"She's going to be in the middle of lots and lots of cases of every kind, and that's not been her most recent experience," said Walter Smith, who was second-in-command of the old D.C. counsel office in the mid-1990s.

Smith can look at Singer's appointment from two perspectives. He is the executive director of the DC Appleseed Center for Law and Justice, one of Appleseed's affiliates. "It will be new to her," he said of the city job. "But that doesn't mean she won't be equal to it."

It was DC Appleseed, under Smith's predecessor, that catalogued the chronic failings of the city's law office -- long known as the office of the corporation counsel and renamed under Robert J. Spagnoletti, whom Singer succeeds.

Legal luminaries who have led the office include: John Payton, who came from a partnership at Wilmer Cutler Pickering; John S. Ferren, who stepped down from the D.C. Court of Appeals; and the late Charles F.C. Ruff, a former U.S. attorney who left a partnership at Covington & Burling.

Singer said she thinks that she is well-prepared, too: "I think that the skills that the job requires are skills that I have developed through my career."

DOJ_NMG_0124215

After graduating from law school in 1991, Singer spent two years as a public defender in Manhattan. Then she came to Washington and was the founding director of Appleseed, which grew from a one-person operation with a $70,000 budget into a 17-office, 70-employee national organization with a budget of several million dollars.

Singer said she was especially proud of two studies during her time at Appleseed: One examined immigrant remittances and the practices of the money-transfer industry. The other looked into the No Child Left Behind Act and the usefulness of the information available to parents as a result of the education law.

She said she had no reason to belong to the bar in New York or Washington because she was not representing clients. "Quite frankly, I was busy. It wasn't that I was looking for things to do. I was working more than full time running a national organization," she said.

In choosing an attorney general with so much experience in social and organizational change -- and so little in the office's traditional areas of practice -- Fenty is staking out a robust role for Singer in changing some of the most dysfunctional corners of government.

In an interview, Fenty said that he wanted an attorney general without a "traditional government background" and that he had not expected to land someone of Singer's caliber.

"I've known Linda for a few years, and she's always struck me as just one of the brightest minds in the city, legal or otherwise," Fenty said.

A mother of two, Singer lives in Forest Hills with her husband, Joe Sternlieb, and she came to know Fenty after meeting him at her children's elementary school, she said. She and Sternlieb are friends with City Administrator Dan Tangherlini. Sternlieb is active in local political circles and was on a Fenty transition committee that handled environmental issues.

Singer said she did some modest work for Fenty's mayoral campaign, helping set up a lawyers committee that organized a gathering.

It turned out to be a fateful effort nonetheless. The event was to be at Covington & Burling, and in helping put it together, Singer met Peter J. Nickles, a partner at the firm and a close friend of the Fenty family's. Nickles is known for his pro bono legal crusade for better conditions at Oak Hill, the District's juvenile detention facility in Maryland, and Fenty chose him to be his counsel and senior adviser.

Lawyers who know Nickles say they expect him to have a broader role than his predecessor, Leonard H. Becker, and that the attorney general's office and Singer could end up subordinated to Nickles.

"Who's going to be driving the legal ship?" wondered a lawyer who has worked for the District government and knows Nickles.

"The axis of power has moved from the AG's office to the mayor's office," said another lawyer, who knows Nickles and Singer and deals frequently with the District government.

The lawyers spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the power of the attorney general's office.

In an interview, Nickles said he expects to be a "very forceful voice" in some cases, especially in dealing with agencies that have been operating under court supervision. "I'm going to be spending a lot of time on the issues," he said. "I may appear in the court. I may try cases."

Singer said she, too, is determined to do more with those troubled agencies.

"Turning over the government to monitors, receivers and judges is a very tough answer," she said. "They're hugely expensive, and so money that could be providing services ends up going to paying experts, masters, all of those folks."

Jonathan M. Smith, executive director of the Legal Aid Society of the District of Columbia, said that in many states, including Maryland and New York, the attorney general's office has become a potent force and that the same potential exists in the District.

"You'll see that there's a lot of proactive litigation that can be brought against bad actors, and I think that's one place where Linda's experience at Appleseed will serve her well," Smith said. "She's thought about how to bring big cases and about big systemic issues."

DOJ_NMG_0124216

But Smith has watched the office long enough to know that the job is a bear for even the best lawyers. "There's a risk," he said, "that she'll come in with this great vision but that the day-to-day will quickly grind her down and make it impossible for her to execute that vision."

One of Singer's predecessors, Payton, said she is smart and energetic enough to handle one of the hardest jobs in D.C. government. "This is going to depend on her leadership," said Payton, who is at Wilmer Cutler's successor, WilmerHale. "And I think she has plenty of leadership abilities."

Each Stored Embryo Is A Stem Cell Debate (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, January 30, 2007

SAN DIEGO — Ingrid Jansson peers through a vapor of liquid nitrogen at frozen embryos conceived for her in a petri dish four years ago. It's the first time she's eyed the surplus from the in vitro fertilization procedure that brought her son Dylan, now 3, into the world.

"It's surreal," says Jansson, 39, as an embryologist fishes out the thin straw containing eight embryos stored at a fertility clinic where she was treated and now works as a nurse. "I don't think about them much, because I have two (children) at home that keep me busy."

As Congress renews debate about funding stem cell research using human embryos, people such as Jansson are thinking hard about what to do with excess embryos after their families are complete. Only they — not politicians, doctors or ethicists — are legally entitled to make the call.

It's not easy, even for Jansson, who does volunteer work helping fertility patients donate their leftover embryos to the Stem Cell Resource, an embryo bank here that provides them free to researchers. She and her husband, Jon Gardner, 41, never imagined they'd have spares after all they did to get pregnant. Now they disagree on what to do.

Jansson, who is not religious, wants to donate her embryos for research. She says giving them to an infertile couple is "not an option" because it "would be like giving away my own child, my own DNA." Gardner is Catholic, and he objects. He says stem cell research, which dismantles embryos, is "destroying human life" and opposes it for his "son's siblings." Says Jansson, "It's very difficult for us to decide."

Much attention has been focused on potential beneficiaries of stem cell research, such as actor and Parkinson's patient Michael J. Fox. Less notice has been given to those who literally give up a piece of themselves to make research possible.

How they decide will help determine the future of research into embryonic stem cells, the master cells from which scientists hope to develop treatments for diabetes, Alzheimer's and other diseases. Scientists hope to find cures using adult or amniotic fluid stem cells, but researchers like George Daley of Harvard say they are not a substitute for embryonic stem cells, which potentially can become any cell in the body.

Behind the public controversy is a private decision with moral, ethical and religious considerations. It is made even more complex by financial restrictions on stem cell research by the federal government — the nation's largest funder of medical research — and a crazy quilt of state laws and programs.

"It's a painful decision, so (patients) just put it off," says Lucinda Veeck Gosden, director of embryology at the in vitro fertilization (IVF) clinic at Weill-Cornell Medical School in New York. The clinic's 9,000 embryos fill 20 tanks, and storage is "a major problem," she says.

Fertility doctors create embryos by removing eggs from a woman's fallopian tubes and fertilizing them with sperm in a petri dish. Because of the pain and expense — one IVF cycle can cost up to $10,000 — and a failure rate of more than 60%, doctors routinely create more embryos than they implant in a woman's uterus. Those left over are frozen for possible use later.

Critics say embryo banks that cater to stem cell researchers will encourage fertility doctors to produce even more embryos. "It's appalling," says Richard Doerflinger, an ethicist with the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, which says life begins at conception and which opposes IVF as "the next step toward commodifying human lives as research material."

DOJ_NMG_0124217

Others ethicists, such as Yuval Levin, executive director of the President's Council on Bioethics in President Bush's first term, say embryo banks may actually help avert undue influence on parents, because the banks try to "stand as a barrier between the researcher and the IVF clinic."

It is unclear how many embryos are stored at the nation's 450 fertility clinics. A 2003 study by RAND Corp., a think tank, estimated there were 400,000. Most were being saved for future fertility treatments. Just 2.8% were designated for research.

Some fertility doctors report storing embryos for a decade or more and say as many as 10% are abandoned. "There are people who just leave them and move and forget about them," says Richard Scott of Reproductive Medicine Associates in Morristown, N.J.

Patients with frozen embryos have four options: Discard them, give them to other couples, pay hundreds of dollars a year to store them at minus-310 degrees Fahrenheit, or donate them to medical research.

University of Pennsylvania bioethicist Arthur Caplan says many IVF clinics don't discuss embryo donation with patients because of moral concerns or confusion about what's legal. Fertility treatment, not usually covered by health insurance, "is a cash business," he says. Doctors "are very sensitive to image," noting that clinics want to avoid anything that hints at controversy.

At Weill-Cornell, "we've avoided it," says Gosden. She says 54% of her clinic's patients who have finished their families ask to have their embryos destroyed, 43% donate them to basic science unrelated to stem cells, and 3% offer them to other infertile couples.

Stem cell research using embryos is legal in New York and all but a few other states.

In California, voters in 2004 approved $3 billion over 10 years for stem cell research. Lawsuits by opponents have bottled up the money, but the state-funded California Institute for Regenerative Medicine expects them to be resolved soon and is soliciting grant proposals. At least four other states, including Illinois and New Jersey, fund embryonic stem cell research.

Without the federal government's financial support, though, scientists say progress toward cures using embryonic stem cells has been slowed.

On Aug. 9, 2001, President Bush approved federal funding for research on 78 existing stem cell lines derived from destroyed embryos. He banned the use of taxpayer dollars for research on lines created after that date. The move was a compromise to advance medical knowledge while addressing moral qualms.

Research in other countries, including Australia and Israel, has leapt ahead, says Evan Snyder, director of stem cell research at the private Burnham Institute here. He says most federally sanctioned lines were "garbage" because scientists rushed to cultivate them "under the deadline." The result, he says, were inferior lines, because they usually take months or years to develop. Today, there remain just 22 lines in the USA. Because they were nourished with material from lab mice, they are not suitable for human use.

"The new lines are better," says Snyder, whose institute maintains labs on separate floors to avoid mixing the federally approved colonies and the newer, privately funded lines. "They grow better. They are more manageable. They don't die as quickly."

Which is why the Democratic-controlled Congress took up a bill in its first week to allow federal funding for new stem cell lines derived from fertility clinic embryos that would otherwise be discarded. The measure would require written consent from patients, who could not be paid. The House of Representatives approved it 253-174. The Senate is likely to pass the measure next month.

Bush vetoed an identical bill in July and says he'll do it again. It's unclear whether Congress could muster the two-thirds support required to override his veto.

In the meantime, "there is this climate in which people may be worried" about supplying embryos to scientists when there is a lack of federal support for the research, says Mary Devereaux, a bioethicist at the University of California-San Diego.

Mary and Brian Brooks always knew they would donate any extra embryos to stem cell research. "We felt strongly that would be a very good and ethical and proper use for them," she says. "It was a no-brainer."

So after having two children by IVF and expecting a third this spring that was conceived naturally, the St. Paul couple last September called the New Jersey clinic where their 13 excess embryos were stored to ask how they could donate them to scientists. "They told us because of the current political climate, there wasn't any place taking (donated) embryos for stem cell research," says Mary, 32, a former art teacher.

DOJ_NMG_0124218

Brian, 33, a scientist with two doctorates, was skeptical. He got on the Internet and discovered the Stem Cell Resource, founded in 2003 as one of the nation's first privately funded, non-profit embryo banks. When Mary phoned, Jansson answered. She said the couple would have to sign a four-page consent form that made clear they would not be paid for the embryos or any "discovery based on the use of your cells."

After the couple signed, the bank arranged for the embryos to be shipped to San Diego in a deep-freeze canister. The bank paid the $750 cost. The embryos are now among 1,000 others, all frozen at less than 5 days old, stored in a 47-liter liquid nitrogen tank beneath a counter in an 8-by-20-foot lab. The bank's location is kept secret for security reasons.

When the embryos arrived, they were given a registry number. All identifying information was removed and sent to a data storage company in Los Angeles. Researchers who want intact embryos or stem cells removed from them must submit detailed proposals for approval by the bank's scientific review committee. No money changes hands. So far, the nearby Burnham Institute has created 21 new or potential stem cell lines from banked embryos in order to study cystic fibrosis and diseases caused by chromosomal abnormalities.

A handful of other organizations also connect embryo donors and scientists. One of the nation's largest fertility clinics, Boston IVF, has provided excess embryos to researchers at Harvard University since 2001. And the University of California, San Francisco, runs its own tissue bank to provide embryos to researchers.

The Stem Cell Resource gets three or four inquiries a week from prospective donors who hear about it through word-of-mouth. It doesn't advertise.

David Smotrich, a fertility doctor who runs an IVF clinic here, founded the bank with nearly $300,000 of his own money. The aim, he says, was to combat what he calls the "stagnation" of the Bush policy and help speed cures. A nephew has autism and an uncle suffers from Alzheimer's. Smotrich, 43, says his passion comes from his immigrant grandfather, who taught him the Jewish concept of tikkun olam. "It means to better the world," he says. "It may sound corny, but that's the reason I originally got started in this."

One of his patients, Alexandra Chisholm-Chait, calls herself "a person of faith" but says government should not be "instituting religious morality on research." After $250,000 in fertility treatment, including 14 rounds of IVF and a daughter born through a surrogate mother, she is weighing what to do with four embryos.

Chisholm-Chait, 44, is leaning toward giving them to another infertile couple. About 150 babies have been born that way since 1998, Levin estimates. Chisholm-Chait's husband, Nicholas Abboud, wants to donate them for stem cell research so more people could benefit. One thing they agree on is that they must come to an agreement. "What good is it serving anybody in a state of frozen perpetuity?" she asks. "They're not going away, so you have to decide what to do with them."

GOP Right Sees Lemons In White House Race (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, January 30, 2007

Contemplating the current field of Republican presidential candidates, Rush Limbaugh sounded like a man with malaise.

"To be honest with you, there's nobody out there that revs me up," he confessed to his audience of several million conservative sympathizers on his radio show last week, "so why should I pretend there is?"

What for much of the past year has been an undercurrent of grumbling on the right about the top tier of Republican contenders -- Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani -- is lately on the rise in both frequency and volume. Limbaugh's sour note is the most striking of examples.

From consultants to bloggers to talk show hosts, there is a climate of suspicion -- at times bordering on contempt -- among conservative activists about their 2008 choices.

McCain is courting social and economic conservatives this year, but still faces grave doubts because of his past attacks on conservative religious leaders and his frequent willingness to make common cause with Democrats. Romney, who is positioning himself as the true conservative alternative, faces charges of opportunism because of his recent past as a social moderate.

DOJ_NMG_0124219

Giuliani's potential candidacy would test whether a leader with liberal views on abortion and gay rights could prosper in a party whose activists are steadfastly opposed to both.

Some activists see all three men failing the test. "The party is headed for the wilderness," complained conservative publicist Craig Shirley, author of a book on Ronald Reagan's insurgent 1976 campaign. "In some ways it's a victim of its own successes, but it's also been co-opted by folks from the inside with less than pure intentions: People who've come to party for power, money, access, celebrity."

Romney "is a question mark" who has "got problems because of his past," Shirley observed. As for McCain and Giuliani: "I don't know of any conservative who is excited about either one of them."

"I really feel strongly that if the slate is what we have now, then we're not going to win in 2008," added Erick Erickson, the founder of the influential blog, RedState. Erickson, who recently posted an entry about the GOP contenders titled "They All Suck," said in an interview that he's "not sure if there is a Republican out there who can win" the general election next year.

"Where do social conservatives go?" asked Dan Schnur, a California-based Republican consultant who worked for McCain in 2000 but is staying out of the 2008 contest. "They've been the determining force in the nomination process for a generation and they've got no candidate in the top tier."

Plenty of people are trying to prove Schnur wrong. McCain's advisers are betting that the disdain toward the Arizonan among many of the most vocal activists will not prove representative of primary voters. Running in a party that counts many Baptists, Romney may find a sympathetic audience for his story of conversion on social issues -- if he can convince people that he saw the light on the road to Damascus, not the White House.

Giuliani, who is the leading GOP contender in many polls, derives his national appeal largely from his record of cutting crime in New York, combined with his leadership amid the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. But one can imagine the reaction among those on the, say, Pottawattamie County, Iowa, Republican committee when they're reminded by the media and Giuliani's opponents about his social views, or the fact that he once decamped from Gracie Mansion and moved in with a gay male couple and their pet Shih Tzu, Bonnie, while awaiting his second divorce.

There are many contenders in the second tier who would like to fancy themselves as conservative alternatives to the top trio. But even the lesser-known candidates have their flaws. Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback is trying to get to the right of Romney and emphasizes his cultural conservative bona fides. But for many in the base, his stance on immigration is unacceptable. And then there are those pesky quotes surfacing from his own past that tie him to the moderate wing of the Kansas GOP and raise questions about just how committed to the conservative movement he is.

Former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, another dark horse, is a Baptist preacher by trade with unimpeachable social credentials. Yet Huckabee has already turned off many conservatives because he raised taxes as governor -- a cardinal sin in internal GOP politics.

The one candidate who does seem to be generating excitement among activists is also one who by all evidence will not run: Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

In separate interviews, two prominent Republican strategists in Washington used almost identical language to lament that the incumbent president's brother will spend 2008 on the sidelines.

"If his last name was 'Smith' instead of 'Bush,' Jeb would be the front-runner," said one. "If he were 'Jeb Smith' instead of 'Jeb Bush' he'd probably be at the top of the pack right now," said the other.

So, for the first time in decades, the GOP is left in unfamiliar uncertainty. The party that had a Nixon, Bush or Dole on every ticket for a half-century but one is now left with none of the above. Add in an unpopular war and unpopular president and it's clear why the editors of National Review included a question for a headline on the cover of their latest issue: "What Now?"

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by gidget7 on 01.29.2007 at 11:36 PM

Nowhere in your column did I see mention of the best candiadate out there, the best of the best. too!

DOJ_NMG_0124220

Congressman Duncan Hunter! The grassroots of the Republican party will be passionate about supporting him, and all the GOP has to do is get his name out there. His stance on ALL the issues and he himself, will do the rest.

And He CAN WIN!

by dslinkard on 01.29.2007 at 11:25 PM

I see where you are going with this, especially with McCain...I think it will probably come down to a Giuliani and IF Hillary receives the Democratic nod, I think there will be many fence riders who will sway over towards Giuliani and the GOP. What will help and hurt Rudy is the fact he is pro-choice and pro-gay marriage. I hope all on here will come over to www.conservative-majority.com and leave your perspectives there as well.

by Calvin Jones and the 13th Apostle on 01.29.2007 at 11:21 PM

DSLinkard, What has McCain done to deserve a shot? Rudy? Rudy's record isn't great. Out of the top 4 in the Republican race(that means including Newt), you know which one has had only one wife, right? Ask Huckabee about Wayne Dumond. In case you don't know, Dumond will become Huckabee's Willie Horton. Jeb Bush? He can thank his brother for making the Bush name poisonous. Did I see someone mention Rick "Man-on-Dog" Santorum? How badly did Bob Casey kick his ass? by 20 points, and Casey didn't even campaign.

by dslinkard on 01.29.2007 at 11:17 PM

Yeah the Clinton years...Clinton did nothing after attacks in 1993; 1996; 1998; 2000...oh yeah, how about the economy headed for a recession? Three words...Dot Com Bust. It's amazing how as time goes by, people truly forget what it was like under Clinton.

by JayPe on 01.29.2007 at 11:07 PM

Hillary Clinton can survive dynasty allegations as the Clinton years are remembered fondly. Not so Jeb Bush, his brothers incompetence will be a massive barrier to overcome. In todays image and money driven political climate though, he may have a shot in 8 years time.

I wonder what job he'll get in the meantime? Florida's Dem senate seat isn't up til 2012, and he's unlikely to challenge Crist in 2010.

by copperhead on 01.29.2007 at 11:06 PM

Rudi is a conservative... LOL. Of course, I think the term "conservative" is a dynamic term these days. This guy: trashed his wife on national television multiple times; moved in with a pair of homosexuals; and drools for more gun control. Yeah... he's real electable.

by roadette on 01.29.2007 at 11:05 PM

I think Newt Gingrich has a really good chance of getting the Republican nomination. I heard him in Virginia, campaigning for George Allen, and he is the only one who generates conservative excitement. He will be able to say he has spent time in the wilderness and learned his lesson.

He continues to push his newsletters and I believe he has compiled quite a large database of names.

by JayPe on 01.29.2007 at 11:03 PM

Back to the article...

"If his last name was 'Smith' instead of 'Bush,' Jeb would be the front-runner,"

History can be very ironic. If the Governor of Texas in 1999 had been George Smith he would never have become President.

by dslinkard on 01.29.2007 at 10:59 PM

I agree PeteF, I agree! I have some thoughts here about Islamo-Fascists, as well as Hillary on President Bush.

by toasting_tokyo on 01.29.2007 at 10:57 PM

Wonder why Pat Robertson hasn't got into this? He seems like a right wing no-brainer.

by PeteF on 01.29.2007 at 10:42 PM

Rudy IS a conservative - lowered taxes, cut crime, reformed welfare, all in NYC. Most importantly he will take a robust stance against Islamofascist terrorism.

by dslinkard on 01.29.2007 at 10:40 PM

Oh yeah, for MBoehm, that would be oxycontin with Rush...why even try and make fun of him, if you cannot even get the drug right? Maybe you should have another vicodin.

by dslinkard on 01.29.2007 at 10:38 PM

Now this is funny...let's look at the Republican Party and yes there is not ONE leading candidate jumping out right now. My guess is that it is going to come down to McCain or Guiliani with Guiliani receiving the nod.

Now, take it over to the Democratic ticket, let's see here...Hillary Rodham Clinton? Barack Hussein Obama? Before you guys condemn the Republican Party please tell me, what makes Hillary or Barack qualified to hold the position of Commander-in-Chief?

Let me break it down further...

What has Hillary truly done that was significant in the Senate? Same question for Obama who has been in just over 2 years?

by alwaysamarine on 01.29.2007 at 10:26 PM

Sadly, it appears that the investment conservatives have made in the GOP over the past generation has not yielded the anticipated returns.Greatness in the Republican mold may have passed away with Ronald Reagan, and it appears that there is no one on the horizon who can lead both the GOP and the conservative movement. The top three candidates for president that could do so have all decided to sit 2008 out. Jeb Bush, Rick Santorum and Fred Thompson all have conservative bonafides and would likely lead Republicans back to electoral dominance. Alas, all we can do is daydream of what might have been. Instead, we will most likely have to hold our noses to vote or sit the 2008 election out entirely. The Bush tax cuts are going to expire,and we will surely see an end to the Mexico City policy as well as any hope for reforming Social Security or the tax code. Republicans have failed to learn that big government is not good government as long as it's Republican government. What a shame that there is no one to show them the way back.

by mboehm on 01.29.2007 at 10:16 PM

Boo hoo for Rush and his ilk. Take a few more vicodin and wait until 2012 when you can push Jeb Bush against the reelection campaign of President Obama.

by hslocal on 01.29.2007 at 07:41 PM

For the first time ever, I think Rush Limbaugh is correct.

by hslocal on 01.29.2007 at 07:40 PM

For the first time ever, I think Rush Limbaugh is correct.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

TESTING THE LIMITS How Mitt Romney Avoided Campaign-Finance Rules (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal law limits how much money individuals can give to presidential candidates -- $2,300 per election. But what about Compuware Inc. founder Peter Karmanos? Last year, he gave $250,000 to presidential aspirant and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. Since 2004, 15 other Romney backers have sunk at least $100,000 each into the Republican's coffers, sometimes with a series of checks issued on a single day.

Because he doesn't hold federal office, Mr. Romney became subject to the federal rules only after he set up a presidential exploratory committee earlier this month. Until then, his team took advantage of a little-noticed gap between federal and state law. While most states limit political donations, about a dozen don't. Mr. Romney's political team set up fund-raising committees in three of those: Michigan, Iowa and Alabama. During that time, his political action committees raised $7 million.

As a result, Mr. Romney was able to hit the ground running, a big advantage in what has already become a feverish race. A week after announcing his possible bid, having already taken care of basic campaign logistics such as hiring and office space, the former governor held a Boston fund-raiser that netted $6.5 million in pledges. Mr. Romney also used the cash to build a broad network of financial backers and grass-roots allies.

Mr. Romney's financial network is in a long tradition of candidates working around post-Watergate campaign-finance rules. In the 1980s and 1990s, candidates dodged limits by steering big checks to party committees, which in turn paid for television ads and turnout efforts. The 1990s also saw the rise of lawmakers' "leadership" committees, some of which were set up in a way that allowed them to collect big, unlimited checks. Members of Congress used these accounts to help colleagues and for travel expenses.

In 2000, then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush recruited volunteers who "bundled" small checks from friends and families into packets that totaled as much as $100,000. In return, top fundraisers got inside access to Mr. Bush and his team, the very result the donation limits were designed to prevent.

Congress clamped down in 2002 with a major revamping of campaign-finance laws that banned unlimited donations to party and leadership committees. But innovative fund-raising techniques continue to mushroom as the cost of campaigning rises ever higher.

In 2004, both Mr. Bush and John Kerry, the Democratic nominee, opted out of the government's subsidized financing system to win their nominations, spending an unprecedented $250 million each before agreeing to rejoin public funding for the general election. This year, experts expect the two major-party candidates to push combined costs to over a billion dollars.

Like Mr. Romney, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack has a nonfederal committee, which collected more than $500,000 from labor unions before he became a Democratic presidential candidate. The 2002 campaign-finance law forbids such contributions to federal politicians or anyone who has officially opened a committee exploring a run for federal office. Mr. Vilsack, like Mr. Romney, isn't a federal office holder.

Ditto former New York Gov. George Pataki, who has a $100,000 backer, Patrick E. Malloy III, a Sag Harbor developer. Mr. Malloy's September donation to the Iowa arm of Mr. Pataki's 21st Century Freedom PAC makes up nearly half the contributions to the state account, according to the latest reports filed just before the November elections.

Meredith McGehee, policy director at the nonpartisan Campaign Legal Center, a Washington, D.C., group that tracks issues relating to money and politics, says the tactic undermines a basic purpose of federal limits: preventing big donors from buying access. "Do we expect those who gave him large amounts in the infancy of his campaign will be especially remembered later on? Absolutely. That seed money is sometimes the most critical part of your campaign."

Based on some polls and early organizing strength, Mr. Romney is considered among the top three Republican candidates, alongside Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Benjamin Ginsberg, the Romney campaign's chief attorney, says the committees were set up to help state and local Republicans, not necessarily Mr. Romney's presidential campaign. Criticism of the fund-raising tactic, he says, is "Washington-centric" and "disrespectful" of states' power to establish their own rules. "Mr. Romney complied with the letter, spirit and intent of state laws where state candidates were on the ballot," he says. The committees' spending and fund-raising efforts are disclosed in state capitols.

In the past three years, Mr. Romney's network donated $1.4 million to Republican candidates, the campaign says. A big chunk of the rest went to Mr. Romney's travel, staff and national consultants. Spencer Zwick, Mr. Romney's national finance director, says the national spending was needed to help raise money for local races.

Mr. Zwick says the state political action committees, as they're called, were designed for quick fund-raising and maximum flexibility. Some local candidates are prohibited from taking money from federal committees, Mr. Zwick says. State-based operations "allow us to participate at all levels," he says.

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for the campaign, acknowledges there could be residual benefits to Mr. Romney's presidential bid. He adds that none of the donors wrote a check expecting to receive special favors in return. Most of them have known Mr. Romney for a long time. They're "motivated by advocacy and what they think is right with regard to the current political and policy debate," Mr. Madden says.

Mr. Karmanos, the Compuware founder, declines to comment.

Mr. Romney's Alabama PAC illustrates how the network operated. In its public disclosures, the state PAC reported raising $280,000 in 2006. The money came from 11 donors, none of whom live in Alabama. Muneer Satter, a Chicago-based Goldman

DOJ_NMG_0124223

Sachs Group Inc. managing director, was a top giver, donating $100,000 to the account in a single day. Mr. Satter declines to comment.

From that kitty, $138,500 was donated to Alabama state and local candidates who could be important allies as Mr. Romney tests his Northern pedigree in the rural South, a region vital to any Republican presidential bid. Much of the remaining balance was used to help defray the costs of Mr. Romney's national operation, including a portion of the rent for his Boston headquarters, bills at Jules Catering of Somerville, Mass., and services provided by Daynes Music Co. of Midvale, Utah. No Alabama vendors received money from the Alabama account, according to the public records.

Son of a former Michigan governor, Mr. Romney joined Bain & Co., a management-consulting firm, shortly after graduating from Harvard. In 1984, he co-founded Bain Capital and helped build it into a major private-equity firm. He left in 1998 and drew national attention when he took over the troubled organizing effort for the 2002 Winter Olympics in Utah.

In 2002, he ran for governor of Massachusetts, touting himself as a fiscal conservative and social moderate. When he set his sights on the White House, Mr. Romney and his allies concluded he needed to broaden his exposure, particularly among the Iowa and New Hampshire activists who will winnow the field.

Mr. Romney's Commonwealth PACs, as they're all called, were launched July 2004 in Michigan. All are in states with early primaries. In addition to picking Iowa, Alabama, and Michigan, the campaign chose two important states that do have donation limits: New Hampshire and South Carolina. Mr. Romney also started a federal political action committee.

Mr. Romney's Massachusetts and Utah backers financed the state networks from the beginning and distributed their contributions among them, records show. For others, the campaign provided a list of state committees and recommended donation amounts. Donors say they didn't inquire about the legalities of the arrangement, assuming, rightly, that Mr. Romney had vetted it properly and that the practice was legal.

Between July and October 2004, the Michigan committee raised nearly $70,000 from a dozen donors -- 10 from Massachusetts and two from Michigan. The committee issued checks to local candidates and parties, including a $4,000 donation to the state Republican Party headquarters.

In 2005, the Michigan committee covered the costs of hiring Navigators LLC, a Washington, D.C., media-consulting firm. The committee also paid more than $11,000 to Gentry Collins, a Des Moines, Iowa, consultant who helped President Bush's 2004 campaign, records show.

The Romney network expanded in 2006. Public documents show how donors issued multiple checks on the same day to different accounts. Mark and Joseph Fuller, for example, gave a total of $145,000. The brothers' checks to the Iowa, New Hampshire, Michigan, South Carolina committees, and to Mr. Romney's federal committee, were all issued Aug. 17, 2006. The Fullers are both senior executives at Monitor Group, a Cambridge, Mass., management and strategic consulting firm.

Mark Fuller, the company's chairman and CEO, says he was a student at Harvard Law School when he met Mr. Romney, who was then a recent graduate. He says his donation stemmed from his belief in Mr. Romney's candidacy. "This is a guy who does not talk himself into 'Alice in Wonderland' fantasy. He will deal with bad news in a realistic way."

Mr. Fuller says he and his wife opted to spread their money across the spectrum of Mr. Romney's accounts because they wanted him "to get out and see some of the states that are more traditionally red states, and get in touch with a different part of the party base."

Throughout 2006, the various state committees coordinated their activities. Each paid a portion of the expenses incurred by the national campaign in Boston, such as rent and consulting costs.

In South Carolina, a state that has donation limits, the committee says it received more than $400,000 and spent nearly $300,000. All but one of the donors lived outside the state. Most of Mr. Romney's top-dollar national givers were among the South Carolina contributors, records show.

South Carolina state and local candidates received $100,500 in donations from the account. The committee hired South Carolina consultants Leslie Gaines and Nick Breeding to guide the committee's work. Both advisers worked for the Bush-Cheney campaign's South Carolina operation, experience that could boost Mr. Romney's candidacy in 2008. The South Carolina committee also paid for furniture rental and a Boston car service for the campaign's headquarters. Spending in New Hampshire followed a similar pattern.

DOJ_NMG_0124224

Now, Mr. Romney hopes to convert his new friends into a presidential campaign team.

Former Republican Iowa House Speaker Christopher Rants was a prime recruitment target because of his ties to other local House members. State legislators are important allies because they can deliver supporters to the caucus meetings that decide the primary winners.

Mr. Rants was impressed with Mr. Romney's willingness to help him raise money. The former governor attended events in the state, donated $2,500 to Mr. Rants's Iowa re-election campaign and similar amounts to every other tight race. In July, Mr. Rants flew to Boston to get a better feel for Mr. Romney's positions on policy issues, including transportation and social issues. He liked what he heard and joined the team.

At a December meeting in Westwood, Iowa, a small clutch of legislators gathered in a hotel meeting room to pepper Mr. Romney for more than an hour about his health-care plan and position against gay marriage. As legislators, they sympathized with Mr. Romney's explanation that he couldn't always control legislation pushed by the statehouse Democrats. "After all, we thwarted our governor a few times, too," said Mr. Rants. By the end of the meeting, Mr. Romney had four new local supporters.

Money doesn't always work. Former Iowa Republican Rep. Jim Nussle was a prime target for all 2008 hopefuls. In his unsuccessful bid for Iowa governor last year, Mr. Nussle received more than $70,000 from Mr. Romney's Iowa account. As head of the Republican Governors Association, Mr. Romney also directed $1.4 million to Mr. Nussle's Iowa race -- including a $500,000 check the former governor personally delivered at Mr. Nussle's annual Red, White and Blues fund-raiser in Dubuque last August.

In the end, Mr. Nussle joined the campaign team of Mr. Giuliani. The former mayor headlined Nussle fund-raisers but didn't donate money directly to his campaign.

Mr. Romney now has to comply with federal fund-raising limits. His advisers say they haven't decided what to do with the state accounts, which had a combined surplus of about $2.7 million as of Election Day in November, according to the most recent disclosure reports.

It's unclear how much of that money remains. Much of it could have been used to finance Mr. Romney's Boston headquarters between November and January, when the candidate officially entered the race. Year-end reports will soon clarify that.

Campaign-finance experts say Mr. Romney and his allies can't use the remaining cash during this presidential campaign. Mr. Romney could transfer it to another person over whom he has no control. If he loses, he could save the cash for another possible bid.

Romney Addresses Most Social Issues; Mum On Immigration (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, January 30, 2007

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney assuaged the concerns of many gathered at National Review Institute's Conservative Summit last weekend, at least on issues of abortion and gay marriage.

But aside from a brief mention of the importance of learning English during a nearly hour-long speech, Romney stayed away from the ongoing and heated immigration debate.

And as attendee John Kwapisz said after the speech, the governor may be able to keep mum.

While the Republican Party was divided over the immigration debate last year, Romney, like other governors-cum-presidential candidates before him, was not forced to vote on a hot issue.

Kwapisz pointed out that Romney might well be positioned to avoid the party-dividing debate since there is a chance President Bush and a Democratic Congress will find common ground on immigration legislation this year.

While a number of pundits have raised questions about Romney's commitment to conservative beliefs on hot-button social issues ranging from abortion to gay marriage — two issues Romney dived into headfirst Saturday night — the ex-governor has by and large avoided the most contentious part of the immigration debate.

While Jeb Bush attempted to rally the crowd at the summit's Saturday luncheon, telling them to "stop moping around" and to "be invigorated," the audience cooled noticeably when he endorsed his brother's support for a guest-worker program.

DOJ_NMG_0124225

Less than half the audience applauded when the former Florida governor said he endorsed President Bush's side of the debate, adding he thought Washington debate on the issue has been "shallow." And it got worse when he went on to say he didn't think the country is "under siege" by illegal immigrants.

"I don't see the threat," Bush said to only a smattering of applause.

Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said Monday the governor does see problems with the language in last year's Senate proposal.

"Governor Romney has concerns about the guest worker program in the McCain-Kennedy bill, because it creates a new, open-ended right for those here illegally," Madden said. "The way the program is structured could open a floodgate of document fraud since the program is based on proving how many years the person has been residing illegally in the U.S."

But one Democratic National Committee official said Romney could use the issue to get to the right of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) who joined Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) in co-sponsoring last year's Senate measure.

"Mitt Romney's been so busy trying to smooth talk conservative activists into ignoring his shifting positions on issues like gun control, health care, taxes, marriage and adoption that he's hoping they'll also forget his own hypocrisy on immigration," DNC press secretary Stacie Paxton said. "Voters can safely assume that, when he thinks they want him to return to his hardline rhetoric on immigration, he will."

Romney found himself in the middle of the debate late last year while still serving as governor. The Boston Globe reported he had hired a lawn service for home maintenance that employed illegal immigrants.

Shortly after that report, Romney negotiated a federal-state deal that expanded the powers of Massachusetts State Police to enable them to arrest illegal immigrants. The order was rescinded by Gov. Deval Patrick (D) almost immediately after he took office.

Romney's website notes the importance of getting "immigration right," but there is no mention of the guest-worker program, endorsed by Bush, McCain and Kennedy — the punch-line of many jokes Saturday night — among others.

During the climax of the debate last spring, when hundreds of thousands were protesting in cities across the country, Romney declined to take a position on the Senate bill, which included a guest-worker provision. Instead, the governor said he was opposed to amnesty but also opposed to returning all illegal aliens to Mexico, according to reports at the time.

The issues page on his presidential exploratory committee's website extols the need for enhanced border security, tamper-proof documentation and employment verification, while calling for more legal migration.

"We need to make America more attractive for legal immigrants — for citizens — and less attractive for illegal immigrants. I want to see more immigration in our country, but more legal immigration and less illegal immigration," Romney is quoted as having said.

Romney did tell the conservative crowd at Saturday's dinner he thinks immigrant students should have to learn English.

"If kids want to learn in America, they have to learn the language of America," he said.

While that might comfort voters in hardliner Rep. Tom Tancredo's (R-Colo.) school, Romney's failure to discuss the guest-worker program was noticeable to Kwapisz.

Kwapisz said his first choice for president is former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, with Romney as his No. 2. Conservative Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback had been in the running, he said, but his endorsement of "amnesty" and criticism of the White House's planned troop surge in Iraq were "disappointing."

Romney has sought to fortify his backing on the right with an exhaustive Southern travel schedule and aggressive pursuit of conservative lawmakers such as Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), who was a vocal critic of last year's Senate legislation because it included a guest-worker program.

Blackburn said she would leave it to Romney to explain his thoughts on a guest-worker program, but she is "comfortable" with his commitment to "law and order" and his position on the immigration issue as a whole.

On other social issues, Romney seemed to alleviate the worries of some in attendance Saturday, though it's a safe bet he'll continue to face questions about the depth of his commitment to core conservative issues.

DOJ_NMG_0124226

Steven Warchawksy, of New York, said after the speech he thought Romney had made a "reasonable and persuasive argument" for how he had come to change his mind on the abortion debate, but at present, Warchawsky said he is backing former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Rep. Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.), one of the early Capitol Hill lawmakers to announce support for Romney's candidacy, said the more Romney has to edify his conservative beliefs, the stronger he becomes.

"I think if [critics] keep pushing on that it might be a mistake," Hoekstra said. "I have no reason to believe in six months it's going to be an issue for him. I think it's going to be an asset."

And attendee Roseann LaManna didn't mince words when asked about criticisms of Romney's changed position on abortion.

"That's bullcrap," she said. "They're looking for something to nail him on because they're afraid he could be the nominee."

Red Sox Pitcher Vows To Support McCain (AP)

By Philip Elliott

AP, January 30, 2007

Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani has recruited a recent New Hampshire Republican chairman to lead his political operations in this first-in-the-nation primary state.

Following his weekend visit to New Hampshire, Giuliani — who has taken the initial steps in a presidential bid — announced the appointment Monday of veteran GOP activist Wayne Semprini.

"We picked up a lot of supporters this weekend," Semprini said.

Semprini, who until Saturday was the state Republican Party chairman, has been involved in New Hampshire politics since 1972.

Giuliani has formed an exploratory committee, the first step toward a full presidential campaign. During his visit this weekend, he would not say when he would make a final decision, although his speeches at Bretton Woods and Manchester were campaign-style addresses.

"It appears to me that Mayor Giuliani is not a guy who does anything part way. He's someone who is very, very thorough," Semprini said. "I don't think he'll make his total announcement until he's had an opportunity to look at all those angles and share all those angles with his wife, Judith."

Judith Giuliani accompanied her husband to New Hampshire, his first trip to the state since forming his exploratory committee.

___

BOSTON (AP) — Republican hopeful John McCain won the support of two Senate colleagues from Maine Monday, and then scored big with a plug from Boston Red Sox pitcher Curt Schilling.

Schilling helped pitch the Boston Red Sox to a World Series title in 2004, a source of pride during the tenure of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. But he apparently won't be supporting Romney in the race for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

Schilling told WEEI-AM: "I'm actually kind of excited about the fact that I think Senator McCain is going to do something official here, and he's going to be the man I'm going to back."

McCain is the Republican senator from Arizona, where Schilling maintains a home.

Last week, Schilling — who campaigned for President Bush in 2004 — beat back suggestions that he challenge Senator John Kerry for re-election in 2008.

McCain's presidential exploratory committee also announced that GOP Sens. Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins have been named to serve as his co-chairs in Maine.

___

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C. (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards acknowledged Monday that he may have been too inexperienced in national politics for his White House run in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0124227

The former North Carolina senator was serving his first and only Senate term four years ago when he declared himself a presidential candidate. During a forum at Wake Forest University on Monday, Edwards said he might agree with critics who said he left Congress too soon to seek the presidency.

"They may have been right," Edwards said, adding that the experience he has gained since the election has now prepared him for another run in 2008.

"When I ran in 2004, I spent most of my time thinking about being a good candidate," Edwards told a packed crowd. "These days I think about what I want to do as president of the United States."

Since losing in 2004 as the running mate for Democratic nominee Sen. John Kerry, Edwards has traveled the world and the country as an advocate for anti-poverty efforts.

___

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John McCain, their parties leading presidential candidates, put politics aside for a time Monday to dedicate a rehabilitation center to treat the increasing number of severely wounded Iraq war veterans.

Clinton and McCain, members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, thanked the wounded for their service and told them the nation owed them a debt. Both senators avoided questions about the unpopular war.

"There is common ground on higher ground, and on that higher ground, we stand to pay in full our debt" to those wounded, said the New York Democrat.

McCain said frustration among servicemembers was understandable in light of extended tours to Iraq or a return to duty as President Bush sends additional troops.

"The war in which you have fought has divided the American people, but it has divided no one in their admiration of you," said the Arizona Republican. "We all honor you."

The $50 million Center for the Intrepid will offer high-tech and new rehabilitation treatments for military amputees and severely burned soldiers.

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — Oh, say can you sing?

For Democratic presidential hopeful Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton the answer sounds like 'no.'

The online world discovered that the former first lady had a hard time with a tough tune when someone posted a video Sunday of Clinton caught on an open MSNBC microphone singing an off-key rendition of "The Star-Spangled Banner" during a campaign event in Iowa.

By Monday morning, the 1-minute, 8-second clip had been viewed more than 660,000 times, making it the top-viewed video for the day at that point.

___

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack was named a visiting professor of law at Drake University, a private college in Des Moines, school officials said Monday.

College officials said Vilsack will be in residence at the school "for several days" during 2007. He'll deliver the keynote speech at the schools Supreme Court celebration in March, host a symposium on risk and responsibility later in the spring, and help teach a short course on legal issues surrounding rural development.

Since leaving office earlier this month, Vilsack has focused on his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination.

___

NEWINGTON, N.H. (AP) — White House hopeful Rep. Duncan Hunter on Monday criticized Sen. John Kerry for telling an overseas conference that the United States was "a sort of international pariah."

The Republican congressman and long-shot presidential candidate complained about Kerry's remarks this past weekend at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. Responding to a question, Kerry said the Bush administration had failed to adequately address a number of foreign policy issues.

"So we have a crisis of confidence in the Middle East — in the world, really. I've never seen our country as isolated, as much as a sort of international pariah for a number of reasons as it is today," the Massachusetts senator said.

DOJ_NMG_0124228

Hunter told a New Hampshire audience Monday: "It was terrible for him to say that."

Kerry spokesman David Wade said Hunter "is stuck in the tuba section of the Republican presidential parade, so he'll say anything for attention."

Kerry, the Democrat's 2004 presidential nominee, announced last week that he would not seek the 2008 nod.

Van Dongen To Boost Giuliani Bid (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, January 30, 2007

Washington, D.C., superlobbyist Dirk Van Dongen has agreed to serve as D.C. finance chairman for Republican Rudy Giuliani's nascent 2008 presidential bid, and allies of the former New York mayor say the move is only a preview of the high-profile, inside-the-Beltway support he is building.

Van Dongen, who heads the National Association of Wholesaler-Distributors and is a top Republican fundraiser with close ties to President Bush, represents a big catch for Giuliani among the president's top money men — the group of "Rangers and Pioneers" who helped pour millions into his two White House campaigns.

It also signals some of the first tangible evidence of the former mayor's outreach to Washington insiders as he lays the groundwork for a 2008 run. To this point he has been much more low-key in those efforts than Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, his top rivals for the GOP nod.

The details of Van Dongen's role are still in the early stages of being worked out.

In a brief interview, he said that he was pleased to do whatever he could to support Giuliani and he praised the former mayor's record of leadership in a city that he said many had deemed ungovernable.

"We're New Yorkers, we actually live in New York City and Washington," Van Dongen said. "I know what New York City was like prior to his becoming mayor and I know what New York City was like after his two terms as mayor."

Van Dongen and his wife split their time between New York and Washington. Their daughter, Rachel Van Dongen, is a senior staff writer for Roll Call.

Van Dongen also said he was involved in building support for Giuliani's abbreviated 2000 Senate bid, which Giuliani ended after being diagnosed with prostate cancer in April of that year.

A source close to the Giuliani campaign said that more endorsements and support from within the Beltway would be forthcoming.

"Meetings have been taking place everywhere from K Street to the Hill," said the Giuliani source. "You will see in the next few weeks the committee announcing some great supporters who will be helping the mayor's efforts."

While Giuliani has obvious ties to the financial powerbrokers on Wall Street, Van Dongen's willingness to be the former mayor's fundraising point person here is significant both in Washington circles and in the world of major GOP donors.

There has been fierce behind-the-scenes competition among top White House contenders to land the major players on Bush's money team. And other donors are watching closely to see where those individuals gravitate.

Van Dongen, Wayne Berman and Ron Kaufman represent three of the biggest Washington, D.C.-based commodities in the group of Bush money men.

Berman, a lobbyist who heads Berman Enterprises, Inc., has signed on with McCain while Kaufman, a senior executive with Dutko Worldwide and a top Bush fundraiser is backing Romney, with whom he shares Massachusetts ties.

Van Dongen and Berman were Rangers for Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, a status earned by bundling at least $200,000 in contributions. Kaufman was a Bush Pioneer, a distinction given to those who bundled at least $100,000.

Giuliani already has a handful of Bush Pioneers and Rangers on his team but none with the insider stature of Van Dongen.

"This is a fantastic inside the Beltway pickup for Rudy Giuliani," said one GOP campaign operative who is not aligned with any of the 2008 contenders. "Dirk has helped to raise millions of dollars for Republican candidates and knows where to find the money."

DOJ_NMG_0124229

Van Dongen was heavily involved in then-Sen. George Allen's (R-Va.) re-election bid in 2006 and also in aiding now-Sen. John Thune's (R-S.D.) defeat of then-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) in 2004. Allen was considered a leading White House contender before his defeat by now-Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.).

On the Hill, GOP Reps. Peter King (N.Y.), Vito Fossella (N.Y.) and Pete Sessions (Texas) are leading Giuliani's outreach efforts to Members. Rep. Mary Bono (R-Calif.) also announced her support last week.

Guy Harrison, Sessions' chief of staff, said that at this point the Members are focusing on educating their colleagues about Giuliani's record of "conservative governance" in New York.

"We're making sure that our Members understand it's not just about being America's Mayor, it's also about governance that works," Harrison said.

Giuliani still enjoys wide popularity due to his tenure as mayor during the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, and early 2008 polls show him in a strong position to win his party's nomination.

However, winning the nod still appears to be a difficult task for Giuliani, whose moderate social positions are widely thought to be unpalatable for conservative primary voters.

Meanwhile, the Republican presidential field grew by one over the weekend when former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee officially announced his campaign.

Among the other candidates rounding out the GOP's White House field are Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.), Rep. Duncan Hunter (Calif.), Rep. Tom Tancredo (Colo.), former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore and former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson.

McCain's Maine Backers (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington And John McArdle

Roll Call, January 30, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) announced Monday that Maine Sens. Olympia Snowe (R) and Susan Collins (R) will serve as co-chairwomen of his presidential exploratory effort in the Pine Tree State.

State Rep. Josh Tardy, the House Republican leader, will serve as vice chairman of McCain's campaign in the state.

The endorsements of Snowe and Collins, both centrists, are not surprising despite the fact that they both endorsed then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush and not McCain in the 2000 Republican primary.

The Maine Senators, along with McCain, were members of the "Gang of 14," which brokered a deal on judicial nominations in 2005.

"I've known and respected John for many years from our service together in the House and Senate and I have always found him to be genuine, straightforward, and honest," Snowe said in a statement.

Snowe and Collins join GOP Sens. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), Lindsey Graham (S.C.), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Trent Lott (Miss.) as McCain's public backers in the Senate.

Seeking a CAO. Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced in early December that House Chief Administrative Officer Jay Eagen would keep his job at least through January to facilitate transition efforts on Capitol Hill. Now, as that deadline approaches, one high-ranking Republican hopes the next CAO will be appointed in a bipartisan manner.

In a letter to House Administration Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.) on Monday, the panel's ranking member, Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.), suggested that a bipartisan CAO search committee be formed to find candidates to fill one of the House's top patronage posts.

"While the proper administration of the House is ultimately the responsibility of the Majority, primarily executed through the Committee on House Administration, the successful operation of the House is certainly not a partisan matter," Ehlers wrote. "It is now incumbent on the Committee to take full advantage of Mr. Eagen's remaining tenure at the House by initiating an open and fully competitive search for his successor as soon as possible."

Pelosi's office has not announced exactly how a successor for Eagen would be chosen, but some sort of search process is expected to take place.

Millender-McDonald could not be reached for comment on Ehlers' letter Monday afternoon.

Hutchison Opens Door To No. 2 Spot On Ticket (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, the largest Republican vote-getter in the 2006 congressional elections and the most popular Republican in Texas, said yesterday she would consider an offer to run for vice president next year.

"If our party's nominee called me and said we are putting everything in the grid, and we think you are the best person, would I say no? I can't imagine that I would say no," she said.

"Would I seek it or do something to promote it? Absolutely not," she told editors and reporters of The Washington Times at a meeting at the newspaper.

Mrs. Hutchison, who garnered more than 2.6 million votes in November and defeated her opponent by 62 percent to 36 percent in an overall bad year for Republicans, attributed her popularity, in part, to her stand on Iraq. "People in my state see me as having a few degrees of separation" from the president.

"I do not believe in pre-emptive strikes against foreign countries that have not attacked us, unless they are a threat to our country," she said. But she also said she believes Mr. Bush thought Iraq had weapons of mass destruction and therefore was a threat.

"I don't think we're in Iraq for the Iraqi people, but for the security of the United States," she said.

"The president is against me on this, but I think we should be looking more at the Bosnia solution," she said, which would create in Iraq "semiautonomous regions that hold the country together by the sharing of oil revenues."

Mrs. Hutchison said she has been working on an alternative draft resolution on Iraq with fellow Senate Republicans John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina.

She said it would avoid "undercutting President Bush internationally," which the Texas lawmaker said would be the result of resolutions co-sponsored by several Republicans, including one by Virginia Sen. John W. Warner and an even stronger anti-troop "surge" resolution backed by Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican.

With 49 seats, Republicans can hold up Democratic initiatives in the Senate, and as Republican Policy Committee chairman, Mrs. Hutchison, 63, must find ways to restore a cohesiveness to Senate Republicans that began to fracture before the disastrous midterm elections, in which the party suffered a net loss of six seats.

Mrs. Hutchison said she is not seeking a spot on the 2008 Republican presidential ticket -- or planning a run for Texas governor in 2010, as some in her state predict.

She did not dispute, however, that she is widely discussed for top offices, including the vice presidency, in part because she is the most conservative and longest-tenured female Republican senator.

An opponent of partial-birth abortion and proponent of parental notification, she has a zero rating from the pro-choice NARAL and a 90 percent rating from the anti-tax Americans for Tax Reform.

Her American Conservative Union 91 percent lifetime voting record puts her ahead of Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky and Utah Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, with 90 each.

Mrs. Hutchison, the lead sponsor of a bill in 2005 to repeal the gun-ownership ban in the nation's capital, said she would reintroduce the legislation this year.

On immigration issues, she reiterated her support for a plan to allow illegals to return to their home counties, go through security and health checks and apply to return to the United States, where they would continue to undergo periodic checks and have to wait at least 17 years before beginning the naturalization process.

"If we don't have a guest-worker program that works, we really won't have border security," she said. "People have already shown they will risk their lives to cross the border."

Clinton Balances Femininity, Toughness (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Political, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124231

In her first tour of Iowa last weekend, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton emerged as a candidate hard-edged enough to threaten violence, yet explicitly female enough to make women feel so comfortable that one mentioned menopause in front of crowd of more than 1,000 people.

Clinton never called attention to her gender during her six years as Democratic senator from New York the way she did at a Des Moines town meeting where she raised the question "Would we ever elect a woman as president?" and mused openly about the challenges she faces as a female candidate.

And she's rarely deployed the masculine language of violence the way she did in Iowa, where she said she would "deck" anyone who attacked her politically, and called on President Bush to "bring the hammer down" on Iraq's political leaders.

"She was Yin-and-Yang'ing it," said Andrew J. "Drew" Zambelli, a pollster and market researcher who has conducted studies on women's views of Clinton for Manhattanville College in Westchester.

Though the directness with which she's begun to talk about being a woman is new, there's no mystery to why Clinton would stress her gender. There are more women than men and women made up 54 percent of the voters in the 2004 presidential election. Clinton has every reason to expect that -- running against at least five men for the Democratic nomination -- she will be their favorite daughter.

"Her run is going to be dependent on her doing disproportionately well on women," Zambelli said. "And there's a value in engaging the proposition. There are some women in the middle who really respond when you focus them in on the issue."

And so Clinton created an atmosphere that seemed, for lack of a better phrase, intensely female. Terri Hoffman, a teacher in Des Moines, mentioned to Clinton in the question-and-answer session -- and to the majority-female crowd of more than 1,000 -- that she is going through menopause. And it was women's enthusiasm that seemed to define the trip, from Pat Baxter-Rebal, who told Clinton she named her Siamese cat after Clinton in 1992, to the young woman at a house party in Cedar Rapids who had one question: What she could do to help?

But while, within the large and small rooms, Clinton seemed to be speaking most directly to the women present, she drew headlines for the new intensity of her words, which seemed to catch supporters and reporters who have covered her for years a bit by surprise.

As her Democratic rivals position themselves largely in relation to her and to her position on the Iraq War, Clinton's toughness has been directed outward: at Republicans and Bush.

"This was his decision to go to war with an ill-conceived plan and an incompetently executed strategy," she said in a moment of tough talk in Davenport calculated to make headlines. "We expect him to extricate our country from this before he leaves office."

Supporters said the factors contributing to her change in style included the requirement that women prove themselves as tough, the intensity of being on the presidential stage, and the simple need to shrug off the careful soft focus that has defined many of her appearances over the last six years.

"She's decided to do this, and there's this sense that they want to punch it up," said Kelli Conlin, the executive director of NARAL Pro-Choice New York and a political ally of the state's junior senator.

"There's been this gauze around the myth of Hillary," Conlin said, but her New York supporters "know that Hillary does have a tough side."

At the Cedar Rapids house party, the hostess, Marcia Rogers, introduced Clinton, and apologized that her husband had not been able to attend. As a crowd filled the large living room and spilled into adjacent spaces, Clinton took a question about why she thinks she is seen as a "polarizing figure."

"There's always a tension in bringing people together to find common ground and standing your ground. I've tried to do both," the candidate replied. "When I have stood my ground I have engendered opposition. In part because I'm a woman doing it."

"I think the other side views me as a worthy adversary," she concluded.

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by dslinkard on 01.29.2007 at 11:12 PM

DOJ_NMG_0124232

I can sum up all of her comments here.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

Clinton Meets With Union Leaders (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Filed at 2:19 p.m. ET

NEW YORK (AP) -- White House hopeful Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton met privately Monday with the board of the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, a 1.3 million-member labor group whose support will be critical to any Democratic candidate.

Clinton, who made her first presidential campaign swing through Iowa this past weekend, traveled to Naples, Fla., to address the annual board meeting of the union. UFCW spokeswoman Jill Cashen said the New York senator had been invited to speak on issues affecting the union, such as health care, immigration and boosting the minimum wage.

"We certainly appreciate her leadership on those issues," Cashen said, adding that other 2008 presidential contenders would be invited to address the UFCW board throughout the year. Cashen declined to say whether the union intends to endorse a candidate.

The meeting was closed to the media.

The UFCW, which represents retail and grocery workers, is the chief backer of Wake Up Wal-Mart, an organization formed to pressure that company to boost wages and benefits for its workers. Clinton served on Wal-Mart's board from 1986 to 1992 but has since become a critic of the retail giant's business practices.

With organized labor poised to play an influential role in the Democratic primary, candidates have been actively wooing union support. On Friday, Clinton and several other presidential hopefuls, including Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, addressed a closed board meeting of the Service Employees International Union in Washington.

SEIU will require presidential candidates seeking the union's endorsement to spend time working alongside union members to understand their lives and concerns. SEIU president Andy Stern personally inaugurated the "Walk a Day in My Shoes" campaign Monday in Iowa, working alongside union members there and eating dinner in their homes.

He was set to do the same Wednesday in New Hampshire, another key early voting state.

UFCW and SEIU are two of seven major unions that broke from the AFL-CIO in 2005 over internal disagreements on how best to build organized labor's membership and political clout. The unions have since formed a new political coalition -- Change to Win.

How 'Mamisma' Can Change Politics (USAT)

By Harriet Rubin

USA Today, January 30, 2007

Is America ready to elect a female president? Of course we are. The most macho countries — Chile, Liberia, Germany — have recently elected women chief executives as symbols of change. So how can a female candidate in America tap the desire for change and avoid tripping on the stereotypes of gender prejudice? Can she appear presidential before we have a model of what female presidential power is?

Even the most powerful woman in politics can't yet hold her own against the most powerful man, it seems: When Bill and Hillary Clinton take a stage together, he makes her disappear, like a magician and his assistant. How then would she look on stage against Republican Sen. John McCain? She'll have to draw consistently on her "mamisma," not machismo. (After all, there are already too many alpha male Democrats in play.) And I'm not talking about machisma or female ferocity.

Mamisma is femininity defined by mature and maternal qualities. It lets a female candidate make men look like wimps while doing the taboo-dance, enticing people to fall in love with her.

The history of female leaders — queens, presidents, prime ministers — reveals that they sell mamisma hard. Israeli's Golda Meir, for example, was no conventional object of desire. She seduced by making her desires plain, like any good mother.

DOJ_NMG_0124233

In Munich, Steven Spielberg's historically inspired account of Israel's plot to avenge the murder of its Olympic athletes, Meir takes five minutes to persuade a young man to abandon his pregnant wife and promising career for her own desperate mission. That is mamisma.

Take a look at Nancy Pelosi on the occasion of her swearing-in as House speaker earlier this month. She was engulfed by children. Is it accidental that the most famous medieval icons depict a Madonna embracing people whose faces beam with childlike innocence? It's no accident: It's mamisma.

Mamisma makes a strong woman appear ultimately non-threatening — a quality we have not seen much in our youth-intoxicated culture.

But the world is changing. In France, never a bastion of powerful women, presidential candidate Segolene Royal, 53, is selling herself as the mother protector of the nation. She's taking a page from the playbook of great queens and women who behave like them.

After their youthful sexuality fades, mamisma women stand toe to toe with powerful men. They often refer to love and trust as bold alternatives to the hard edges of powers that be.

Queen Elizabeth I sought her subjects' love; she assumed she had their respect. Eleanor Roosevelt became a saint by insisting that the bottom line of government is love. By contrast, fired Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina wore toughness like a set of dentures; she denied there was anything womanly about her. That is anti-mamisma.

Mamisma works because after age 50, the laws of power change. Law No. 1: After 50 a woman is praised for what she had been blamed for, as legendary anthropologist Margaret Mead believed. A woman's youthful mistakes may be re-evaluated as signs of her bravery and vision.

Pritzker Prize-winning architect Zaha Hadid is today hailed for the same weird designs that earlier guaranteed her rejection by potential clients. Hillary Clinton might remind us that she was an early champion of health care reform and that she suffered attacks from all sides for it. Advisers may warn candidate Clinton to sidestep this chapter in her past. But if she were to forget this advice and follow the rules of mamisma, she would promote the fact that surviving the onslaught is her war-hero record. McCain, too, fought in an unpopular and losing war.

The second law of mamisma: The differences between Mars and Venus are fading in that sizable demographic, the baby boomers, the majority of whom are 50 or older. The sexes don't simply grow older at different speeds; men mature into femininity. While men become more emotional, rounder and softer in physique, women tend to bulk up. They are acknowledged as stronger than men after age 50 because "women age more slowly," says Eric Walsh, a geriatrician at Beth Israel Medical Centering New York. Women also become the primary caretakers, as men become physically the weaker sex.

This is a new playing field. A mamisma woman will not gear her message to either gender, and she will wrap tough platforms in emotional language: To stand against sending more troops into Iraq, Pelosi would emotionalize the discussion, noting that Bush is trying not to appear weak, the criticism his father suffered.

The third law of mamisma is that, as University of Chicago scholar Wendy Doniger points out, "Men would marry their mothers if they could." Why? Because they like being reminded that they are great. It's the ultra-maternal message. A female candidate would likewise remind the electorate that a golden future awaits — a message more seductive than better homeland security.

Queen Eleanor of Aquitaine in the 12th century led a revolt away from her John McCain-like husband, King Henry. While he was out selling people on crusades, Eleanor built a court of love which appealed to the child in everyone, the very opposite of her husband's vision. The youth of Europe joined her in droves. This extremely alternative vision let Eleanor escape the secondary roles as wife and helper, assert her independent sovereignty and dispense her own justice and her own patronage.

Eleanor's original ideal of courtly love informs our culture to this day. As in Eleanor's time, there is a constituency that wants to feel the love.

Mamisma is anti-Machiavelli: seduction over divisiveness. Is it a good thing? In a world run like a PlayStation war game, maturity would be a nice antidote. After all, who wouldn't want a return to the seriousness and authority of the Founding Fathers … even if this time around, they just happen to be women?

DOJ_NMG_0124234

Harriet Rubin is author of The Mona Lisa Stratagem: The Art of Women, Age and Power, which will be out in May. She is also a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Hagel Low On Cash On Hand, Raising Retirement Issue (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

Hill, January 30, 2007

Sen. Chuck Hagel's (R-Neb.) year-end financial filing shows that he raised just $80,000 for his campaign committee in the final three months of 2006, bringing his cash on hand to $140,000 from $110,000.

As of his third-quarter filing, Hagel had the least cash on hand of the 33 senators up for reelection in 2008. The potential presidential candidate's most recent filing shows he increased his campaign fundraising over the $20,000 he raised in the third quarter.

Political observers often use fundraising and cash-on-hand figures to speculate about whether members of Congress intend to seek reelection. The senator with the second-least cash after the third quarter, Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.), is thus far the only one to announce he will not run again.

Unlike Allard, who was one of Democrats' top three targets, Hagel appears unlikely to face a serious Senate challenge in 2008. He defeated now-Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) with 56 percent of the vote in 1996 and cruised to reelection in 2002 with 83 percent against token Democratic opposition.

At the same time, he has left open the possibility that he would retire, whether or not he would seek the presidency. Last week, he rebuffed a report that said he has assured the National Republican Senatorial Committee that he will seek reelection.

Spokesman Mike Buttry said Hagel's campaign financial filings offer no clue about his future plans and emphasized Hagel's fundraising through his political action committee, which raised more than $400,000 during the last cycle.

"I wouldn't read anything into that," Buttry said. "Sen. Hagel's focus last year was on raising and contributing money from his PAC."

Hagel recently has drawn attention for his harsh evaluation of the progress being made in Iraq. He is one of two Republican senators to sign on to a non-binding Democratic resolution criticizing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Franken Off The Air (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, January 30, 2007

Comedian and potential Minnesota Senate candidate Al Franken will leave liberal talk radio station Air America in two weeks, he announced yesterday on his show.

The announcement paves the way for Franken to explore a possible Democratic challenge to freshman Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) in 2008.

The radio host, who a year ago moved back to Minnesota and has been recording his "Al Franken Show" in Minneapolis, said he is "definitely giving it serious consideration" and that he plans to make a decision soon.

Air America also announced yesterday that the station is on the block. Franken said he wanted to stick around through the transition and his last show will be Feb. 14. He said if he makes his decision by then, he will announce his intentions on his show.

Air America filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection last year.

Interestingly, in the same show Franken announced his departure, he had Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) as a guest.

A spokesman for Franken's Midwest Values PAC, Andy Barr, said Schumer's appearance was coincidental. Schumer has been promoting his book, "Positively American: Winning Back the Middle-Class Majority One Family at a Time."

Google Moves To Disarm Search 'Bombs' (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124235

For many years, Google said it wouldn't rectify the antics of pranksters who rigged search terms, like having "miserable failure" bring up a White House biography of George W. Bush as a top result on its search engine.

But Google last week reversed its position, changing its algorithms to eliminate so-called "Google bombs" that yield political or humorous results.

On its blog targeted at Web engineers, Google disclosed that it made changes to minimize the impact of the most popular Google bombs. Too many people started to think the results reflected the company's political opinion, it said.

"We've seen a lot of misconceptions. People thought Google was behind these or was endorsing these" Google bombs, said Matt Cutts, the software engineer at Google who posted an explanation of the company's decision on the Google Webmaster blog. "It's not the case. Most of these can be considered pranks, and the direct impact on all search results is minuscule. But it is good to correct our search quality."

Because of the changes Google made to its formula, searching for "miserable failure" on Google now pulls up a news story by the BBC about Google bombing as the first result, followed by a Wikipedia entry on the topic and another article in an industry publication. The White House page no longer appears in the top 100 results.

The search engine uses many factors to determine the ranking of a Web site in the search results. One factor influencing that ranking is how many other Web sites link to the targeted site, so if many sites use the term "miserable failure" and use it as a link to the White House site, the White House site rises in the rankings. The White House Web page does not contain the words "miserable failure," but the obscurity of the phrase made it easier to rise quickly in the rankings.

Other search engines use similar variations on search technology. Google isn't the only one affected. Yahoo's search, for example, still brings up the president's profile as its top result.

George Johnston, a Bellevue, Wash., man who claims to be the architect of the "miserable failure" Google bomb, said he started his campaign in 2003 because it would be "fun" and "easy." He e-mailed a number of popular bloggers and asked them to use the phrase and create a link to the White House Web site. It quickly took off.

"It spawned a whole class of jokes when people understood how easy it was," Johnston said in an e-mail. "Google bombing as a blogger sport hit its peak in 2004," then receded as the novelty wore off, he said.

The White House has never asked Google to remove the "miserable failure" results, according to White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore. "If anything, it provided people with an opportunity to learn more about the president's positive agenda," Lawrimore said.

Other popular Google bombs include "French military victories," which brings up a Web site designed to look like an error message that says, "Did you mean: French military defeats." Another term, "waffles," used to pull up a site about former presidential candidate Sen. John Kerry. Google bombing happened in other languages, as well.

Despite the growth of fake results, Google was initially reluctant to intervene, claiming that the most relevant results could still be found. More recently, Google tried to highlight pranks by putting a warning at the top of the results page.

Danny Sullivan, a London-based consultant and former editor of Search Engine Watch, said Google should have addressed the issue much earlier. "But it's a difficult decision," he wrote in response to e-mailed questions. "Some people still interpret this as Google trying to repress Web 'opinion' rather than improve search results."

Google said the changes it made last week still can't stop all Google bombs. "People will always find ways to make jokes on the Web," Cutts said. "Because Google takes search quality very seriously, we will continue to refine search quality."

Father Drinan, Model Of Moral Tenacity (WP)

By Colman Mccarthy

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

If you've ever wondered whether God laughs, think back to 1980, when the Rev. Robert Drinan was ordered by Pope John Paul II to get out of politics and leave Congress. The Jesuit priest, who died on Sunday, was finishing his fifth term representing a suburban Boston district that included Cambridge and Brookline. The pope had been hearing from rankled conservative American Catholics--the Pat Buchanan, William F. Buckley Jr., William Bennett wing of the church -- that Father Drinan, a purebred Democrat, was a dangerous liberal. His voting record on abortion was seen as too pro-choice.

DOJ_NMG_0124236

Father Drinan's presence in the House of Representatives had been sanctioned by the previous pope, Paul VI, as well as by the U.S. episcopate, the cardinal of Boston, his own Jesuit superiors and emphatically by the voters in his district.

No matter.

John Paul, knowing that Jesuits take a vow of loyalty to popes, had his way. And who replaced the dangerously liberal Father Drinan? The more dangerously liberal Barney Frank--as ardent an advocate for abortion rights and as he was for gay rights. If there is a God, the Frank-for-Drinan trade surely had Him laughing at the Vatican's expense.

From Congress, Bob Drinan went a few blocks to Georgetown University Law Center.

It was a natural transition, from practicing the politics of peace and justice to teaching it. His classes on human rights law, constitutional law and legal ethics were routinely oversubscribed. Though I had met him before his days in Congress, when he served as dean of Boston College Law School, it was at Georgetown Law that our friendship grew. My classes there for the past 20 years have attracted the same kind of students that his did -- future public-interest lawyers, poverty lawyers, human-rights lawyers, and, in good years, a future Jack Olender or William Kunstler.

After my Tuesday afternoon class, I would often go by Bob Drinan's fourth-floor office to get energized. I saw him as a towering moral giant, a man of faith whose practice of Christianity put him in the company of all my Jesuit heroes--Daniel Berrigan, Horace McKenna, Teilhard de Chardin, John Dear, Francis Xavier, the martyred Jesuits of El Salvador and the priests who taught me in college. In his office, ferociously unkempt and as tight as a monk's cell, our conversation ranged from politics to law to the morning's front pages. He was as knowledgeable about the Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991 as he was about the many allegations of international lawbreaking by the current Bush administration. Bob Drinan had mastered the art of being professionally angry but personally gentle.

As a priest, he was a pastor-at-large. He was at the altar at journalist Mary McGrory's funeral Mass. He celebrated the Nuptial Mass at the marriage of Rep. Jim McGovern (D-Mass.) and his wife, Lisa. And always, there were plenty of baptisms. As a writer, he produced a steady flow of books on human rights, poverty and social justice. He saved his most fiery writing for the National Catholic Reporter, the progressive weekly to which he contributed a regular column. His final one appeared on Dec. 15, a piece about the 26th anniversary of the martyrdom in El Salvador of Maryknoll Sister Ita Ford.

The column began: "In the 1980s I gave a lecture at Jesuit Regis High School in New York City, where the students are all on scholarship. I spoke about the war being waged by the Reagan administration against the alleged communists of El Salvador.

"In the discussion period, three students took issue with my remarks, making it clear that they and their families agreed with the U.S. policy of assisting the Salvadoran government. The atmosphere was almost hostile until one student stood and related that his aunt, Maryknoll Sister Ita Ford, had been murdered by agents of the government of El Salvador. I have seldom if ever witnessed such an abrupt change in the atmosphere of a meeting."

One of my students at Georgetown Law last semester was also one of Father Drinan's: Chris Neumeyer, a former high school teacher from California. His father, Norris Neumeyer, was in town earlier this month and wanted to meet his hero, Father Drinan. The two lucked out and found the priest in his office. Yesterday, Norris Neumeyer, after learning of the priest's death, e-mailed his son and recalled asking if Father Drinan knew his often-jailed fellow Jesuit Daniel Berrigan and his brother Philip. He did. The difference between himself and the Berrigans, Father Drinan believed, was that they took action outside the system while he took action inside.

Papal meddling aside, it was enduring action.

Colman McCarthy, a former Washington Post columnist, directs the Center for Teaching Peace and teaches courses on nonviolence at four universities and three high schools.

The Humane Society Becomes A Political Animal (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Many people may consider the Humane Society of the United States a pussycat. But with 10 million donors and a $120 million budget, it is becoming a tiger among Washington's interest groups.

DOJ_NMG_0124237

Just ask Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.). Actually, make that former governor and then-representative. The Humane Society targeted both in last year's elections after Ehrlich supported bear hunting and Pombo supported commercial whaling and trapping in wildlife refuges.

The society also spent lavishly to help pass an initiative in Arizona, fought by agribusiness, that bans inhumane factory farming. And it bested the National Rifle Association on a measure that prohibits the shooting of mourning doves for sport in Michigan.

"They are a worthy opponent," said Andrew Arulanandam of the NRA. "They certainly have a lot of backers with deep pockets."

"They keep us on our toes," agreed Kelli Ludlum of the American Farm Bureau Federation. "We need all of our members to counter their growing effectiveness."

The society's newfound prowess was engineered by its 41-year-old president, Wayne Pacelle. The smooth-talking Pacelle (who travels so often that he doesn't own a pet) was the group's top lobbyist before taking over 2 1/2 years ago. He quickly consolidated his power base by merging with two other animal-protection organizations -- the Fund for Animals and the Doris Day Animal League. He also formed a political affiliate, the Humane Society Legislative Fund, which spent $500,000 on key races in last year's elections, and established his own political action committee called Humane USA, which funneled an additional $300,000 to pro-animal candidates.

"The organization has committed itself to political activity as never before in its 52-year history," Pacelle said. In addition to collecting the scalps of opponents on Election Day, the society can claim at least two dozen successful statewide ballot measures including ones that bar horse slaughter and cockfighting. It's fighting similar battles in Congress.

Pacelle's goal is to double the amount of his electoral giving and the extent of the society's lobbying over the next two years. He already can boast an average of 20,000 members in each congressional district and a budget that is twice the size of that of his nearest animal-rights rival, the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (ASPCA). The activist People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) is a quarter as large.

Pacelle notes that his group has no corporate connection to the animal shelters that regularly kill surplus strays. Still, lots of animal lovers do not consider his society very humane.

Lately, a growing number of politicians don't, either. "I compensate to some degree for animal advocates who are overly sentimental," Pacelle said. He then quoted his late mentor Cleveland Amory of the Fund for Animals, who said, "I want to put cleats on little old ladies in tennis shoes."It's All in a Name I

The new trade association that represents stock and bond traders is called the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association. But the group's acronym, SIFMA, sounds so distasteful as a spoken word that its staff has been warned to spell out the letters, S-I-F-M-A, whenever they refer to the lobby.It's All in a Name II

Some big guns in lobbying are pressing to name the Education Department's building in the District after President Lyndon B. Johnson, and they may well succeed now that Democrats control the Capitol.

For years, former House Republican leader and fellow Texan Tom DeLay blocked the proposal. But he's not around anymore, so Johnson acolytes are trying anew. They include ex-Johnson aides and now K Streeters Harry C. McPherson and Lloyd N. Hand of DLA Piper, James R. Jones of ManattJones Global Strategies, and Jack Valenti, former president of the Motion Picture Association of America. Lyndon K. Boozer, 43, an AT&T lobbyist and son of Johnson's late secretary, Yolanda Garza Boozer, conceived the project.

And yes, Boozer was named for the great man -- just as he hopes the education building will be soon.It's All in a Name III

Democratic lobbying shops, eager to capitalize on their new majority in Congress, have sprouted so quickly that they obviously did not bother to apply any imagination to their names.

Kimberly Allman, a former lobbyist for the Recording Industry Association of America, started Allman Strategies. Steve Elmendorf, a former aide to longtime congressman Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.), formed Elmendorf Strategies. And Julie Domenick, most recently at the Loeffler Group, runs Multiple Strategies.

At least Parven Pomper Schuyler Inc. and Heather Podesta & Partners chose boring names without resorting to "strategies."

DOJ_NMG_0124238

One long-established Democratic firm with a relatively interesting moniker, the Glover Park Group, is expanding. The new hires include Julie Rochman, formerly with the American Insurance Association; Beth Tritter, ex-aide to Rep. Nita Lowey (D-N.Y.); Susan Kannel, formerly with Lake Research Partners; and Tracy Sefl and Jason Miner, both formerly with the Democratic National Committee.

On the Republican front, a familiar name will soon head the National Association of Chain Drug Stores. Steven C. Anderson, president of the National Restaurant Association, will replace Craig L. Fuller, chief of staff to George H.W. Bush when the elder Bush was vice president, who left the chain-store group last March.Another New Idea

Fred Wertheimer has fought for ethics reforms for more than 30 years, and he has a new proposal: earmark disclosure by lobbyists.

Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, wants lobbying groups to disclose what narrow projects -- a.k.a. earmarks -- they are pressing for and to identify the lawmakers who are sponsoring them. Versions of this have been advanced in the past by Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) and Joseph Lieberman (I-Conn.).

Lobbyists can now be vague about what they do for their clients. But that would end under the Wertheimer plan. Voters could then decide who elected officials were working for -- lobbyists, their constituents or both. Any thoughts?

A Voice For More Voters (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Think of it as California's revenge.

After years of watching as its financial heavy hitters were bled dry for campaign contributions that were spent elsewhere, the state's politicians have decided to give its voters a say in selecting the Republican and Democratic presidential nominees.

And as befits a place that helped give birth to the Goldwater Right, the New Left, the counterculture, environmentalism, modern libertarianism and the tax revolt, California doesn't mind if it throws an already flawed presidential nominating system into chaos.

Fearing that California will bigfoot its way into dominance by moving its primary to Feb. 5, 2008, Illinois, Florida and New Jersey are maneuvering to do exactly the same thing. Thus would this diverse group of states give its voters a say just two weeks after the New Hampshire primary, three weeks after the Iowa caucuses, and also close to the contests in Nevada and South Carolina, which the Democrats have moved up in their order of battle.

There is a lot of hand-wringing about how the most open election since 1928 and the most important in many, many years -- for once, that is not an exaggeration -- will now be held hostage to the whims of big states, big fundraisers, big consultants and, as the first President Bush described momentum, Big Mo.

The money part could be ameliorated if Congress were only willing to update a public financing system that is several election cycles behind the realities of politics. Democrats in Congress who tout their populist and reform credentials while decrying the influence of wealthy interests should be moving with dispatch to do so.

As for the rest of the difficulties, there is another description of the supposed chaos: a rational response by political actors in a federal system doing their best -- given the incentives in place -- to serve the interests of the voters in their states.

What should surprise us is that the big states did not move years ago to enhance their role in picking the nominees.

California was once a giant in the process. In the 1964 Republican primary, Barry Goldwater narrowly defeated Nelson Rockefeller and set the GOP on the rightward course it has pursued since. In 1972, California Democrats voted for George McGovern over Hubert Humphrey, confirming the importance of the antiwar forces in the party. Since then, California's influence has been exercised largely by the people who can afford the fundraising parties at mansions in and around Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Moreover, the bulk of the states talking about moving their primaries forward promise to enhance the influence of two groups largely left out of the current process: the voters in big cities and the vast group of suburban and exurban citizens so decisive to the outcomes of general elections.

DOJ_NMG_0124239

Don't get me wrong: I share the devotion to Iowa and New Hampshire's conscientious voters that is a requirement for entry into the guild of political writers. I love watching candidates sit with small groups of voters in living rooms in Epping, N.H., or Altoona, Iowa, and confront agonizingly thoughtful and detailed questions about health-care policy or nuclear proliferation. And I love visiting both states, warm and welcoming as they are, with the excuse that I'm working.

But it's time the method we use in selecting nominees bear some resemblance to how we elect them. It's time the polyglot cities and the great exurban tracts gain a voice commensurate with their importance to the nation.

And it's time that our candidates get tested early by broader electorates. Was it really good for the country that South Carolina's Republicans put an effective end to the battle between George W. Bush and John McCain so early in 2000, on Feb. 19 to be exact? Was it helpful that the Democratic battle between Al Gore and Bill Bradley that same year effectively ended after New Hampshire voted on Feb. 1, or that John Kerry wasn't tested harder in more places after his Jan. 27, 2004, victory there?

The revolt of the big states may not slow the process and might even enhance the importance of the outcomes in Iowa, New Hampshire and the two other early states. But by forcing themselves forward, California, Illinois, New Jersey, Florida (and who knows who else?) will definitely let many more voters, and many more kinds of voters, in on an important choice. The legislatures in those states should ignore the complaints and let their people join the action.

Iowa Emigration Act (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

The Labor Department reported last week that U.S. union membership keeps shrinking, which helps explain why unions have made easing the rules for organizing one of their top political priorities. And in some places, they've got a good chance to succeed.

Unions lost 326,000 members in 2006 and the percentage of working Americans who belong to a union dipped to 12%, continuing to fall from the high of 34% in the 1950s. Today only one in 13 private-sector workers is a member of a labor union, while four times as many Americans own stock as belong to a union.

Big Labor's response has been to redouble efforts to rig the rules to make union organizing much easier. So in Congress the number one AFL-CIO priority is "card check" legislation, which would end secret ballots for organizing elections at worksites. Union reps would know which workers voted "no" and thus be able to exert enormous peer pressure to conform. Given union history, this would surely include threats and other intimidation. Democrats on Capitol Hill are likely to bring "card check" up for a vote on very short notice -- the better to prevent business from mobilizing against it.

Meanwhile, at the state level, unions are trying to exploit their legislative victories in November by overturning right-to-work laws. These laws prohibit employers from requiring workers to join a union as a condition of employment. They also protect workers from having to pay union dues whether they belong to the union or not -- dues that often go to political causes that workers don't support.

Iowa is emerging as the first test of this effort, thanks to Democratic control of the Governorship and both legislative houses for the first time in 40 years. Iowa has been a right-to-work state for 60 years, which is one reason the state has been able to hold on to some of its manufacturing base. Though neither new Governor Chet Culver nor legislators campaigned against right-to-work, unions are now demanding a vote to gut the popular law.

The proposed law wouldn't require workers to join a union, but it would mandate that all workers pay union dues whether they join or not. The unions call this a "fair play law" because all shop employees have to pay equally for union activities. But this is a strange definition of "fair" because it allows unions to dun workers without their consent.

If the Iowa legislature wanted to chase jobs and employers out of the state, they couldn't come up with a better plan than underming right to work. Leo Troy, an economist at Rutgers University, has studied the issue and found that "right-to-work laws are strongly correlated with faster growth in jobs and personal income."

Many international and domestic companies won't consider locating a plant in a non-right-to-work state. Most of the new auto plants owned by Mercedes, Nissan, BMW and Honda are located in Alabama, South Carolina, Texas and other right-to-work locales. A recent survey by the National Right to Work Institute found that, between 1986 and 2006, 11 right-to-work states have added 104,000 auto manufacturing jobs, a 63% increase. The non-right-to-work states lost 130,000 auto jobs, or 15% over the same period.

DOJ_NMG_0124240

Iowa has one of America's older populations, and the state's politicians have been fretting for years about the difficulty of keeping their young people from fleeing for better economic opportunities in other states. If Iowa Democrats placate Big Labor and join New Jersey, New York, Michigan and Ohio in all but forcing workers to join unions, they can expect an accelerating exit to warmer economic climes.

The Battle Of Jericho (WP)

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

GRADUATION ceremonies for Montgomery Blair High School's Class of 2007 will afford students one more lesson in life. Too bad it's one of convenience trumping principle. That's the only message to be drawn from the capitulation by the school board to allow the use of a church for the ceremonies.

Members of the board, after impassioned lobbying by parents and students, overruled a decision by Superintendent Jerry D. Weast that prevented use of the Jericho City of Praise church in Landover. Mr. Weast's decision, although unpopular, was right. The reversal exposes the system to a possible lawsuit by groups who see use of the church as violating the constitutional separation of church and state. Indeed, it was the threat of such a lawsuit that prompted the ban in the first place. More important, though, are the feelings of parents and students who might be offended by having to celebrate an important moment in such a venue. No matter how small the number of those discomfited by walking into a building that proclaims "Jesus Is The Lord!!!" the rights of the minority must be taken into account.

We are sympathetic to the Blair community's problem. Its large student body makes most other venues unsuitable, and the Show Place Arena and Equestrian Center in Prince George's County is not ideal. Then, too, with its large number of low-income families, Blair can't match the ability of other schools to raise money to rent better facilities.

Montgomery County must do a better job of providing a proper setting for all its students -- and their families -- to celebrate graduation. We wonder, for instance, why Blair is given the same amount of money to conduct its ceremony as much smaller schools. Or why Prince George's County is able to accommodate its large high schools. Although the board shouldn't have allowed the use of Jericho, it wisely decided to conduct a full review of its policy on graduations.

U.S. To Discuss Finances With N. Korea (AP)

By Audra Ang

AP, January 30, 2007

A U.S. Treasury official in Beijing for negotiations with North Korea over its alleged illicit financial dealings said Tuesday he was "hopeful" of progress, as a report indicated full talks on the North would resume Feb. 8.

Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser was set to meet his North Korean counterparts later Tuesday to talk about U.S. financial restrictions, which were imposed due to Pyongyang's alleged smuggling and counterfeiting and have stymied separate talks on scrapping its nuclear weapons program.

"We're prepared to go through these talks as long as it takes for us to get through our agenda," Glaser told reporters. "I'm hopeful we'll make progress."

The North Korean delegation told reporters when they arrived in Beijing that the talks will be held at the two embassies but did not make any other comments.

The financial negotiations are expected to clear the way for another round of six-nation nuclear disarmament talks.

Japanese public broadcaster NHK reported Tuesday that China had informed Tokyo that the negotiations would resume Feb. 8. The Chinese Foreign Ministry said it could not confirm the date.

Pyongyang has tied the financial restrictions and disarmament issues together since Washington took action against the Macau-based Banco Delta Asia in 2005, accusing it of laundering counterfeit money and abetting other unspecified criminal acts by North Korea.

The issue has caused other banks to steer clear of North Korean business for fear of losing access to the U.S. market, thereby hampering the North's access to the international banking system.

DOJ_NMG_0124241

The North says the restrictions are evidence of U.S. hostility, and for a year Pyongyang boycotted the six-nation negotiations on dismantling its nuclear programs.

After North Korea tested a nuclear device in October, it agreed to return to the disarmament talks — as long as there were separate negotiations on the financial issues.

However, both the disarmament meetings and the financial discussions, held in Beijing in December, ended inconclusively. The six-party disarmament talks involve the two Koreas, the U.S., China, Japan and Russia.

U.S. officials have indicated that North Korea is still demanding the financial issues be dealt with before progress can be made on the nuclear talks.

Pyongyang wants Washington to first end the financial isolation campaign, and to lift a freeze on $24 million in accounts at Banco Delta Asia.

Talks On N Korea Financial Squeeze To Resume (FT)

By Anna Fifield In Seoul

Financial Times, January 30, 2007

US and North Korean officials are due to resume talks on Tuesday over a US-instigated financial crackdown on Pyongyang, discussions likely to be pivotal to determining the success of nuclear talks expected to reconvene next week.

The two days of meetings in Beijing between US Treasury officials and their North Korean counterparts come amid signs that Kim Jong-il's regime has been trying to adjust to the crippling effect of the crackdown.

They also coincide with growing speculation that the US is preparing to release $13m (€10m, £6.6m) of the $24m with North Korean links frozen at Banco Delta Asia in September 2005 when the US Treasury accused the Macao bank of laundering money for the North Korean regime. That crackdown – and the unexpected knock-on effects as banks in Vietnam and China voluntarily closed North Korean accounts – has enraged the North Koreans. Analysts argue it contributed to the decision to conduct last year's nuclear test and has become a big hurdle in the already tortuous nuclear negotiations.

"The [Banco Delta Asia] issue will be the turning point for the whole denuclearisation process," said Nam Sung-wook, a North Korea specialist at Korea University in Seoul.

Attempts to resolve the North Korean nuclear problem diplomatically have received a second wind this month, with a flurry of preparatory meetings, some even involving North Koreans. The US chief nuclear negotiator, Christopher Hill, held surprise bilateral talks with his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-gwan, in Berlin this month, which left the Pyongyang delegation talking of a "certain agreement". The next round of nuclear talks is likely to open in Beijing next week.

Previously hobbled by divisions within the Bush administration over whether the US should talk to North Korea, Mr Hill has apparently managed to secure agreement in Washington to return the money North Korea earned through legitimate means if Pyongyang agrees to at least freeze its Yongbyon nuclear reactor and allow the return of International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors.

Trade with both China and South Korea continues to provide an economic lifeline to an impoverished North Korea. But the US-led financial crackdown and the sanctions imposed following the nuclear test are clearly having an impact on its economy, although it is difficult to gauge the precise effect.

"The figure of $24m is not that big but flows of foreign exchange are important for determining economic management in North Korea," says Yoon Deok-ryong of the South's Korea Institute for Economic Policy. "If those scarce resources become even more scarce then it will have a serious impact on the whole North Korean economy."

Pyongyang is understood to have recently banned the use of foreign currency, a step that could have a huge effect by forcing its citizens to convert hard currencies into North Korean won, therefore supplying foreign exchange to the regime and giving the central bank more control over the economy.

Meanwhile, the need to make economic progress has received heightened attention in state media this month, which analysts interpret as a sign of further economic decline.

The regime's new year message talked of a year "in which the dawn of a great, prosperous and powerful socialist nation was ushered in".

DOJ_NMG_0124242

Having achieved two of its strategic goals of ideological and military strength, Pyongyang declared it would now focus on the third – becoming a "great and prosperous nation".

There are some signs that the squeeze could be triggering wider economic changes of the sort encouraged by China.

In the Democratic Chosun, a state publication, North Korean cabinet premier Kwak Bum-ki announced plans to bring about "decisive" changes in enterprises and economic institutions. Analysts said this could herald a strengthening of reforms introduced in 2002, when wages and prices were liberalised.

To Ban The Bomb, Sign The Peace (NYT)

By Paul B. Stares

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Washington

OF all the crises facing the new United Nations secretary general, Ban Ki-moon, the fraying nuclear nonproliferation system is arguably the most consequential. Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, has warned of 30 "virtual new weapons states" on the horizon. Obviously, the more countries that possess the bomb, the higher the risk of a nuclear accident, the theft of a weapon, sales of technology and hardware, and a serious miscalculation leading to nuclear war.

So where should Mr. Ban start? With North Korea having declared after its test last October that it now possesses a nuclear deterrent, the understandable temptation will be to focus on Iran. This would be a mistake. North Korea is still some way off from having a reliable nuclear weapon, and to accept its having this capacity as a fait accompli would not only play into its game plan but also convince Iran and other countries that the international community lacks the will to prevent them from developing the bomb. A new approach is required.

The logical place to look is to examine the lessons of "nuclear reversal" — that is, what has made states in the past give up the nuclear option. At first glance, the historical record doesn't look encouraging: South Africa is the only country that has developed nuclear weapons and then destroyed them. Yet other nations have abandoned advanced research programs — including Australia, Argentina, Brazil, South Korea, Sweden and Taiwan — or, like Belarus, Kazakhstan and Ukraine, given up the nuclear arsenals they inherited from the Soviet Union. One big reason for these countries' decisions, not surprisingly, was the efforts of major powers to reassure them about their long-term security, so that nuclear weapons offered no appreciable benefit.

How would this approach be applied to North Korea? The answer is not unilateral assurances from the United States. American officials have vowed many times that they harbor no hostile intent; repeating that mantra will not make it any more credible to Pyongyang. Similar guarantees from all five of the permanent members of the Security Council, however, could be more persuasive. Enter Mr. Ban.

The diplomatic vehicle for such security assurances would be a United Nations-sponsored initiative to formally end the Korean War and dismantle the present armistice arrangements. As part of a peace treaty, the principal signatories — the United States, China and the two Koreas — would commit themselves to establishing normal diplomatic relations, recognizing the territorial integrity of both Koreas and, most important, ensuring a nuclear-free peninsula.

To sweeten the deal, the Security Council's permanent five would extend security guarantees, similar to those given Ukraine, to both Koreas. These would remain in effect as long as each side fulfilled its nonproliferation commitment. If one or the other reneged, all bets would be off.

Complementary agreements involving conventional arms control, economic assistance, access to international financial institutions and humanitarian aid could also be discussed, but not as prerequisites for replacing the Korean armistice with a permanent peace settlement.

The United States has already signaled its willingness to sign a peace treaty — but only after North Korea verifiably dismantled its nuclear weapons. Reversing the order, however, with upfront but still conditional security guarantees, would provide North Korea with immediate incentives to take the first step.

For Mr. Ban, such an agreement would be not only a gift to his native Korea but a much-needed boost to his organization's stature. Above all else, he might just save the nonproliferation system by using the same approach elsewhere, not least with Iran.

Cheney To Visit Japan, Australia (AFP)

DOJ_NMG_0124243

AFP, January 30, 2007

US Vice President Dick Cheney will travel to Japan and Australia the week of February 19 for talks on Asian security and the global war on terrorism, his office announced.

Cheney, who will also visit US troops stationed in Guam, will meet with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and Australian Prime Minister John Howard to thank them for their help in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The US vice president will also thank the Japanese and Australian militaries for their help, his office said in a statement.

Earlier this month, Japanese newspapers said Cheney was coming to explain President George W. Bush's new plan for Iraq and seek Abe's support and would also make a speech in Japan.

Cheney last visited Japan in April 2004.

Australian PM Welcomes Cheney Visit (AFP)

AFP, January 30, 2007

Australian Prime Minister John Howard has welcomed an upcoming visit by US Vice President Dick Cheney as an opportunity to consult on the progress of the Iraq war.

Australia has some 1,400 troops with the US-led coalition forces in Iraq and Howard has been a firm supporter of US President George W. Bush, as both men face growing criticism from voters over the war.

"The Australia-US alliance is of enduring importance to both countries and makes a significant contribution to international security," Howard said in a statement announcing that Cheney would visit from February 22-27.

"Vice President CheneyÂ's visit will be an important opportunity to reinforce the strong bilateral relationship between the United States and Australia and to consult on major international issues such as regional security challenges, Afghanistan, Iraq and the war against terrorism."

Howard said last week he would not pull Australian troops out of Iraq in the face of spiralling sectarian violence and growing voter discontent over the conflict.

"I think given the larger things that are at stake with the alliance and the fact you do stick by your close allies when things are difficult, I think that would do a lot of damage to the alliance," he said.

"It would not be the right thing to do and it is not something that I will do."

Cheney's office announced that he would travel to Japan and Australia in mid-February for talks on Asian security and the "war on terrorism".

The US vice president, who will also visit US troops stationed in Guam, will meet with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and Howard to thank them and their troops for their help in Iraq and Afghanistan, his office said in a statement.

Cheney last visited Japan in April 2004, but has not been to Australia while serving as Bush's vice president.

US Offers Air Support For Somali Peacekeepers (AFP)

AFP, January 30, 2007

The United States is ready to contribute air support to an African Union peacekeeping force in Somalia, a leading official said.

US Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Jendayi Frazer told AFP that she had made the offer during talks on the sidelines of the African Union summit in Addis Ababa with the head of the AU commission Alpha Oumar Konare.

"We are ready to provide airlift and contracting airplanes for the African peacekeeping force in Somalia," she said.

"We already discussed that with Uganda, and I discussed with chairman Konare.

"A verbal note has been addressed to the AU about the support we are ready to provide and the help we can provide to that force," she added.

The AU has given the green light to a 7,600-strong force to deploy to Somalia at the end of the month but the deadline is set to be missed as only three countries -- Uganda, Nigeria and Malawi -- have so far volunteered forces.

The cash-strapped AU member states want the international community to pay for the force and are also wary of being caught up in new violence in the Horn of Africa nation.

DOJ_NMG_0124244

The US has called the recent ouster of Islamist hardliners from Mogadishu and subsequent replacement in power by a weak interim government as a chance for Somalia to turn its back on 16 years of bloodshed.

Hamas, Fatah Battle Despite Cease-fire (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, January 30, 2007

Palestinian infighting raged in the Gaza Strip Tuesday morning despite a cease-fire declaration by warring Hamas and Fatah factions aimed at ending factional clashes that have left more than 60 dead in the past two months.

Gunfire and explosions were audible in downtown Gaza City as gunmen from the rival factions ignored the cease-fire, reached at a midnight meeting between Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas and a representative of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah.

The truce was set to go into effect at 3 a.m. local time.

Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas announced the agreement early Tuesday. Zahar said the agreement stipulated that all security forces must return to their bases, that suspects in killings were to be handed over, and that all hostages still being held — a number thought to be in the dozens — were to be released. He also said all roadblocks set up by the factions were to be removed.

None of those steps appeared to have been taken after the 3 a.m. deadline passed.

Several earlier truce agreements aimed at stopping the internal Palestinian bloodshed, raging fitfully since early December, have broken down.

Fatah spokesman Maher Mekdad had said his group would observe the agreement.

"Despite all the bitterness and sadness that we are feeling, we will work to make it succeed," he said.

The agreement between the Palestinian factions came as a two-month truce between the Palestinians and Israel in Gaza was jeopardized by a Palestinian suicide bombing, the first since April, 2006. The bomber, a 21-year-old from Gaza, struck the Israeli resort city of Eilat, killing three people and himself.

The two radical groups that claimed to have sent the bomber said they were trying to end Palestinian infighting by taking aim at Israel instead.

Hamas, which controls the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet, praised the attack as legitimate resistance.

Israel's first response came early Tuesday. The army said its aircraft bombed a tunnel dug by Palestinians near the Gaza-Israel border meant to be used by militants for an attack against Israel. No casualties were reported.

Israel has observed a truce with the Palestinians in Gaza since late November, and the airstrike signaled that the Eilat bombing put that cease-fire in danger.

Suicide Attack Is First In Israel In 9 Months (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

JERUSALEM, Tuesday, Jan. 30 — After nine months without a suicide bombing in Israel, a Palestinian walked from Egypt across the open desert border, hitched a ride from a wary Israeli motorist and then blew himself up on Monday inside a bakery in the Red Sea resort town of Eilat, Israeli officials said.

Three Israelis who worked in the bakery were killed by the blast; it was the first time that Eilat, isolated at the very southern tip of Israel, has ever been hit by a suicide bombing.

The town was apparently a target because Israel's web of defenses and travel restrictions on Palestinians has made it extremely difficult for bombers to reach Israel from the West Bank, the source of virtually all suicide bombings in Israel in recent years.

The attack complicated the latest effort to restart Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, which have languished for six years. The United States will be the host of talks on Friday that will include European, Russian and United Nations officials, but the White House said in statement on Monday that if the Palestinian government failed to prevent terrorism, it would "undermine the aspirations of the Palestinian people for a state of their own."

DOJ_NMG_0124245

Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades and Islamic Jihad claimed joint responsibility for the attack, and identified the bomber as Muhammad Faisal al-Siksik, 21, from northern Gaza.

"We shall draw the conclusions and learn the lessons, and instruct our security people to continue their ongoing and never-ending struggle against terrorists and those who send them," Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, said after the bombing.

[The Israeli military said Tuesday that it had responded with an airstrike on a Gaza tunnel near the border with Israel, The Associated Press reported. No one was injured.]

In recent weeks, most of the violence in the region has involved internal Palestinian street battles in the Gaza Strip. The violence continued Monday, with at least three Palestinians killed in Gaza, bringing the toll to about 30 since Thursday.

Early Tuesday, the two main Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, announced a cease-fire after late-night talks in Gaza City. [Gunfire and explosions were audible in downtown Gaza City on Tuesday morning, after the talks took place, as gunmen from the rival factions apparently ignored the cease-fire,The A.P. reported.] Several previous efforts have also collapsed.

Relatives of the bomber, Mr. Siksik, said he left home three days ago and was upset because he had no job and his baby daughter recently died of an illness, The Associated Press reported. Also, a friend of his was killed in a clash with Israeli forces, they said.

In the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya, dozens of people celebrated outside the family home of Mr. Siksik, and his mother, Rowayda Siksik, said she knew her son had set out on a suicide bombing mission. "He told me, 'Meeting God is better for me than this whole world,' " The A.P. quoted her as saying.

Islamic Jihad said the bomber reached Israel from Jordan. But both Jordan and Israeli security officials denied that.

Mr. Siksik left Gaza and entered Egypt, said Micky Rosenfeld, a spokesman for the Israeli police. He said the bomber then crossed Egypt's desert border with Israel, which is aggressively patrolled, but has no fence or other barrier for most of its length.

After entering Israel, Mr. Siksik reached a road north of Eilat on Monday morning, and hitched a ride from an Israeli driver, Mr. Rosenfeld said. Mr. Siksik, who was wearing a black coat and carrying a black bag, was acting suspiciously, the police spokesman said, and the Israeli driver called the police immediately after dropping him on the northern edge of Eilat.

The police were immediately dispatched to the scene, but before they could arrive Mr. Siksik reached the bakery, a few hundred yards from where he got out of the car, Mr. Rosenfeld said.

Benny Mazgini, an Israeli who witnessed the attack, told Israel Radio that he saw a man wearing a black jacket and carrying a black bag on the street outside the bakery. "I thought it was odd because it was very hot and I told myself, why is that idiot dressed that way?"

Seconds later, the bomber detonated his explosive in the Lechamim bakery, tearing the inside apart, shattering windows and leaving the pavement outside covered with blood and body parts.

In a Gaza City news conference after the blast, a masked spokesman for Islamic Jihad said the bombing had been in retaliation for Israeli raids against Palestinian groups.

On its Web site, Islamic Jihad also said the bombing was intended to redirect the focus away from the internal Palestinian fighting in Gaza. "The operation has a clear message to the Palestinian rivals," Islamic Jihad said on the site. "It is necessary to end the infighting and point the guns toward the occupation that has hurt the Palestinian people."

Hamas, the radical Islamic group that leads the Palestinian government, did not claim involvement in the bombing. However, Fawzi Barhoum, a Hamas spokesman in Gaza, described the attack as a "natural response" to Israeli military operations against the Palestinians. "So long as there is occupation, resistance is legitimate," he said.

Egypt's Sinai peninsula, which is largely empty aside from beachfront hotels and fishing villages, has been rocked by a number of bombings in the past three years that have killed Israeli and Western tourists as well as Egyptians.

Israel and Egypt have expressed concern that the vast, hilly terrain offers a natural haven for radical Islamic groups to plan and carry out attacks.

Islamic Jihad has been involved in almost all of the suicide bombings against Israel in the past two years. Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, meanwhile, is linked to the Fatah movement.

DOJ_NMG_0124246

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and other Fatah leaders say they oppose violence against civilians, and Al Aksa militants say they act on their own. At a minimum, the bombing was an embarrassment for Mr. Abbas, again showing his inability to control factions that claim loyalty to the movement.

The last suicide bombing in Israel was an Islamic Jihad attack on April 17, when 11 people were killed at a small restaurant in Tel Aviv.

While attacks in Eilat are rare, three rockets were fired from the Jordanian side of the border in August 2005.

Palestinian Suicide Bomber Kills 3 In Israeli Resort City (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 29 -- A 21-year-old Palestinian from the Gaza Strip blew himself up Monday inside a bakery in the Israeli resort city of Eilat, killing himself and all three people inside.

The morning suicide attack was the first inside Israel in nine months, and it brought sharp condemnation from Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the White House and leaders of the relatively moderate Fatah faction led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

But the governing Hamas movement and Islamic Jihad, a smaller radical group that asserted responsibility for the bombing, called the attack a legitimate response to Israel's occupation of territories that Palestinians envision as part of their future state.

Islamic Jihad officials said the bombing should motivate Palestinian armed groups -- whose partisan fighting in Gaza has killed nearly 30 people in recent days -- to end their differences and unite against Israel.

"This is an important message to the factions," Mohammed el-Hindi, an Islamic Jihad political leader in Gaza, told al-Jazeera satellite television. "We have to remember that we are one nation with one enemy."

Olmert met with military officials following the attack in Eilat, a flashy resort city on the Red Sea whose tourism industry has suffered in the aftermath of Israel's war last summer with the Lebanese Shiite group Hezbollah. It was the first suicide bombing in the city, although Israeli vacationers have been targeted in the past just across the border in Egypt's Sinai Peninsula.

Because there were no survivors inside Lehamim Bakery, located in a residential neighborhood on the edge of Eilat's tourist district, Israeli officials took more than an hour to determine the cause of the 9:40 a.m. explosion.

Police investigators arrived at the bakery, which rescue workers described as a grisly scene, to discover the remnants of an explosives vest on one of the bodies. Israeli officials said the bomb contained nine to 17 pounds of explosives, generating a blast that sent a shower of glass and bread trays into the streets.

"It was very, very hot and he had a coat on," a witness named Benny Mazgini, 45, told Israel Radio. "It didn't look right to me. I thought to myself, 'What's that idiot dressed like that for?' A couple of seconds later I heard a massive explosion."

Olmert said he is weighing Israel's response and vowed to "continue in our ongoing and unending struggle against terrorists and those who send them."

At a news conference in Gaza City, a masked gunman from Islamic Jihad's military wing identified the bomber as Mohammed Siksik, a member of the group from the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya.

Siksik left home three days ago, according to family members interviewed by the Palestinian Ramattan news service, after rival Hamas and Fatah militias began their latest round of factional fighting. Islamic Jihad officials said he entered Israel through Jordan, a contention the Jordanian government denied.

Mickey Rosenfeld, an Israeli police spokesman, said Siksik likely slipped across the Gaza border and into Egypt's Sinai Peninsula. Israel has complained frequently about Palestinian arms smuggling along the frontier since its soldiers left the border area in November 2005.

Rosenfeld said Siksik then likely entered Israel from the Sinai, a vast, lightly populated desert along Israel's southern border. Israeli government officials said investigators were still gathering evidence of his movements.

DOJ_NMG_0124247

Witness accounts in the Israeli media said Siksik may have received a ride into Eilat from a resident, who grew suspicious and called the police after dropping him off. Siksik may have triggered the bomb before he had originally planned after hearing police cars approach the bakery, witnesses said.

The victims' identities were not immediately known. But Israel Radio reported that two of them were Eilat residents and the third a foreign worker from a South American country. All three victims appeared to be employees of the bakery.

The Islamic Jihad official in Gaza said a group called the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades-Army of the Believers, which he characterized as an offshoot of Fatah's armed wing, also participated in the attack. He called on all Palestinian armed groups to stop their internal fighting and "point their arms, all their arms, at the Zionist enemy."

Fatah officials condemned the bombing, saying it undermined the party's goal of reviving peace negotiations with Israel. But Fawzi Barhoum, a spokesman for Hamas, which won parliamentary elections a year ago and controls the Palestinian ministries, said that "all the Palestinian people and factions support this martyr operation."

"This type of operation is a normal response to the occupation and the violation of our rights as a Palestinian people," said Barhoum, who also cited the international aid boycott against the Palestinian government imposed after Hamas's election as justification for the attack.

In a statement, the White House said: "The burden of responsibility for preventing terrorist attacks rests with the Palestinian Authority government. Failure to act against terror will inevitably affect relations between that government and the international community and undermine the aspirations of the Palestinian people for a state of their own."

The Islamic Jihad official said the bombing was retaliation for Israeli military operations in Gaza, many of which have swept through Beit Lahiya over the past six months, and assassinations of the group's members.

Islamic Jihad has not agreed to any cease-fire agreements with Israel, and frequently fires rockets at Israeli towns along the Gaza border. Israeli military airstrikes have killed many Islamic Jihad gunmen on their way to fire rockets.

Israel May Have Misused Cluster Bombs, US Says (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

The State Department notified Congress yesterday that Israel may have violated U.S. rules prohibiting the use of American-made cluster bombs in civilian areas during last summer's war in Lebanon.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to confirm that the preliminary findings related to Israel's use of the weapons in civilian areas, citing classified military-sales agreements between Israel and the United States. But the State Department said last August that it opened the investigation because human rights groups complained that cluster weapons -- bombs that erupt with many little "bomblets" to maximize the number of people killed -- had been found across Lebanon and were responsible for many civilian deaths.

"There may likely could have been some violations" of the agreement governing the U.S. sales, McCormack said, stressing that the State Department has not made any final judgments but is required, under law, to notify Congress of its preliminary findings. He said the classified report was sent to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Biden's staff said it was received late yesterday but they had no comment because the report is classified; Pelosi's office did not respond to a request for comment.

The war started after Hezbollah militants crossed into Israel, killing and capturing Israeli soldiers. After Israel responded, Hezbollah fired thousands of weapons on Israeli population centers from its bases in south Lebanon, frequently from civilian areas.

Israel provided "a detailed response" to the United States "regarding Israel's effort to halt Hezbollah's attacks on civilian populations," said David Siegel, a spokesman for the Israeli Embassy. "Israel suffered heavy casualties and acted as any government would in exercising its right to self-defense."

It is not illegal under international law to use cluster weapons against enemy combatants. The United States has used cluster bombs in Iraq, resulting in many civilian casualties. The Israeli Defense Forces, which says it urged people to flee areas near missile launchers to minimize civilian deaths, is investigating whether cluster bombs were heavily used in populated areas in the final days of the month-long war.

DOJ_NMG_0124248

Hezbollah "used human shields, they hid themselves among civilian populations," McCormack said. "No military commander wants to have to be put in the position of acting in self-defense and going after those people who have committed aggression against your country but are then hiding among civilian populations."

Human Rights Watch urged a cutoff yesterday of cluster-bomb sales to Israel. "We've investigated cluster munitions in Kosovo, Afghanistan, and Iraq, but we've never seen use of cluster munitions that was so extensive and dangerous to civilians," Steve Goose, director of the group's arms division, said in a statement.

The State Department investigates any allegations that Israel misused U.S.-supplied weapons, and often no action is taken. In 1978, 1979 and 1981, the State Department notified Congress that Israel "may have violated" agreements by using U.S. weapons for purposes other than defense, according to the Congressional Research Service. But the inquiries resulted in no penalties. In 1982, the Reagan administration suspended sales of cluster bombs to Israel for six years after a congressional investigation found that Israel violated agreements on their use during its invasion of Lebanon.

U.S. Suspects Illegal Use Of Cluster Bombs (WT/AP)

By George Gedda

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

Israel likely misused American-made cluster bombs in civilian areas of Lebanon during the war against Hezbollah last summer, the State Department said yesterday.

Spokesman Sean McCormack said a preliminary report on the U.S. investigation has been sent to Congress. He did not provide details of the investigation.

The United Nations said last summer that unexploded cluster bombs -- anti-personnel weapons that spray bomblets over a wide area -- litter homes, gardens and highways in southern Lebanon.

When Israel purchases cluster bombs and other lethal equipment from the United States, it must agree in writing to restrictions on their use.

The report, Mr. McCormack said, "is not a final judgment."

He declined to speculate on what action may be taken against Israel if a violation is confirmed.

He said Israeli officials have been cooperative in providing information.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said yesterday that "Israel takes the concerns raised by the U.S. extremely seriously" and had been as "forthcoming and transparent as possible."

"Israel is itself conducting an ongoing internal investigation as to the use of munitions during the Lebanon conflict," Mr. Regev said.

The U.N. Mine Action Coordination Center has said it is not illegal to use the cluster bombs against soldiers or enemy fighters, but the Geneva Conventions bar their use in civilian areas.

Relief organizations and the U.N. mine office have reported finding evidence that Israel used three types of U.S.-made cluster bombs during the 34-day war with Hezbollah militants, during which both sides fired rockets into populated areas.

The U.N. mine office said it had found hundreds of bomblets of the types made by the United States among unexploded ordnance recovered in nearly 250 locations in southern Lebanon.

Israel also makes its own cluster munitions.

The Reagan administration imposed a six-year ban on cluster-weapon sales to Israel in 1982, after a congressional investigation found misuse of the weapon during Israel's war that year with Lebanon.

The Israeli army has said all weapons it uses "are legal under international law and their use conforms with international standards."

Cluster bombs are typically used against tanks and explode upon impact with steel. In the conflict in Lebanon, the shells were fired into urban and rural areas where Israel thought Hezbollah guerrillas might be hiding. Many hit the ground or pavement and did not explode.

DOJ_NMG_0124249

Israel said it was forced to hit civilian targets in Lebanon because Hezbollah fighters were using villages as bases for rocket launchers aimed at Israel. At least 850 Lebanese and 157 Israelis died in the fighting.

The Bush administration repeatedly warned Israel to avoid civilian casualties during the cross-border war, but refrained from direct criticism of Israeli tactics.

Egypt Steps On The Press As It Backtracks On Democratic Reform (CSM)

By Sarah Gauch

The Christian Science Monitor, January 30, 2007

CAIRO

Court proceedings started Sunday against Howaida Taha, an Al Jazeera journalist arrested while producing a documentary on police torture in Egypt. She's charged with harming national interests and faces five years in prison.

Meanwhile, Egyptian blogger Kareem Amer has been in jail since November awaiting trial, charged with criticizing Islam and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Taken together, these cases have given journalists, bloggers, and human rights activists in Egypt cause to fear an impending crackdown on the country's outspoken independent press and its young, activist bloggers, who have been primary agitators for democratic reform.

"These attacks on the press send a chilling message to all members of the media who attempt to tackle sensitive topics," says Joel Campagna, Middle East program coordinator at the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists. "There's been a steady level of pressure against domestic and pan-Arab media, and bloggers, which might be coming to a head."

Over the past year, the government has steadily rolled back political reforms implemented since 2004 after the Bush administration singled out Egypt as ripe for democratic reform. Since then, Egypt has held parliamentary elections that were allegedly rife with fraud, police have violently suppressed demonstrations, and the government has arrested hundreds of opposition Muslim Brotherhood members, who hold 88 out of 454 parliamentary seats.

And many worry Egypt's relative freedom of expression may be ending, too. Indeed, they say, Ms. Taha's case is alarming. She was accused of fabricating scenes of torture after the authorities discovered her unedited video including reenactments of torture scenes. Taha says she had Interior Ministry cooperation for the project and had told them about the reenactments.

Activists and journalists say the government is trying to squash accusations of Egyptian police torture with Taha's case, which comes amid revelations of rampant abuse after bloggers posted videos online of apparent police torture.

In one particular case, a minibus driver is shown being sodomized with a stick. Since the tape surfaced, two police officers have been jailed and are scheduled to stand trial. The driver, who subsequently filed a complaint against the police, is serving three months in prison for resisting the authorities.

Mr. Amer is the first Egyptian blogger to face trial. A young former law student at Al-Azhar University, the seat of Sunni Islamic learning, he has been in solitary confinement since being jailed. His trial was adjourned last week until Thursday.

In addition to these two cases, about 45 independent and opposition journalists in Egypt face court cases, according to the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights. While none of those are currently jailed, several are appealing guilty verdicts.

"For many of these cases, the Egyptian government starts the investigation and just leaves the file open," says human rights activist Gamal Eid. "This sends the message: You are under our microscope and we can restart this case at any time."

Although Mr. Mubarak promised in 2004 to abolish prison sentences for journalists, when the country's press laws were amended last July incarceration for journalists – and bloggers – remained.

The government denies accusations of stifling free expression. "Freedom of expression is guaranteed and granted on all levels," says one government official, who asked to remain anonymous. "There are at least 10 newspapers who daily criticize the government, including the president."

Although Egypt is more tolerant, Mr. Campagna says, its tactics also follow a regional trend of limiting free expression. "When we look at the region now versus 10 years ago it's much rarer to see governments using actual repression, throwing journalists in prison," he says. "Today, governments are employing more effective, subtle means of pressure: bringing journalists before courts with the prospect of jail time, behind-the-scene pressure from security agents. This is as effective as actual imprisonment."

DOJ_NMG_0124250

Increased pressure, however, on the press and bloggers doesn't seem to have cowed many. "I will not stop exposing the government through my work," says Al Jazeera's Taha, who has copies of her confiscated tapes and is already back at work on her documentary, part of a series about human rights abuses in Arab countries.

General To Be Asked About Beijing's Test (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

China's most senior military war planner is visiting the United States, and Pentagon officials plan to question him about Beijing's recent anti-satellite test.

Gen. Ge Zhenfeng, deputy chief of the general staff, arrived in Hawaii on Sunday. He is leading a delegation of officers that are part of a U.S.-China military exchange program.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates is not expected to meet with Gen. Ge, and the Pentagon is seeking to play down the visit by giving Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker the lead role in the 11-day visit.

Defense officials said they do not expect Gen. Ge to be more forthcoming than other Chinese officials who have refused to explain China's Jan. 11 anti-satellite missile test.

"They haven't been forthcoming at all," said one defense official. "This is something that we'll continue to press them on."

Gen. Ge is considered China's most important war planner and ground forces commander. He took part in China's first joint war games with Russia in 2005 and is in charge of managing the Chinese military's close ties to the North Korean military.

Defense officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity said senior Pentagon officials considered canceling Gen. Ge's visit because of the anti-satellite weapons test. The Chinese fired a commercial rocket with an anti-satellite warhead that then crashed into an orbiting Chinese weather satellite, destroying it on impact.

U.S. officials consider the test provocative because it was China's first acknowledged use of space weapons. The Chinese government has publicly called for an international ban on such weapons.

"He'll probably give us the same shrugs we've seen in the past," the defense official said of Gen. Ge.

The defense official said the Pentagon is concerned about Chinese anti-satellite weapons and has been tracking its space-weapons development for some time.

"It's disturbing to see that they've conducted a test," the official said, noting that it indicates that the Chinese have "transcended" from research and development into action.

Meanwhile, Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said in a speech yesterday that the Chinese anti-satellite test was a "wake-up call" that should prompt a major program to counter China from attacking U.S. satellites.

"The January 11th test also shows China's ability to hit targets in low-Earth orbit where most of American reconnaissance assets are deployed," Mr. Kyl said in a speech to the Heritage Foundation.

An Army spokesman said that the focus of Gen. Ge's visit will be on how the Army conducts "professional military education" and that Gen. Schoomaker is not expected to make a reciprocal visit to China because he is stepping down as chief.

Gen. Ge and nine other Chinese military officers are visiting the U.S. Pacific Command in Honolulu and then will visit the Army's Fort Lewis, Wash., base. They will visit the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, N.Y., on Monday.

A Covert Fight For Putin's Job (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

MOSCOW -- Even though the vote is more than a year away, presidential jockeying in Russia already is in full swing. But if new U.S. presidential candidates declare themselves almost daily, that is the one thing a serious contender in Russia's tightly controlled system would never do.

Instead, the race to succeed Vladimir Putin, who is obliged by a two-term limit to step down next year, is a kind of Kabuki theater, where contenders maneuver to score points for themselves and undermine suspected rivals with the only constituency that really matters: Mr. Putin and the Kremlin elite. The behind-the-scenes struggle has triggered waves of conspiracy theories as events ranging from corruption scandals to contract killings to the poisoning of a former security agent are dissected for clues to what it says about the presidential race.

DOJ_NMG_0124251

"With such tight controls on the media, everyone naturally starts to wonder why the government lets one piece of information out instead of something else," said Nikolai Petrov, political analyst at the Carnegie Moscow Center. "So everyone is analyzing information to learn about the battles between different clans."

Politicians and analysts agree that there is little suspense about who will decide the outcome of the elections, slated for March 2008. Basking in strong public support and tight control over the media, political parties and election authorities, Mr. Putin will be able to ensure victory for whichever candidate he endorses.

Russia's next president must do more than safeguard the stability of a sprawling, resource-rich, nuclear-armed nation. More threatening to those now in control in the Kremlin, he will decide who controls the enormous power and wealth that Mr. Putin has concentrated in Moscow.

Kremlin insiders also insist that tight control over the process is critical to ensure that extreme left-wing or nationalist candidates, whose views have strong appeal in Russia, don't prevail.

Mr. Putin kicked off speculation over who would succeed him more than a year ago, when he elevated two close allies to prominent government jobs, in a move widely viewed as setting up a horse race between the two.

Dmitry Medvedev, a baby-faced lawyer who got his start with Mr. Putin in St. Petersburg in the 1990s, was handed the reins of a massive new social-spending program. Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov, an old Putin colleague from the KGB security agency (Mr. Ivanov won't say just what he did there), was tasked with rebuilding Russia's military industry.

Even as the two have seen their poll ratings rise thanks to blanket coverage on state TV, doubts persist about whether Mr. Putin might find a way to stay on despite the constitutional ban on running for a third term. One theory popular in Moscow's political class runs that people close to the president might precipitate some kind of crisis, possibly a breach in relations with the West, to force him to reverse his public pledge to step down next year.

A similar struggle played out in early 1996, when one Kremlin faction sought to persuade then-President Boris Yeltsin, who was ailing and lagging far behind in the polls, to cancel the vote. That group lost out to another, and Mr. Yeltsin went on to defeat his Communist rival.

Russia's short democratic history doesn't have many success stories. Fourteen years ago, the first relatively free elections after the collapse of communism led to a Parliament packed with hard-line nationalists and Communists. Later presidential campaigns involved heavy-handed manipulation of the media and other official levers to ensure that Boris Yeltsin, and then Mr. Putin, prevailed.

"Russia has no system of deciding who will be the next president," said Grigory Yavlinsky, head of the opposition Yabloko political party and a former presidential candidate. As elections approach "there will be lots of instability and terrible nervousness."

The recent murders of Kremlin critics -- journalist Anna Politkovskaya in Moscow and former security agent Alexander Litvinenko in London -- are seen as evidence of a fight among Kremlin clans. Mr. Putin's critics have blamed the Kremlin for both deaths. Russian officials heatedly deny that and suggest the murders were arranged by Mr. Putin's opponents to tarnish Russia's reputation.

Practically every political development is interpreted for what it might say about the hidden race. Mr. Ivanov, for instance, wound up on the defensive last year after the brutal hazing of a military-academy recruit got heavy media coverage. Then a wave of corruption charges at the Health Ministry looked to many analysts like a campaign to discredit Mr. Medvedev.

Some of the speculation is even more extreme. Stanislav Belkovsky, a political analyst and onetime Kremlin adviser, believes Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning has given an edge to Mr. Medvedev's supporters because it has discredited Russian security services. The radioactive poison used to kill Mr. Litvinenko was spread through restaurants and hotels in London, and the incident has badly strained relations with Britain.

DOJ_NMG_0124252

Publicly, officials deny any split in Mr. Putin's retinue, insisting that since he has said he will step down at the end of his term, the issue is closed. Mr. Putin has been cagey about his plans to endorse a successor, saying only that his preferred candidate should continue his policies and that it might not be one of the apparent heirs.

Mr. Putin says he expects to remain a prominent political player after he leaves office, raising the possibility that he could keep the reins of power behind the scenes, a wholly new political construct for Russia.

Even so, the race is heating up. Messrs. Medvedev and Ivanov are shown daily on state TV looking presidential and regularly make highly publicized foreign visits. The unannounced competition has been thinly veiled at times, such as when the two attended ceremonies for rival business schools within days of each other.

For now, Kremlin-watchers say Mr. Medvedev has Mr. Putin's favor. The spending programs he is running are a machine-politician's dream: about $14 billion in subsidies to improve health, education, housing and agriculture. A former law professor and longtime Putin protégé, he is also chairman of the board of state gas giant OAO Gazprom. Considered a relative liberal, Mr. Medvedev delivered a keynote speech at this year's Davos economic forum, insisting the Kremlin is committed to market economics and democracy.

Detractors say that, at 44 years old, Mr. Medvedev is handicapped by a lack of political experience and gravitas -- at 5-feet 5-inches tall he is one of the few top Russian officials shorter than Mr. Putin. Others say his mild bearing might work to his advantage because Mr. Putin could more easily control him after stepping down.

Kremlin watchers say Mr. Ivanov, 53, remains a contender thanks to his supposed appeal to Kremlin hard-liners, owing to his tough-guy credentials. Mr. Ivanov took a hard line during Russia's recent confrontation with the former Soviet state of Georgia, whose pro-Western president has accused the Kremlin of trying to topple him.

For the moment, any competition between Messrs. Ivanov and Medvedev is strictly under the carpet -- neither man will even admit to harboring presidential ambitions.

Saudis To Pare Oil Output Again (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

Saudi Arabia, which already has aggressively shaved its oil output in a battle to shore up prices, is tightening its spigots further this week.

A senior Saudi oil official said yesterday the kingdom had advised its customers of the impending 158,000 barrel-a-day cut, which takes effect Feb. 1. The reductions, part of a broader campaign by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, are intended to shrink inventories of oil that had ballooned last year as demand growth for petroleum faltered.

"After these cuts, our oil production will have declined by about one million barrels a day since last summer," said the senior Saudi oil official.

Word of the Saudi move to further trim output comes as traders are trying to parse whether OPEC is going to cut its production in line with its announced plans. OPEC's members often produce more than they have pledged. Saudi Arabia, the world's largest oil exporter, is the oil cartel's de facto leader and closely watched by markets.

Saudi Arabia's one-million-barrel reduction -- made over a roughly six-month period -- is nearly double the total cuts it agreed to make under two output reductions hammered out by OPEC at meetings in Doha, Qatar, in October and in Abuja, Nigeria, in December. The Saudi official couldn't be precise about Saudi output after the reduction this week but said that it would be "around 8.5 million barrels a day."

The 10 members of OPEC that committed to reduce their output were producing about 27.5 million barrels a day in September. The agreed-upon cuts, if fully implemented, would bring the group's output down to 25.8 million barrels a day in a global oil market of about 85 million barrels a day.

OPEC officials, including some senior Saudis, have been sending some conflicting signals about their plans. Yesterday, U.S. benchmark crude declined $1.41 to $54.01 a barrel after the outgoing Saudi ambassador to the U.S., Prince Turki al Faisal, said current oil-price levels are "adequate to meet the requirements of producing and consuming countries." He also dismissed speculation that Saudi Arabia was trying to drive down oil prices to constrain export revenues for political rival Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0124253

The ambassador sent crude prices down in October when he said the kingdom's aim was to bring oil prices down to "reasonable levels." This was shortly before OPEC ministers met and announced a 1.2 million barrel-a-day cut.

Saudi oil officials who manage the kingdom's production say more cuts are on the way. The move to trim further comes as the cartel seems to be having some success in shoring up prices, which fell below $50 a barrel amid signs of sluggish oil-demand growth and rising inventories.

Ali Naimi, Saudi Arabia's oil minister and the cartel's de facto leader, has been careful not to pinpoint a specific target price for crude. Analysts said the OPEC cuts are meant to shore up crude well above $50 a barrel for the benchmark U.S. oil type by further eating away at inventories.

"They are defending prices from falling below $55 [a barrel] quite aggressively," said Roger Diwan, an analyst at PFC Energy, a Washington industry consultancy.

Mr. Diwan noted Saudi Arabia had opened its oil taps wide when prices were surging, in line with its long-standing policy of tempering markets. Saudi officials had expressed concern when prices soared to record highs last year, for fear that the price surge might trigger a market-killing economic downturn or encourage customers to seek substitute fuels. "The Saudis, they don't talk a lot, so look at what they do, and that will give you the whole story," Mr. Diwan said.

Saudi Arabia cranked its pumps to near-maximum in 2005, when prices leaped because of strong demand, tight supplies and hurricane damage to oil-production facilities in the Gulf of Mexico. Late last spring, the kingdom began trimming its output as oil tanks in consumer countries filled up and Saudi Arabia couldn't find buyers for all its oil.

During the summer, buyers demanded more oil, and the Saudis provided it as world oil prices peaked at more than $77 a barrel in July. Then prices started tumbling in the fall, prompting OPEC to cut output twice.

This month, as oil prices fell close to $50 a barrel in New York, Mr. Naimi brushed aside calls by some members such as Venezuela and Iran for an emergency OPEC meeting, presumably to consider deeper output cuts than already agreed upon. A Saudi official said the kingdom turned down a meeting because oil-industry data showed the fundamentals of the oil market were moving toward balance and that no cuts beyond those already planned were needed for the months ahead.

Since then, prices have firmed above $50.

French Diplomat Says Ties With U.S. Are On The Mend (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

Relations between France and the United States are back on track after years of tumult and should remain that way regardless of who wins the French presidential election this spring, Paris' envoy to Washington said yesterday.

Jean-David Levitte, who took over the French Embassy in December 2002 at a time of strained ties just before the Iraq war began, said he is a "happy ambassador" these days because the two countries have similar positions on most key issues.

"Today, our relationship is back on the right track," Mr. Levitte told editors and reporters at The Washington Times. "These are not only words; these are deeds."

His comments on Lebanon's political crisis, Syria's behavior, Iran's nuclear program and its larger role in the Middle East were almost identical to the Bush administration's positions.

"We share the frustration of the United States, and for the time being, we have decided not to maintain a high-level dialogue with Syria," he said, citing Damascus' continued interference in Lebanon.

"There is not much difference between Washington and Paris," he said.

Mr. Levitte also echoed the administration's recent observations that the U.N. Security Council's December resolution that imposed limited sanctions on Tehran over its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment is affecting Iranian public opinion.

"We have noted in the Iranian media the beginning of a debate about the situation that Iran is in now -- more isolation and confrontation," Mr. Levitte said.

The resolution gave Tehran two months to respond, but it is not clear what the consequences might be if it does not.

Mr. Levitte declined to comment on the situation in Iraq, saying only that the French Embassy in Baghdad is urging the country's leaders to think about their children's future when making decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0124254

Regarding withdrawal of U.S. and other foreign forces from Iraq, he said France is advocating "a perspective," rather than a timetable, that would put just enough pressure on the Iraqi government to get its act together and start improving security.

French political observers expect a close election in April between the conservative candidate, Nicolas Sarkozy, and socialist Segolene Royal, the first woman to run for France's president.

Even though Mr. Sarkozy has promised to improve relations with the United States, Mr. Levitte predicted "a lot of continuity in the key elements of our foreign policy." The European Union will remain "our first priority," followed by the trans-Atlantic relationship.

"Don't expect major changes," he said. "General [Charles] de Gaulle has a legacy that is still the inspiration for all leaders of the French republic, whatever their political party is."

Jean-Marie Le Pen, the far-right presidential candidate who came in second five years ago, is not expected to win, although his poll numbers are higher than they were at this time in 2002.

Mr. Le Pen attracted many voters with his anti-immigrant positions, which have maintained their appeal because of a series of events, including the 2005 riots in poor neighborhoods with predominantly Muslim residents.

Mr. Levitte said the French government realized it had made a big mistake decades ago by resettling immigrants, mostly from North Africa, in de facto ghettos isolated from the rest of society, where unemployment and bad schooling led to desperation among young people.

"The unrest that existed in poor neighborhoods had nothing to do with jihad and much to do with social conditions," he said. "That's why we have to put the emphasis on improving the social conditions -- schools, jobs, better housing -- and hopefully all this will trigger better absorption in the social fabric of France of this minority."

A special "authority" has been set up to look into complaints that companies reject job applicants just because they have Muslim or other foreign names, the ambassador said.

The number of French citizens with at least one parent or grandparent born abroad is equal to that in the United States, he noted with pride.

Ghana To Chair African Union Instead Of Sudan: Top Official (WP/AP)

By Les Neuhaus And Alfred De Montesquiou, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Jan. 29 -- Bloodshed in Sudan's Darfur region dominated discussion at the African Union summit Monday, blocking Sudan's bid to lead the 53-country group as the U.N. chief described scorched-earth military policies as "a terrifying feature of life" in the vast, arid area.

With Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir looking on, U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon said that "the toll of the crisis remains unacceptable." As many as 450,000 people have died from disease and violence and 2.5 million have been displaced in four years of fighting. Ban called on African leaders to end the deadlock created by Sudan's refusal to allow U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur.

Hours later, the African Union chose Ghana's president, John Kufuor, to head the bloc, deflecting Sudan's bid for the second year in a row.

"This is a very unfortunate development," Sudanese Foreign Ministry spokesman Ali Sadiq said in Khartoum. "The African heads of states had committed to this last year. That they changed their mind shows there was heavy pressure from outside Africa."

Last year, African leaders selected the president of Congo Republic in a compromise in which he would hand over the A.U. post to Bashir after a year. But that deal hinged on Sudan demonstrating progress in bringing peace to Darfur. Instead of declining, Darfur's violence has in recent months spilled into neighboring Chad and Central African Republic.

International organizations opposed the idea of Sudan leading the A.U., accusing Bashir's government of encouraging conflict in Darfur. Rebel leaders in the region said they would no longer regard an A.U. peacekeeping mission as an honest broker if Sudan were selected.

DOJ_NMG_0124255

Nobel Peace laureate Desmond Tutu of South Africa criticized Sudan sharply on Monday, and a French aid group said it was pulling out of western Sudan because of the lack of security. Six other international charities said Sunday that their work in Darfur will soon be paralyzed unless urgent action is taken.

Darfur has been the scene of violence since rebels from ethnic African farm communities took up arms against the Arab-dominated central government in 2003. Sudan's government has been accused of retaliating against civilians as well as supporting paramilitary groups from nomadic Arab tribes blamed for some of the worst atrocities in the conflict. Officials in Khartoum deny the allegations.

The government signed a peace agreement with one Darfur rebel faction last May, but violence has worsened. Sudan and Chad have also traded accusations of supporting each other's rebel groups.

Bashir has opposed a U.N. Security Council resolution that calls for 22,000 U.N. peacekeepers to replace or absorb the weak A.U. force of 7,000 soldiers now in Darfur. But late Monday, Sadiq, the Foreign Ministry spokesman in Khartoum, said Sudan's government had agreed to cooperate on forming a "hybrid force" for Darfur that would include U.N. troops.

He said no final agreement on troop numbers had been reached, although A.U. and U.N. officials say the United Nations could send as many as 10,000 to 15,000. Sadiq said U.N. troops could begin deploying in July. Sudan has reneged on previous agreements to allow the United Nations into Darfur.

The summit, which ends Tuesday, is also focusing on assembling an African peacekeeping force for Somalia, which has been without an effective central government since clan warlords toppled a longtime military dictatorship in 1991 and then fell to fighting among themselves.

In December, a U.N.-backed interim government supported by Ethiopia's military ousted an Islamic militia in the Horn of Africa nation, but Ethiopian troops are pulling out and there are worries that warlords and other armed groups could disrupt efforts to restore stability.

China And Sudan (WP)

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

THE DARFUR crisis has demonstrated the limits of U.S. influence. President Bush and administration officials have described it as genocide and pushed intermittently for sanctions, peacekeeping deployments, and a deal between Sudan's government and its rebel opponents, but their efforts have been hampered by the hesitancy of other players. Sanctions resolutions in the U.N. Security Council have been delayed and diluted because Russia sells weapons to Sudan's government and because China has a large stake in Sudan's oil. Efforts to deploy a serious peacekeeping force have been undermined partly by foot-dragging within the Security Council, partly by the indifference of Sudan's Arab neighbors to the suffering of Darfur's Muslim victims and partly by the ambivalence of the African Union, which has veered between brave efforts to supply soldiers and a misplaced deference to Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir. Yesterday brought a small victory in the effort to force action. Now a bigger test follows.

Yesterday's victory occurred at the summit of the African Union. For the second consecutive year, Mr. Bashir sought the presidency of the union, even though its chief achievement has been the Darfur peacekeeping operation made necessary by Mr. Bashir's own support for genocide. In the days before the meeting, reports suggested that Mr. Bashir might succeed in his ambition, an outcome that would have destroyed the African Union's credibility not only in Darfur but in conflict mediation elsewhere. Fortunately, Africa's leaders balked at this prospect and chose a rival candidate.

The next test involves Chinese President Hu Jintao, who today begins a 12-day tour of Africa that includes a stop in Sudan. Mr. Hu's main goal is to do business: China's trade with Africa is booming. But he may also be ready to push Sudan's leadership to accept the deployment of a U.N. peacekeeping force that would build on the existing African Union contingent. A Security Council resolution already calls for such a deployment, but Mr. Bashir has been resisting it. Yesterday a Sudanese spokesman indicated that his government no longer objected, perhaps signaling an awareness of the limits to China's willingness to provide diplomatic cover.

The African Union snub and the Chinese leader's visit provide an opportunity to regain the initiative on Darfur, which is descending further into misery and is destabilizing its neighbors. Yesterday a French aid group said it was pulling out of the territory because of insecurity, and on Sunday six other international charities said their work in Darfur was close to a standstill. Fighting has spread into neighboring Chad and the Central African Republic; it is a primary reason that Sudan's north-south peace agreement, concluded after a two-decade war that killed an estimated 2 million people, is at risk of unraveling. The question for Mr. Hu is whether he merely wants to create an illusion of diplomatic progress on Sudan to protect China from the appearance of complicity in genocide or whether he means to ensure that peacekeepers are deployed.

DOJ_NMG_0124256

Optimism In Northern Ireland (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

IN A ONCE-UNTHINKABLE concession, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army voted Sunday to recognize the authority of the new Police Service of Northern Ireland. Meeting in Dublin, Sinn Fein pledged cooperation with the new force only days after revelations that the province's previous police force, the Royal Ulster Constabulary, coddled Protestant killers as recently as the 1990s. The juxtaposition of the two events suggests that what was once regarded as an intractable political problem is on its way to a solution.

According to a report last week by Police Ombudsman Nuala O'Loan, the RUC's Special Branch protected informants from the Ulster Volunteer Force, an illegal Protestant paramilitary group, even though they were involved in 10 killings and other acts of violence. Coziness between the police and underworld informants isn't unique to Northern Ireland, but the ties between the RUC and Protestant paramilitaries confirmed what Catholics long had argued: that law and order in the province was skewed in favor of Protestants.

But, as Sinn Fein has recognized, that was then and this is now. More than a name differentiates the new police service from the RUC. As might be expected in a force with "royal" in its title, the RUC was composed largely of pro-British Protestants. The new force, whose membership is almost a quarter Catholic (a proportion that is expected to grow as a result of aggressive recruiting), has been reconstituted and reformed as part of the 1998 Good Friday peace agreement.

Sunday's vote, urged by Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams, was a prerequisite for reestablishing a coalition government in Belfast in which Unionists — pro-British Protestants — will share power with Republicans — Catholics who want a united Ireland. It's hard to imagine stranger bedfellows: the Democratic Unionist Party, which regards Northern Ireland as eternally British, and Sinn Fein, which still seeks a "democratic socialist republic" that will rule the entire island.

The genius of the Good Friday agreement, supported by Britain and the predominantly Catholic Republic of Ireland, is that it finessed the issue of whether Northern Ireland is British or Irish. As part of the agreement, the Republic of Ireland renounced its claim to govern the north, while Britain disavowed any "selfish interest" in ruling the province past the point at which a majority of its inhabitants have decided to sever the connection with the United Kingdom. Meanwhile, Britain and Ireland will make sure that their constituents in the north cooperate.

It's a delicate compromise, but infinitely preferable to "the Troubles" that cost 3,000 lives. But if it is to survive, those who police the north must be — and be seen as — evenhanded.

DOJ_NMG_0124257

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JANUARY 30, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Uighurs' Detention Conditions Condemned (WP) 4
Dutch Man Face Terror Trial In U.S. (WT)..... 5
Dutch Citizen Pleads Not Guilty To Terrorism Charges (WP)..... 6
Man Faces U.S. Terror Charges In First Prosecution Of Iraq Troop Targeting (USAT/AP) 6
Iraqi-Born Dutch Citizen Pleads 'Not Guilty' To Charges He Assisted The Insurgency (ABC) 7
Analysis: Dutchman Faces U.S. Iraq Charges (UPI)..... 7
Turks Arrest 47 On Suspicion Of Terror Links (NYT)..... 9
Habeas Corpus And An Era Of Limits (LAT) 9
Gonzales' Body Blow Against Habeas Corpus (VAPILOT)..... 10
Canada's Good Example (NYT) 11

Homeland Response:

Nuclear Agency: Air Defenses Impractical (WP) 12
Panel Rejects Responsibility For Attacks (NYT/AP)..... 13
Idea To 'Cage' Atomic Plants Is Rejected (LAT)..... 13
Documents Detail Puzzling Behavior Of Truck-driving Student (PROJO) 14
Homeland Security's Inspector General Blasts Coast Guard Modernization Program (AP) 16
Super Bowl Security A Massive Effort (AP) 17
PUC Sets Contempt Hearing For Verizon (AP)..... 18
Senators At Louisiana Hearing Criticize Federal Recovery Aid (NYT) 18
Obama Blasts Bush Adminstration On Katrina Recovery (CHIT) 19
Mary Quite Contrary (RC) 20
The Post-Katrina Drawing Board (WP)..... 21

War News:

Bush Warns Iran Against Action In Iraq (AP)..... 22
Bush Warns Iran About Aggression In Iraq (CHIT) 22
Bush Vows To Confound Iranian Operations In Iraq (WT)..... 23
Bush Warns Iran, Syria, Hezbollah On Lebanon (AFP) 24
How The 'Axis' Seeks The Killer Missile (WT) 24
With Iran Ascendant, U.S. Is Seen At Fault (WP) 25
US Ally And Foe Are Trying To Avert War In Lebanon (NYT)..... 27
Embassy Row (WT) 28
Europe Resists US On Curbing Ties With Iran (NYT)..... 29
Shell Iran Plan Will Come Under US Scrutiny (FT) 31
Senator Targets Surplus Sales To Iran (AP) 31
Iranian President's Setbacks Embolden His Domestic Critics (WSJ) 32
Missteps By Iraqi Forces In Battle Raise Questions (NYT)..... 33
Iraq: Shiite Cult Behind Najaf Battle (USAT/AP)..... 34
Leader Of Shiite Religious Cult Killed By U.S., Iraqi Forces (LAT) 35
Iraqis Describe Plot To Kill Shiite Clerics (WP)..... 36
Iraqis Thwart Plot To Kill Shi'ite Clergy (WT/AP)..... 37
Battle Suggests New Sectarian Divides In Iraq (CSM)..... 38
Baker Agrees Reluctantly To Testify On Iraq (HILL) 39
Beyond Baghdad (WP) 41
Fallon Says U.S. Miscalculated Iraq (AP)..... 41
War Of The Water Cooler (WP)..... 42
Our Options In Iraq (WSJ) 43
The American Iraq (WSJ) 44
A League Of Their Own (NYT) 47
Equipment For Added Troops Is Lacking (WP) 47
Brakes Thrown On Iraq Fight (RC) 48
Iraq Debate Strains Bond Of Congress' Vietnam Vets (USAT)... 50
Soldier's Death Strengthens Senators' Antiwar Resolve (WP).... 51
Feingold Calls War Bluff (POL)..... 52
Congress Tests Bounds Of Its War Power (AP)..... 56
Democrats Must Not Fold: Hold Bush Accountable At Retreat (RC)..... 57
Former Coalition Official Sentenced In Fraud Case (WP)..... 58
As Iraqi Refugees Flee, Let's Not Forget Vietnam (USAT) 59
Reconstruction Aid Falling Into The Wrong Hands (WT)..... 59
Discarding An Afghan Opportunity (WP) 60
Iraqis Get Ideas From S.C. Prisons (AP)..... 61

Corporate Scandals:

KLA-Tencor Books Options Charge, Found 'intentional' Mispricing (DOW) 62
`NatWest Three' Again Seek Dismissal Of Enron Charges (Update1) (BLOOM) 62
Former Executives Spared Prison Time In Cendant Case (FINDLAW/AP) 63
SEC Clears Market-Based Way To Value Staff Stock Options (WSJ) 64
6-Month Home Detention For Executive (NYT/AP)..... 65
Fannie Mae Chief Got 25% Raise Last Year (WP) 65

Criminal Law:

Under Oath, Fleischer Stays On Message (NSDY/AP)..... 66
Fleischer Tells Of Talk With Libby (USAT/AP) 67
Former Press Secretary Says Libby Told Him Of Plame (WP)... 67
Fleischer Handles Questioning In The Usual Fashion (WP) 68
Ex-Bush Aide, In Testimony, Disputes Libby (NYT) 69
Fleischer: Libby Discussed CIA Officer Over Lunch (FINDLAW/AP) 71
Former Press Secretary Dispels Many Illusions (NYT) 72
The Ba-Da-Boom Crew (WP) 73
Reporter To Take Stand In CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP) 74
Russert: Not Source Of CIA Officer Leak (NSDY/AP)..... 74
Feds Plan $200M Grant Program Aimed At Curbing Violent Crime (USAT) 75
Man In Internet Sex Sting Sentenced (NTHWSTT)..... 75
FBI Inquires About Miller Land Deals (SGVT)..... 76
Former Coke Secretary Testifies In Conspiracy Trial (SDUT/AP)77
Alleged Coke Spy Tearful At Trial Former Secretary Says Of Allegations She Conspired To Sell Company Secrets: 'I Did Not Do Any Of This.' (AJC) 78
MS-13 Member In Jail, Accused Of Cutting Off Couple's Heads (KHOU) 79
4 Convicted Of Watching Cockfights (AP)..... 79
FBI Agents Arrest Man At Mall St. Matthews (LCJ)..... 80
Serial Child Molester Receives Maximum Term In California (NYT) 80
Man Sentenced To Probation In Fake Hazmat Incident (NSDY) 81
Florida Man Gets Probation In Bomb Hoax Case At Airport (BRAH)..... 81
Troutman Denies Possible Drug Possession (WBBM) 82
Judge: Convicted Ex-alderman Can Run (CHIT) 82
Editorial: TIME FOR FEDS TO ACT IN CITY HALL PROBE (NIAGFR)..... 82
A Lively Market, Legal And Not, For Software Bugs (NYT)..... 82
Virginia Men Face U.S. Trial In Peddling Of Phony Purses (WP)84
Five Deadly Hours In The District (WP)..... 86
Trial Nearing, Alleged Call Girl Found Dead (WP) 86
Attorney Rejects Warden's Claim That US Inmate Showed No Signs Of Pain In Execution (FINDLAW/AP) 87
A Missed Warning (MH)..... 88

Civil Law:

Lawsuit Alleges Price Inflation By Boehringer Ingelheim Roxane (AP)..... 88
Feds Say Lab Owner Stole $17M (HTRIB) 89

Civil Rights:

Police Charged In Shootings Back At Work; NAACP Calls For Probe (AP) 90
Defense Begins Arguments In Election Dispute (JCL)..... 91
Bond For Seale Denied (JCL)..... 91
Bail Denied In 1964 Race Killings (NSDY/AP) 92
Editorial: It's Not Too Late For Justice To Be Served (KZGAZETTE) 92
Do We Have A Human Trafficking Problem? (LVS)..... 93

Antitrust:

Justice Department Deadline Is Up For Mittal Steel (WVSJ) 95
FTC Approves Bridgestone Acquisition (AP)..... 95
First The Wait For Microsoft Vista; Now The Marketing Barrage (NYT) 95
Delta Says Deal Is An Option, Just Not Now (WSJ)..... 97
Airline Deals Could Be Grounded (CNN)..... 97
As Airlines Surge, Pilots Want Share (NYT)..... 99
Merrill Lynch Acquires First Republic (FT)..... 100
Merrill To Buy First Republic, Seeking To Add Wealthy Clients (NYT) 100
Citi Will Buy Egg To Raise U.K. Presence (WSJ) 101
Citigroup To Buy Online Bank In Britain To Expand Retail Presence (NYT) 101
Lawmakers Push For Bank Ownership Limits (AP)..... 102
EU To Threaten Banks, Credit Card Firms, Draft Says (Update1) (BLOOM)..... 103
HEDGE-FUND HARDBALL Amid Amaranth's Crisis, Other Players Profited (WSJ) 103
Patent Backlog Spurs Demand For Examiners (WP)..... 107

Environment:

Global Warming Issue Gains 'Traction' With New Congress (USAT)..... 108
UN Chief Seeks Climate Change Summit (FT) 109
World Scientists Near Consensus On Warming (NYT)..... 109
BP Faces Growing Criminal Probe Over Texas Refinery (Update3) (BLOOM) 110
Court Ruling On Salmon Hooks Pork (HILL) 112
Yosemite Case May Affect Public Access (FINDLAW/AP) 113
Gray Wolves To Lose Some Protection (USAT) 114
A Faith-Based Fuel Initiative (NYT) 115

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexican Drug Suspects Plead Not Guilty (AP) 115
Suspected Mexican Drug Cartel Figures Arraigned In S.D. (SDUT)..... 116
Alleged Juárez Drug Ring Members Extradited (EPT)..... 116
7 Puerto Rican Doctors Indicted In Alleged Internet Pharmacy Scheme (AP) 117
Sentencing Set For 3-state Drug Ring (GCNG) 117
Large Tunnels On U.S.-Mexico Border Remain Unfilled (LAT). 118
Supporters Of Medical Marijuana Want Changes To The Law (AP)..... 120
U.S. Marshal In Seattle Steps Down (AP) 120
A Day Without Guns ... (NYT)..... 121

Immigration:

Farm Groups Are Optimistic On Overhaul Of Immigration (HILL)122

Tax:

U.S. To Pay S.A. Lawyers $1.34 Million (SAEN)..... 123
The 'Tax Gap' Myth (WSJ)..... 124

Congress-Administration:

U.S. Exporters Feel Favorable Trade Winds (WP)..... 125
Bush Directive Increases Sway On Regulation (NYT) 127

DOJ_NMG_0124259

Unworthy Of Consideration (USAT) ... 128
Our View On Health Care: People Without Health Plans Can't Catch A (tax) Break (USAT) ... 129
Capital Sources: A Father's Call For Health-Care Reform (NSWK) ... 130
Schwarzenegger's Healthcare Reform Proposal Could Conflict With Bush's Aim To Balance Federal Budget (LAT) ... 131
Civilian Reserve Just Words In A Speech (WT) ... 132
Why Volunteerism Has Reached Historic High In US (CSM) ... 133
Bush Clarifies 'Democrat Majority' Gaffe (AP) ... 134
Bush Says Missing '-ic' Was An Oversight (WP) ... 135
The 'Democrat Majority' Is Still The Talk Of The Capital (LAT) ... 136
No Offense, But ... (NYT) ... 137
Senate To Consider Minimum Wage Bill With Tax Breaks (NYT) 137
Strike One For Executive Pay (WSJ) ... 138
Kennedy, GOP Engage In War Of Words On Tax Cuts (WT) ... 139
Republicans Block House Pay Raise (AP) ... 139
Politics Could Scuttle Raising Pay For House Members (NYT) 140
Democrats Craft Spending Bill As Deadline Looms (WSJ) ... 140
In Need Of Cash, Dems See Billions In Biotech (HILL) ... 142
Pelosi Reaches Out To Blogging Community (AP) ... 143
White House Brings In New Pastry Chef (AP) ... 143
Mad About Mary (NYT) ... 144
Liberate Political Speech (LAT) ... 145
Voucher Comeback (WSJ) ... 145

Other News:

Bullish On Bernanke (WP) ... 145
Fed Has Yet To Set Target On Inflation (NYT) ... 147
Bernanke Quietly Guides Economy (USAT) ... 148
Good News, Bad News: US Economy Too Strong For Interest Rate Cuts (CSM) ... 150
A U.S. Law Firm Takes A New Route Into China (WSJ) ... 151
Lawyers Split On Fitness For Office (WP) ... 153
Each Stored Embryo Is A Stem Cell Debate (USAT) ... 154
GOP Right Sees Lemons In White House Race (POL) ... 157
TESTING THE LIMITS How Mitt Romney Avoided Campaign-Finance Rules (WSJ) ... 159
Romney Addresses Most Social Issues; Mum On Immigration (HILL) ... 162
Red Sox Pitcher Vows To Support McCain (AP) ... 163
Van Dongen To Boost Giuliani Bid (RC) ... 165
McCain's Maine Backers (RC) ... 166
Hutchison Opens Door To No. 2 Spot On Ticket (WT) ... 166
Clinton Balances Femininity, Toughness (POL) ... 167
Clinton Meets With Union Leaders (NYT/AP) ... 168
How 'Mamisma' Can Change Politics (USAT) ... 169
Hagel Low On Cash On Hand, Raising Retirement Issue (HILL) 170
Franken Off The Air (HILL) ... 171
Google Moves To Disarm Search 'Bombs' (WP) ... 171
Father Drinan, Model Of Moral Tenacity (WP) ... 172
The Humane Society Becomes A Political Animal (WP) ... 173
A Voice For More Voters (WP) ... 174
Iowa Emigration Act (WSJ) ... 175
The Battle Of Jericho (WP) ... 175
U.S. To Discuss Finances With N. Korea (AP) ... 176
Talks On N Korea Financial Squeeze To Resume (FT) ... 176
To Ban The Bomb, Sign The Peace (NYT) ... 177
Cheney To Visit Japan, Australia (AFP) ... 178
Australian PM Welcomes Cheney Visit (AFP) ... 178
US Offers Air Support For Somali Peacekeepers (AFP) ... 179
Hamas, Fatah Battle Despite Cease-fire (AP) ... 179
Suicide Attack Is First In Israel In 9 Months (NYT) ... 179
Palestinian Suicide Bomber Kills 3 In Israeli Resort City (WP) ... 181
Israel May Have Misused Cluster Bombs, US Says (WP) ... 182
U.S. Suspects Illegal Use Of Cluster Bombs (WT/AP) ... 182
Egypt Steps On The Press As It Backtracks On Democratic Reform (CSM) ... 183
General To Be Asked About Beijing's Test (WT) ... 184
A Covert Fight For Putin's Job (WSJ) ... 185
Saudis To Pare Oil Output Again (WSJ) ... 186
French Diplomat Says Ties With U.S. Are On The Mend (WT) 187
Ghana To Chair African Union Instead Of Sudan: Top Official (WP/AP) ... 188
China And Sudan (WP) ... 189
Optimism In Northern Ireland (LAT) ... 189

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0124260

TERRORISM NEWS:

Uighurs' Detention Conditions Condemned (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Julie Tate

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Chinese Uighurs who have been imprisoned for the past month at a new state-of-the-art detention camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, are being held around the clock in near-total isolation, a circumstance their lawyers say is rapidly degrading their mental health, according to an affidavit filed in federal court yesterday.

The lawyers' complaint is the latest step in their efforts to force an expedited review of the Uighurs' confinement by the U.S. Court of Appeals, a review that the Bush administration opposes and that Congress made more difficult in legislation it passed late last year.

The Uighurs' (pronounced weegurs) detention by the U.S. military, after being sold for bounty by Pakistanis in early 2002, has long attracted controversy. The men had just arrived from Afghanistan, where, they said, they had received limited military training because they opposed Chinese government control of their native region. But they said they never were allied with the Taliban or opposed to the United States, and had fled to Pakistan only to escape the U.S. bombing campaign.

By 2005, U.S. military review panels determined that five of the 18 captured Uighurs were "no longer enemy combatants," but they continued to be held at the Guantanamo Bay prison until their release last year. The panels did not reach that conclusion about the other 13, though all had given similar accounts of their activities during the reviews, according to declassified transcripts of the sessions.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson ruled in December 2005 that the government was unlawfully imprisoning the Uighurs who were found not to be combatants.

Because China views Uighurs as members of a rebellious ethnic minority, the U.S. government declined to return the five men to China, where they faced retribution, and dozens of other nations refused to accept them. Ultimately they were sent last year from Guantanamo Bay to Albania, where they are housed in a compound run by the United Nations.

Lawyers for the remaining 13 Uighurs say the men were moved in December to Guantanamo Bay's Camp 6, a high-security facility at the base completed last August at a cost of $37.9 million. The lawyers say the government provided no explanation for the move, which came shortly after they filed a court petition in Washington seeking the expedited review.

In Camp 6, the Uighurs are alone in metal cells throughout the day, are prohibited for the most part from conversing with others, and take all their meals through a metal slot in the door, lawyer P. Sabin Willett said in his affidavit, which was based on what he was told during his visit Jan. 15-18. They have little or no access to sunlight or fresh air, have had nothing new to read in their native language for the past several years, and are sometimes told to undertake solitary recreation at night, he said.

"They pass days of infinite tedium and loneliness," according to Willett's court filing. One Uighur's "neighbor is constantly hearing voices, shouting out, and being punished. All describe a feeling of despair . . . and abandonment by the world." Another Uighur, named Abdusumet, spoke of hearing voices himself and appeared extremely anxious during Willett's visit, tapping the floor uncontrollably, he said.

The account matches another offered by Brian Neff, a lawyer who in mid-December visited a Yemeni imprisoned in Camp 6. "Detainees in Camp 6 are not supposed to talk to others, they are punished for shouting, and if they talk during walks outside they will be punished," Neff said in an e-mail yesterday. "We are extremely concerned about the . . . conditions of Camp 6 -- in particular, the fact that the detainees there are being held in near-total isolation, cut off from the outside world and any meaningful contact."

Some other "high-value" detainees are being held at a CIA-run camp at Guantanamo Bay that officials say is reserved for the most dangerous and important suspects, but virtually no information has emerged about their treatment.

Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a spokesman at Guantanamo Bay, confirmed that Camp 6, which houses 160 detainees, has no communal living spaces. Its design originally included them, but they were omitted after detainees attacked guards at Camp 4 in May 2006. Detainees eat and pray in their cells, he said.

Durand said that as repairs are completed at Camp 4, where communal spaces still exist, "detainees in Camp 6 will have the opportunity to earn their way into Camp 4" after first passing through another camp with medium-security conditions.

He said that while he cannot comment on specific detainees, all "have regular, daily human contact. In Camp 6 they can communicate with other detainees in the cell block. Detainees pray together through the food ports in their doors. . . . When detainees recreate, they do so in individual units in a recreation yard with access to see and speak to other detainees."

DOJ_NMG_0124261

Willett said that one of his clients, named Abdulnasser, contends that he was cleared for release from detention during one of the military's annual administrative reviews. But Willett has been unable to confirm that claim, or determine why none of the other detained Uighurs are aware of such annual reviews.

The Justice Department, in court papers, has maintained that the appellate court should delay reviewing the Uighurs' detention until cases related to other detainees are resolved. It also has said that legislation passed last year by Congress, which created new military panels to try Guantanamo Bay detainees on criminal charges, seriously limits the court's jurisdiction to question government decisions on their detention.

Dutch Man Face Terror Trial In U.S. (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

An Iraqi-born Dutch citizen pleaded not guilty yesterday in federal court in Washington to charges of conspiring with insurgents to attack U.S. military personnel in Iraq -- the first U.S. criminal prosecution arising from terrorist activities in Iraq.

Wesam al-Delaema, 33, extradited from the Netherlands on Saturday, had been sought by the U.S. government since 2003, when he and other members of the "Mujahideen from Fallujah" videotaped themselves planting explosives along an Iraqi road used by U.S. troops.

The videotape, which was widely shown on Arabic TV stations, was seized by Dutch police who raided Mr. al-Delaema's house in Amersfoort in May 2005 following a tip from U.S. authorities.

Mr. al-Delaema was returned to the United States after being held in the Netherlands for nearly two years, where he and his attorneys vigorously fought the U.S. extradition request.

"After a lengthy extradition process, this defendant will now face justice for his efforts in orchestrating and launching roadside bomb attacks against our men and women serving in Iraq," said Assistant Attorney General Kenneth L. Wainstein, who heads the Justice Department's national security division. "We in the ranks of federal prosecutors are honored to play a role in protecting our military colleagues against such deadly and cowardly attacks."

Mr. al-Delaema entered his not guilty plea before U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman during a 10-minute court hearing. Assistant U.S. Attorney Gregg Maisel told the judge investigators would seek hair samples and other DNA from Mr. al-Delaema, but did not elaborate.

A grand jury indictment handed up in U.S. District Court in Washington in September 2005 named Mr. al-Delaema on six counts of conspiracy -- to kill U.S. citizens abroad, to use a weapon of mass destruction, to maliciously damage or destroy U.S. government property by means of an explosive, to possess a destructive device during a crime of violence, to use such a device, and to teach the making of an explosive with the intent to further a crime of violence.

The indictment said Mr. al-Delaema traveled from the Netherlands to Iraq in October 2003 after the U.S.-led invasion and, together with his co-conspirators, the Mujahideen from Fallujah, "declared his intentions to kill Americans in Iraq using explosives."

If convicted of all the charges, Mr. al-Delaema could be sentenced to life in prison.

Mr. al-Delaema has claimed he was forced to make the videotape after being kidnapped and beaten, and feared being beheaded if he resisted. Although in a 2003 interview broadcast on Dutch television, Mr. al-Delaema accused the U.S. government and its allies of waging war in Iraq to control its oil reserves, saying the "Americans and British are coming to our country to steal oil and everyone knows it."

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said that Mr. al-Delaema, who was born in Fallujah, was arrested by Dutch law-enforcement authorities on May 2, 2005, and initially faced similar charges in that country. Following his arrest, Mr. Boyd said, Dutch law-enforcement and prosecution authorities worked with the FBI in its investigation of Mr. al-Delaema's reported terrorist activities.

In September 2005, the U.S. government filed a request with the Netherlands seeking Mr. al-Delaema's extradition. The request was granted by a Dutch court and the Dutch Ministry of Justice and, in December, the request was sustained on appeal in the Netherlands. He was flown to the United States on Saturday, arrested and taken into custody by the FBI.

As part of the extradition agreement, Mr. Boyd said Mr. al-Delaema will be tried in a federal court -- not by a military tribunal such as those set up for terror suspects being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. He said the U.S. government also will not oppose Mr. al-Delaema serving his sentence in a Dutch prison if he is convicted.

"We will continue to be vigilant in our efforts to bring to justice anyone who plots terrorist attacks against our citizens at home or abroad," said U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor in Washington. "We look forward to working cooperatively with the Dutch authorities in prosecuting this defendant under our criminal laws."

DOJ_NMG_0124262

FBI Assistant Director Joseph Persichini Jr., who heads the bureau's Washington field office, said Mr. al-Delaema's extradition "sends a clear message of the FBI's unwavering dedication to our mission to detect, deter and bring to justice any individual who conspires to commit terrorist acts against any U.S. citizen either in this country or on foreign soil."

In addition to Mr. Maisel, prosecutors include Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Cohen of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington and trial attorneys Gregg Sofer, Jerome Teresinski and Marla Tusk of the Counterterrorism Section of the National Security Division at the Justice Department.

Dutch Citizen Pleads Not Guilty To Terrorism Charges (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

A Dutch national born in Iraq pleaded not guilty to terrorism charges in federal court yesterday, marking the start of the first U.S. criminal prosecution of an alleged Iraqi insurgent.

Wesam al-Delaema, 33, is charged with four counts of conspiracy and two other crimes for allegedly belonging to a group called "Mujaheddin From Fallujah," which constructed and deployed roadside bombs aimed at U.S. forces in Iraq. Delaema, who was born in Fallujah, traveled to Iraq in October 2003 and was shown making and discussing explosives on a videotape that was seized from his house in the Dutch city of Amersfoort in May 2005, authorities said.

Delaema, who was originally arrested and jailed by Dutch police, has said that he was kidnapped and forced to participate in the videotape, which was widely shown on Arabic television stations.

The prosecution of Delaema in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia follows nearly two years of negotiations between U.S. and Dutch authorities, which led to Delaema's extradition to the United States over the weekend.

The unusual extradition agreement would allow Delaema to return to the Netherlands to serve his prison sentence if he is convicted, Dutch and U.S. officials said. It also marks the first time that U.S. authorities have sought to prosecute an alleged Iraqi insurgent in U.S. criminal courts, rather than pursuing military charges or turning him over to the jurisdiction of Iraqi courts.

Victor Koppe, who served as Delaema's attorney in the Netherlands, said the arrangement guarantees that Delaema will not be designated an enemy combatant or tried by a U.S. military commission. Dutch courts also will be able to review and possibly modify the terms of any U.S. sentence once Delaema is returned home, Koppe and U.S. officials said.

Koppe said the conditions were necessary because the U.S. government no longer can be trusted to treat prisoners humanely. Two of the U.S. charges against Delaema carry possible life sentences.

"It's really that video that is the main and only evidence against him," Koppe said in a telephone interview yesterday. "He acknowledged that he could be seen on that video but that he was forced to do it because he was kidnapped."

Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond, said it was highly unusual for the U.S. government to submit to the stringent conditions contained in the Delaema extradition agreement.

"I've never heard of a federal court exercising jurisdiction and then being subjected to a tribunal from another jurisdiction," Tobias said. "It's a strange way to proceed, but maybe the U.S. had to take what it could get from the Netherlands."

U.S. prosecutors contend in court papers that the videotape clearly shows Delaema bragging about how he and other insurgents hid bombs targeting American forces.

"This is not the first operation we carry out," Delaema says on the tape, according to prosecutors. "We have executed several operations and most of them were successful. . . . Their casualties have gone beyond your imagination."

Assistant Attorney General Kenneth L. Wainstein, who heads the Justice Department's national security division, said in a statement that Delaema "will now face justice for his efforts in orchestrating and launching roadside bomb attacks against our men and women serving in Iraq."

Delaema made a brief appearance yesterday before U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman. Prosecutors requested that hair and saliva samples be obtained from him to allow DNA identification.

Man Faces U.S. Terror Charges In First Prosecution Of Iraq Troop Targeting (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — An Iraqi-born Dutch citizen pleaded not guilty Monday in what the Justice Department called the first U.S. terror charges against insurgents targeting Americans in Iraq.

Wesam al-Delaema, 33, has been wanted by the United States since 2003, when he and his fellow "Mujahideen from Fallujah" videotaped themselves planting explosives along an Iraq road used by U.S. troops. The explosives did not result in any deaths.

He was extradited from the Netherlands over the weekend after being held there for nearly two years, and will become the first suspect tried in a U.S. court for alleged terrorism in Iraq's bloody insurgency.

"After a lengthy extradition process, this defendant will now face justice for his efforts in orchestrating and launching roadside bomb attacks against our men and women serving in Iraq," Assistant Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein said Monday.

Al-Delaema has claimed he is innocent, and his lawyers have argued the U.S. does not have the right to try him. He nodded his head and spoke in broken English with his attorneys during a 10-minute hearing in front of U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman in Washington. Prosecutor Gregg Maisel said the government would be seeking hair and saliva samples from al-Delaema, which the Justice Department said could link him to the crimes.

As part of the extradition agreement with the Netherlands, Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said that al-Delaema will be tried in a federal court — not by a military commission such as those set up for terror suspects being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The U.S. will also not oppose al-Delaema serving his sentence in a Dutch prison if he is convicted, Boyd said.

Al-Delaema's attorney, Victor Koppe, had argued that he feared al-Delaema could be tortured by U.S. authorities and said the U.S. legal system couldn't be trusted.

Al-Delaema traveled to Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion. Evidence against him includes a videotape he filmed of a group called "Warriors of Fallujah" preparing a roadside bomb, which was widely shown on Arabic TV stations. The tape was seized by police who raided al-Delaema's house in the Dutch city of Amersfoort in May 2005 following a tip from U.S. authorities.

In extradition hearings in the Netherlands, al-Delaema argued that he was forced to make the video after being kidnapped and beaten. He said he feared being beheaded if he resisted.

In a 2003 interview broadcast on Dutch television, al-Delaema accused the U.S. and its allies of waging war in Iraq to control its oil reserves.

"The Americans and British are coming to our country to steal oil and everyone knows it," he said.

"I don't care if I myself die or not. I want to offer myself up for my land, for my people. I'm not more or less important than the women and children who you see on television dying because of America," al-Delaema said.

His family said the interview was intended as a joke.

Iraqi-Born Dutch Citizen Pleads 'Not Guilty' To Charges He Assisted The Insurgency (ABC)

By JASON RYAN And PIERRE THOMAS

ABC News, January 30, 2007

Jan. 29, 2007 — An accused insurgent believed to be the first individual to be charged with directly participating in the Iraq insurgency in the United States pleaded not guilty today in federal court.

The indictment alleges that Wesam Al Delaema, a 33-year-old Iraqi-born Dutch citizen, traveled from the Netherlands to Iraq in October 2003 with a group of co-conspirators who called themselves the "Mujahideen from Fallujah." The group, the indictment says, declared intentions to kill Americans in Iraq using explosives and alleges that that they hid explosives "in a road in or around Fallujah, Iraq."

In a hearing in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., the clerk read the six charges as Delaema, unshackled and dressed in his own clothes, stood before Judge Paul Friedman

Charges against Delaema include: conspiracy to kill U.S. citizens abroad; conspiracy to use a weapon of mass destruction (explosives); conspiracy to maliciously damage or destroy U.S. government property by means of an explosive; possession of a destructive device (explosives) during a crime of violence; conspiracy to possess a destructive device (explosives) during a crime of violence; and teaching or demonstrating the making or use of an explosive with the intent to further a crime of violence.

Delaema waived the use of a translator and briefly smiled when meeting his court-appointed attorneys.

"After a lengthy extradition process, this defendant will now face justice for his efforts in orchestrating and launching roadside bomb attacks against our men and women serving in Iraq," said Assistant Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein of the Justice Department's National Security Division.

At the time of his arrest in the Netherlands, foreign media outlets reported that Dutch anti-terrorism police found video tapes of insurgent attacks and operations in Iraq at Delaema's residence.

Delaema was extradited to the United States from the Netherlands late Saturday night by the FBI and U.S. Marshals. He will be held without bond until his status conference and detention hearing on February 5.

Analysis: Dutchman Faces U.S. Iraq Charges (UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, Upi Homeland And National Security Editor

United Press International, January 30, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0124264

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 (UPI) -- The first man to ever face U.S. criminal charges for his part in the Iraq insurgency was arraigned in federal court Monday.

Iraqi-born naturalized Dutchman Wesam al-Delaema, 32, was extradited from The Netherlands over the weekend after U.S. prosecutors agreed he would not face the death penalty and could serve his time in a Dutch prison.

Federal authorities "worked very closely with our Dutch partners to build this case," U.S. Attorney Jeff Taylor told United Press International after the arraignment. Taylor said his prosecutors were "experienced in putting together these kinds of complex, multi-jurisdictional cases."

Delaema was indicted in the District of Columbia in September 2005 for conspiring to kill U.S. forces by attacking convoys in Fallujah, Iraq.

The evidence against him includes video recordings that he allegedly made -- and allegedly urged others to make -- of roadside bomb attacks against U.S. forces.

Monday, the U.S. District Court in Washington gave prosecutors permission to obtain DNA swabs from Delaema, so that they could be compared with a database of DNA obtained from bomb fragments and "other physical items" recovered from attack scenes and other terrorist sites.

The database is compiled by the Terrorist Explosive Device Analytical Center -- a multi-agency effort between the U.S. Department of Defense and federal law enforcement agencies which functions as a repository for all kinds of forensic evidence from terror attacks in Iraq and elsewhere.

According to court filings, the center "conducts a full range of forensic and technical analysis on such items, utilizing analytical protocols that include photography, latent fingerprint analysis, trace evidence (hair and fiber), DNA, electronic and cryptographic analysis, and tool marks."

"The goal (in collecting DNA samples) is to gather more evidence to prove the charges," said Taylor.

According to the indictment and other court documents, Delaema was arrested May 2005 in the Dutch city of Amersfoort. One report at the weekend said Dutch authorities had been originally been tipped to Delaema by U.S. intelligence, and the court documents say Dutch police monitored telephone conversations he had with people in Iraq.

European counter-terrorist officials have broken up several networks recruiting and making travel arrangements for European Muslim extremists who want to go to fight the U.S. military in Iraq.

So-called graduates of such networks are especially feared by U.S. counter-terrorism officials because of their operational experience and that fact that with European passports, they can easily travel to the United States without a visa.

The documents say Delaema, who was born in Fallujah, returned there in October 2003, driving in his Opel Omega.

"While in Iraq," the documents say, "Delaema traveled to an area near Fallujah, Iraq, where he met with at least six other individuals. Delaema and his associates, each of whom wore a hooded mask over his head, created a video of their meeting" during which "Delaema gave a speech in Arabic" proclaiming him and his associates as "The Mujahedin of Fallujah."

Delaema and his associates also videoed themselves demonstrating how to bury improvised explosive devices under the road, and set them off with remote controlled detonators. On the video, they discussed separating charges by 50 feet or more, so as to strike more than one vehicle in the target convoy, the documents say.

The videotapes and other video recordings were seized at his apartment.

In the telephone conversations Dutch authorities monitored "with various individuals, known and unknown, in Iraq," after his return, "Delaema encouraged other individuals to videotape attacks against the Americans and to provide Delaema with the videotapes."

He also "promised to provide camera equipment to an individual in Iraq" so that attacks could be filmed.

His prosecution will likely cast a spotlight on the shadowy networks that distributes, on the Web and via DVD, video of attacks on U.S. and coalition forces in Iraq.

The indictment charges Delaema with conspiracy to kill U.S. citizens abroad; conspiracy to use a weapon of mass destruction (which under federal law includes large explosive devices); conspiracy to use explosives against U.S. government property; possession of explosives during a crime of violence; conspiracy to possess explosives during a crime of violence; and teaching or demonstrating the making or use of explosives to further a crime of violence.

Because the indictment does not link the attacks Delaema conspired in to any actual deaths, the maximum penalty he faces under federal law if convicted is life imprisonment, the Justice Department said in a statement at the time.

Netherlands Justice Ministry spokesman Ivo Hommes told CNN over the weekend that U.S. officials had guaranteed Delaema would not be handed over for trial as an enemy combatant by military tribunal, and would not face additional charges -- effectively guaranteeing he would not face the death penalty.

European law generally prohibits extradition where the defendant might face execution.

DOJ_NMG_0124265

"The offenses for which Delaema is charged were not death (penalty) eligible," Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd told UPI in an e-mail Sunday evening. "We also agreed in our extradition request not to object to Delaema serving his sentence in the Netherlands."

Turks Arrest 47 On Suspicion Of Terror Links (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

TRABZON, Turkey, Jan. 29 — In simultaneous operations carried out in five Turkish cities on Monday, the police arrested 47 people suspected of being Islamic militants, including the leader of Al Qaeda in Turkey, the semi-official Anatolian news agency reported.

Police acted on information warning of "sensational attacks" by Turkish groups in coordination with Al Qaeda, the report said. No details were available on the nature of possible targets.

Turkey is home to a deadly Islamic militant movement that has managed a number of spectacular attacks in the last several years, though none recently. In 2003, small trucks laden with explosives fixed on two synagogues, the British Consulate and the Turkish headquarters of the British-owned HSBC bank in Istanbul, killing more than 60 people and wounding hundreds.

More than 60 people are on trial for those crimes, though the police say many of the ringleaders managed to flee the country.

On Friday, a Turkish court jailed seven Islamists accused of plotting to kill President Bush during a NATO summit meeting in Istanbul in 2004, [a news agency] reported. The men were members of Ansar al Islam, an Islamist group believed to have links to Al Qaeda.

Among those taken into custody on Monday was Ekrem K, identified as the suspected leader locally of Al Qaeda. Ekrem K, who the police said went by the name Usame, was captured in Konya, 150 miles south of Ankara, along with 22 other suspects, according to the Anatolian report.

He was suspected of communicating with Al Qaeda in a coded language and also of training new recruits for the network.

Late last year, the police detained another man, a lawyer, who claimed to be the leader of Al Qaeda in Turkey.

Habeas Corpus And An Era Of Limits (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

Constitution says those in custody can seek liberty in court, but what of Guantanamo?

WASHINGTON — Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales provided laugh lines for comedians and fodder for outraged bloggers when he told senators recently that the Constitution does not specifically grant individuals the right to habeas corpus.

The Constitution appears to contradict him on that historic doctrine, which says those taken into custody have the right to plead their innocence before a judge. "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended," it says, "unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

Most constitutional experts agree that phrase clearly guarantees the right of habeas corpus. And Gonzales himself later clarified that he believes Americans do have that right.

But in a clumsy way, Gonzales was making a claim that underpins the Bush administration's controversial view that "enemy combatants," including the prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, are not entitled to fight the government in court.

The dispute involves not only the Constitution but also a separate law that spells out the reach of habeas corpus. The issue, which sparked the lively exchange between Gonzales and senators, is the focus of a bill before Congress as well as cases involving "enemy combatants" that appear headed to the Supreme Court.

Many senators, including Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and its ranking Republican, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), believe the right to habeas corpus should apply broadly and include foreign terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay.

But they lost last year when the issue came before Congress.

In a 51-48 vote, the Senate joined the House in affirming the Bush administration's view that habeas corpus should not cover "aliens" held as terrorism suspects or "enemy combatants."

The new law, known as the Military Commissions Act, overturned a Supreme Court ruling that had extended habeas corpus rights to the detainees at Guantanamo Bay. But in that decision, in the case of Rasul vs. Bush, the justices said they were ruling only on the statutory law, not on the Constitution.

In 1789, two years after the Constitution was written, the first Congress adopted a law saying that judges may hear writs of habeas corpus. This law was later expanded to say "any person" who is deprived of liberty by the government may file such a petition.

DOJ_NMG_0124266

In 2004, speaking for a 6-3 majority, Justice John Paul Stevens interpreted "any person" to mean that the men held at Guantanamo Bay had a right to appeal their detention in court.

Now that Congress has overridden the high court's view, the next round of litigation in the "war on terror" is focusing on the right to habeas corpus in the Constitution.

Although everyone — including, apparently, the attorney general — agrees the Constitution protects a right to habeas corpus, there is considerable debate over the reach of that right.

On Thursday, for example, lawyers for Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, an Arab immigrant who was arrested in Peoria, Ill., in 2001 and later sent to a military brig as an "enemy combatant," are going before a U.S. appeals court in Virginia seeking his release.

Bush administration lawyers say his case should be thrown out because the Military Commissions Act says federal judges have no authority "over pending and future habeas corpus actions filed by … detained aliens" who are deemed to be "enemy combatants." They say the reach of habeas corpus should be set by the law enacted by Congress, not by interpreting the Constitution.

In reply, al-Marri's lawyers contend the recently enacted law is unconstitutional. "Like American citizens, aliens in the United States have a constitutional right to habeas corpus. Absent a valid suspension of the writ, Congress could not repeal habeas jurisdiction [for] a lawful resident alien like al-Marri," they said.

The Supreme Court appeared to agree three years ago when it ruled in the case of Hamdi vs. Rumsfeld. "All agree that, absent suspension, the writ of habeas corpus remains available to every individual detained within the United States," said Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

But the constitutional rule is less clear for the detainees at Guantanamo Bay, because they are not within the territory of this country. A dispute over their status is pending before a U.S. appeals court in Washington.

When Gonzales went before the Judiciary Committee on Jan. 18, his written testimony objected to the bill sponsored by Leahy and Specter that would restore habeas rights to "aliens." The new law "prevents terrorists captured on the battlefield from continuing to fight us in our courts," his statement said.

That set the stage for a perplexing exchange between Specter and Gonzales.

The senator incorrectly said the Supreme Court had already ruled the Constitution protects the habeas rights of detainees at Guantanamo.

Gonzales responded by suggesting the Constitution does not protect habeas corpus at all. "The fact that the Constitution — again, there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution. There is a prohibition against taking it away," he said.

"Now, wait a minute," Specter interrupted. "The Constitution says you can't take it away except in case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus?"

Gonzales refused to concede the point. "I meant by that comment the Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States, or every citizen, is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas."

Later in the same hearing, the attorney general softened his tone. "I believe that the right of habeas is something that's very, very important, one of our most cherished rights," he said.

Most constitutional scholars and legal experts reject Gonzales' view that the Constitution does not include an "express grant" of a right to habeas corpus.

"He is completely wrong on the history," said Eric Freedman, a Hofstra law professor and expert on habeas corpus.

Added Pepperdine Law Professor Douglas W. Kmiec, "The historical consensus among scholars is contrary" to the attorney general's statement.

At the Justice Department last week, two lawyers delicately tried to explain what the attorney general meant.

"This didn't come out as cleanly and crisply as we might have hoped," said one, who spoke on the condition that he not be identified. "The question is not whether Americans have a right to habeas corpus. That is undisputed. What's at issue is the scope of the right."

*

david.savage@latimes.com

Gonzales' Body Blow Against Habeas Corpus (VAPILOT)

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, January 30, 2007

Even when White House policies seem ill-conceived, they at least have a veneer of defensible logic. If America doesn't like the idea of government agents examining its library habits, the practice does make a certain quaint, paranoid sense.

But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has ceased even trying to maintain the pretense of reason.

Appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales abandoned cogency altogether for bald assertion of illogic as truth.

It was Gonzales, you might remember, who couldn't find in law a barrier to torture, but could find permission to tap our telephones - despite a law explicitly forbidding it. The subject last week was the right to habeas corpus mentioned in Article I, Section 9 of the U.S. Constitution: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

Habeas corpus essentially guarantees you the right to freedom from wrongful imprisonment, and it dates to the Magna Carta in the early 13th century. Government assault on habeas corpus was one of the central complaints against British rule in the American colonies.

The right to freedom of the body, in fact, was considered so basic that the framers felt no need to enumerate it in the Constitution the way they guaranteed lesser rights, like freedom of speech or religion.

Still you don't need to know what habeas corpus does for you or its history to understand - and find alarming - what happened last week.

Gonzales, the highest officer of the law in the nation, asserted that because the framers don't specifically enumerate habeas corpus, it's not guaranteed, for example, to American citizens held in detention indefinitely without charge - precisely the kind of thing that habeas was designed to prevent.

"Again," said Gonzales, "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution - there is a prohibition against taking it away. But it's never been the case... "

Here an incredulous Sen. Arlen Specter interrupted him: "Wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away, except in case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus unless there's an invasion or rebellion?"

That is, Specter argued, wouldn't Americans be presumed to have a right if the Constitution mentions only taking it away?

Specter's contention assumes - quite correctly, according to historians - that the framers didn't attempt to list all possible rights because they were God's to give, not man's. Some fundamental rights weren't listed because freedom was presumed, and because the framers were writing a Constitution, not a laundry list.

"I meant by that comment the Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States," Gonzales said, "or every citizen, is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas. It doesn't say that. It simply says the right of habeas corpus shall not be suspended except by -"

Here Specter, a Republican, again interrupts: "You may be... violating common sense."

Indeed. The Constitution doesn't explicitly give people the freedom to have children or breathe the air, but nobody would claim Americans don't have the right to each of those things.

Gonzales' logic leads to the notion that only rights included in the Constitution actually exist, a little worrisome since it's a document silent on both babies and breathing. Still, if common sense and logic were the worst of Gonzales' violations, we'd be comforted.

Canada's Good Example (NYT)

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Canada set an important example of decency when it offered a formal apology and compensation worth millions of dollars to a Syrian-born Canadian citizen who was a victim of President Bush's use of open-ended detention, summary deportation and even torture in the name of fighting terrorism.

Last week's announcement by Prime Minister Stephen Harper came more than four years after the nightmare began for the Canadian, Maher Arar, a 36-year-old software engineer. On his way back from a family vacation, he was detained by U.S. officials at Kennedy Airport on the basis of unsubstantiated information from the Canadian police. After being held in solitary confinement in a Brooklyn detention center and interrogated without proper access to legal counsel, he was sent to Syria, where he was imprisoned for nearly a year and tortured.

It was all part of a legally and morally unsupportable practice known as extraordinary rendition, the deportation of terrorism suspects to countries where the regimes are known to use torture and to disdain basic human rights protections.

Four months ago, a Canadian government panel concluded that Mr. Arar had never had a terrorism connection, and that Americans had misled Canada about their plans for him. The Bush administration stonewalled the inquiry. It has responded to a new Canadian request to remove Mr. Arar from a United States security watch list by rudely telling Canada, its democratic northern neighbor and strategic ally, to mind its own business.

Not only has the Bush administration refused to apologize to Mr. Arar, but Justice Department lawyers are also brandishing a dubious claim of state secrets and fighting a lawsuit brought by Mr. Arar in this country. Bush administration officials insist that they have “new intelligence” that justifies keeping Mr. Arar on the watch list. That intelligence has not been disclosed, but Canadian officials who have reviewed the information are unpersuaded.

DOJ_NMG_0124268

Questioned about the Arar case at a recent Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales provided no specifics that would explain Mr. Arar’s continued presence on the watch list, or why he was deported to Syria in the first place. The committee’s chairman, Senator Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, is right to demand that the administration face up to its bad behavior in this case and renounce its renditions policy.

This is not just about making amends with Canada, or doing the right thing by what appears to be an innocent man. It is a matter of trying to restore this country’s reputation as a defender and protector of human rights.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Nuclear Agency: Air Defenses Impractical (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Federal regulators plunged into an energy and national security controversy yesterday by ruling that the nation's 103 nuclear power plants do not need to protect themselves from potential attacks by terrorists using airplanes.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission's 5-to-0 ruling was in response to a 2004 petition by the Committee to Bridge the Gap, a Los Angeles nonprofit group, that said nuclear plants should build shields made of steel I-beams and cabling or take other steps to prevent a release of radiation in case of an air attack. Eight state attorneys general backed the petition.

The group cited the 9/11 Commission, which said in its report that the al-Qaeda plot to hit the World Trade Center towers and the Pentagon in 2001 had originally contemplated hijacking 10 planes and striking one or more nuclear power plants.

"Nuclear power plants are pre-emplaced nuclear weapons near major cities," said Daniel Hirsch, president of the Committee to Bridge the Gap. "They can't blow up like a nuclear bomb, but they can release a thousand times the radiation of the Hiroshima bomb. They are the most attractive target for a terrorist to hit in our country."

But NRC Chairman Dale Klein said, "Nuclear power plants are inherently robust structures that our studies show provide adequate protection in a hypothetical attack by an airplane."

The commission might impose stricter requirements on new plants, which some nuclear foes hope will add costs or delay licenses for industry expansion.

For now, however, the NRC said that guarding against airborne attacks was the job of the military and other agencies. It added that nuclear plant operators were already required to be prepared to respond to fires or explosions, whatever the cause. The commission said that it was toughening requirements for reactor operators to repel "multiple, coordinated groups of attackers, suicide attacks and cyber threats."

Some members of Congress said that the NRC's steps fell short of what was needed.

"I am disappointed," said Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.). The NRC decision "reflects an inadequate, industry-influenced approach that sacrifices security in favor of corporate profits."

On Friday, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who chairs the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, had written to the agency that "the communities that surround existing plants need to be confident that the NRC, as the regulator charged with nuclear safety, did all it could to ensure that plants defend against current security threats" -- including, she added, "large attacking forces and commercial aircraft."

Yesterday, Boxer said that her "initial reaction" was that the NRC "did not follow the direction of Congress to ensure that our nuclear power plants are protected from air- or land-based terrorist threats."

The 9/11 Commission called nuclear plants "vital facilities" and pointed to evidence that the plants had attracted al-Qaeda's attention. The commission's report said that senior al-Qaeda planner Khalid Sheik Mohammed told interrogators after his capture that nuclear plants were on his original target list. And the commission said that during a meeting in Spain in July 2001, Mohamed Atta, thought to be the lead hijacker on Sept. 11, had considered targeting a nuclear facility he had seen during familiarization flights near New York -- a target he and his conspirators referred to as "electrical engineering." In the end, Atta did not have a chance to discuss the idea with senior al-Qaeda leaders.

Timothy J. Roemer, a member of the 9/11 Commission, said that "there should be agencies in our government that make this as high a priority as al-Qaeda makes it." He also said that as the nuclear industry expands, "they should also shoulder some of the burden of our environment and our defense."

The question of whether nuclear facilities should be required to protect themselves against air attacks is frequently mentioned as a cost issue by electric power companies interested in building nuclear plants. There has not been a new order placed for a nuclear reactor in the United States since the 1979 Three Mile Island accident in Pennsylvania. Tax incentives in the Energy Policy Act of 2005 have sparked preliminary planning on about 19 nuclear power projects, and several companies are expected to seek NRC approval later this year.

DOJ_NMG_0124269

Many of the industry's critics have seized on national security as a reason to block new plants or to raise the costs of construction. Hirsch said, however, that building an I-beam and cabling shield would add only about 1 percent to the cost of a plant.

"Where are the resources best put to use to protect our population?" said Steven Kerekes, a spokesman for the Nuclear Energy Institute. "There will be far more value in putting those resources toward other parts of the infrastructure that aren't nearly as well protected as nuclear power plants." He cited a 2002 computer modeling study that said a jetliner crash at a nuclear site would not lead to a radiation leak.

The Supreme Court this month decided not to hear an appeal of a 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruling that said the NRC had violated the National Environmental Policy Act when it failed to include a terrorist attack in an environmental impact report for an application to create dry-cask storage at the Diablo Canyon Power Plant near San Luis Obispo, Calif. Pacific Gas and Electric, which owns Diablo Canyon, was granted the license, but the NRC must now reconsider the application.

One NRC commissioner, Gregory B. Jaczko, dissented on the Diablo Canyon license. "I strongly believe . . . that any new nuclear power plants built in this country should be designed to withstand commercial aircraft crashes."

Baltimore-based Constellation Energy, which operates five nuclear units at three locations, is weighing a new plant. It has chosen a design by Areva that is supposed to protect against airplane crashes by doubling the thickness of the containment vessel and redesigning other facilities. One such plant is under construction in Finland; another is planned for France, said Areva spokesman Penny Phelps. A Constellation spokesman said the plant was appealing because it was designed for "a spectrum of events."

Panel Rejects Responsibility For Attacks (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission said nuclear power plant operators should not be expected to stop terrorists from crashing an airliner into a reactor, saying that responsibility lies elsewhere. Plant operators should instead focus on limiting radioactive releases and public exposure from any such airborne attack, the agency said in a revised defense plan for nuclear plants. “The active protection against airborne threats is addressed by other federal organizations, including the military,” the commission said.

Idea To 'Cage' Atomic Plants Is Rejected (LAT)

By Dan Weikel

Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

A California group had asked that steel shields and other anti-terrorism measures be mandated.

Federal regulators on Monday rejected requests from a California nuclear policy group to bolster security at atomic power plants, including protections against the type of air attack that destroyed the World Trade Center on Sept. 11.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission turned down a formal petition from the Committee to Bridge the Gap, which contends that nuclear power stations remain vulnerable to terrorist air and ground assaults.

Commission officials said the precautions were unnecessary because research indicated reactors had "adequate protection" against airliners.

The nonprofit Committee to Bridge the Gap, based in Santa Cruz, proposed in 2004 that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission require atomic power plants to build giant steel cages around reactor buildings to deflect impacts from large commercial planes.

The group further asked the commission to increase to at least 19, from five, the number of attackers each nuclear power plant must be prepared to defend against. The request was based on the number of terrorists who hijacked airliners on Sept. 11.

The commission on Monday instead adopted regulations similar to security directives it imposed in April 2003, without public hearings, on operators of commercial reactors.

The directives deal with the size, training and composition of security forces; reactor security; barriers to protect against truck or car bombs; the dimensions of security perimeters; and the numbers of terrorists that plants must defend against. For national security, the specifics are confidential.

"We are taking a multifaceted approach to security enhancements in this post 9/11 threat environment and looking at how best to secure existing nuclear power plants," said Nuclear Regulatory Commission Chairman Dale Klein.

DOJ_NMG_0124270

The nation has about 100 commercial nuclear reactors, including four in California: two each at San Onofre in northern San Diego County and Diablo Canyon near San Luis Obispo. Many reactors are near major population centers.

Ray Golden, a spokesman for the San Onofre Nuclear Generating Station, said the station's operator, Southern California Edison, had spent about $80 million on security improvements since Sept. 11, 2001.

He added that the plant was designed to withstand earthquakes and that thick concrete structures housed important systems.

Still, some fear that a terrorist attack could breach a reactor or a plant's nuclear waste storage facilities and release harmful radiation.

"Rather than upgrading protections, the proposed rule merely codifies the status quo, reaffirming the existing, woefully inadequate security measures already in place at the nation's reactors," said Dan Hirsch, president of Committee to Bridge the Gap.

His organization's call for fortifications was supported by attorneys general from eight states, including California, who said in letters to the commission that they were concerned that defenses were obsolete and might not be effective against large groups of heavily armed terrorists.

In November 2004, the commission agreed to consider the organization's request and folded it into a formal public process to develop security regulations for the nuclear power industry.

In addition, the federal Energy Policy Act of 2005 asked the commission to upgrade security regulations and consider air assaults, attacks by large groups, and attacks of the magnitude of Sept. 11.

In rejecting the Committee to Bridge the Gap's recommendations, the commission said that firefighting and evacuation procedures, strengthened after Sept. 11, were sufficient to deal with potential releases of radiation from fires and explosions.

Commissioners noted that such protections against air attack as fighter planes and anti-aircraft weapons were primarily the responsibility of the military and other federal organizations.

Consulting with law enforcement and intelligence agencies, commissioners interpreted Sept. 11 as four separate attacks, each involving four to five terrorists, and declined to increase the number of attackers that plants must be prepared to defend against.

Representatives of the nuclear power industry had opposed reactor cages as costly and unnecessary.

They said studies by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Nuclear Energy Institute, a trade organization and lobbying arm for the industry, indicated that crashes of airliners into power plants were unlikely to cause significant harm to the public.

"We are comfortable that our nuclear power plants and spent fuel ponds are robust and can withstand significant impacts though they are not designed specifically for aircraft impacts," said Tony Pietrangelo, vice president of regulatory affairs for the Nuclear Energy Institute.

In a German government study, however, researchers used flight simulators and computer analysis to show that airliners were able to hit nuclear reactors roughly half the time, occasionally triggering large fires and radiation release into the atmosphere.

"Fire prevention is always better than firefighting," said Michele Boyd, an energy specialist with Public Citizen, a nonprofit Washington watchdog group. "Nuclear terrorism prevention is far more prudent than trying to reduce radiation exposures after the fact."

Documents Detail Puzzling Behavior Of Truck-driving Student (PROJO)

By Karen Lee Ziner, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 30, 2007

Mullawala

Shortly after Mohammed Mullawala's arrest in Rhode Island last month, investigators discovered he was a man on the move who ricocheted from state to state, city to city and apartment to apartment.

But a state police affidavit draws a more complicated picture of the man whose behavior at a Smithfield trucking school in November triggered a nationwide investigation that involves the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and multiple state police fusion centers tasked with homeland security concerns.

Mullawala, a 28-year-old Indian national, faces a deportation hearing today. He has been held since Dec. 5 at the Suffolk County House of Corrections in Boston, on a civil violation of his student visa. No criminal charges have been filed against him; however, the Rhode Island Department of the Attorney General has issued a criminal extradition warrant that alleges he submitted a false document to the Rhode Island Division of Motor Vehicles in order to obtain a Rhode Island driver's license.

DOJ_NMG_0124271

It was Mullawala's lack of interest in learning how to back up a tractor-trailer; his request to buy software on hazardous materials and his queries on whether fingerprinting would be required for a commercial driver's license that raised concerns with an instructor at the Nationwide Tractor-Trailer Driving School, and soon thereafter, with federal Homeland Security.

The affidavit contains a complicated timeline of Mullawala's alleged whereabouts since he came to the United States from India in 2002 — zigzagging between Providence to three addresses in Connecticut, and several more in Queens, the Bronx and Long Island, N.Y., as well as Jersey City, N.J.

The timeline revolves around 11 addresses in four states that Mullawala says he lived at. Only 7 have checked out so far, some of which he apparently stayed at for only a month. It includes three universities he said he attended, but apparently did not. It shows he twice returned to India, in 2003 and 2004, once via Kuwait.

Among other new details:

Mullawala frequently switched cars.

In Rhode Island, he registered three different cars; a 1987 Honda on Dec. 3, 2002; a 1989 Nissan three weeks later. The Journal learned that Mullawala registered a 1989 Honda five months later, in May 2003. Four months after that, according to the affidavit, Mullawala registered a 1991 Honda in Connecticut.

On a Connecticut identification card, he changed the spelling of his first name from Mohammed to Muhammed.

He held licenses and ID cards in four states, some of the licenses were suspended multiple times.

He worked for several limousine companies in violation of his visa. He never paid state or federal income tax.

The affidavit's overarching feature involves what investigators characterized as false information Mullawala gave about his movements, addresses, employment, and college enrollments.

A few examples:

He never lived at 181 Carpenter St. in Providence, as he said. His references and roomates' names there do not check out.

He enrolled in three different universities but took almost no classes. At Johnson & Wales University, he enrolled, dropped out, and re-enrolled. He enrolled at the University of Bridgeport and dropped out in the same month. He enrolled at the City University of New York, but took no classes at all.

Two companies where he said he worked have no record of Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala.

He said he had no traffic tickets or summonses, but apparently he had many.

Investigators say they are trying to answer numerous questions, including:

If, as the investigators say, his student identity was a guise for something else, what was it?

What is the significance of numerous "problematic" phone calls to or from his cell phone, that appear to connect with people "of national interest" with regard to "terrorist-type indicators?" as state police Maj. Steven O'Donnell said.

Why has he moved so frequently, and to multiple states?

Why was he so eager to obtain a license to haul hazardous materials, as he told his instructor at the tractor-trailer driving school?

His behavior at best, "is evasive," O'Donnell said last week. "If someone's being deceptive there's a reason they're being deceptive." So far, O'Donnell said, "we don't have any answers."

The affidavit, entered into evidence at federal immigration court in Boston last week, persuaded Judge Matthew D'Angelo that Mullawala poses a danger to the community and is "an extreme flight risk," despite defense lawyer June Beak's argument that Mullawala has no criminal charges against him.

D'Angelo called "troubling," Mullawala's behavior at the trucking school — where Mullawala attended for two days out of the required six to eight weeks; where he allegedly offered extra money to finish the course in a month; and where he said he only wanted to learn how to drive a rig forward and not learn other technical maneuvers.

D'Angelo deemed "far-fetched" and implausible Mullawala's explanation that he moved frequently to avoid areas where the police ticketed heavily for parking violations, as well as to enjoy the mobility his single status afforded.

All of that, plus the fact that Mullawala has no known family or other ties in this country led D'Angelo to order Mullawala's continued federal detention until today's deportation hearing.

The affidavit underscores how vigorously FBI agents and state police detectives attached to the FBI's Joint Anti-Terrorism Task Force have been pursuing leads tied to Mullawala, despite the lack of any criminal charges against him.

It notes that the joint investigation was launched Nov. 29, based on Homeland Security and FBI bulletins. That was six days before Mullawala came to state police headquarters in Scituate to file a complaint that he was being harassed by a detective who had called him on his cell phone. After questioning, he was taken into custody on a student visa violation.

It states that federal agents are still trying to determine if Mullawala lived where he said he lived, according to the affidavit. Off and on, he lived in the Bronx, one landlord told investigators. Most recently, he lived in Jamaica, Queens, said another.

DOJ_NMG_0124272

The affidavit lays out three charts: one on Mullawala's overall timeline; a second on his licenses and registrations; and a third on his work history.

Investigators are continuing to plot his course and filling in the blanks for periods when Mullawala told them he could not remember where he lived. They're looking for connections with other people.

They are still studying his various licenses, registrations, and ID cards in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and New Jersey. Those include a Rhode Island driver's license and Rhode Island-issued Social Security card; a New Jersey driver's license, another by the New Jersey Taxi-Limousine Commission; a Connecticut driver's license and ID card; a City University of New York ID card, a passport issued in India, and more.

(Because he ignored traffic tickets and court summonses, Mullawala's Rhode Island driver's license was suspended twice; his New York license was suspended four times).

The affidavit also gives a chronology of the days leading up to Mullawala's arrest and outlines the questions posed to him.

When a state police investigator called Mullawalla on his cell phone on Dec. 1, and asked him on a pretense to report to headquarters, Mullawalla said he couldn't because his parents were visiting from India. The affidavit says, "Mohammed Y. Mullawalla later admitted that he lied when making this statement."

On Dec. 5, Mullawala showed up at state police headquarters unannounced to make a complaint against one of the troopers in the case. A trooper at the front desk recognized Mullawala from a Homeland Security Bulletin and he was taken into custody.

In a recent phone interview from the Suffolk County House of Corrections, Mullawala rambled rapidly from topic to topic.

He said variously that he came to the United States to study computer engineering, and that he went to trucking school to learn how to drive a rig so he could start a marble import-export business, and that he moved often because he's not the kind of guy to stick to one thing very long.

To the question, "Are you a terrorist?" Mullawala replied, absolutely not.

"I'm not. One hundred percent, I am an innocent student, ma'am."Investigators say they are convinced that Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala is not a student.

But the pieces assembled in the past six weeks have yet to solve the puzzle.

"If someone's being deceptive, there's a reason they're being deceptive. [So far] we don't have any answers."

Maj. Steven O'Donnell

Rhode Island State Police

"If someone's being deceptive, there's a reason they're being deceptive. [So far] we don't have any answers."

Maj. Steven O'Donnell

Rhode Island State Police

Homeland Security's Inspector General Blasts Coast Guard Modernization Program (AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia

The AP, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON – A federal investigation concluded that the U.S. Coast Guard's multibillion-dollar fleet modernization program run by Lockheed Martin Corp. and Northrop Grumman Corp. has design flaws that have led to spiraling maintenance costs and, without a fix, could reduce the longevity of the spiffed-up ships.

Because of design deficiencies, the Coast Guard cutters might not be strong enough to withstand 230 days a year at sea over a period of 30 years, as required by the contract, the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general said in a report released Monday,

The so-called Deepwater contract was awarded in 2002 to Integrated Coast Guard Systems, a joint venture of defense contractors Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman.

Since then, the combined cost of the first two cutters has increased from $517 million to about $775 million primarily due to design changes needed to meet post-9/11 mission requirements and other government specifications not included in the original contract, the report found.

Deepwater, a $24 billion, 25-year program, is the largest acquisition project in Coast Guard history.

Representatives from Integrated Coast Guard Systems did not immediately return calls for comment Monday afternoon.

But in a written response to the IG's report, the Coast Guard said it had "serious concerns" with the investigators' approach to reviewing and analyzing the program.

"The report contains selective inclusion of documents that do not represent the most current, comprehensive, or technically accurate data," the Coast Guard said.

Shares of Bethesda, Md.-based Lockheed Martin slid 24 cents to $94.63 in afternoon trading, while Los Angeles-based Northrop Grumman added 29 cents to $70.78, both on the New York Stock Exchange.

Super Bowl Security A Massive Effort (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

AP, January 30, 2007

MIAMI - Gavin moved quickly around the spacious convention center, searching for a hidden bomb. Near a glass box containing a fire extinguisher, he sniffed the air and abruptly sat down. Inside was a pound of live high explosives, wrapped in black plastic.

For successfully finding the "bomb," Gavin got a treat from his handler, Special Agent L.A. Bykowsky of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. His training exercise over, the 7-year-old golden Labrador retriever is ready for duty conducting bomb-sniffing sweeps for the Super Bowl and its related events and hotels.

Gavin will be among 66 specialized canine bomb teams working as part of a massive local, state and federal security effort to protect one of the world's highest-profile public events from terrorists, foreign and domestic. The dog teams are one element of a 6-inch-thick security plan, which includes jet fighters and helicopters, tactical weapons teams, mobile bomb labs and robots, high-tech X-ray machines and sensors, intelligence databases and hundreds of uniformed police officers.

"We don't have any specific threat to this event," said Julie Torres, chief of the ATF's Miami office and the designated federal coordinator for Super Bowl security. "It is the biggest event in the nation as far as a sporting event. It is vulnerable as far as any terrorist activity. We have to plan excessively so we can provide proper security."

Those plans began to take shape two weeks after last year's Super Bowl in Detroit. This year's game is the sixth since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, which forever changed the security landscape for any major U.S. public event. The Super Bowl is a Level One national security event, right behind a presidential inauguration in importance.

The trick for planners is to keep the game an enjoyable sporting event while still projecting a secure atmosphere. That means fans will see a significant police presence, but much more will be going on behind the scenes.

"What you want to do is give the appearance of preparedness and security, and give the fans a safe environment, but you don't want to look oppressive," said Maj. Lou Battle, Super Bowl coordinator for the Miami-Dade Police Department. "You're not going to feel like you're in an armed camp."

More than two dozen federal, state and local agencies are involved in security along with the NFL's own personnel. Milt Ahlerich, the NFL's vice president for security, said Monday that the league has hired 3,000 of its own personnel - part of $6 million budgeted for Super Bowl security - to handle chores ranging from running the magnetometers to screening fans at Dolphin Stadium.

"We have a great deal of confidence that our fans will be safe, that the two teams will be safe," he said.

Fans are prohibited from bringing most items into the game, other than a small bag that is subject to search. Traditional tailgating with cooking fires, tents and the like is banned in the parking lots, Ahlerich said.

The law enforcement agencies will be housed together at a Joint Operations Center, which includes U.S. intelligence agencies, a "bomb management" group and an aviation team to monitor all air traffic. On game day, Federal Aviation Administration flight restrictions for 10 miles around the stadium go into effect two hours before game time and end just before midnight.

"If you've got to fly, you just can't go through that perimeter," Torres said. "And if you do, you're going to have folks who are going to contact you and try to get your attention."

U.S. military fighters would handle any jetliners or other high-flying aircraft that violate the order. Any "low and slow" planes that stray into the space would be intercepted by U.S. Customs and Border Protection aircraft, often Blackhawk helicopters or Citation jets, said CBP spokesman Zachary Mann.

The FBI plays a major role in coordinating the dissemination of intelligence and law enforcement databases - and investigating any suspected terrorism plots.

"Information dissemination is one of our highest priorities," said Stuart McArthur, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami field office and head of the South Florida Joint Terrorism Task Force. "Every threat that comes in will be checked out by the South Florida JTTF."

The FBI also is doing background checks on stadium workers and other employees involved in various Super Bowl events. Action will be taken if any red flags are raised.

Bykowsky said Gavin and the other bomb-sniffing dogs are capable of identifying minute amounts of powder and explosives no matter what other competing smells are around - kind of like finding a specific ingredient in a big bowl of vegetable soup. And there are some 19,000 explosives available around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0124274

"If there are tomatoes in the soup, he will find them," she said.

Many of the Defense Department and other aircraft will operate out of Homestead Air Reserve Base south of Miami. The ATF has explosives expertise and a mobile bomb lab coming from Atlanta. Large X-ray machines used by Customs at ports will scan shipping containers and truck trailers for suspicious material and high-tech sensors will check for radioactive and biological substances.

"Every square foot of the Super Bowl venue is under surveillance of some sort," Battle said.

One wild card in Miami is whether there might be celebrations, or even rioting, among the thousands of Cuban exiles in the city if Fidel Castro dies before the game. The Cuban president has been seriously ill since midsummer, with some reports indicating he might be near death.

NFL officials and government officials say there is no plan to postpone the game or any of the numerous related events if Castro dies, and dealing with any disruptions triggered by such an event won't take away personnel or assets from Super Bowl security.

"There is a plan, and it's not going to affect the game at all - game day and all the events leading up to game day," said Torres, who was born in Cuba and moved to Miami with her family at age 5. "We have planned for that."

PUC Sets Contempt Hearing For Verizon (AP)

By Francis X. Quinn, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 30, 2007

Maine Utilities Commission Sets Contempt Hearing for Verizon Over Domestic Surveillance

AUGUSTA, Maine (AP) -- The Maine Public Utilities Commission unanimously voted Monday to schedule a hearing next month to allow Verizon Communications Inc. to argue why it should not be held in contempt for its response to a commission order stemming from allegations about domestic surveillance by the federal government.

The case involves a multi-customer complaint filed last May effectively seeking to force Verizon to say whether it provided telephone call records to the government without a warrant.

The complaint followed media reports about a National Security Agency eavesdropping program.

Verizon, in answer to the customer complaint, issued a response on May 19, 2006, in which it referred to points made in two press releases, including one that declared the company was not asked for records by the NSA and did not provide such records.

The PUC subsequently ordered Verizon, on Aug. 9, to affirm in writing that its representations to the commission were true.

On Aug. 21, the same day that the U.S. Justice Department filed suit against the PUC and Verizon asserting that the PUC was pre-empted by federal law from investigating the alleged spying program, Verizon said it would not submit an affirmation, citing legal action by the federal government.

Since then, the PUC has sought to have the federal suit dismissed and the complaint case has not moved forward.

On Monday, the PUC voted 3-0 to hold a contempt hearing by Feb. 13. Panelists suggested Verizon's response to date had been inadequate and noted that the ordinary period for resolving complaints was close to expiring.

"This isn't a national security issue," said PUC Chairman Kurt Adams.

Verizon had nothing immediate to say.

"Verizon is reserving comment," spokesman Peter Reilly said.

Complainant James Cowie expressed some satisfaction that the commission was "finally doing something" but maintained that the same action taken Monday could have been taken months ago.

"We're not happy with the commission at all," he said.

The Bush administration has agreed to let a panel of federal judges oversee the government's domestic spying program.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will have final say in approving wiretaps on communications involving people with suspected terror links, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said earlier this month in a letter to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Senators At Louisiana Hearing Criticize Federal Recovery Aid (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 29 — Three United States senators sounded off on Monday about the slow pace of recovery from Hurricane Katrina at a hearing in the French Quarter, criticizing federal officials for perceived inequities in aid to Louisiana and for imposing rules that are halting government assistance.

DOJ_NMG_0124275

With Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois and a presidential candidate, expected to speak at the hearing of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs committee, dozens of residents lined up outside the Louisiana Supreme Court building hoping to be admitted. But only a small fraction were allowed inside, where Mr. Obama jousted with Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator of Gulf Coast rebuilding, about where the money was, and why more of it was not in Louisiana.

Mr. Obama and Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, focused on why Louisiana, which had far more damage than Mississippi, did not receive a larger proportion of federal aid. Mr. Powell said Congress had put a cap on how much aid money any one state could get.

The senators complained about federal rules requiring a local match for aid after disasters; Mr. Powell said that in some cases, like the removal of the tons of debris that inundated the landscape here, the rules had been waived.

The senators, including the panel's chairman, Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut, voiced little criticism of Mayor C. Ray Nagin or other local officials, and Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana was not on the witness list. Ms. Blanco is responsible for the Road Home, a troubled housing assistance program that has made little progress in getting federal rebuilding aid to thousands of homeowners.

Fewer than 300 homeowners have received aid under the program, Mr. Lieberman said, though more than 100,000 have applied. (A program official said on Monday that 359 had received grants.) The program's failure is cited as a crucial reason for the faltering repopulation effort.

The senators used the occasion to echo local laments that President Bush did not mention New Orleans in his State of the Union address. They did not disagree when Mr. Nagin, evidently referring to officials outside the city, said, "The tragedy of Katrina has lingered for so long, I just don't see the will to really fix it."

While the senators scored the federal response, Mr. Powell gingerly noted the region's "significant" difficulties before the storm, and suggested the problems of the Road Home were now a state matter.

Undeterred, Mr. Obama warmed to the issue of the Bush administration's failures in the response to the disaster, now a fixture in the Democrats' arsenal.

"There's not a sense of urgency out of this White House to get this done," Mr. Obama said. He spoke of his hometown of Chicago's recovery from the great fire of 1871 as an effort of national will, and suggested it could be done again.

Mr. Obama wondered about "whether we're in danger of actually forgetting New Orleans," adding, "That's shameful."

Obama Blasts Bush Adminstration On Katrina Recovery (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, January 30, 2007

NEW ORLEANS -- Democratic presidential hopeful Barack Obama blasted the Bush administration Monday for the slow pace of Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts, saying reconstruction no longer seems to be a White House priority.

"There is not a sense of urgency in this administration to get this done," said the senator from Illinois. "You get a sense that will has been lacking in the last several months."

Obama, the Senate's only African-American member, was in New Orleans for a field hearing on Gulf Coast rebuilding conducted by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

In the days after Katrina, the devastation of New Orleans and the botched federal response turned into a dramatic international emblem for charges of incompetence in the administration and of indifference to the plight of poor people, particularly blacks and other racial minorities. The flooding and tardy rescue efforts had the greatest impact on low-income black residents, many of whom did not have personal transportation or financial resources to evacuate easily on their own.

The broken homes and vacant streets of the city's flood-damaged neighborhoods remain a potent political symbol. Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards kicked off his campaign in December outside a damaged home in one hard-hit neighborhood.

After Monday's field hearing, the Senate committee took a bus tour of the city's Lower 9th Ward, a low-income black neighborhood where many ruined homes sit empty and bear the painted X-marks used in the chaotic weeks following the hurricane to show which buildings had been searched for survivors.

Testifying to the committee, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said he still doesn't see "the will to really fix" his city and suggested that race was a factor.

"I think it's more class than anything, but there's racial issues associated with it also," said Nagin, who is black.

Nagin complained that disputes with federal officials over the value of damaged buildings and cumbersome paperwork have slowed the money flow.

"And then I look at what we're doing in Iraq and how we spend money at an unprecedented level there, how we can set up temporary hospitals and designate money to rebuild their economy, and we have this dance going on in New Orleans," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0124276

The hearing is one of the first that the Homeland Security Committee has scheduled since the Senate passed to Democratic control. No Republican members attended.

The session follows criticism of Bush for not including any mention of the New Orleans recovery effort in last week's State of the Union address. Obama echoed that criticism, noting that Bush had traveled to the city shortly after the disaster and promised to do "what it takes … as long as it takes" to rebuild New Orleans.

But "17 months later, we heard not a single word, not one word in President Bush's State of the Union address," Obama said. "Those of us who are concerned all across the country wonder if we're in danger of forgetting about New Orleans, and that's shameful."

Federal officials involved with rebuilding efforts defended their work in testimony before the committee. Donald Powell, federal coordinator for Gulf Coast reconstruction for the Department of Homeland Security, said he was confident that when the history of the recovery effort is written "it will also be a story of modern renaissance."

"President Bush is committed to rebuilding the Gulf Coast and rebuilding it better and stronger," Powell said.

Still, Gil Jamieson, the deputy director for Gulf Coast recovery for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said it might take as long as a decade to rebuild the region.

Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) and other members of the panel criticized the administration for failing to waive a legal requirement that local authorities pay 10 percent of the cost of recovery of a local disaster. They noted that the requirement had been waived after the Sept. 11 attacks in New York and also in 1992 after Hurricane Andrew hit Florida.

Powell responded that state officials could use federal disaster aid they had received for the recovery effort to pay the cost of the match.

As the hearing began, a protester stood and unfurled a banner urging "Probe the White House," a reference to calls for establishment of a commission to investigate the administration's response to Katrina modeled after the Sept. 11 commission.

Speaking later to reporters, committee Chairman Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut said he would rather focus on the rebuilding effort and was reluctant to mount a new investigation of the failures in the initial response.

"We don't want to play 'gotcha' anymore," Lieberman said. "We want to get the aid and assistance to the people of the region who need it."

Mary Quite Contrary (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, January 30, 2007

Nearly 18 months after Hurricane Katrina devastated Louisiana and Mississippi, HOH thought it likely everything that could be said about the tragedy already had been said.

Alas, HOH underestimated Pelican State Sen. Mary Landrieu (D), who had some highly original things to say Monday morning at a field hearing in New Orleans convened by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

“I often think we would have been better off if the terrorists had blown up our levees. Maybe we’d have gotten more attention,” Landrieu said, according to a report from the New Orleans station WWL-TV.

The problem, Landrieu continued, is that Louisiana gets a bad rap in Washington, D.C., especially compared to its neighbor to the east.

“Mississippi is actually the most corrupt state in the union, but you never hear that, because there’s some political undertones about having Mississippi look so good and having Louisiana look not so good at the national level,” Landrieu said.

So, beginning from the top, does Landrieu really wish her home state had been attacked by terrorists? Not really, explained her communications director, Adam Sharp.

“She was just reflecting on the priorities of the [Bush] administration,” Sharp said. “Look at the State of the Union — 5,600 words and not one mention of Hurricane Katrina or Rita or the recovery. You are left to wonder if [a terrorist attack] is what it takes to get on the radar screen.”

As for that whole corruption thing, Landrieu makes no apologies for that one either. In fact, Sharp sent HOH a handy dandy report showing that Mississippi is indeed the most corrupt state in all the land.

The report — written in 2004 by the Corrupt Crime Reporter and based on public data — says Louisiana “is not the most corrupt state in the country, as its reputation might indicate. It comes in third.”

Mississippi is a solid No. 1 on that list, while sleeper pick North Dakota slid in at the No. 2 slot.

In any case, Sharp said, Landrieu “was not denigrating Mississippi to make her point. We know that the actions of a few dishonest officials should not be representative of the entire state.”

DOJ_NMG_0124277

Not the Easiest Job. She's dealt with more than her fair share of negative press over the last several months, and now Melanie Roussell is leaving her post as communications director and senior policy adviser to embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.).

In an e-mail Monday, Roussell wrote that she is leaving Jefferson — who is under federal investigation for allegedly soliciting bribes — to take the post of press secretary at the House Judiciary Committee.

"And like a bird leaving the nest, the time has come for me to move on to new and exciting ventures — taking with me the strength of character, motivation, and expertise that I learned here on the Jefferson staff," Roussell said.

Today is her last day with Jefferson's office. Perhaps things will be a little quieter at the new gig.

Someone's Been Sitting in My Chair, Part II. HOH enjoys stories about chairs. Recently, he told you about the time House Transportation and Infrastructure ranking member John Mica (R-Fla.) stormed out of a panel meeting and took his GOP colleagues with him because there was not a properly positioned chair for him.

Now comes word of some more disgruntled House Republicans, this time of the press secretary variety.

House GOP flacks get together to compare notes every Monday at 1 p.m. While there had been some issues in the opening days of the 110th Congress with making sure they had a room in which to meet, those problems were supposedly settled and the Republican spinners should have a standing reservation in the Cannon Caucus Room.

And yet, on Monday the press secretaries showed up to find that a) the room was double-booked (though not occupied), and b) the chairs were all stacked in the back of the room rather than arrayed out like they were supposed to be, meaning the staffers had to move the chairs themselves.

To Republicans, the latest chapter of Chairgate was yet another example of the Democrats' inability to competently manage the House. "All they have to do is keep the trains running and they can't even do that," complained a GOP aide.

But according to a Democratic leadership aide, the whole affair was attributable to a computer error. The room reservation system is electronic, and apparently a group related to the Smithsonian Institution had applied to use the Cannon Caucus Room for the whole day and the computer granted the reservation without recognizing that the Republicans had a standing hold on the room at 1 p.m.

The Democratic aide expressed relief that, despite the electronic mix-up, the Republicans, who "showed their perseverance and ability to adapt to hard times, were still able to have the meeting."

The Post-Katrina Drawing Board (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

After Hurricane Katrina in 2005, many business leaders complained that despite contributions of $1.2 billion in relief or services, too many efforts to help the U.S. disaster response were thwarted by red tape.

Truckloads of goods were turned back on the roads by police or the National Guard. Donations of vital telecommunications gear were delayed, although they could have provided critical phone and computer links in the early hours. Big retailers offered bottled water at low cost but had to sell to the government through approved contractors that charged taxpayers more.

Yesterday, Business Executives for National Security, a nonprofit, nonpartisan advisory group representing disaster-related industries, released "Getting Down to Business," a plan for public-private disaster coordination.

Among its recommendations:

Â· Add businesses to emergency operations centers run by states and big cities nationwide and make their involvement a condition for federal homeland security grants.

Â· Include businesses in emergency planning, training and exercises, and in the National Response Plan, the main blueprint for U.S. disaster response.

Â· Create business equivalents to Emergency Management Assistance Compacts, in which states around the country agree to help one another in a disaster.

Â· Overhaul the government's emergency logistics, purchasing and donations management practices into faster, ready-to-use packages.

Â· Rewrite the nation's disaster laws and the National Response Plan to include the private sector; tackle issues such as liability, medical and regulatory waivers; and make businesses eligible for federal aid when carrying out disaster responsibilities, such as providing security for emergency repairs.

DOJ_NMG_0124278

WAR NEWS:

Bush Warns Iran Against Action In Iraq (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, January 30, 2007

President Bush said Monday the United States "will respond firmly" if Iran escalates military action in Iraq and endangers American forces. But Bush emphasized he has no intention of invading Iran.

Bush also acknowledged skepticism concerning U.S. intelligence about Iran, because Washington was wrong in accusing Iraq of harboring weapons of mass destruction before the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. "I'm like a lot of Americans that say, 'Well, if it wasn't right in Iraq, how do you know it's right in Iran,'" the president said.

The president, in an interview with NPR, said the United States was "constantly evaluating and answering this legitimate question by always working to get as good intelligence as we can."

Sharply at odds over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program, Washington and Tehran increasingly are arguing about Iraq, where both countries are seeking influence. The White House said last week that American troops in Iraq have been authorized to kill or capture Iranian agents deemed to be a threat. Iran's ambassador followed up by telling The New York Times that Tehran plans to greatly expand its economic and military ties with Iraq and open an Iranian national bank branch in Baghdad.

The United States accuses Iran of supplying terrorists and insurgents in Iraq with improvised explosive devices that have become the most lethal threat to U.S. forces. The Bush administration says it decided to take a tougher line with Tehran after months of evidence showing Iran was assisting anti-U.S. forces.

"If Iran escalates its military action in Iraq to the detriment of our troops and/or innocent Iraqi people, we will respond firmly," the president said. "It makes common sense for the commander in chief to say to our troops and the Iraqi people and the Iraqi government that we will help you defend yourself from people that want to sow discord and harm. And so we will do what it takes to protect our troops."

Bush said it was important to distinguish the nuclear standoff with Iran from the quarrel over Tehran's involvement in Iraq. He said he believed the dispute over Iran's nuclear program could be resolved diplomatically.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., has said Bush does not have authority to launch military action in Iran without first seeking congressional authorization.

Bush told NPR he had no intention of going into Iran. "This is the kind of thing that happens in Washington," the president said. "People ascribe, you know, motives to me beyond a simple statement — 'Of course we'll protect our troops.' I don't know how anybody can then say, 'Well, protecting the troops means that we're going to invade Iran.'"

Bush Warns Iran About Aggression In Iraq (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Asserting the right of the U.S. military inside Iraq to defend itself and Iraqis against threats from Tehran, President Bush vowed Monday that Iranian aggression inside Iraq would be met with American force.

At the same time, Bush asserted his determination to resolve what the U.S. sees as Iran's ambitions for nuclear weaponry through diplomatic channels.

With a two-track message of stern military warnings and promises of peaceful diplomacy, Bush is confronting an increasingly complicated conflict with the Iranian government.

"If Iran escalates its military action in Iraq to the detriment of our troops and or innocent Iraqi people, we will respond firmly," Bush said in an interview with National Public Radio. "We will do what it takes to protect our troops. It makes common sense for the commander in chief to say to our troops and the Iraqi people—and the Iraqi government—that we will help you defend yourself from people that want to sow discord and harm."

And , during an interview conducted in the Roosevelt Room of the White House, the president suggested that it is "very important ... not to mix issues" involving Iran.

One issue is Iran's nuclear ambitions, Bush said, insisting that he is confident in the power of diplomacy to resolve it. "The message that we are working to send to the Iranian regime and the Iranian people is that you will become increasingly isolated, if you continue to pursue a nuclear weapon," Bush said.

The other issue is Iran's support of insurgents inside Iraq as well as in other countries in the region, with the U.S. committed to blocking Iranian interference in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0124279

The president repeatedly has asserted the right of U.S. forces to intervene in the Iranian shipment of weaponry into Iraq, with Bush blaming Iran for supporting radical Shiite groups that have formed death squads in Iraq. And the White House has authorized U.S. forces to stop Iranian forces inside Iraq.

But Bush insists he has no plans to invade Iran, despite worries voiced in Congress.

"I have no intent upon incur—going into Iran," Bush said. "I mean, this is the kind of thing that happens in Washington. People ascribe, you know, motives to me beyond a simple statement—of course we'll protect our troops. I don't know how anybody can then say, well, protecting the troops means that we're going to invade Iran."

Iran has confirmed that the U.S. detained two of its security officials last month, but says those officials, later released, were engaged in legitimate talks and should not have been detained. Iran also has announced plans to open branch banks and other economic ties with Iraq, according to a New York Times interview with the Iranian ambassador to Iraq.

Kurt Campbell, director of the international security program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, sees Iran attempting to establish ties with Shiite leaders in Iraq.

"Most of the problems that we are experiencing in Iraq have to do with our failures and mistakes as opposed to some larger grand Iranian strategy to undermine us," Campbell said. "In many respects Iranians have stepped into a vacuum of American leadership as a whole."

At the same time, he suggested, Bush draws power from challenging conventional wisdom—"such as a larger force for Iraq ... and a more confrontational policy with Iran." With an escalating debate over the war in Congress, tough talk for Iran could help bring Republicans in line, Campbell said, while appealing to Democrats who oppose the war in Iraq but support a tough stance toward Iran.

The U.S. has deployed an additional aircraft carrier to the region, with the Bush administration maintaining that not only Iran, but also Lebanon and Israel, are concerned about Iranian-backed terrorists operating within their borders.

"Most of the nations in that part of the world believe their security is supported, if you will, by the United States," Vice President Dick Cheney said in an interview with Newsweek magazine. "They want us to have a major presence there. When we—as the president did, for example, recently—deploy another aircraft carrier task force to the [Persian] Gulf, that sends a very strong signal to everybody in the region that the United States is here to stay."

Cheney also voiced a warning about U.S. resolve in averting nuclear weaponry in Iran, echoing a caution that the president issued two years ago.

"The fact is, we are doing what we can to try to resolve issues such as the nuclear question diplomatically through the United Nations," Cheney said in the interview, "but we've also made it clear that we haven't taken any options off the table."

That was reminiscent of Bush, at a news conference with European leaders in Belgium in February 2005: "This notion that the United States is getting ready to attack Iran is simply ridiculous. Having said that, all options are on the table."

Now, with the Iranian government announcing intentions to build new economic ties with Iraq, the White House is watching that move as well, warily, but without warnings.

"We'll wait and see whether it's a positive development or not," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Monday. "We would certainly welcome Iran to start playing a constructive role in the region."

Bush Vows To Confound Iranian Operations In Iraq (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

President Bush yesterday said he doesn't intend to attack Iran but will "respond firmly" if Iranian agents inside Iraq escalate their attacks or supply materials used to attack U.S. troops or Iraqis.

"We will protect our interests in Iraq. That's what the American people expect us to do," Mr. Bush said in an interview with National Public Radio. "That's definitely what our troops want to do, and that's what the families of our troops want us to do. And if we find the Iranians are moving weapons that will end up harming American troops, we'll deal with it."

Shi'ite-controlled Iran is arguably the major international problem for Mr. Bush right now -- sharing a border with Iraq, being home to the same religious sect as the majority of Iraqis, and at the same time pursuing a nuclear program in defiance of its international commitments.

The president yesterday also accused Iran of being part of an effort to bring down Lebanon's government as well, saying it is working with Syria and the terrorist group Hezbollah.

"Their goals are clear," Mr. Bush said. "They foment violence."

Iran announced during the weekend that it will offer Iraq military assistance in the form of training, and also offer reconstruction assistance -- a move the White House was reluctant to characterize.

DOJ_NMG_0124280

That followed news earlier this month that the United States was stepping up its efforts to try to prevent Iran from supplying materials to insurgents -- a charge the White House has made before.

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill are wary of the White House's tone, fearing it is the first step toward military action against Iran. Top Democrats have said Mr. Bush will have to come seek congressional authority if he wants to expand the Iraq war.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush is trying to shore up support for his new plan to secure Iraq, which includes sending 4,000 Marines to Anbar Province to fight al Qaeda and more than 17,000 soldiers to Baghdad to help Iraqi troops restore order in the middle of Sunni-Shi'ite sectarian fighting.

He told NPR that senators would be sending mixed messages if they vote for a resolution opposing the troop increase because those lawmakers voted just last week in favor of a new military commander who says the troops are needed.

"It is ironic that the Senate would vote 81 to nothing to send a general into Iraq who believes he needs more troops to do the job and then send a contradictory message," the president said, referring to Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who the Senate confirmed last week to become commander of Multinational Force Iraq.

Bush Warns Iran, Syria, Hezbollah On Lebanon (AFP)

AFP, January 30, 2007

US President George W. Bush deplored recent violence in Lebanon and warned that Iran, Syria and Hezbollah must be "called to account" for trying to destabilize that country.

"While Lebanon's friends seek to help the Lebanese government build a free, sovereign, and prosperous country, Syria, Iran and Hezbollah are working to destabilize Lebanese society," Bush said in a statement.

"All those who seek a peaceful, constitutional solution to the crisis in Lebanon deserve the support of the international community, but those responsible for creating chaos must be called to account," he said.

Four people were killed and 152 injured Thursday in clashes between Sunni and Shiite Muslims apparently triggered by a row in a cafeteria at Beirut's Arab University between government supporters and opponents.

"I am deeply disappointed by the recent violence and bloodshed on the streets of Lebanon. It is all the more troubling that the violence occurred while Lebanon's legitimate leaders and friends were gathered together in Paris to help secure a peaceful and prosperous future for the country," said Bush.

The United States has pledged 770 million dollars in new aid to Lebanon as part of a major international drive to rebuild the country and bolster the embattled pro-Western government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora.

"This is a strong symbol of the American people's support for and commitment to the future of Lebanon," said Bush, who had tough words for Damascus, Tehran, and the militant Shiite movement Hezbollah.

Bush said they sought to derail the creation of the international tribunal to try suspects in the murder of Lebanon's former premier Rafiq Hariri and stall Hezbollah's disarmament as called for by the UN Security Council.

"Their goals are clear. They foment violence in order to prevent the establishment of a Special Tribunal in response to former Prime Minister Hariri's assassination, to prevent full implementation of UN Security Council resolutions calling for Hezbollah's disarmament, and to bring down Lebanon's democratically elected government," said Bush.

How The 'Axis' Seeks The Killer Missile (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

North Korea and Iran are cooperating in developing long-range missiles, the deputy director of the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency said yesterday.

Army Brig. Gen. Patrick O'Reilly said during a speech that North Korea test fired a long-range Taepodong missile in July, and Iran is working on a space launcher that would help develop an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) that could hit the U.S.

"Not only North Korea, but Iran has shown some significant developments in their [own] missile systems," Gen. O'Reilly said in a speech to the George C. Marshall Institute.

"They are working in concert with the North Koreans," he said. "They have made a claim that they are working towards developing a space launch capability, which also would give them an ICBM capability."

The Pentagon believes Iran has a "new intermediate-range ballistic missile or space launch vehicle [SLV] in development," a Missile Defense Agency briefing slide stated.

The Iranians are "likely to develop an ICBM/SLV [and] could have an ICBM capable of reaching the U.S. before 2015," according to the briefing chart.

One of the new missiles would be solid-fueled, making it capable of being launched rapidly, and have a range of 1,240 miles, enough to hit targets throughout Europe from Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0124281

The speech marked the first time the Pentagon publicly disclosed the missile cooperation between Pyongyang and Tehran.

The North Koreans test fired a Taepodong-2 on July 4 but the missile failed 40 seconds after launch, Gen. O'Reilly said. The two-stage version has a range of 6,200 miles and the three-stage version can travel 9,300 miles.

"But the indications are clear that they are continuing to strive to expand their ballistic missile capability," he said.

The U.S. missile defense system was made operational before the North Korean tests and the forces involved "performed very well," Gen. O'Reilly said. Another briefing chart used during the speech stated that if the Taepodong-2 had threatened the United States, "we are confident the ballistic missile defense system would have operated as designed."

Another briefing chart revealed for the first time that North Korea is developing a new intermediate-range missile with a range of about 2,000 miles that was described as "a qualitative improvement in performance" from earlier missile systems. North Korea's July tests -- seven missiles were fired -- included two 806-mile range Nodong missiles, he said.

Gen. O'Reilly said the U.S. missile defense system, which includes a network of long-, medium- and short-range interceptors and sensors, is designed to counter missiles from "rogue states" targeted at the U.S., its allies and forces overseas.

The system can defend against short-range Iranian missile attacks against Saudi Arabia and North Korean strikes on Japan, as well as an Iranian missile strike on London or North Korean missile attacks on the United States, an MDA briefing slide stated.

North Korea uses its missiles as "geopolitical leverage" over the United States and its allies and also to raise money by selling them abroad, Gen. O'Reilly said. Iran is building missiles for "both asymmetric threats and conventional threats" to U.S. and allied forces, he noted.

Gen. O'Reilly also stated that Hezbollah's short-range rockets and missiles, used in last year's fighting in Lebanon, were a threat to Israeli forces and that more than 4,500 were fired.

"They had small ball bearings, about 300, in their warhead, and they were very effective at shutting down a lot of the maneuvering capability of the Israeli army and also shutting down over 70 percent of the commerce in northern Israel during that period of time," he said. "And that was significant from both non-state actors and other countries that have committed to using rockets as terror weapons."

Asked whether the Pentagon can counter China's anti-satellite weapon, which was tested recently, Gen. O'Reilly said countering space weapons currently is not a mission for the Missile Defense Agency but could be done.

"We have tremendous kinematic capability with our missiles; we have the sensors and the battle management, so that work would be straightforward if we were ... given that guidance and mandate to do," he said.

The Pentagon also is developing a "multiple kill vehicle" that will greatly boost the power of current interceptors by adding more non-explosive warheads that can hit 10 or more enemy warheads from a single booster, he said.

The current missile interceptors deployed at Fort Greely in Alaska and Vandenberg Air Force Base in California can protect the United States from North Korean missiles and afford "partial protection" from Middle Eastern missiles. Upgraded defenses will provide full defense from both North Korean and Middle Eastern missiles, Gen. O'Reilly said.

By 2011, the Pentagon plans to have up to 44 interceptors deployed in the United States and the first 10 interceptors in Europe; a large radar in Europe; 18 Aegis missile defense ships; 48 ground-based THAAD interceptors; two new surveillance and tracking satellites; and a battle management and integrated global fire system for the Middle East and Southwest Asian missile threats.

With Iran Ascendant, U.S. Is Seen At Fault (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates -- Kuwait rarely rebuffs its ally, the United States, partly out of gratitude for the 1991 Persian Gulf War. But in October it reneged on a pledge to send three military observers to an American-led naval exercise in the Gulf, according to U.S. officials and Kuwaiti analysts.

"We understood," a State Department official said. "The Kuwaitis were being careful not to antagonize the Iranians."

Four years after the United States invaded Iraq, in part to transform the Middle East, Iran is ascendant, many in the region view the Americans in retreat, and Arab countries, their own feelings of weakness accentuated, are awash in sharpening sectarian currents that many blame the United States for exacerbating.

Iran has deepened its relationship with Palestinian Islamic groups, assuming a financial role once filled by Gulf Arab states, in moves it sees as defensive and the United States views as aggressive. In Lebanon and Iraq, Iran is fighting proxy battles against the United States with funds, arms and ideology. And in the vacuum created by the U.S. overthrow of Iranian foes in Afghanistan and Iraq, it is exerting a power and prestige that recalls the heady days of the 1979 Islamic revolution, when Iranian clerics led the toppling of a U.S.-backed government.

DOJ_NMG_0124282

"The United States is the first to be blamed for the rise of Iranian influence in the Middle East," said Khaled al-Dakhil, a Saudi writer and academic. "There is one thing important about the ascendance of Iran here. It does not reflect a real change in Iranian capabilities, economic or political. It's more a reflection of the failures on the part of the U.S. and its Arab allies in the region."

Added Eyal Zisser, head of the Middle Eastern and African Studies Department at Tel Aviv University in Israel: "After the whole investment in democracy in the region, the West is losing, and Iran is winning."

The United States has signaled a more aggressive posture toward Iran. President Bush on Friday defended a Pentagon program to kill or capture Iranian operatives in Iraq. Vice President Cheney, in a Newsweek interview published Sunday, said the deployment of a second U.S. aircraft carrier task force to the Persian Gulf was intended to signal to the region that the United States is "working with friends and allies as well as the international organizations to deal with the Iranian threat."

And John D. Negroponte, outgoing director of national intelligence, told Congress this month that Iran's influence is growing across the region "in ways that go beyond the menace of its nuclear program."Widespread Support

Iranian officials -- emboldened but uneasy over nuclear-armed neighbors in Israel and Pakistan and a U.S. military presence in the Gulf, Iraq and Afghanistan -- have warned that they would respond to an American attack on Iran's facilities.

"Iran's supporters are widespread -- they're in Iraq, they're in Afghanistan, they're everywhere. And you know, the American soldiers in the Middle East are hostages of Iran, in the situation where a war is imposed on it. They're literally in the hands of the Iranians," said Najaf Ali Mirzai, a former Iranian diplomat in Beirut who heads the Civilization Center for Iranian-Arab Studies. "The Iranians can target them wherever, and Patriot missiles aren't going to defend them and neither is anything else."

"Iran would suffer," he added, "but America would suffer more."

As that struggle deepens, many in the Arab world find themselves on the sidelines. They are increasingly anxious over worsening tension between Sunni and Shiite Muslims across the Middle East, even as some accuse the United States of stoking that tension as a way to counter predominantly Shiite Iran. Fear of Iranian dominance is coupled, sometimes in the same conversation, with suspicion of U.S. intentions in confronting Iran.

"It was necessary to create an enemy to justify the failure of the American occupation in Iraq," Talal Salman, the editor-in-chief of as-Safir, a Lebanese newspaper, wrote in a column this month. "So to protect ourselves against the coming of the wolf, we bring the foreign fleets that fill our lands, skies and seas."

Iranian rivalry with its Sunni Arab neighbors is centuries old, but as with most conflicts in the Middle East, its modern contours are shaped by politics and interests.

Iran has found itself strengthened almost by default, first with the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan to Iran's east, which ousted the Taliban rulers against whom it almost went to war in the 1990s, and then to its west, with the American ouster of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, against whom it fought an eight-year war in the 1980s.

Arab rulers allied with the United States issued stark warnings. Jordan's King Abdullah in 2005 spoke darkly of a Shiite crescent that would stretch from Iran, through Iraq's Shiite Arab majority, to Lebanon, where Shiites make up the largest single community. President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt suggested last year that Shiites in the Arab world were more loyal to Iran than to their own countries. And in a rare interview, published Saturday, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia suggested that Iran, although he did not name the country, was trying to convert Sunni Arabs to Shiism. "The majority of Sunni Muslims will never change their faith," he told al-Siyassah, a Kuwaiti newspaper.

Across the region, Iran has begun to exert influence on fronts as diverse as its allies: the formerly exiled Shiite parties in Iraq and their militias; Hezbollah, a Lebanese group formed with Iranian patronage after Israel's 1982 invasion; and the cash-strapped Sunni Muslim movement of Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

"I disagree with Iranian policy, but you have to give the Iranians credit," said Abdullah al-Shayji, a political science professor and head of Kuwait University's American Studies Unit. "You have to appreciate that they have an agenda, they're planning for it, they seize the opportunity, they see an American weakness and they are capitalizing on it."A Helping Hand

In Beirut's southern suburbs, a Hezbollah stronghold, a banner hangs near a bridge wrecked by Israeli strikes last summer: "The Zionist enemy destroys, the Islamic Republic of Iran builds." Even before the 33-day war ended, Iran had provided Hezbollah with $150 million to begin rebuilding, some of it going to victims in $10,000 bundles of crisp U.S. currency, according to a Shiite politician who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"You want me to give you my opinion? Honestly?" asked Hajj Hassan Sbeiti, a 44-year-old merchant, his face breaking into a wry smile. "If you say hello to me, you probably like me. If you say hello to me and ask what I need, you're a friend. If you say hello to me, ask what I need and put money in my hand, then you're going to be my brother."

In Iraq, U.S. officials say Iran is providing Shiite militias with sophisticated projectiles capable of penetrating U.S. armored vehicles and backing those forces in a gathering civil war against Sunni Arabs. One commander of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia that U.S. military officials now identify as the greatest security threat in Iraq, said that however much he might dislike Iran, he was eagerly anticipating the delivery of 50 rocket-propelled grenades to Basra.

DOJ_NMG_0124283

But no less influential are the ties that Iran has deepened with the three main Shiite groups in Iraq, some of whose leaders spent years in exile in Iran and are now nominally allied with the United States, and the burgeoning economic relationship between the two countries.

The extent of Iran's engagement in the Arab world, and the rising sectarianism that has accompanied the Iranian ascendance, troubles Arabs who already worry about growing tension between the United States and Iran.

"If Iran is bombed, Iran's reaction is a sure thing. They cannot sit idle, and what kind of reaction they will take is a big question," said Abbas Bolurfrushan, the president of the Iranian Business Council in Dubai, a booming city-state on the Gulf that is part of the United Arab Emirates, where an estimated 400,000 Iranians live and work.

The result? "A disaster," he said. "Disaster."'Defensive' Alliance

Mirzai, the former Iranian diplomat, offered a similar scenario in more threatening terms. Wearing a white turban and the robes of a cleric, he sketched out potential Iranian responses: cutting the Strait of Hormuz in the Persian Gulf, through which 20 percent of the world's oil passes; retaliation in Iraq, Afghanistan or Lebanon; attacks on U.S. targets in the Gulf.

"There is a policy the Iranians have and they've repeated it often -- the Gulf is either safe for everyone or no one," he said.

In an attempt to contest Iran's influence, the United States has sought to form an axis among Sunni Arab states it considers moderate: Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and smaller countries in the Gulf. Israeli officials have spoken about a possible alignment of their country's interests with those states to arrest both Iran's influence and its nuclear program.

In November, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said he would try to deepen ties with those states, some of which have yet to recognize Israel, in what Israeli analysts saw as an opening bid to create an anti-Iranian bloc.

But Zisser, of Tel Aviv University, cautioned that "all of these countries are not very strong, and they have their own problems."

"Iran's threat could do something to bring them together, but I would say that any alliance that comes out of it would be defensive in nature," he said. "These countries are not going to be able to unite in any way that would meaningfully change the face of the Middle East."

Potentially more far-reaching is the sectarian tension that the struggle has ignited. In the Palestinian territories, Israeli officials say, Iran has been increasingly successful in influencing the chaotic political situation, particularly by funding the Hamas-led government.

The connection has not gone unnoticed in the Palestinian street. At two rallies this month for Fatah, the movement led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, crowds directed chants at Hamas, a Sunni Arab group. "Shiites, Shiites," they shouted.

Across the Middle East, once antiquated words have sprung up in conversations about Shiites -- Safawis, for instance, drawn from the name of a Persian empire that brought Shiism to Iran. In Lebanon, posters have gone up in Sunni neighborhoods portraying leaders united by little other than their Sunni sectarian affiliation: Saddam Hussein, Yasser Arafat, Rafiq al-Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister killed in a 2005 car bombing, and Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the leader of Hamas who was assassinated by Israel in 2004.

"You are in heaven," the poster reads, "and those who killed you will go to hell."

Iranian officials have repeatedly warned against the phenomenon, fearing it will curb their leverage in an Arab street that remains majority Sunni. Many in the Arab world watch its gathering force with a sense of helplessness.

"It's very bleak and it's very dangerous," said Dakhil, the Saudi writer. "We have a sectarian civil war in Iraq now and this is drawing sectarian lines through the region. This is the most important, the most dangerous ramification of the American war in Iraq."

US Ally And Foe Are Trying To Avert War In Lebanon (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 29 — In an unusual collaboration that could complicate American policy in the region, Iran and Saudi Arabia have been mediating an agreement to end Lebanon's violent political crisis.

Leaders of Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed party trying to overthrow Lebanon's government, have recently visited the Saudi king in Riyadh, according to officials who attended the meeting. And Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi chief security adviser, has met with his Iranian counterpart, Ali Larijani, in Riyadh and Tehran to try to stop Lebanon's slide into civil war.

"The only hope is for the Iranians and Saudis to go further in easing the situation and bringing people back to the negotiating table," said Radwan Sayyed, an adviser to Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

DOJ_NMG_0124284

The Saudi-Iranian efforts have put Washington in an awkward position, since it is trying to reduce Iran's regional influence. But since a stable Lebanon is also an American priority, American officials have watched the efforts without interfering.

There is a belief in Lebanon that if the Saudi-Iranian effort succeeds, the result will be short term. There remains fear that Syria, which retains influence with Hezbollah and within Lebanon's security services, will work to scuttle any deal.

But Iran seems to be working in earnest. Members of Lebanon's governing party say the dynamics inside Iran, where the firebrand president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, appears to be losing political strength, have led Tehran to lean on Hezbollah.

One question is whether Hezbollah will do what Iran wants or will bend to the Syrians. Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, said in a speech last week that an agreement "between two countries or two governments does not bind the Lebanese, because the Lebanese must seek their own interests and not the interests of Saudi Arabia and Iran."

It has been nearly three months since Hezbollah began leading street protests aimed at bringing down the American-backed government here, and Lebanese political leaders have failed to agree even on the framework for talks.

There have been no direct meetings between the main political leaders in months. Many say they fear even more bloodshed if a deal is not struck by Feb. 14, the second anniversary of the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

The governing coalition plans to mark the anniversary with large street rallies at Mr. Hariri's grave site in the center of town. Those demonstrators would be separated by a few feet from the hundreds of opposition supporters who have camped out for nearly three months in their effort to bring down the government.

Allies of Syria in the opposition have scolded the government for backing the creation of an international tribunal to hear evidence in the assassination of Mr. Hariri and other political killings. Syria has been implicated in the killing by a United Nations investigation, and one of its allies in the opposition says that if the government backs down on the tribunal, the crisis would ease.

But the fight is also over who will be the next president, whether Hezbollah will be allowed to keep its weapons, how to rewrite the nation's electoral laws, whether United Nations troops will remain on the southern border with Israel and, more fundamentally, whether Lebanon will lean toward the United States and Europe or Iran and Syria.

There have been proposals that each side has presented as compromises only to be rejected by the other as insufficient.

"It is true, whoever governs will decide Lebanon's political direction," said Muhammad Fniesh, a senior member of Hezbollah who said he recently attended a meeting with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia.

Iran and Saudi Arabia have been involved in Lebanese affairs for decades. Saudi Arabia has close ties with the Hariri family and has invested large sums of money rebuilding Beirut. Recently, as Iranianbacked parties have taken over in Iraq and as Iran has tried to establish itself as the regional superpower, Saudi Arabia has begun, at American urging, to press back.

Seeking to fill the vacuum left by Egypt, whose regional influence has diminished, Saudi Arabia has tried to position itself as an Arab counterpoint to Iran.

But in Lebanon, political leaders and diplomats said, both see a common interest in calming sectarian tensions, at least for now. The fight has effectively divided the country between the predominantly Shiite Muslim opposition and the predominantly Sunni Muslim governing alliance. Lebanon's Christian community is divided between the two.

The eagerness to look beyond Beirut for a solution comes as Western diplomats here say they fear that local leaders have abrogated their responsibility to foreign powers. Even Lebanese leaders say internal talks are going nowhere.

"Nothing much is moving," said Ali Hamdan, an adviser to Nabih Berri, the speaker of Parliament and leader of Amal, a Shiite party in the opposition. "It is as if we are moving backwards."

Most agree that if there has been any major movement in resolving — or defusing — Lebanon's political crisis, it has more to do with the changing political dynamics elsewhere. "Saudi Arabia and Iran are near an agreement," said Toufic Sultan, a former leader in the main government-aligned Druse party who has maintained close ties to Saudi officials.

Already reeling from the chaos and sectarian strife in Iraq, governments around the region are worried that Lebanon, too, is on the brink of breaking apart along sectarian lines.

Embassy Row (WT)

By James Morrison

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

New Saudi envoy

Adel al-Jubeir, the urbane public face of the Saudi monarchy who is also well-connected in Washington, was yesterday named the new ambassador to the United States from the oil-rich desert kingdom.

King Abdullah issued a decree appointing Mr. al-Jubeir and accepting the surprise resignation of Prince Turki al-Faisal, who stepped down last month after about a year as ambassador here.

Mr. al-Jubeir, 44, is not a member of the Saudi royal family, but he has powerful relations with the monarchy, having served as King Abdullah's foreign policy adviser since 2000 when the king was crown prince and as a spokesman for Prince Bandar bin

DOJ_NMG_0124285

Sultan, who served 22 years as ambassador to the United States. Mr. al-Jubeir's brother, Nail, now holds the post of the embassy's chief spokesman.

The new ambassador was educated in the United States, earning a bachelor's degree from the University of North Texas and a master's degree in political science from Georgetown University.

Mr. al-Jubeir first appeared as a spokesman for the Saudi government during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, which forced Saddam Hussein to retreat from Kuwait, and in 2002 endured intense press scrutiny as he defended Saudi Arabia after the September 11 attacks in the United States. Fifteen of the 19 suicide hijackers were Saudi subjects.

While at the embassy, Mr. al-Jubeir was featured in gossip columns for dating NBC News anchor Campbell Brown.

Mr. al-Jubeir, who is expected to take up his position next month, displayed his skills as a communicator and a diplomat at a press conference in April 2005, after King Abdullah, then crown prince, met with President Bush at his ranch in Crawford, Texas.

"Our two countries ... have seen the coming and breaking of many storms," Mr. al-Jubeir told reporters. "The relationship has been steadfast, and it's grown with every decade, irrespective of who the president of the United States is."

He assured the press of Saudi Arabia's commitment to the war on terrorism and cited the kingdom as a reliable source of oil for the United States.

"Our countries are facing many challenges, whether it is the war on terrorism where we face the common enemy of al Qaeda; whether it is trying to broaden and deepen economic ties," he said.

Tough talking

John R. Bolton, the straight-talking former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, dropped diplomatic niceties in an interview with a French newspaper, calling for the replacement of the Iranian government, criticizing some U.S. moves in Iraq and fretting about the U.S. troop surge.

He told Le Monde, in the interview published yesterday, that the U.N. Security Council passed a toothless resolution that gave Iran until Feb. 23 to respond to demands that it cease its nuclear weapons program. Mr. Bolton blamed Russia for gutting an earlier draft of the resolution to the point where it "does not have great effectiveness."

"The negotiations have failed," he said, adding that the only way to deal with the Iranian regime is to "isolate them on the international level."

"In the long run -- and I hope not the very long run -- the only true solution is regime change," Mr. Bolton said.

He criticized the Bush administration's early administrative control over Iraq through the Coalition Provisional Authority, which, he said, deprived the Iraqis of "political responsibilities."

"It gave the terrorists and the remainders of [Saddam Hussein's] Ba'ath Party a chance to gather," he said.

Mr. Bolton supported Mr. Bush's troop surge but called it "the best of a series of bad options." He warned that a premature withdrawal of U.S. troops would be seen as a sign of weakness in the Middle East.

"It is necessary to avoid another version of the Vietnam syndrome, " he said.

Europe Resists US On Curbing Ties With Iran (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — European governments are resisting Bush administration demands that they curtail support for exports to Iran and that they block transactions and freeze assets of some Iranian companies, officials on both sides say. The resistance threatens to open a new rift between Europe and the United States over Iran.

Administration officials say a new American drive to reduce exports to Iran and cut off its financial transactions is intended to further isolate Iran commercially amid the first signs that global pressure has hurt Iran's oil production and its economy. There are also reports of rising political dissent in Iran.

In December, Iran's refusal to give up its nuclear program led the United Nations Security Council to impose economic sanctions. Iran's rebuff is based on its contention that its nuclear program is civilian in nature, while the United States and other countries believe Iran plans to make weapons.

At issue now is how the resolution is to be carried out, with Europeans resisting American appeals for quick action, citing technical and political problems related to the heavy European economic ties to Iran and its oil industry.

"We are telling the Europeans that they need to go way beyond what they've done to maximize pressure on Iran," said a senior administration official. "The European response on the economic side has been pretty weak." The American demands and European responses were provided by 10 different officials, including both supporters and critics of the American approach.

DOJ_NMG_0124286

One irony of the latest pressure, European and American officials say, is that on their own, many European banks have begun to cut back their transactions with Iran, partly because of a Treasury Department ban on using dollars in deals involving two leading Iranian banks.

American pressure on European governments, as opposed to banks, has been less successful, administration and European officials say.

The main targets are Italy, Germany, France, Spain, Austria, the Netherlands, Sweden and Britain, all with extensive business dealings with Iran, particularly in energy. Administration officials say, however, that Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany, the current head of the European Union, has been responsive.

Europe has more commercial and economic ties with Iran than does the United States, which severed relations with Iran after the revolution and seizure of hostages in 1979.

The administration says that European governments provided $18 billion in government loan guarantees for Iran in 2005. The numbers have gone down in the last year, but not by much, American and European officials say.

American officials say that European governments may have facilitated illicit business and that European governments must do more to stop such transactions. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has said the United States has shared with Europeans the names of at least 30 front companies involved in terrorism or weapons programs.

"They've told us they don't have the tools," said a senior American official. "Our answer is: get them."

"We want to squeeze the Iranians," said a European official. "But there are varying degrees of political will in Europe about turning the thumbscrews. It's not straightforward for the European Union to do what the United States wants."

Another European official said: "We are going to be very cautious about what the Treasury Department wants us to do. We can see that banks are slowing their business with Iran. But because there are huge European business interests involved, we have to be very careful."

European officials argue that beyond the political and business interests in Europe are legal problems, because European governments lack the tools used by the Treasury Department under various American statutes to freeze assets or block transactions based on secret intelligence information.

A week ago, on Jan. 22, European foreign ministers met in Brussels and adopted a measure that might lead to laws similar to the economic sanctions, laws and presidential directives used in the United States, various officials say. But it is not clear how far those laws will reach once they are adopted.

The American effort to press Iran economically is of a piece with its other forms of pressure on Iran, including the arrest of Iranian operatives in Iraq and sending American naval vessels to the Persian Gulf.

American officials refuse to rule out military action. On Monday, President Bush said in an interview with National Public Radio that the United States would "respond firmly" if Iran engages in violence in Iraq, but that he did not mean "that we're going to invade Iran."

Several European officials said in interviews that they believe that the United States and Saudi Arabia have an unwritten deal to keep oil production up, and prices down, to further squeeze Iran, which is dependent on oil for its economic solvency. No official has confirmed that such a deal exists.

The Bush administration has called on Europe to do more economically as part of a two-year-old trans-Atlantic agreement in which the United States agreed to support European efforts to negotiate a resolution of the crisis over Iran's nuclear program.

Typically, American officials say, European companies that do business with Iran get loans from European banks and then get European government guarantees for the loans on the ground that such transactions are risky in nature.

According to a document used in the discussions between Europe and the United States, which cites the International Union of Credit and Investment Insurers, the largest providers of such credits in Europe in 2005 were Italy, at $6.2 billion; Germany, at $5.4 billion; France, at $1.4 billion; and Spain and Austria, at $1 billion each.

In addition to buying oil from Iran, European countries export machinery, industrial equipment and commodities, which they say have no military application. Europeans also say that courts have overturned past efforts to stop business dealings based on secret information.

At least five Iranian banks have branches in Europe that have engaged in transactions with European banks, American and European officials say.

The five include Bank Saderat, cited last year by the United States as being involved in financing terrorism by Hezbollah and others, and Bank Sepah, cited this month as involved in ballistic missile programs.

A directory of the American Bankers Association lists Bank Sepah as having $10 billion in assets and equity of $1 billion in 2004. It has branches in Frankfurt, Paris, London and Rome. The United States Embassy in Rome has called it the preferred bank of Iran's ballistic missile program, with a record of transactions involving Italian and other banks.

DOJ_NMG_0124287

Bank Saderat had assets of $18 billion and equity of $1 billion in 2004, according to the American Bankers directory. Three other Iranian banks — Bank Mellat, Bank Melli and Bank Tejarat — have not been cited as involved in any illicit activities, but many European officials say they expect the Treasury Department to move against them eventually.

European officials say that the European Commission will meet in mid-February and approve a measure paving the way for freezing assets and blocking bank transactions for the 10 Iranian companies and 12 individuals cited in an appendix of Security Council Resolution 1737, adopted in December.

Shell Iran Plan Will Come Under US Scrutiny (FT)

By Ed Crooks

Financial Times, January 30, 2007

The US authorities will "take a look at" a controversial agreement signed over the weekend by Royal Dutch Shell that could ultimately lead to a multi-billion dollar investment in Iran, a US State Department official said.

Shell and its partner Repsol of Spain have signed a service agreement, as reported in the Financial Times last week, with the Iranian government to continue work on developing blocks 13 and 14 of the giant South Pars gas field, in spite of mounting international pressure over the country's nuclear programme.

US legislation permits President George W. Bush to take action against non-US companies investing in Iran's energy sector. However, because of concerns over an extra-territorial trade dispute and the risk of further alienating allies, no foreign companies have been penalised to date under the Iran Libya Sanctions Act and the subsequent Iran Freedom Support Act.

The US, however, is tightening sanctions on Iranian institutions, and encouraging European governments to do the same.

Sean McCormack, a state department spokesman, said on Monday that US government lawyers and policymakers would take a look at the Shell deal, to see whether to take any action. "If there's an investment greater than a certain amount, as specified in US law, then our lawyers take a look at it and the policymakers take a look at it, and see if there's any further steps that we, as a government, take," he said.

Mr McCormack refused to speculate on what sanctions Repsol and Shell would face if they go through with the South Pars investment.

If the project goes ahead, it would involve a plant to produce liquefied natural gas to be sold in Europe and Asia. A final decision on whether to proceed is expected in the first quarter of next year.

The agreement does not put a figure on the value of the project. Shell and its partners are still working on cost estimates. But it was suggested in Iran at the weekend that it could be worth $10bn (£5bn).

Shell and Repsol would each have 25 per cent of the project, with the National Iranian Oil Company holding 50 per cent.

Iran holds the world's second largest gas reserves, after Russia. Phases 13 and 14 of South Pars are estimated to hold 27,700bn cu ft – enough to meet the world's demand for more than three months.

Shell on Monday also announced the sale of one of its US refineries and 250 petrol stations for $1.63bn, bringing to almost $10bn the amount it has raised from selling downstream assets in the past four years.

It has sold the refinery, south of Los Angeles, and petrol stations in the area to Tesoro, a Texas-based company that becomes the second-biggest refiner on the US west coast as a result of the deal.

Senator Targets Surplus Sales To Iran (AP)

By Sharon Theimer

AP, January 30, 2007

A Democratic senator wants to cut off all Pentagon sales of surplus F-14 parts, saying the military's marketing of the spares "defies common sense" in light of their importance to Iran.

Sen. Ron Wyden's bill came in response to an investigation by The Associated Press that found weaknesses in surplus-sale security that allowed buyers for countries including Iran and China to surreptitiously obtain sensitive U.S. military equipment including Tomcat parts.

The Oregon Democrat's legislation would ban the Defense Department from selling surplus F-14 parts and prohibit buyers who have already acquired surplus Tomcat parts from exporting them. Wyden's bill, the Stop Arming Iran Act, is co-sponsored by the Senate's No. 2 lawmaker, Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois.

The surplus sales are one of the first national security issues to be addressed by the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

"It just defies common sense to be making this kind of equipment available to the Iranians with all that they have done that is against our interests," Wyden said Monday in an interview, adding that constituents brought up the surplus-sale security problems at his town-hall meetings over the past few days. "I just want to legislate this and cut it off permanently, once and for all."

DOJ_NMG_0124288

The Tomcat is the fighter jet made famous in the 1986 Tom Cruise blockbuster movie, "Top Gun." The U.S. military retired its F-14s last fall. That leaves only Iran — which bought the fighter jet in the 1970s when it was a U.S. ally — flying the planes.

U.S. law enforcement officials believe Iran can produce only about 15 percent of the parts it needs for its Tomcats, making the Pentagon's surplus sales a valuable avenue for spares.

The Pentagon already plans to sell about 60 percent of the roughly 76,000 parts for the F-14, viewing them as general nuts-and-bolts-type aircraft hardware that can be sold safely to the public without restrictions.

Some of those spares from the newly retired fleet likely have already been sold, Jack Hooper, a Defense Logistics Agency spokesman, said Monday. The Defense Department plans to destroy about 10,000 other components it considers unique to the F-14.

The agency is reviewing 23,000 other parts it believes it can sell under existing law. But it said it will consider their potential value to Iran.

Those parts, of both military and commercial value, are of particular concern to Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials and the investigative arm of Congress, the Government Accountability Office. The GAO has conducted its own inquiry into surplus security and found loopholes. It wants assurances the parts won't be sold.

Wyden said his bill would cut off the sale of all surplus F-14 parts. The legislation includes all parts to cut off all opportunities for Iranian "fishing expeditions," spokeswoman Jennifer Hoelzer said, adding that GAO investigations have found valuable surplus accidentally getting included in boxes of what are supposed to be nuts-and-bolts-type hardware.

Wyden is confident he can get the bill through the Senate in the next few months. Wyden, a senior member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, also pledged greater Senate oversight of the surplus program.

Hooper declined to comment on the legislation.

"We're certainly not going to attempt to interfere whatsoever in the legislative process," Hooper said. The Defense Department maintains it has followed all procedures in selling its surplus.

The AP reported the Pentagon's F-14 part sales plans earlier this month. Its investigation found that in several cases, buyers for countries that included Iran and China took advantage of security flaws to buy sensitive surplus, including aircraft parts and missile components.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., has asked the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to investigate the surplus security weaknesses.

Iranian President's Setbacks Embolden His Domestic Critics (WSJ)

By Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

TEHRAN, Iran -- With another confrontational moment in Iran's nuclear standoff approaching next month, criticism of the country's president at home is increasing.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whose landslide victory in elections 18 months ago set the Iranian establishment reeling, suddenly faces a concerted effort by political foes to constrain both his populist economic policies and his public defiance of the West.

Many of Tehran's elite politicians and even clerics have long harbored concerns about Mr. Ahmadinejad, who ascended to the country's top political post from outside the traditional ruling circles. But the immense popularity he generated among Iran's poor and working-class voters kept many of his critics from speaking out or openly moving against his policies.

He also appeared to have the backing of the most important figure in Iran's power structure, Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. But a round of elections late last year -- for local municipal and village leaders as well as an important national consultative body -- has undermined Mr. Ahmadinejad's political momentum and unleashed a flood of public criticism and moves to clip his wings. Candidates whom Mr. Ahmadinejad supported fared poorly in the elections, while key adversaries re-established themselves as fixtures of the political scene.

In Tehran's city council, from which Mr. Ahmadinejad launched his campaign for president two years ago, his supporters went from a majority to a handful of seats. Meanwhile, Hashemi Rafsanjani, whom Mr. Ahmadinejad defeated in the presidential election two years ago, dominated the voting for seats on the Assembly of Experts, the body charged with choosing a new Supreme Leader when the 67-year-old Mr. Khamenei steps down or dies.

Since those public votes, a drumbeat of criticism against Mr. Ahmadinejad's administration has emerged from within Iran's Parliament and among some senior regime officials. The president even found himself confronted by a crowd of jeering students during an appearance at a Tehran university campus, with a video of the incident distributed on the Internet3.

"The elections opened a space and legitimized criticism of him," said Nasser Hadian, a political-science professor at the University of Tehran. "There are going to be more attempts to contain him."

DOJ_NMG_0124289

The poor showing by candidates associated with Mr. Ahmadinejad in local elections -- and the relatively better performance of reform candidates opposed to him -- resulted from the sort of strong turnout that generally favors reformers. The country's conservatives also failed to rally behind a single slate of candidates, as they did during the earlier presidential election. But high on many voters' minds is Iran's increasingly muddled economy.

The president won the election with vows to improve the living standards of Iranians. He has pursued a populist agenda, while traversing the nation to announce development initiatives. Rising spending, however, has sparked a bout of inflation, which officially is 15% but private economists say likely is far higher. After a speech introducing his annual budget -- which will push spending another 20% higher for the fiscal year beginning in March -- Mr. Ahmadinejad argued with several parliamentarians over the rising price of tomatoes.

While Mr. Ahmadinejad's appeal persists among his core supporters, they are among the hardest-hit by rising inflation, and some privately express doubts about his leadership.

"He looked like a decent person, one of us," says one 57-year-old man who works part time washing dishes in a restaurant in southern Tehran. "I voted for him, but I wouldn't again."

Meanwhile, Mr. Rafsanjani, a longtime regime power broker and president of the country during much of the early 1990s, is spearheading a tentative movement to rein in Mr. Ahmadinejad, particularly his proclamations about Iran's nuclear program and denunciations of Israel. A large group of parliamentarians, including many who once supported Mr. Ahmadinejad, recently met with Mr. Rafsanjani. The gathering was seen as an important indication that support for Mr. Ahmadinejad is eroding.

A key question is whether Mr. Khamenei will continue backing Mr. Ahmadinejad. While the Supreme Leader has vocally defended the president and largely embraced his confrontational approach toward the United Nations Security Council on the nuclear issue in, Mr. Khamenei has done little to stem criticism of Mr. Ahmadinejad. He also has held several meetings with Mr. Rafsanjani.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's standing with Mr. Khamenei, and the broader attempts to rein him in, could be important in the run-up to a Feb. 20 deadline for the Security Council resolution passed in December ordering Iran to stop its uranium-enrichment program. The U.S. and European countries say the program has violated international rules and is aimed at creating a nuclear weapon. Iran says the program is peaceful and hasn't violated international rules.

The resolution included a limited set of sanctions targeting officials and organizations accused of involvement in the nuclear program. European governments have joined with the U.S. to broaden and toughen those punishments. The U.S. is expected to push for harsher sanctions if Iran doesn't stop its enrichment program.

Mr. Khamenei reiterated publicly recently that Iran wouldn't halt enrichment, but Mr. Ahmadinejad has been relatively quiet on the issue in public. Some European diplomats and Iranian analysts say Iran might agree to a temporary pause in the program after the country completes a research-level enrichment project in coming weeks, in an effort to keep the crisis from escalating further.

Missteps By Iraqi Forces In Battle Raise Questions (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 29 —Iraqi forces were surprised and nearly overwhelmed by the ferocity of an obscure renegade militia in a weekend battle near the holy city of Najaf and needed far more help from American forces than previously disclosed, American and Iraqi officials said Monday.

They said American ground troops — and not just air support as reported Sunday — were mobilized to help the Iraqi soldiers, who appeared to have dangerously underestimated the strength of the militia, which calls itself the Soldiers of Heaven and had amassed hundreds of heavily armed fighters.

Iraqi government officials said the group apparently was preparing to storm Najaf, a holy city dear to Shiite Islam, occupy the sacred Imam Ali mosque and assassinate the religious hierarchy there, including the revered leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, during a Shiite holiday when many pilgrims visit.

“This group had more capabilities than the government,” said Abdul Hussein Abtan, the deputy governor of Najaf Province, at a news conference.

Only a month ago, in an elaborate handover ceremony, the American command transferred security authority over Najaf to the Iraqis. The Americans said at the time that they would remain available to assist the Iraqis in the event of a crisis.

The Iraqis and Americans eventually prevailed in the battle. But the Iraqi security forces’ miscalculations about the group’s strength and intentions raised troubling questions about their ability to recognize and deal with a threat.

The battle also brought into focus the reality that some of the power struggles in Iraq are among Shiites, not just between Shiites and Sunnis. The Soldiers of Heaven is considered to be at least partly or wholly run by Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0124290

Among the troubling questions raised is how hundreds of armed men were able to set up such an elaborate encampment, which Iraqi officials said included tunnels, trenches and a series of blockades, only 10 miles northeast of Najaf. After the fight was over, Iraqi officials said they discovered at least two antiaircraft weapons as well as 40 heavy machine guns.

The government knew that the Soldiers of Heaven had set up camp in the area, but officials said they thought they were there to worship together.

Mr. Abtan said the Iraqi forces later decided to move on the group because an informer said Sunday was "zero hour" and the government noticed more men streaming into the area.

"If this operation had succeeded, it would have been a chance of a lifetime for them," he said.

The Iraqis initially sent a battalion from their Eighth Army Division, along with police forces, but they were quickly overwhelmed, according to an Iraqi commander at the scene. The battalion began to retreat but was soon surrounded and pinned down, and had to call in American air support to keep the enemy from overrunning its position.

American Apache attack helicopters and F-16s, as well as British fighter jets, flew low over the farms where the enemy had set up its encampments and attacked, dropping 500-pound bombs on the encampments. The Iraqi forces were still unable to advance, and they called in support from both an elite Iraqi unit known as the Scorpion Brigade, which is based to the north in Hilla, and from American ground troops.

Around noon, elements of the American Fourth Brigade Combat Team, 25th Infantry Division were dispatched from near Baghdad.

After an American helicopter was shot down at 1:30 p.m., some of those soldiers helped secure the crash site and recover the bodies of the two American soldiers killed in the crash, according to a statement by the American military. Others joined in the effort to combat the renegade militia, the statement said.

A commander in the Scorpion Brigade said the combined American and Iraqi forces killed 470 people. He also said some of the dead Soldiers of Heaven fighters were found bound together at the ankles and suggested that the chains had probably been used to keep people from fleeing and to keep them moving as one unified group.

Government estimates of the number of fighters killed ranged from 120 to 400.

An Iraqi military official said at least 25 security force members were killed in the battle.

Iraqi officials said Monday that they had killed the leader of the militia in the weekend fighting, identifying him as a man who went by the name Ahmed Hassan al-Yamani, but whose real name was Diyah Abdul Zahraa Khadom.

However, a Shiite cleric who has had contact with the group said the real leader was Ahmad bin al-Hassan al-Basri. The cleric said he believed that Mr. Basri was alive and probably hiding near Karbala.

Mr. Basri, while unknown to the average Iraqi, is relatively well known among the clerical hierarchy in Najaf, according to several clerics interviewed for this article.

The clerics who were interviewed said that Mr. Basri was a student of Moktada al-Sadr's father, a revered cleric, and that Mr. Basri and the senior Mr. Sadr had a split in the early 1990s.

The governor of Najaf, Asad Abu Ghalal, in an interview on national television, said government intelligence officials told him that the Soldiers of Heaven have had ties with the government of Saddam Hussein as far back as 1993. He also said that the farmland where the militia had set up camp had been bought by a former Hussein loyalist, although he said that did not initially raise concerns about the group's intentions.

Government officials were quick to point the finger at Al Qaeda, alleging that it provided financing for the group. But numerous Shiite clerics, seeking anonymity for fear of contradicting the government, said it was highly unlikely that Al Qaeda, a Sunni group, would link up with a Shiite messianic group.

Officials in the Shiite-dominated government are loath to detail internal rivalries in their community, but in the past three years there have been several clashes between rival factions, and the deaths of two senior Shiite ayatollahs have been linked to internal struggles for dominance.

The often bloody internal rivalries have been overshadowed by the more overt Sunni-Shiite war being fought daily in Baghdad and in other mixed cities.

Iraq: Shiite Cult Behind Najaf Battle (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 30, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraq's military announced Monday that it killed the leader of a heavily armed cult of messianic Shiites called "Soldiers of Heaven" during a 24-hour gunbattle near Najaf.

The group planned to ambush Shiite clerics and worshipers at a religious festival in Najaf, about 100 miles south of Baghdad, said Maj. Gen. Othman al-Ghanemi, the Iraqi commander in charge of the region. Provincial councilmember Ahmed al-Fatlawi said the gunmen were allied with Sunni extremists and Saddam Hussein loyalists.

DOJ_NMG_0124291

The U.S. military said Iraqi forces acted on a tip Sunday that gunmen were joining pilgrims headed to the Ashoura festival. It said U.S. air power was called in after the Iraqis faced fierce resistance. U.S. ground forces went in after a U.S. helicopter went down, killing two soldiers.

U.S. and British jets played a major role in the fighting, dropping 500-pound bombs on militant positions, but President Bush said the battle was an indication that Iraqi forces were starting to take control.

"My first reaction on this report … is that the Iraqis are beginning to show me something," Bush told National Public Radio on Monday.

The president also said the United States "will respond firmly" if Iran escalates military action in Iraq and endangers U.S. forces. On Sunday, Iran's ambassador to Iraq told The New York Times that Iran plans to expand its economic and military ties with Iraq.

Leader Of Shiite Religious Cult Killed By U.S., Iraqi Forces (LAT)

By Louise Roug And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 30, 2007

BAGHDAD — American and Iraqi forces killed the leader of a Shiite religious cult, known as the Heaven's Army, along with several hundred armed members who had planned to launch an attack in the holy city of Najaf, including against the country's most known religious leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraqi officials said today.

The gunmen planned to attack during ceremonies marking one of the holiest Shiite holidays, in the Islamic month of Muharram.

At least 600 cult members, hiding on the city's outskirts in palm date orchids, had been digging trenches and were planning to disguise themselves as pilgrims, Maj. Gen. Othman Ghanemi, the Iraqi commander who heads the Najaf region, told the Associated Press.

He said the gunmen planned to kill as many senior clerics as they could, including Sistani, apparently because they believed the violence would cause the Imam Mahdi, the last in the line of Shiite saints who disappeared more than 1,000 years ago, to reappear.

Iraqi authorities identified the leader of the fringe group as Dyaa Abdul Zahra, also known as Thamir Abu Gumar, who was said to be armed with two pistols when he was killed. At least 60 cult members were wounded and 120 were captured. The death toll ranged from 150 to 400, officials said.

In addition, about 500 automatics rifles were recovered during the raid, along with mortars, heavy machine guns and rockets, Ghanemi told the A.P.

The militant group's members included Shiite and Sunni extremists and foreign fighters, Najaf government officials said. They pitched a daylong battle against Iraqi and American troops, in which a U.S. helicopter crashed, killing two U.S. troops. In a separate attack, five teenage girls also were killed in a mortar attack at a Baghdad school, authorities said.

The cause of the helicopter crash near Najaf was unclear, but U.S. and Iraqi officials said there was ground fire before the craft went down, and witnesses said they saw it shot out of the sky. It was the third U.S. helicopter to go down in Iraq in eight days.

Three additional U.S. troops were reported killed Sunday.

Sunday's fighting near Najaf and elsewhere was extraordinary, even by Iraq's bloody standards, highlighting the challenge faced by U.S. and Iraqi forces, which are fighting a complex patchwork of elusive enemies, including Shiite militias and Sunni-led insurgents. The deaths outside Najaf would constitute the highest daily casualty toll inflicted by U.S. and Iraqi forces since U.S. troops arrived in Baghdad shortly after the March 2003 invasion.

Iraqi security forces took authority over Najaf's security about a month ago. Witnesses and security officials said Sunday that Iraqi forces were being defeated by the enigmatic, well-organized fighters until U.S. air support and U.S.-Iraqi ground troops arrived.

Shaky footage recorded by mobile telephone, broadcast on Iraqi television, showed Iraqi soldiers hunkered behind a berm as intense gunfire erupted and smoke rose in the distance.

Ali Nomas, an Iraqi security official in Najaf, said the leader of the hitherto unknown Heaven's Army had told followers that he was a missing son of the Imam Ali, the cousin and son-in-law of the prophet Muhammad. Ali's remains are entombed in Najaf.

"They believe that the Mahdi has called them to fight in Najaf," Nomas said, adding that fighters had converged on the Najaf area from other predominantly Shiite cities in Iraq.

He lamented that Iraq's death and destruction had convinced some Shiites that the end of days was coming.

"There's nothing bizarre left in Iraq anymore," Nomas said in a telephone interview. "We've seen the most incredible things."

DOJ_NMG_0124292

Najaf Gov. Asad Abu Gulal said some of the fighters were members of Hussein's Baath Party.

Although they disagreed on the attackers' identity, Iraqi officials and witnesses offered similar accounts of events on the battlefield. Most of the fighting took place in farmland outside the city, which is home to Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, Sistani. Security forces cordoned off the ancient, labyrinthine city to prevent attacks on pilgrims, clergy and holy sites, the governor said.

The gunmen apparently planned to launch their attack today, but Iraqi security forces were tipped off Sunday night about their presence on nearby farms, Gulal said.

Iraqi security forces struck at dawn but were overwhelmed by the militants, who had dug trenches on farms. At least two Iraqi soldiers were killed in the initial fighting, a security official in Baghdad said.

Iraqi forces then called in U.S. air support as well as the Scorpion Brigades, an Iraqi quick-reaction force based in a neighboring province.

Helicopters arrived, but after one was downed about 1:30 p.m., they were replaced by higher-flying jets, as American Humvees and armored vehicles rolled into the area.

Three more Iraqi soldiers were killed, as were at least 250 of the militants, according to several Iraqi officials. Those numbers could not be independently confirmed. By 4 p.m., the tide of the battle had shifted, but U.S. forces continued bombing into the night in an attempt to stamp out remnants of the militants, Iraqi officials and witnesses said.

Two U.S. soldiers and a Marine were killed in three separate attacks around Iraq on Saturday, the U.S. military said Sunday. The deaths brought the number of U.S. military personnel killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion to 3,080, according to icasualties.org.

Violence began early Sunday and continued throughout the day, including in the northern city of Kirkuk, where bombings killed 14 people, and Babil province, south of the capital, where mortar rounds killed 10 and five bodies were found in the Tigris River. A suspected Baath Party loyalist was assassinated in the southern city of Kut, and in the western city of Fallouja, a car bomb killed two and injured four.

Assailants in Baghdad targeted both Sunnis and Shiites. In a Sunni neighborhood in west Baghdad, mortar rounds hit a girls' secondary school, killing five students and wounding 21 others. In another western neighborhood, explosives hidden in a wooden cart killed four and injured 18, and an Industry Ministry advisor and his daughter were shot to death in a nearby area.

In a Shiite neighborhood on the east side of the Tigris, a bomb exploded on a bus, killing one and injuring five. Two other bombings killed seven and injured 35 people in Shiite neighborhoods.

Gunmen elsewhere in the capital killed a bank clerk in a car lot near her house. At least 54 bodies were found in various Baghdad neighborhoods, including a woman kidnapped two days ago, her family said.

Meanwhile, Iraqi officials in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad sacked 1,500 policemen, charging them with absenteeism and fleeing fighting. They also dismissed Baqubah Mayor Khalid Sanjary on suspicion of having ties to Sunni Arab rebels. The province is riddled with Al Qaeda in Iraq members as well as militiamen affiliated with Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Iraqis Describe Plot To Kill Shiite Clerics (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 29 -- A Shiite cult leader, who claimed to be a revered Muslim figure who vanished in the 10th century, was killed Sunday along with scores of fighters who were poised to attack a holy city in southern Iraq and assassinate the country's Shiite religious leadership, Iraqi officials said Monday.

Information about the scope of the fighters' encampment and their aspirations emerged as Iraqi and U.S. troops inspected the rural battleground and hauled out those captured and killed during the day-long siege that began Sunday.

The discovery of a heavily armed Shiite-led cult, intent on attacking venerated Shiite symbols and leaders, startled Iraqi security officials who were already contending with rival religious factions battling for supremacy in the country.

"This is a new step in the annals of terrorism," Iraq's minister of national security, Shirwan al-Wahli, said in an interview. Wahli said the fighters were led by a man known as the Judge of Heaven, who claimed to be a direct descendant of the prophet Muhammad's son-in-law, Ali. Wahli said the man also declared himself the Mahdi, the reappearance of the 12th imam, or leader of the faithful, who many Shiites believe vanished in the 10th century and whose return will mark an era of redemption and peace.

The cult leader killed Sunday probably sought to assassinate conservative Shiite religious leaders because they likely would have disputed his claim to be the Mahdi, said John O. Voll, a professor of Islamic studies at Georgetown University, in a telephone interview.

The most recent comparable event occurred in 1979 in Saudi Arabia, Voll said, when a man claiming to be the Mahdi took over the holy sanctuary in Mecca. He and his followers were killed.

DOJ_NMG_0124293

Wahli said the cult leader came from southern Iraq and had written a book laying out his "supernatural, unbelievable" ideas. Over a matter of months, he recruited the estimated 700 people, known as the Soldiers of Heaven, who lived in tents and huts on farmland near Zarqaa, about eight miles northeast of Najaf, Wahli said.

Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said the man's name was Samer Abu Kamar, but other Iraqi officials assigned him different names.

Iraqi officials said Monday that they had not finished removing explosives or counting casualties from the siege, and their estimates of the number of fighters killed ranged from 200 to more than 400. The U.S. military, which provided backup ground troops along with helicopter and fixed-wing aircraft support, said more than 100 fighters were captured. Two U.S. soldiers died when their helicopter crashed during the operation.

Wahli said the structure of the group was Shiite, but it involved Sunni fighters and "based on the level of training, support and financing, it obviously has received support from outside Iraq."

About 10 Iraqi soldiers and police officers also died in the battle, [a] news service cited Wahli as saying.

A Washington Post special correspondent who approached the farm where the fighters had hidden witnessed 10 ambulances travel into the encampment and saw Iraqi soldiers drive out corpses and lead away women and children among the captured.

Ayad Abu Gilel, the brother of the governor of Najaf, showed the correspondent a 53-minute videotape recorded inside the compound.

The footage showed a wide trench ringing the encampment and a series of tunnels or bunkers dug into earthen mounds to offer protection. The video showed at least eight vehicles mounted with antiaircraft machine guns. Dozens of dead bodies, some burned, could be seen lying amid mortars, AK-47 assault rifles, rocket-propelled grenades and other weaponry.

Iraqi and U.S. military officials characterized the attack as a positive signal that the Iraqi security forces were able to lead a major battle and were willing to target extremists from the same Muslim sect that runs the central government. The U.S. military handed over primary control of Najaf province to Iraqi security forces last month.

"This is a very clear message from the government that no one except the government carrying arms is acceptable, whether Shia or Sunni," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "It reveals the firm commitment of the prime minister that any outlaw will be dealt with very strongly."

According to a statement issued by the U.S. military, Iraqi army and police forces deployed to the area of the encampment following a tip that gunmen were moving toward Najaf among Shiite pilgrims traveling to observe the religious holiday of Ashura, which culminates Tuesday. More than 200 gunmen attacked the joint patrol using small arms, rocket-propelled grenades and hand grenades, the military said. U.S. ground troops and aircraft were called in for support.

"The aggressive manner in which the Iraqi soldiers performed north of [Najaf] going after the anti-Iraqi forces was impressive," said Col. Michael Garrett, commander of the 4th Brigade Combat Team (Airborne), 25th Infantry Division, in the statement.

During a news conference in Najaf, the deputy provincial governor, Abdul Hussein Abtan, said the fighters were able to amass the vehicles and weaponry under the pretext that they were moving building materials destined for the Najaf airport, which is under construction. He said the group surged in numbers over the past 10 days in preparation for attacks on pilgrims, shrines in Najaf and clerics on the last day of Ashura. Among the fighters captured or killed were two Egyptians, a Lebanese and a Sudanese, he said.

"There were extensive preparations, they were highly trained, and they fought in an orderly way," said Wahli. "Their leader kept insisting through a loudspeaker that they keep fighting, despite repeated attempts by the Iraqi security forces to get them to stop."

Elsewhere in Iraq, national police patrols found 47 bodies over the past day, including 43 from around Baghdad, said Maj. Gen. Sami Mahmoud of the Interior Ministry, who said all of the unidentified people were shot to death.

Also, an insurgent threw a hand grenade at an Iraqi police patrol in the Dora neighborhood of southern Baghdad, killing two policemen and wounding four others, Mahmoud said.

A car bomb exploded in the northern city of Kirkuk targeting a Kurdish militia commander, killing one person and injuring seven others, said Brig. Gen. Turhan Yousif, the Kirkuk police chief.

Iraqis Thwart Plot To Kill Shi'ite Clergy (WT/AP)

By Kim Gamel

The Washington Times, January 30, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's army announced yesterday that it had foiled a plot to kill leading Shi'ite clerics and killed the leader of a heavily armed band of messianic Shi'ites called "Soldiers of Heaven" during a fierce gunbattle near the southern city of Najaf.

DOJ_NMG_0124294

Senior Iraqi security officers said that as part of the plot, three gunmen were captured in Najaf after they rented a hotel room in front of the office of Iraq's most senior Shi'ite spiritual leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, with plans to attack it.

The fierce 24-hour battle, which began Sunday, was ultimately won by Iraqi troops supported by U.S. and British jets and American ground forces, but the ability of a splinter group little known in Iraq to rally hundreds of heavily armed fighters was a reminder of the potential for chaos and havoc emerging seemingly out of nowhere.

Members of the group, which included women and children, planned to disguise themselves as pilgrims and kill as many leading clerics as possible, said Maj. Gen. Othman al-Ghanemi, the Iraqi commander in charge of the Najaf region.

The U.S. military said Iraqi security forces were sent to the area Sunday after receiving a tip that gunmen were joining pilgrims headed to Najaf for Ashoura, a commemoration of the seventh-century death of Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad. The major religious festival culminates today.

The gunmen had put up tents in fields lined with date palm groves surrounding Najaf, 100 miles south of the capital. They planned to begin their attack yesterday, when Ashoura celebrations would get under way, the Iraqi security officers told the Associated Press on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to disclose the information.

In the battle to foil the attack on the pilgrims, Iraqi and U.S. forces faced off against more than 200 gunmen with small-arms fire, rocket-propelled grenades and hand grenades, the U.S. military said. The battle occurred about 12 miles northeast of Najaf.

The American military said U.S. air power was called in after the Iraqis faced fierce resistance. American ground forces also were deployed after small-arms fire downed a U.S. helicopter, killing two soldiers.

U.S. and British jets played a major role in the fighting, dropping 500-pound bombs on the militants' positions, but President Bush said the battle was an indication that Iraqis were beginning to take control.

"My first reaction on this report from the battlefield is that the Iraqis are beginning to show me something," Mr. Bush told NPR yesterday.

The U.S. military said more than 100 gunmen were captured, but it did not say how many were killed. Iraqi defense officials said 200 militants were killed, 60 wounded and at least 120 captured.

"It seems most likely that this was Shi'ite-on-Shi'ite violence, with millenarian cultists making an attempt to march on Najaf during the chaos of the ritual season of Muharram," Juan Cole, an Islamic scholar at the University of Michigan, said on his Web site. "The dangers of Shi'ite-on-Shi'ite violence in Iraq are substantial, as this episode demonstrated."

But Iraqi officials said Sunni extremists and Saddam Hussein loyalists also helped the cult in their bid to ambush Shi'ite worshippers.

"We have information from our intelligence sources that indicated the leader of this group had links with the former regime elements since 1993," said Ahmed al-Fatlawi, a member of the Najaf provincial council.

Mr. al-Fatlawi said that in addition to Iraqi Shi'ites, the gunmen included Sunnis and foreigners. Other Najaf government officials said Afghans, Saudis and even a Sudanese were among the dead.

Gen. al-Ghanemi said the area where the men were staying was once run by Saddam's Al-Quds army, a military organization the dictator established in the 1990s. The ousted leader was executed last month.

Abdul Hussein Abtan, deputy governor of Najaf, told Iraqi state television that the group had developed a military structure, acquiring heavy arms and digging trenches.

"What we want to know is where they bought all these weapons?" Gen. al-Ghanemi said, adding that the army seized about 500 automatic rifles in addition to mortars, heavy machine guns and Russian-made Katyusha rockets in what amounted to a major test for Iraq's new military as it works toward taking over responsibility for security from U.S.-led forces.

Gen. al-Ghanemi said the group is considered heretical by mainstream Shi'ite clerics and had been planning for months to attack Najaf during the Ashoura ceremonies.

Battle Suggests New Sectarian Divides In Iraq (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, January 30, 2007

CAIRO

What precisely happened near the Shiite shrine city of Najaf Sunday is still being sorted out, but it seems likely that at its root was an unusual new wrinkle in Iraqi violence: a Shiite plan to attack Shiites.

A battle that lasted for more than 12 hours in the nearby village of Zarqa ended with a US helicopter being shot down and a claim by local authorities that more than 200 militants were slain in the fighting. But who were the militants?

Though the majority Shiite province has a problem with assassinations and gangster-style extortion, Sunni Arab insurgents are rarely active there, and fighting on this scale had not been witnessed in the area for more than a year.

DOJ_NMG_0124295

The incident is a reminder of the swirling agendas now at play in Iraq and the turbulent political waters US troops are wading into as more soldiers arrive and President Bush has vowed to stand by Shiite Islamist Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Religious ideologies and classic power plays are now converging in Iraq, leading to what at times seem to be multiple, parallel conflicts: Sunni Arab insurgents who want to establish an Islamic state fight US Marines in Anbar Province; death squads associated with militant Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr stalk the streets of Baghdad, targeting both Sunni and Shiite political rivals; mostly Sunni Arab nationalists with ties to Saddam Hussein's Baath party seek to oust US forces from the country.

Following Sunday's deadly battle, Najaf Governor Asaad Abu Khalil originally implied that the fighters were foreign Arabs of the sort usually associated with Al Qaeda and that their intention was to disrupt the religious festival of Ashura with plans to attack both pilgrims and senior ayatollahs in southern Iraqi city of Najaf, the principal seat of Shiite religious learning in Iraq.

But his office has since backed off from those claims, and it now appears the gunmen – who killed or wounded dozens of Iraqi soldiers in the fighting as well as killing the two pilots of the downed US helicopter – were Shiites motivated by extreme religious ideology.

The central Iraqi government says the fighters are members of a millenarian Shiite group called the Jund al-Sama, or Army of Heaven, and that they were plotting to kill the senior ayatollahs in Najaf, chief among them Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, to prepare the way for the Mahdi, a messiah figure for many Shiites.

They believe the Mahdi ascended to heaven in the 9th century and will return to earth to usher in a final confrontation between good and evil that will end with a 1,000-year reign of peace, which will be followed by the end of the world.

According to Iraqi Army Maj. Gen. Othman al-Ghanami, quoted by the Associated Press, the group was heavily armed. He said 500 rifles were confiscated along with mortars, heavy calibre machine guns, and Katyusha rockets. That such a little known group should be so well armed is a sign of the myriad threats to the country's eventual pacification.

Ashura commemorates Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad and the most revered of Shiite saints, and is the occasion of public flagellation and high emotion.

Local authorities said the gunmen were planning the attack because they believed the Mahdi was due to return Sunday, and were seeking to remove potential rivals.

"In Shiite Islam there is this very strong millenarian trend, similar to Christian movements that think Christ is about to return," says Juan Cole, a professor of Middle East history at the University of Michigan. "So just like some millenarian evangelicals think that the pope is the antichrist, they would see the ayatollahs as ... usurpers of his rightful role."

While Professor Cole is skeptical of the view that such millenarian movements are always triggered by social or economic upheaval, he says, "I'm comfortable in saying that in this particular case this movement that's fighting outside of Najaf is certainly enabled by the chaos in Iraq for the past decade and a half."

Such movements have ebbed and flowed throughout Shiite history and Shiite religious politics have been marked by violent power grabs for centuries. Cole points to the Babi Movement in the 1840s and 1850s in Iran and Iraq as a good example. The movement attracted vast numbers of followers, mostly from the urban lower and lower-middle classes, who believed that the Mahdi was about to return and rid them of their unjust rulers. The group's followers targeted the Shiite religious hierarchy of the time, and sought to assassinate the Shah of Iran in 1852.

General Ghanami said the leader of the group was killed in the fighting, and identified him as Abu Qamar al-Yamani. The London-based Arabic daily Al Hayat reported that the Army of Heaven is loyal to Mahmoud al-Hassani al-Sarkhi, a cultish Shiite leader whose followers have clashed with both foreign troops and supporters of mainline Shiite leaders in Iraq numerous times since the US invasion.

His supporters have fought with those of other militant Shiite clerics, most notably those of Ayatollah Muhammad Yaqubi, whose men dominate the politics of the southern city of Najaf, and also sought to take control of the main shrine in Karbala last summer from supporters of Ayatollah Sistani, the most revered cleric in Iraq.

Baker Agrees Reluctantly To Testify On Iraq (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 30, 2007

James A. Baker III, the co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, has ended weeks of resistance and today will testify before Congress on the war, avoiding a split with his fellow co-chairman, former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.).

Sources familiar with the efforts to persuade Baker to testify said he did not want to appear to be lobbying against President Bush at the height of his push for 21,500 additional troops in Iraq.

Baker will answer senators' questions today during a hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which includes three Democratic presidential hopefuls and Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), the chamber's most forceful Republican critic of the war, who also is mulling a White House bid.

DOJ_NMG_0124296

Opponents of Bush's plan to send more troops are likely to ask Baker about the study group's conclusion that "[s]ustained increases in U.S. troop levels would not solve the fundamental cause of violence in Iraq, which is the absence of national reconciliation."

To support the president's proposal, Baker may note that the study group also agreed that it could support a short-term surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad or speed the training of Iraqi government forces. However, given the broader conclusion that more troops will not end the violence, Baker may have to admit that adding more troops will not be as effective as the Bush administration and its congressional allies argue.

Baker also may be asked about the study group's conclusions that the "situation in Baghdad and several provinces is dire," the "level of violence is high and growing," and "there is great suffering, and the daily lives of many Iraqis show little or no improvement."

Those assessments contradict the positive picture that Vice President Dick Cheney painted during a nationally televised interview last week.

"There's problems — ongoing problems — but we have in fact accomplished our objectives of getting rid of the old regime, and there is a new regime in place that's been here for less than a year, far too soon for you guys to write them off," Cheney told CNN's Wolf Blitzer. "Bottom line is that we've had enormous successes and we will continue to have enormous successes."

Baker has had a long history with Bush, his father and Cheney. Both Baker and Cheney worked for President Gerald Ford. Baker managed George H.W. Bush's 1980 presidential campaign, and later served as secretary of state during his administration, when Cheney held the post of secretary of defense.

More recently, Baker oversaw the vote recount effort in Florida that swung the 2000 presidential election to the Bush-Cheney ticket.

While the decision on whether to appear before Congress has been a delicate dance for Baker, it has also been a sensitive subject for congressional Democrats who do not want to scare off prominent Republicans from testifying at their hearings. A sign of the deference Democrats are willing to show, they are not expected to put Baker under oath tomorrow.

Baker originally declined to testify before the Democrat-controlled Senate Foreign Relations and House Foreign Affairs panels. Hamilton testified on his own before the House committee on Jan. 19 and was scheduled also to make a solo appearance around that time before the Senate.

Upon learning that Hamilton would go to the Senate alone, Baker changed his mind and agreed to testify as long as the hearing date was postponed until a week after Bush's State of the Union address, almost three weeks after the president unveiled his new plan for the war, according to sources knowledgeable of what led to today's scheduled appearance.

While Baker wavered on whether to appear before the Senate, he did not reveal any second thoughts about skipping a request to testify in the House, where lawmakers are younger and have a reputation for being less decorous than their Senate counterparts.

"Baker really didn't want to testify and felt like the report spoke for itself," a policy assistant to Baker, John Williams, said. "But Hamilton wanted to testify before Congress.

"In an effort to keep a bipartisan approach he [Baker] worked with Biden's office to find a time when he thought the two of them could meet," Williams added, referring to the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.).

Williams also said that Baker only wanted to make one appearance before Congress.

"The fact is that he wanted to do one," Williams said. "He didn't want to come back and forth and back and forth, and the Senate worked with his schedule."

If Baker had agreed to the Senate's first proposed hearing date of Jan. 18, however, he could have testified before both chambers on successive days, presumably requiring only one roundtrip flight from Houston.

Williams disputed that Baker's testimony necessarily would undercut Bush's proposed troop surge, noting that the study group said it could support a short-term surge.

"That's not inconsistent with what the president is doing right now," Williams said. He also argued that it did not make sense that Baker would seek to postpone his congressional appearance because Bush unveiled his plan for more troops eight days before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's original hearing date.

Williams said the Jan. 18 and 19 hearing dates simply did not fit into Baker's schedule, but he could not immediately say what Baker was doing on those days.

For now, at least, Democrats are accepting scheduling conflicts as reasons to appear before their committees.

"Originally Secretary Baker was not available on Jan. 18 (when Lee Hamilton was scheduled to testify), but his scheduled opened up on Jan. 30," Senate Foreign Relations Committee spokeswoman Elizabeth Alexander said. "To accommodate both Baker and Hamilton's schedules — so they could appear together — the SFRC postponed the hearing until Jan. 30."

DOJ_NMG_0124297

Beyond Baghdad (WP)

By Richard G. Lugar

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Since President Bush announced that he would send more American troops to Iraq, the debate on Iraq policy has reached new levels of stridency. Opponents of the war have rallied against what they see as an unjustified escalation, while the administration has dismissed opposition as defeatism. Vice President Cheney went so far as to say a withdrawal would show that Americans "don't have the stomach for the fight."

Military action in Iraq, however, defies orthodox notions of victory and defeat. We are not in Iraq to defend territory or even to destroy an enemy. Rather, we are pursuing the amorphous task of coaxing out of the Iraqi people and government political decisions that will result in a democratic, pluralistic society that is conducive to regional stability.

While the emergence of such a government and society is still worth pursuing, we must recognize that it is an optimal goal. It should not be the focal point of our Middle East policy or the sole measure of success in Iraq.

We need to recast the geo-strategic reference points of our Iraq policy. Some commentators have compared the Bush plan to a "Hail Mary" pass in football -- a desperate heave deep down the field by a losing team at the end of the game. Actually, a far better analogy for the Bush plan is a draw play on third down with 20 yards to go in the first quarter. The play does have a chance of working if everything goes perfectly, but it is more likely to gain a few yards and set up a punt on the next down, after which the game can be continued under more favorable circumstances.

The president's plan is an early episode in a much broader Middle East realignment that began with our invasion of Iraq and that may not end for years. Nations throughout the Middle East are scrambling to find their footing as regional power balances shift in unpredictable ways.

At the center of this realignment is Iran, which is perceived to have emerged from our Iraq intervention as the big winner. We paved the way for a Shiite government in Iraq that is much friendlier to Iran than was Saddam Hussein. Bolstered by high oil revenue, Iran has meddled in Iraq, rigidly pursued a nuclear capability, and funded Hezbollah and Hamas.

But the pendulum of Middle East politics may be swinging back against Iranian assertiveness. Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan, the Gulf states and others have become increasingly alarmed by Iran's behavior and by widening regional sectarian divisions. Because of this dynamic, U.S. bargaining power in the Middle East is growing. Moderate Arab states understand that the United States is an indispensable counterweight to Iran.

This opens up opportunities for solidifying our broader strategic objectives, and it offers a backup option in Iraq. Even as the president's Baghdad strategy goes forward, we need to plan for a potent redeployment of U.S. forces in the region to defend oil assets, target terrorist enclaves, deter adventurism by Iran and provide a buffer against regional sectarian conflict. In the best case, we could supplement bases in the Middle East with troops stationed outside urban areas in Iraq. Such a redeployment would allow us to continue training Iraqi troops and delivering economic assistance, but it would not require us to interpose ourselves between Iraqi sectarian factions.

The secretary of state's recent trip to the Middle East and the dispatch of an additional aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf showed that the administration understands the gravity of what is happening in the region. The United States should make clear to our Arab friends that they have a role in promoting reconciliation within Iraq, preventing oil price spikes, splitting Syria from Iran and demonstrating a more united front against terrorism.

The administration must avoid becoming so quixotic in its attempt to achieve the optimal outcome in Iraq that it fails to adjust to shifts in the region or political realities within Iraq. Although any administration would be reluctant to talk about a Plan B when its primary plan is still in motion, the president and Congress must reach a consensus on how to protect our broader strategic interests regardless of what happens in those Baghdad neighborhoods or on the floor of the Senate. Otherwise, the fatigue and frustration with our Iraq policy that is manifest in the resolutions of disapproval before the Senate could lead not just to the rejection of the Bush plan but also to the abandonment of the tools and relationships we need to defend our vital interests in the Middle East.

The writer, a Republican from Indiana, is the ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Fallon Says U.S. Miscalculated Iraq (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, January 30, 2007

WASHINGTON - Adm. William Fallon, who is poised to become the top American commander in the Middle East, says the United States miscalculated the ability of Iraqi forces to take control and underestimated the enemy's persistence.

ADVERTISEMENT

"Securing the stability of the country has been more difficult than anticipated," Fallon said in a written statement to the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Our ability to correctly assess the political, economic and security situation in Iraq has been lacking."

Fallon's remarks were submitted in advance of a confirmation hearing Tuesday. Fallon, who commands troops in the Pacific region, has been tapped to replace Army Gen. John Abizaid as head of the U.S. Central Command.

In addition Tuesday, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was expected to consider the nomination of John Negroponte, the first director of national intelligence, to become deputy secretary of state.

Fallon and Negroponte's confirmations were not expected to rouse Senate protests, despite bitter opposition in Congress to Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Public sentiment has turned strongly against a war that has dragged on for nearly four years with more than 3,000 American dead and violence unabated by insurgents and sectarian militias.

In remarks prepared for a speech Tuesday, Sen. Bill Nelson (news, bio, voting record), D-Fla., a member of the Armed Services Committee who recently returned from a trip to the region, said only another 200,000 or 300,000 U.S. troops would make a substantial difference in Iraq.

"Based on everything I saw last month, and based on my conversations with Iraqi officials, our own military leaders and rank-and-file soldiers, I am convinced more troops won't end the sectarian violence," Nelson said.

Nelson also was expected to deliver a sharp rebuke of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Nelson said al-Maliki "either lacks the will, or the nerve, to take on the Shiite militias."

Last week the Senate approved, 81-0, Bush's nomination of Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to head the Iraq war. Petraeus would work alongside Fallon, who would oversee military operations throughout the region, including Afghanistan.

During Petraeus' Jan. 23 confirmation hearing, senators questioned him on how Bush's new strategy would work and whether Congress should weigh in with a resolution of disapproval. Petraeus said the situation in Iraq was "dire" but not hopeless.

In his written remarks, Fallon told the Senate panel that the U.S. has "relearned" the need to hold secure an area "until Iraqi security forces and local political and economic activity have provided essential confidence to the population."

Fallon also said he believes the Pakistan government should do more to prevent al-Qaida operatives from crossing its border into Afghanistan and that Iran remains a serious threat to the region.

However, Fallon said Tehran was unlikely to produce a nuclear weapon until "mid-next decade."

"I sense that our allies in the region are more concerned about the potential threat posed by Iran now than at any time since the Iran-Iraq War," he wrote.

Petraeus is to arrive in Baghdad to take over for Gen. George Casey as the top U.S. commander in Iraq next week, a defense official said Monday. Casey, tapped to become the next Army chief of staff, will face the Senate Armed Services Committee on Thursday.

War Of The Water Cooler (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 30, 2007

Wars get odd names. My favorite is the War of Jenkins' Ear (1739 to 1741), but the one about the Roses is good and so is the Hundred Years' War and also the French and Indian War which, somehow, neglects to mention that the British were also involved. Usually, though, those names are wonderfully descriptive and more truthful than an Orwellian moniker such as Operation Just Cause, which was that silliness in Panama (1989), or Operation Iraqi Freedom, the present debacle in the desert. A better name for it would be the War of the Water Cooler. This, I'm sure, is where it all started.

You can scour the vast literature about the Iraq war and how it started and not find the single moment when George W. Bush decided he had to go to war -- and why. The minutes of all the pertinent meetings, all of them surely monitored by Bob Woodward, either have produced nothing or will produce nothing because nothing was produced in these meetings. This war, I am sure, was the product of what Dick Cheney said to Bush at the White House water cooler. No one was present to take any of this down on paper.

"God wants you to do this, Chief."

"Yes, I know."

It was an amazing thing and it was prodded, mind you, by one man who thought that the presidency had been critically weakened by post-Watergate reforms (Cheney) and another (Bush) who didn't think much at all about anything -- but knew his heart was pure and his soul even purer and his hearing so keen he could hear God himself. He said this, you will recall, on at least two occasions, once to Woodward himself and yet again when he met with leaders of the Palestinian Authority.

DOJ_NMG_0124299

"God told me to strike at al-Qaeda, and I struck them, and then he instructed me to strike at Saddam, which I did," Mahmoud Abbas quoted Bush as saying.

This is how the War of the Water Cooler started. I am sure of it, but no matter. In the intellectual style of Bush himself, it's immaterial that I can't prove my assertion; he cannot prove otherwise -- and that's what matters. In this case, it just so happens that the absence of a record is record enough to prove that the war started at the water cooler (if there is one, but no matter) and while it is true that Bush and Cheney cherry-picked the intelligence data and exaggerated it, what mattered above all is that they -- the two of them -- decided to go to war and the rest of the country just followed.

It's almost beside the point that Saddam Hussein lacked the weapons of mass destruction that were Bush's stated casus belli. By the time the war started, it was clear that Iraq had no nuclear weapons program to speak of -- Cheney lied about this -- and as for the rest, chemical and biological, why were they suddenly so menacing? After all, chemical weapons had first been used in World War I, and biological weapons, while plenty scary, were hardly practical. No one really knew how to make it work.

Two guys took us to war and now two guys keep us at war. The consensus of the country is that Bush/Cheney has failed. The president's approval ratings are lower than the average daily Washington temperature -- and it is winter, for crying out loud. Now Bush has authorized the so-called surge, which is meant to rectify the slide, the mess, the coming defeat. But to Cheney, there is no slide, no mess. "Bottom line is that we've had enormous successes and we will continue to have enormous successes," is the way he put it to CNN's Wolf Blitzer. This bizarre assessment, so at odds with truth, is a Rorschach of sorts and Cheney fails it stunningly.

But out in the hallway, at the water cooler that metaphorically exists, Cheney tells Bush he's winning and he's strong -- a regular Truman, another Lincoln and, not incidentally, another Nixon for his heroic reestablishment of the imperial presidency in aw-shucks garb. And out by the water cooler Bush nods. He is a strong president and a good president. He has fought evil and done what was asked of him -- and the fallen are heroes and the brave are in heaven and he will answer (as do Hebrew National salamis) to a higher authority. And if, by your own water cooler, you should think all this is absurd, consider this: The war goes on . . . and on . . . and on.

Our Options In Iraq (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

These are our options in Iraq: We can withdraw troops and equipment as fast as our Galaxys and Globemasters can carry them home (or to Okinawa). This is the Murtha Way. We can cap troop levels at 140,000 and withdraw them no later than Inauguration Day, 2009. This is Hillary's Way. We can redeploy our forces outside of Iraqi cities, conduct limited training and counterterrorism missions, urge reconciliation among the various political factions and seek diplomatic openings with Syria and Iran. This is the way of Sens. Chuck Hagel and Joe Biden. We can advocate and facilitate the partition of Iraq. This is the (Peter) Galbraith Way. Or we can surge troops into the toughest neighborhoods of Baghdad, Ramadi and Najaf and keep them there indefinitely.

That is the President's Way. It is going to mean many more American casualties -- perhaps as many in the months ahead as we've seen over the past four years. It may fail for lack of troops, or insufficient cooperation from the Iraqi government. It could be defeated in the field, or it could succeed -- only to be undermined in Washington, much as Gen. Creighton Abrams's 1972 battlefield victories in Vietnam were. It lacks an endgame. It's a political loser. But it is the only strategy on the table that aims at victory and has a chance of succeeding.

Consider the alternatives in their turn. The intelligent case for immediate withdrawal is that it means no more Americans need die in a war that is already lost. For Iraq, the consequences of American withdrawal will surely be grievous: ethnic cleansing on a massive scale; the collapse of the current government; the creation of an al Qaeda statelet in Anbar province; a rush by Iran, Saudi Arabia and perhaps Turkey to fill the vacuum; a regional war of Sunnis and Shiites and factions in between; a Mideast nuclear arms race.

Advocates of immediate withdrawal would counter that all this was foreordained by the invasion of Iraq (or at least by the bungled occupation) so it may as well happen sooner rather than later. But what are the consequences of immediate withdrawal for the U.S.? Well, see above, and ask yourself if it's a price the U.S. can afford to pay. Unless you agree with Boston Globe columnist James Carroll, who sees geopolitical catastrophe as a pathway to redeeming America's soul, the answer is probably not.

What about Hillary's Way? Its political convenience is to prevent Iraq from being a millstone around the neck of the next administration, presumably hers. Its strategic virtue is that it offers a window to get things right in Iraq, finally, and the pressure to do so quickly.

But it fails to address the obvious objection, which is that once a date-certain for U.S. withdrawal is set, Sunni insurgents, Shiite Mahdists and outside powers like Iran need only bide their time before moving in. And because of Sen. Clinton's proposed troop cap, it prevents the U.S. from sufficiently altering facts on the ground to give the Iraqi government a chance to stand on its own. Given the choice between postponed and immediate withdrawal, at least the latter stands to save American lives. Otherwise, the results are the same.

DOJ_NMG_0124300

Now take the Hagel-Biden Way, itself mostly a reprise of the recommendations of Jim Baker's Iraq Study Group. At a hearing last Wednesday of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Hagel waxed pontifical on the subject of "coherence of strategy," accusing the administration of having no coherent strategy either in the past or for the future. For his pains, and for standing on the right side of opinion polls, admiring pundits have praised the Nebraska Republican as a profile in political courage.

As for the merits of his own strategy, spelled out in a recent USA Today op-ed, that's another story. With Mr. Biden, the senator wants to redeploy U.S. forces outside of Iraqi cities. He seems to have missed the fact that, except for the politically critical Green Zone in Baghdad, that's where the troops have mainly been for two years, in keeping with the "light footprint" strategy that everyone now agrees failed. Next Mr. Hagel wants to "transfer responsibility for internal security and halting sectarian violence to Iraqi forces under an appropriately expedited timeline." Another interesting idea, given how much of the sectarian violence of the past few years has been instigated by elements within the Iraqi interior ministry.

And Mr. Hagel wants to "engage Iraq's neighbors and the international community to build a regional framework to help support and sustain a political solution and national reconciliation." Which neighbors would those be? Iran, which mass-produces IEDs and finances the most radical among Iraq's Shiite groups? Syria, which serves as sanctuary for Baathist holdouts and transfer point for Sunni insurgents? The "coherence" of the Hagel-Biden plan itself rests on the incoherent assumption that the regimes that so far have worked hardest to abort Iraq's rebirth as a federal and democratic state can now be enlisted to midwife the effort.

Finally there is partition. There is a seductive neatness to the idea that, by dividing Iraq into Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish states, one cuts the proverbial Gordian knot of the country's dysfunctional politics. But Iraq's population isn't so neatly divided, not least in Baghdad where one in four Iraqis live. How are they to be moved, resettled, compensated and so on?

Proponents of partition argue that such dilemmas are already in the process of resolving themselves, as Shiites and Sunnis abandon previously mixed neighborhoods. This is what logicians call the "Is-Ought" fallacy, and it would have the perverse effect of putting the U.S. behind the very forces of the sectarian aggression that so far we have sought to quell. Nor does it address the long-term question of just what kind of states Kurdistan, Basrastan and Fallujastan would become, whether they'd be viable, and whether they would be hostile or friendly to American interests.

Which leaves us with the Bush Way. It proposes to assume a responsibility -- the responsibility for everyday security -- the U.S. military relinquished when it first allowed Baghdad to be looted. And it takes as its premise the idea that "national reconciliation" in Iraq can only be accomplished in the absence of chaos. These are the fundamental responsibilities of an occupier. It's too bad we didn't do it sooner. That's no reason not to start now.

The American Iraq (WSJ)

By Fouad Ajami

The Wall Street Journal, January 30, 2007

So this government in Baghdad, fighting for its life, has not mastered even the grim science of the gallows, and has no knowledge of the "drop charts" used for hangings around the world. The Tikritis had been much better at this sort of thing. They had all the time in the world to perfect the skills and techniques of terror; they had done it against the background of relative indifference by outside powers. And they had the indulgence of the neighboring Arabs who gave their warrant to all that played out in Iraq under the Tikriti despotism.

Pity those men now hunkered down in Baghdad as they walk a fine, thin line between the yearning for justice and retribution in their land, and the scrutiny of the outside world. In the annals of Arab history, the Shia have been strangers to power, rebels and dissidents and men on the run hunted down by official power. Now the ground has shifted in Baghdad, and an Arab world steeped in tyranny reproaches a Shia-led government sitting atop a volcano. America's "regional diplomacy" -- the name for our earnest but futile entreaties to the Arab rulers -- will not reconcile the Arab regimes to the rise of the Shia outcasts.

In the fullness of time, the Arab order of power will have to come to a grudging acceptance of the order sure to take hold in Baghdad. This is a region that respects the prerogatives of power. It had once resisted the coming to power of the Alawites in Syria and then learned to accommodate that "heretical" minority sect and its conquest of Damascus; the Shia path in Iraq will follow that trajectory, and its justice is infinitely greater for it is the ascendancy of a demographic majority, through the weight of numbers and the ballot box. Of all Arab lands, Iraq is the most checkered, a frontier country at the crossroads of Arabia, Turkey and Persia. The Sunni Arabs in Iraq and beyond have never accepted the diversity of that land. The "Arabism" of the place was synonymous with their own primacy. Now a binational state in all but name (Arab and Kurdish) has come into being in Iraq, and the Shia underclass have stepped forth and staked a claim commensurate with the weight of their numbers. The Sunni Arabs have recoiled from this change in their fortunes. They have all but "Persianized" the Shia of Iraq, branded them as a fifth column of the state next door. Contemporary Islamism has sharpened this feud, for to the Sunni Islamists the Shia are heretics at odds with the forbidding strictures of the Islamists' fanatical variant of the faith.

DOJ_NMG_0124301

Baghdad, a city founded by the Abbasid Caliph al-Mansour in 762, was sacked by the Mongols in 1258: The invaders put it to the sword, and dumped its books and libraries in the Tigris. In the (Sunni) legend, a Shia minister by the name of Ibn Alqami had opened the gates of the city to the invaders. History never relents here. In a commentary that followed the execution of Saddam, a Palestinian commentator in the West Bank city of Jenin wrote in a pan-Arab daily in London that a descendant of Ibn Alqami (read Nouri al-Maliki) had put to death a descendant of al-Mansour.

These kinds of atavisms cannot be conciliated. The truth of Iraq will assert itself on the ground, but the age of Sunni monopoly on power has passed. One of Iraq's most respected scholar-diplomats, Hassan al-Alawi, has put the matter in stark terms. It is proper, he said, to speak of an "American Iraq" as one does of a Sumerian, a Babylonian, an Abbasid, an Ottoman, and then a British Iraq. Where Iraq in the age of the Pax Britannica rested on an "Anglo-Sunni" regime, this new Iraq, in the time of the Americans, is by the logic of things an American-Shia regime. The militant preachers railing against the fall of Baghdad to an alliance of the "American crusaders" and the "Shia heretics" are the bearers of a dark, but intensely felt conviction. We should not be apologetic, in Arab lands seething with bigotry and rage, about our expedition into Iraq. We shouldn't fall for Arab rulers who tell us that they would have had the ability to call off the furies had we had in place a "process" for resolving the claims of the Palestinians, and had we been able to "deliver" Israel. Those furies have a life of their own: In truth, they are aided and abetted by these same rulers in the hope of tranquilizing their own domains and buying off the embittered in their midst.

The Sunni Arab regimes, it has to be noted, are not of one mind on Iraq. Curiously, the Arab state most likely to make peace with the new reality of Iraq is Saudi Arabia; those most hostile are the Jordanians, the Egyptians and the Palestinians. The Saudi monarch, King Abdullah, has read the wind with accuracy; he has a Shia minority in his domain, in the oil-bearing lands of the Eastern Province, and he seems eager to cap the Wahhabi volcano in the Najdi heartland of his kingdom. There is pragmatism in that realm, and the place lives by its own coin. In contrast, Jordan and Egypt present the odd spectacle of countries heavily invested in an anti-Shia drive but with no Shia citizenry in their midst. The two regimes derive a good measure of their revenues from "strategic rent" -- the aid of foreign powers, the subsidies of Pax Americana to be exact. The threat of Shiism is a good, and lucrative, scarecrow for the rulers in Cairo and Amman. The promise of standing sentry in defense of the Sunni order is what these two regimes have to offer both America and the oil states.

The Palestinians, weaker in the scale of power and with troubles of their own, are in the end of little consequence to the strategic alignment in the region. But to the extent that their "street" and their pundits matter, they can be counted upon to view the rise of this new Iraq with reserve and outright hostility. For six decades, the Palestinians have had a virtual monopoly on pan-Arab sentiments, and the Arabic-speaking world indulged them. Iraq -- its wounds, and the promise of its power and resources -- has been a direct challenge to the Palestinians and to their conception of their place in the Arab scheme of things. A seam is stitched in Palestinian society between its Muslim majority and its minority Christian communities. Palestinians have little by way of exposure to the Shia. To the bitter end, the Palestinian street remained enamored of Saddam Hussein. Iraq's Shia majority has returned the favor, and has come to view the Palestinians and their cause with considerable suspicion.

For our part, the Pax Americana has not been at peace with the Shia genie it had called forth. We did not know the Shia to begin with; we saw them through the prism of our experience with Iran. Moqtada al-Sadr in Baghdad and Hassan Nasrallah in Beirut: This was the face of the new Shiism and we were spooked by it. And we were susceptible as well to the representations made to us by Arab rulers about the dangers of radical Shiism.

This was odd: We had been in the midst of a searing battle with al Qaeda and the Taliban, zealous Sunni movements, but we were still giving credence to the Arab warnings about the threat of Shiism. Nor were the Shia who would finally claim power in Iraq possessed of an appreciable understanding of American ways. Nouri al-Maliki speaks not a word of English; with years of exile in Syria behind him, he was at considerable disadvantage in dealing with the American presence in his country. He and the political class around him lacked the traffic with American diplomacy that had seasoned their counterparts in Cairo, Amman and the Arabian Peninsula. Without that intimacy, they had been given to premonitions that America could yet strike a bargain, at their expense, with the Sunni order of power.

We held aloft the banner of democracy, but in recent months our faith in democracy's possibilities in Iraq has appeared to erode, and this unnerves the Shia political class. President Bush's setback in the congressional elections gave the Iraqis legitimate cause for concern: Prime Minister Maliki himself wondered aloud whether this was the beginning of a general American retreat in Iraq. And there was that brief moment when it seemed as though the "realists" of the James Baker variety were in the midst of a restoration. The Shia (and the Kurds) needed no deep literacy in strategic matters to read the mind of Mr. Baker. His brand of realism was anathema to people who tell their history in metaphors of justice and betrayal. He was a known entity in Iraq; he had been the steward of American foreign policy when America walked away, in 1991, from the Kurdish and Shia rebellions it had called for. The political class in Baghdad couldn't have known that the Baker-Hamilton recommendations would die on the vine, and that President Bush would pay these recommendations scant attention. The American position was not transparent, and there were in the air rumors of retrenchment, and thus legitimate Iraqi fears that the American presence in Baghdad could be bartered away in some accommodation with the powers in Iraq's neighborhood.

DOJ_NMG_0124302

These fears were to be allayed, but not put to rest, by the military "surge" that President Bush announced in recent days. More than a military endeavor, the surge can be seen as a declaration by the president that deliverance would be sought in Baghdad, and not in deals with the rogues (Syria and Iran) or with the Sunni Arab states. Prime Minister Maliki and the coalition that sustains his government could not know for certain if this was the proverbial "extra mile" before casting them adrift, or the sure promise that this president would stay with them for the remainder of his time in office.

But there can be no denying that with the surge the landscape has altered in Baghdad, and that Mr. Bush is invested in the Maliki government as never before. Mr. Maliki's predecessor -- a man who belongs to the same political party and hails from the same traditional Shia political class -- was forced out of office by an American veto and Mr. Maliki could be forgiven his suspicion that the Americans might try this again. It was known that he had never taken to the American envoy, Zalmay Khalilzad, and that he fully understood that American officials would rather have other Shia contenders in his post -- our old standby Ayad Allawi, the current vice president Adel Abdul Mahdi, both more worldly men at ease with American ways. So if this is America's extra mile in Baghdad, it has to be traversed with a political leader whose abilities and intentions have been repeatedly called into question by American officials.

This marriage of convenience may be the best that can be hoped for. Mr. Maliki will not do America's bidding, and we should be grateful for his displays of independence. He straddles the fence between the things we want him to do -- disarming the militias, walking away from Moqtada al-Sadr -- and the requirements of political survival. We have been waiting for the Iraqis to assume responsibility for their own affairs and we should not be disconcerted when they take us at our word. The messages put out by American officials now and then, that Mr. Maliki is living on borrowed time, and the administered leaks of warnings he has been given by President Bush, serve only to undermine whatever goals we seek in Baghdad.

With Saddam's execution, this prime minister has made himself a power in the vast Shia mainstream. Having removed Ibrahim Jaafari from office last year, the American regency is doomed to live with Mr. Maliki, for a policy that attempts to unseat him is sure to strip Iraqis of any sense that they are sovereign in their own country. He cannot be granted a blank check, but no small measure of America's success in Iraq now depends on him. If he is to fall, the deed must be an affair of the Iraqis, and of the broad Shia coalition to be exact. He may now to able to strike at renegade elements of the Mahdi Army, for that movement that once answered to Moqtada al-Sadr and carried his banners has splintered into gangs led by bandit warlords. In our concern with Moqtada al-Sadr and the Mahdi Army, we ought to understand the reluctance of Mr. Maliki's ruling coalition to take on the Shia militias. The terror inflicted on the Shia -- an unrelenting affair of the last three years -- makes it extremely difficult for a Shia-led government to disarm men who pose as defenders of a community still under brutal siege.

Boldness and despair may have come together to carry forward this new drive in Baghdad. Fear of failure often concentrates the mind, and President Bush's policy could yet find its target right as the skeptics have written off this whole project in Baghdad. Iraq has had its way of meting out disappointments at every turn, but the tide of events appears to be working in the president's favor.

There is a "balance of terror" today between the Sunni and Shia protagonists. More and more Sunni Arabs know that their old dominion is lost, and that they had better take the offer on the table -- a share of the oil revenues, the promise that the constitution could be amended and reviewed, access to political power and spoils in return for reining in the violence and banishing the Arab jihadists. The Shia, too, may have to come to a time of reckoning. Their old tormentor was sent to the gallows, and a kinsman of theirs did the deed with the seal of the state. From the poor Shia slums of Baghdad, young avengers answered the Sunni campaign of terror with brutal terror of their own. The old notion -- once dear to the Sunnis, and to the Shia a nagging source of fear and shame -- that the Sunnis of Iraq were a martial race while the Shia were marked for lamentations and political quiescence has been broken for good.

The country has been fought over, and a verdict can already be discerned -- rough balance between its erstwhile Sunni rulers and its Shia inheritors, and a special, autonomous life for the Kurds. Against all dire expectations, the all-important question of the distribution of oil wealth appears close to a resolution. The design for sharing the bounty is a "federal" one that strikes a balance between central government and regional claimants. The nightmare of the Sunni Arabs that they would be left stranded in regions of sand and gravel has been averted.

This is the country midwifed by American power. We were never meant to stay there long. Iraq will never approximate the expectations we projected onto it in more innocent times. But we should be able to grant it the gift of acceptance, and yet another dose of patience as it works its way out of its current torments. It is said that much of the war's nobility has drained out of it, and that we now fight not to lose, and to keep intact our larger position in the oil lands of the Arabian Peninsula and the Persian Gulf. This may not be the stuff of glory, but it has power and legitimacy all its own.

DOJ_NMG_0124303

Mr. Ajami is a 2006 recipient of the Bradley Prize, teaches at Johns Hopkins and is author of "The Foreigner's Gift: The Americans, the Arabs, and the Iraqis in Iraq" (Free Press, 2006).

A League Of Their Own (NYT)

By Milton Viorst

The New York Times, January 30, 2007

Washington

PRESIDENT BUSH seems not to have noticed, but what stands between hostile sectarian forces and the resumption of all-out civil war in Lebanon is the Arab League, whose diplomacy 17 years ago put an end to a conflict in which tens of thousands of Lebanese died. Is there not a lesson here, for the president and the Democratic Congress, that is applicable to Iraq?

The Beirut face-off is the follow-up to last summer's war, in which Hezbollah, the Shiite party supported by Syria and Iran, held off the more powerful Israelis long enough to achieve a United Nations cease-fire on favorable terms. Now Hezbollah challenges the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, which is supported by the bulk of Lebanon's Sunni, Christian and Druse population, as well as the United States.

